Today the main historical library of the Church is maintained and supervised by the Historical Department of the Church in Salt Lake City. It strives to maintain as complete a collection as possible on the Mormon experience throughout the world. It holds a copy of each edition, in each language, of all official Church publications. It attempts to collect all publications in which the Church or the Latter-day Saints are mentioned. It also holds a significant collection of works published by and about SCHISMATIC GROUPS that follow teachings of Joseph Smith or the Book of Mormon.

Perhaps best known of all the LDS Libraries is the FAMILY HISTORY LIBRARY. With approximately 1.6 million reels of microfilm, containing raw genealogical data and copies of published books, as well as a collection of some 200,000 hard-copy volumes, the Family History Library is used by genealogists throughout the world. Its resources are available through a network of over 1,500 local LDS Family History Centers, each staffed by volunteers. Each library has a catalog of the main library's holdings and may order microfilm copies of most of the collection. In addition, the Church operates libraries/media centers in each of its meetinghouses to support the curriculum of the Church's teaching organizations.

Many college and university libraries, as well as other research institutions, hold significant collections on the Mormons and the Church. BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY, Utah State University, and the University of Utah all have important Mormon collections. The other colleges and universities in Utah also hold notable materials, as do the Utah State Historical Society, the Daughters of Utah Pioneers Museum, and the Utah State Archives. Outside of Utah, the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C., has collected much published material on the Latter-day Saints. The National Archives has many records documenting the federal government's involvement with the Mormons and the Utah territory. Research collections at Yale University, the New York Public Library, Princeton University, the University of Michigan, the Historical Office of the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS, the University of California at Berkeley, and the Huntington Library (San Marino, California), as well as many other libraries throughout the West, can be resources for scholars searching for LDS materials. Indeed, Mormon-related records may be found in any of the hundreds of archives and manuscript libraries throughout the United States.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Evans, Max J. "A History of the Public Library Movement in Utah." Master's thesis, Utah State University, 1971.
- , and Ronald G. Watt. "Sources for Western History at the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." Western Historical Quarterly 8 (July 1977):303–312.

MAX J. EVANS

---

LIFE AND DEATH, SPIRITUAL

Unlike physical life and death, over which individuals have little control, spiritual life and death are opposite poles between which a choice is required. Latter-day scripture states that all people "are free to choose liberty and eternal life, through the great Mediator of all men, or to choose captivity and death, according to the captivity and power of the devil" (2 Ne. 2:27). This opposition between life and death is viewed as the fundamental dichotomy of all existence.

At one pole is Jesus Christ, who is described throughout the scriptures as light and life (e.g., John 1:4; 3 Ne. 15:9; D&C 10:70). He is the author both of physical life, as the creator of the earth and its life-sustaining sun (D&C 88:7), and of spiritual life, as the giver of eternal life (3 Ne. 15:9). To choose life is to follow him on a path that leads to freedom and eternal life.

Satan, at the opposite pole, is darkness and death (e.g., Rom. 6:23; Alma 15:17; D&C 24:1). He is the author of temporal death, as the one who enticed Adam and Eve to initiate the Fall, and of spiritual death, as the tempter who induces individuals to separate themselves from God through tions are no longer sent to the Archives, and the Manuscript Histories have been replaced by brief annual historical reports.

In the early days of the Church, leaders sought after texts that demonstrated a broad-based learning and cultural understanding. A library was established in Nauvoo in the Seventies Hall that contained many books, including those brought by missionaries who had served abroad. Although the disposition of the Nauvoo library is not known, the Latter-day Saints continued to maintain libraries after they moved west.

Today the main historical library of the Church is maintained and supervised by the Historical Department of the Church in Salt Lake City. It strives to maintain as complete a collection as possible on the Mormon experience throughout the world. It holds a copy of each edition, in each language, of all official Church publications. It attempts to collect all publications in which the Church or the Latter-day Saints are mentioned. It also holds a significant collection of works published by and about SCHISMATIC GROUPS that follow teachings of Joseph Smith or the Book of Mormon.

Perhaps best known of all the LDS Libraries is the FAMILY HISTORY LIBRARY. With approximately 1.6 million reels of microfilm, containing raw genealogical data and copies of published books, as well as a collection of some 200,000 hard-copy volumes, the Family History Library is used by genealogists throughout the world. Its resources are available through a network of over 1,500 local LDS Family History Centers, each staffed by volunteers. Each library has a catalog of the main library's holdings and may order microfilm copies of most of the collection. In addition, the Church operates libraries/media centers in each of its meetinghouses to support the curriculum of the Church's teaching organizations.

Many college and university libraries, as well as other research institutions, hold significant collections on the Mormons and the Church. BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY, Utah State University, and the University of Utah all have important Mormon collections. The other colleges and universities in Utah also hold notable materials, as do the Utah State Historical Society, the Daughters of Utah Pioneers Museum, and the Utah State Archives. Outside of Utah, the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C., has collected much published material on the Latter-day Saints. The National Archives has many records documenting the federal government's involvement with the Mormons and the Utah territory. Research collections at Yale University, the New York Public Library, Princeton University, the University of Michigan, the Historical Office of the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS, the University of California at Berkeley, and the Huntington Library (San Marino, California), as well as many other libraries throughout the West, can be resources for scholars searching for LDS materials. Indeed, Mormon-related records may be found in any of the hundreds of archives and manuscript libraries throughout the United States.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Evans, Max J. "A History of the Public Library Movement in Utah." Master's thesis, Utah State University, 1971.
- , and Ronald G. Watt. "Sources for Western History at the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." Western Historical Quarterly 8 (July 1977):303–312.

MAX J. EVANS

---

LIFE AND DEATH, SPIRITUAL

Unlike physical life and death, over which individuals have little control, spiritual life and death are opposite poles between which a choice is required. Latter-day scripture states that all people "are free to choose liberty and eternal life, through the great Mediator of all men, or to choose captivity and death, according to the captivity and power of the devil" (2 Ne. 2:27). This opposition between life and death is viewed as the fundamental dichotomy of all existence.

At one pole is Jesus Christ, who is described throughout the scriptures as light and life (e.g., John 1:4; 3 Ne. 15:9; D&C 10:70). He is the author both of physical life, as the creator of the earth and its life-sustaining sun (D&C 88:7), and of spiritual life, as the giver of eternal life (3 Ne. 15:9). To choose life is to follow him on a path that leads to freedom and eternal life.

Satan, at the opposite pole, is darkness and death (e.g., Rom. 6:23; Alma 15:17; D&C 24:1). He is the author of temporal death, as the one who enticed Adam and Eve to initiate the Fall, and of spiritual death, as the tempter who induces individuals to separate themselves from God through sin. To choose to follow Satan by succumbing to sin and resisting Christ's entreaties to repent is to choose death.

The freedom to choose effectively between life and death is a result of the redemption of Christ (2 Ne. 2:27), and it is God's work and glory "to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man" (Moses 1:39).

The scriptures speak of two SPIRITUAL DEATHS. The first has already come upon all humans as a result of the Fall, separating "all mankind . . . from the presence of the Lord" (Hel. 14:16). The second will be experienced by only those who, having once known Christ, willfully deny him and refuse to repent, being thus "cut off again as to things pertaining to righteousness" (Hel. 14:18). Spiritual death does not mean that a person's spirit literally has died (the spirit is immortal), but that one is in "a state of spiritual alienation from God" (Smith, Vol. 1, p. 45), a death "as to things pertaining unto righteousness" (Alma 12:16; 40:26).

Because little children are not capable of sinning (Moro. 8:10–14), the first spiritual death does not begin for an individual on the earth until the age of ACCOUNTABILITY (eight years of age; D&C 68:27). Generally, as individuals mature they begin to recognize the consequences of their acts and become responsible for them (D&C 18:42). Insofar as they do not harmonize behavior with an understanding of truth and goodness, they create a gulf between themselves and God—that is, spiritual death.

The first step toward overcoming this state was taken, paradoxically, before the Fall occurred: in premortal life. All who have been or will be born on this earth chose both physical and spiritual life when as spirit children of God they chose to follow the Father's plan for earth life. After they reach the age of accountability during earth life, they must again choose.

According to LDS understanding, the choice between spiritual life and death is made at the time of BAPTISM and CONFIRMATION, the ordinances that symbolically reconcile a person to God and initiate a lifetime process of spiritual rebirth. Once baptismal covenants are made and the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST is conferred and received, the symbolic rebirth must be made actual through the day-to-day struggle to repent and choose life—Christ and righteousness. The choice is not made once and for all, but many times during a lifetime.

Latter-day Saints do not view righteousness simply as a way to avoid an unpleasant AFTERLIFE and gain a heavenly reward. Following Christ is also the path to happiness in mortal life. As people harmonize their lives with God's laws, they are "blessed in all things, both temporal and spiritual" (Mosiah 2:41). In Christ is life abundant (John 10:10); "if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments" (Matt. 19:17).

In an everyday sense, choosing life for the Latter-day Saint should include loving and serving others, praying and studying the words of God daily, sharing knowledge of Christ and his plan with others, speaking the truth, remaining chaste before marriage and faithful after marriage, rearing children with patience and love, and being honest in all things. Enjoying such things constitutes the abundant life.

In the postmortal period, "life" again depends upon Christ's ATONEMENT, which overcomes the first spiritual death by making it possible for all men and women to come into God's presence to be judged. At that point, everyone will be judged worthy of a DEGREE OF GLORY and its quality of life except the SONS OF PERDITION. These individuals suffer the second spiritual death for having committed the unpardonable sin, which is denying Christ in the face of full knowledge and truth (D&C 76:30–38; HC 6:314).

[See also Eternal Life; Lifestyle; Opposition; Spiritual Death.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hunter, Howard W. "The Golden Thread of Choice." Ensign 19 (Nov. 1989):17–18.
Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS, 3 vols.

SUE BERGIN

---

LIFESTYLE

Early Latter-day Saints, who typically gathered into their own communities and shared cultural and religious concepts and experiences, developed a distinctive lifestyle that helped overcome differences in social class or a variety of geographic and religious backgrounds among members of the fledgling Church. The members, mostly former Protestants from New England, New York, Ohio, eastern Canada, the British Isles, and Scandinavia, had compatible Christian and social values, and a sin. To choose to follow Satan by succumbing to sin and resisting Christ's entreaties to repent is to choose death.

The freedom to choose effectively between life and death is a result of the redemption of Christ (2 Ne. 2:27), and it is God's work and glory "to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man" (Moses 1:39).

The scriptures speak of two SPIRITUAL DEATHS. The first has already come upon all humans as a result of the Fall, separating "all mankind . . . from the presence of the Lord" (Hel. 14:16). The second will be experienced by only those who, having once known Christ, willfully deny him and refuse to repent, being thus "cut off again as to things pertaining to righteousness" (Hel. 14:18). Spiritual death does not mean that a person's spirit literally has died (the spirit is immortal), but that one is in "a state of spiritual alienation from God" (Smith, Vol. 1, p. 45), a death "as to things pertaining unto righteousness" (Alma 12:16; 40:26).

Because little children are not capable of sinning (Moro. 8:10–14), the first spiritual death does not begin for an individual on the earth until the age of ACCOUNTABILITY (eight years of age; D&C 68:27). Generally, as individuals mature they begin to recognize the consequences of their acts and become responsible for them (D&C 18:42). Insofar as they do not harmonize behavior with an understanding of truth and goodness, they create a gulf between themselves and God—that is, spiritual death.

The first step toward overcoming this state was taken, paradoxically, before the Fall occurred: in premortal life. All who have been or will be born on this earth chose both physical and spiritual life when as spirit children of God they chose to follow the Father's plan for earth life. After they reach the age of accountability during earth life, they must again choose.

According to LDS understanding, the choice between spiritual life and death is made at the time of BAPTISM and CONFIRMATION, the ordinances that symbolically reconcile a person to God and initiate a lifetime process of spiritual rebirth. Once baptismal covenants are made and the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST is conferred and received, the symbolic rebirth must be made actual through the day-to-day struggle to repent and choose life—Christ and righteousness. The choice is not made once and for all, but many times during a lifetime.

Latter-day Saints do not view righteousness simply as a way to avoid an unpleasant AFTERLIFE and gain a heavenly reward. Following Christ is also the path to happiness in mortal life. As people harmonize their lives with God's laws, they are "blessed in all things, both temporal and spiritual" (Mosiah 2:41). In Christ is life abundant (John 10:10); "if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments" (Matt. 19:17).

In an everyday sense, choosing life for the Latter-day Saint should include loving and serving others, praying and studying the words of God daily, sharing knowledge of Christ and his plan with others, speaking the truth, remaining chaste before marriage and faithful after marriage, rearing children with patience and love, and being honest in all things. Enjoying such things constitutes the abundant life.

In the postmortal period, "life" again depends upon Christ's ATONEMENT, which overcomes the first spiritual death by making it possible for all men and women to come into God's presence to be judged. At that point, everyone will be judged worthy of a DEGREE OF GLORY and its quality of life except the SONS OF PERDITION. These individuals suffer the second spiritual death for having committed the unpardonable sin, which is denying Christ in the face of full knowledge and truth (D&C 76:30–38; HC 6:314).

[See also Eternal Life; Lifestyle; Opposition; Spiritual Death.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hunter, Howard W. "The Golden Thread of Choice." Ensign 19 (Nov. 1989):17–18.
Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS, 3 vols.

SUE BERGIN

---

LIFESTYLE

Early Latter-day Saints, who typically gathered into their own communities and shared cultural and religious concepts and experiences, developed a distinctive lifestyle that helped overcome differences in social class or a variety of geographic and religious backgrounds among members of the fledgling Church. The members, mostly former Protestants from New England, New York, Ohio, eastern Canada, the British Isles, and Scandinavia, had compatible Christian and social values, and a shared purpose in building Zion and in creating the culture of their communities. A century and a half later, with more than seven million Latter-day Saints living throughout the world in a multitude of nations and in varied circumstances, the LDS lifestyle continues to be focused on shared personal beliefs and the desires to progress toward exaltation and to build up the kingdom of God on earth.

In the 1940s, more than a century after the Church was established, its one million members were concentrated largely in the western United States. Converts had tended to migrate to join the main body of the Church, and many Utah Church members and leaders were descended from early pioneers. In these circumstances, a concept of LDS lifestyle became clearly defined. Religious observance and participation in Church programs became almost inseparable from other aspects of life in communities comprised largely of Church members. The people with whom one worshiped at Church were also one's neighbors, schoolmates, and associates at work.

This lifestyle, especially in the LDS towns of the rural Intermountain West, was family-oriented and home- and Church-centered. Self-sufficiency through gardening, canning, sewing, and bread-making, and also commitment to hard work, service, duty, thrift, and education were shared cultural patterns and values. The lifestyle, based upon practical considerations, cultural heritage, and family traditions as well as Church teachings, reflected the influence of pioneer agrarian values, the independence and vigor of western frontiersmanship, and New England Puritanism. This lifestyle pervaded LDS society in North America, and even beyond as the Church began to expand rapidly throughout the world in the decades following World War II.

Today, Latter-day Saints make up groups ranging from entire small towns in Utah and surrounding states to small congregations of only a few individuals or families in other areas and countries. Latter-day Saints are now encouraged to build up the Church in their home areas rather than migrate to Utah. Converts retain national and family traditions while adopting the religion and moral teachings and activities of the Church.

While Latter-day Saints throughout the world feel a common spiritual heritage and devotion to their faith, their daily lives may vary considerably. Nevertheless, there are certain shared patterns of LDS lifestyle practiced throughout the world by faithful members regardless of language or cultural differences. These practices identify the members and families as Latter-day Saints and constitute a bond and similarity of values among members—even where there is significant cultural diversity.

A typical day begins and ends with individual and family prayer, and includes scripture study. The WORD OF WISDOM affects a Latter-day Saint's choices in food and drink. Clothing choices are influenced by teachings on modesty. Gospel teachings influence somewhat the choice of an occupation and affect one's conduct while at work, school, and home. Active Church members feel they should be good examples of Jesus Christ's message to their families and all other associates (see MISSIONS). Members' commitment to TITHING and to making other contributions to the Church affects financial decisions. Latter-day Saints who live their religion avoid profanity and entertainment that advocates or encourages immorality. Many members have CALLINGS requiring significant weekly or even daily commitments of time and energy.

Church members are taught that they should establish valuative priorities in order to avoid becoming overwhelmed by the many demands on their time and energies. Important decisions are often made in consultation with one's spouse, parents, or perhaps the entire family, and with the Lord through prayer (cf. D&C 9:8–9). Since there are more opportunities and obligations available than one person can possibly fulfill, Latter-day Saints try to direct their energies by wise individual choices through thought, prayer, consultation with Church leaders, and personal inspiration through the guidance of the HOLY GHOST. Such resources help them decide what is most important at any given time. The influence of Church culture, especially in the United States, is sufficiently strong that even those who become disaffected and no longer participate in LDS religious activities often continue to describe themselves as “cultural Mormons.”

Each close-knit community of Saints may have distinctive characteristics, depending upon the area where such Church members live. Ideally, a Church MEETINGHOUSE, whether in a large or small ward, or involving a scattered few members, becomes a second home, a place where one is accepted, loved, helped, and given the opportunity to participate. A sense of belonging, both to the local ward or branch and to the worldwide community of those who have accepted the name of Christ through baptism and are bound to him by covenant, is the foundation of the spiritual and emotional life, as well as the practical daily life, of the Latter-day Saint.

[See also Civic Duties; Community; Enduring to the End; Family Life; Individuality; Joining the Church; Lay Participation and Leadership; "Peculiar" People; Self-sufficiency.]

JAROLDEEN EDWARDS

LIGHT OF CHRIST

The light of Christ refers to the spiritual power that emanates from God to fill the immensity of space and enlightens every man, woman, and child. Other terms sometimes used to denote this same phenomenon are HOLY SPIRIT, "Spirit of the Lord," and "Spirit of Truth," but it is different from the HOLY GHOST. The scriptures are not always precise in the use of such terminology, and several attempts have been made to describe the various aspects of this important manifestation of God's goodness and being.

Jesus Christ is the light and life of the world (John 8:12; 3 Ne. 15:9). This light is described in the Doctrine and Covenants as "the same light that quickeneth your understandings; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God to fill the immensity of space—the light which is in all things, which giveth life to all things, which is the law by which all things are governed, even the power of God who sitteth upon his throne, who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things (D&C 88:11–13). B. H. Roberts, a seventy, interpreted this to mean that the light of Christ is a creative power, a governing power, a life-giving power, and an "intelligence-inspiring power" (Roberts, 2:7–8).

This light manifests itself in different ways and degrees. In its "less refined existence," wrote Parley P. Pratt, it is visible as sunlight. It is also the refined "intellectual light of our inward and spiritual organs, by which we reason, discern, judge, compare, comprehend, and remember the subjects within our reach." It is revealed as instinct in animals, reason in man, and vision in the prophets (p. 25).

John A. Widtsoe gave this general description of the emanation of God's power: "God is a personal being of body—a body limited in extent. He cannot, therefore, at a given moment be personally everywhere. . . . By his power, will and word, [he] is everywhere present. . . . The holy spirit permeates all the things of the universe, material and spiritual" (Widtsoe, pp. 68–69).

Since God possesses a fulness of this power and man only a small portion, it becomes a goal of Latter-day Saints to receive more of this light, which for the faithful grows "brighter and brighter until the perfect day" (D&C 50:24). Initially, this "Spirit giveth light to every man that cometh into the world" (D&C 84:46; see also John 1:9; Moro. 7:16). It equips all people with a basic discernment of good and evil, which Latter-day Saints often equate with conscience. By listening to the promptings of the Spirit one is led via faith and baptism to a higher spiritual blessing called the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST, "a greater and higher endowment of the same Spirit which enlightens every man that comes into the world" (C. W. Penrose, JD 23:350). Continued progression will eventually lead to a fulness of the Spirit, or glorification in the CELESTIAL KINGDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Pratt, Parley P. Key to the Science of Theology. Salt Lake City, 1979.
- Roberts, B. H. Seventy's Course in Theology, 5 vols. Salt Lake City, 1907–1912; Vol. 3 on the doctrine of deity and Vol. 5 on divine immanence.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS, Vol. I, pp. 49–54.
- Widtsoe, John A. A Rational Theology. Salt Lake City, 1915.

G. KENT DUNFORD

LIGHT AND DARKNESS

Many juxtapositions of light and darkness are identifiable in latter-day scripture. Darkness was apparently the primeval condition (Gen. 1:2; Moses 2:2; Abr. 4:2). Light was introduced by the divine word: "Let there be light: and there was light" (Gen. 1:3; Moses 2:3; Abr. 4:3). It was decreed "good" and was divided from the darkness, light being known as "day" and darkness as "night" (Gen. 1:4–5; Moses 2:4–5; Abr. 4:4–5). The account in Abraham adds that "they (the gods) comprehended the light, for it was bright" (Abr. 4:4; see also GODHEAD; CREATION AND CREATION ACCOUNTS).

nity of those who have accepted the name of Christ through baptism and are bound to him by covenant, is the foundation of the spiritual and emotional life, as well as the practical daily life, of the Latter-day Saint.

[See also Civic Duties; Community; Enduring to the End; Family Life; Individuality; Joining the Church; Lay Participation and Leadership; "Peculiar" People; Self-sufficiency.]

JAROLDEEN EDWARDS

LIGHT OF CHRIST

The light of Christ refers to the spiritual power that emanates from God to fill the immensity of space and enlightens every man, woman, and child. Other terms sometimes used to denote this same phenomenon are HOLY SPIRIT, "Spirit of the Lord," and "Spirit of Truth," but it is different from the HOLY GHOST. The scriptures are not always precise in the use of such terminology, and several attempts have been made to describe the various aspects of this important manifestation of God's goodness and being.

Jesus Christ is the light and life of the world (John 8:12; 3 Ne. 15:9). This light is described in the Doctrine and Covenants as "the same light that quickeneth your understandings; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God to fill the immensity of space—the light which is in all things, which giveth life to all things, which is the law by which all things are governed, even the power of God who sitteth upon his throne, who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things (D&C 88:11–13). B. H. Roberts, a seventy, interpreted this to mean that the light of Christ is a creative power, a governing power, a life-giving power, and an "intelligence-inspiring power" (Roberts, 2:7–8).

This light manifests itself in different ways and degrees. In its "less refined existence," wrote Parley P. Pratt, it is visible as sunlight. It is also the refined "intellectual light of our inward and spiritual organs, by which we reason, discern, judge, compare, comprehend, and remember the subjects within our reach." It is revealed as instinct in animals, reason in man, and vision in the prophets (p. 25).

John A. Widtsoe gave this general description of the emanation of God's power: "God is a personal being of body—a body limited in extent. He cannot, therefore, at a given moment be personally everywhere. . . . By his power, will and word, [he] is everywhere present. . . . The holy spirit permeates all the things of the universe, material and spiritual" (Widtsoe, pp. 68–69).

Since God possesses a fulness of this power and man only a small portion, it becomes a goal of Latter-day Saints to receive more of this light, which for the faithful grows "brighter and brighter until the perfect day" (D&C 50:24). Initially, this "Spirit giveth light to every man that cometh into the world" (D&C 84:46; see also John 1:9; Moro. 7:16). It equips all people with a basic discernment of good and evil, which Latter-day Saints often equate with conscience. By listening to the promptings of the Spirit one is led via faith and baptism to a higher spiritual blessing called the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST, "a greater and higher endowment of the same Spirit which enlightens every man that comes into the world" (C. W. Penrose, JD 23:350). Continued progression will eventually lead to a fulness of the Spirit, or glorification in the CELESTIAL KINGDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Pratt, Parley P. Key to the Science of Theology. Salt Lake City, 1979.
- Roberts, B. H. Seventy's Course in Theology, 5 vols. Salt Lake City, 1907–1912; Vol. 3 on the doctrine of deity and Vol. 5 on divine immanence.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS, Vol. I, pp. 49–54.
- Widtsoe, John A. A Rational Theology. Salt Lake City, 1915.

G. KENT DUNFORD

LIGHT AND DARKNESS

Many juxtapositions of light and darkness are identifiable in latter-day scripture. Darkness was apparently the primeval condition (Gen. 1:2; Moses 2:2; Abr. 4:2). Light was introduced by the divine word: "Let there be light: and there was light" (Gen. 1:3; Moses 2:3; Abr. 4:3). It was decreed "good" and was divided from the darkness, light being known as "day" and darkness as "night" (Gen. 1:4–5; Moses 2:4–5; Abr. 4:4–5). The account in Abraham adds that "they (the gods) comprehended the light, for it was bright" (Abr. 4:4; see also GODHEAD; CREATION AND CREATION ACCOUNTS).

nity of those who have accepted the name of Christ through baptism and are bound to him by covenant, is the foundation of the spiritual and emotional life, as well as the practical daily life, of the Latter-day Saint.

[See also Civic Duties; Community; Enduring to the End; Family Life; Individuality; Joining the Church; Lay Participation and Leadership; "Peculiar" People; Self-sufficiency.]

JAROLDEEN EDWARDS

LIGHT OF CHRIST

The light of Christ refers to the spiritual power that emanates from God to fill the immensity of space and enlightens every man, woman, and child. Other terms sometimes used to denote this same phenomenon are HOLY SPIRIT, "Spirit of the Lord," and "Spirit of Truth," but it is different from the HOLY GHOST. The scriptures are not always precise in the use of such terminology, and several attempts have been made to describe the various aspects of this important manifestation of God's goodness and being.

Jesus Christ is the light and life of the world (John 8:12; 3 Ne. 15:9). This light is described in the Doctrine and Covenants as "the same light that quickeneth your understandings; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God to fill the immensity of space—the light which is in all things, which giveth life to all things, which is the law by which all things are governed, even the power of God who sitteth upon his throne, who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things (D&C 88:11–13). B. H. Roberts, a seventy, interpreted this to mean that the light of Christ is a creative power, a governing power, a life-giving power, and an "intelligence-inspiring power" (Roberts, 2:7–8).

This light manifests itself in different ways and degrees. In its "less refined existence," wrote Parley P. Pratt, it is visible as sunlight. It is also the refined "intellectual light of our inward and spiritual organs, by which we reason, discern, judge, compare, comprehend, and remember the subjects within our reach." It is revealed as instinct in animals, reason in man, and vision in the prophets (p. 25).

John A. Widtsoe gave this general description of the emanation of God's power: "God is a personal being of body—a body limited in extent. He cannot, therefore, at a given moment be personally everywhere. . . . By his power, will and word, [he] is everywhere present. . . . The holy spirit permeates all the things of the universe, material and spiritual" (Widtsoe, pp. 68–69).

Since God possesses a fulness of this power and man only a small portion, it becomes a goal of Latter-day Saints to receive more of this light, which for the faithful grows "brighter and brighter until the perfect day" (D&C 50:24). Initially, this "Spirit giveth light to every man that cometh into the world" (D&C 84:46; see also John 1:9; Moro. 7:16). It equips all people with a basic discernment of good and evil, which Latter-day Saints often equate with conscience. By listening to the promptings of the Spirit one is led via faith and baptism to a higher spiritual blessing called the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST, "a greater and higher endowment of the same Spirit which enlightens every man that comes into the world" (C. W. Penrose, JD 23:350). Continued progression will eventually lead to a fulness of the Spirit, or glorification in the CELESTIAL KINGDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Pratt, Parley P. Key to the Science of Theology. Salt Lake City, 1979.
- Roberts, B. H. Seventy's Course in Theology, 5 vols. Salt Lake City, 1907–1912; Vol. 3 on the doctrine of deity and Vol. 5 on divine immanence.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS, Vol. I, pp. 49–54.
- Widtsoe, John A. A Rational Theology. Salt Lake City, 1915.

G. KENT DUNFORD

LIGHT AND DARKNESS

Many juxtapositions of light and darkness are identifiable in latter-day scripture. Darkness was apparently the primeval condition (Gen. 1:2; Moses 2:2; Abr. 4:2). Light was introduced by the divine word: "Let there be light: and there was light" (Gen. 1:3; Moses 2:3; Abr. 4:3). It was decreed "good" and was divided from the darkness, light being known as "day" and darkness as "night" (Gen. 1:4–5; Moses 2:4–5; Abr. 4:4–5). The account in Abraham adds that "they (the gods) comprehended the light, for it was bright" (Abr. 4:4; see also GODHEAD; CREATION AND CREATION ACCOUNTS).

This primeval contrast figures importantly in the early literature of Mesopotamia, as in the ancient Sumerian epic of King Gilgamesh, also in various pre-Socratic philosophies in Greece, especially the oppositional philosophy of Heraclitus. These usages, like those of scripture, refer to light and darkness as physical phenomena of the environment to be apprehended by the senses. Other meanings, literal and metaphorical, equate light with life, love, goodness, righteousness, godliness, virtue, blessedness, happiness, freedom, sweetness, guiltlessness, spiritual-mindedness, intelligence, wisdom, heaven-sent revelation, and so on. Darkness is associated with things deathly, devilish, infernal, fallen, carnal, wicked, corrupt, intemperate, mournful, miserable, bitter, fettered, benighted, and ultimately ill-fated.

Despite their opposition, light and darkness may be confused. Isaiah speaks of persons who “put darkness for light, and light for darkness” (Isa. 5:20). Further, individuals may prefer darkness to light. John cites Christ’s condemnation of those who love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil, which may induce hatred of light (John 3:19–20).

The proportion of light to darkness within one’s body is considered a function of the eye and, specifically, the orientation of the eye. Jesus said in the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, “The light of the body is the eye; if therefore thine eye be single [here the JST adds “to the glory of God”] thy whole body shall be full of light. But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness” (Matt. 6:22–23; cf. JST Matt. 6:22). The Doctrine and Covenants explains, “And if your eye be single to my glory, your whole bodies shall be filled with light, and there shall be no darkness in you; and that body which is filled with light comprehendeth all things” (D&C 88:67). And “the day shall come when you shall comprehend even God, being quickened in him and by him” (D&C 88:49).

Christ is a God-appointed source and giver of light, a revealer of God’s glory, a banisher of darkness. The apostle Paul wrote, “For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ” (2 Cor. 4:6). Peter spoke of Christ who “hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light” (1 Pet. 2:9). The Book of Mormon describes the epiphanous experience of the Lamanite king Lamoni: “The dark veil of unbelief was being cast away from his mind, and the light which did light up his mind, which was the light of the glory of God, which was a marvelous light of his goodness—yea, this light had infused such joy into his soul, the cloud of darkness having been dispelled, that the light of everlasting life was lit up in his soul” (Alma 19:6; cf. Alma 32:35). In modern revelation Christ has reiterated his divine function as “the light which shineth in darkness,” which the darkness cannot comprehend nor extinguish (e.g., D&C 6:21; 88:49).

The interplay of these literal and symbolic meanings is perhaps most graphically portrayed in LDS CHRISTOLOGY. On the occasion of his birth in Bethlehem, there was a miraculous interruption of the conventional twenty-four-hour light-dark cycle in the Western Hemisphere; it was, in essence, a celebration of light. The Book of Mormon records that “There was no darkness in all that night, but it was as light as though it was mid-day. . . . The sun did rise in the morning again, according to its proper order; and they knew that it was the day that the Lord should be born, because of the sign which had been given (3 Ne. 1:15, 19). In contrast, at the crucifixion of Christ and for three consecutive days “there was thick darkness upon all the face of the land, insomuch that the inhabitants thereof who had not fallen could feel the vapor of darkness; and there could be no light” (3 Ne. 8:20–23).

The same vividness of contrast between light and darkness is seen in Joseph Smith’s experiences (see FIRST VISION).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Madsen, Truman G. “Man Illumined.” In To the Glory of God, pp. 121–133, ed. C. Tate. Salt Lake City, 1972.

HAROLD L. MILLER, JR.

---

LIGHT-MINDEDNESS

Modern scripture deals with “light-mindedness” as trivializing the sacred or making light of sacred things. Latter-day Saints were admonished early in the history of the Church to “trifle not with sacred things” (D&C 6:12; 8:10). At its worst, light-mindedness may become ridicule and then sacri-

This primeval contrast figures importantly in the early literature of Mesopotamia, as in the ancient Sumerian epic of King Gilgamesh, also in various pre-Socratic philosophies in Greece, especially the oppositional philosophy of Heraclitus. These usages, like those of scripture, refer to light and darkness as physical phenomena of the environment to be apprehended by the senses. Other meanings, literal and metaphorical, equate light with life, love, goodness, righteousness, godliness, virtue, blessedness, happiness, freedom, sweetness, guiltlessness, spiritual-mindedness, intelligence, wisdom, heaven-sent revelation, and so on. Darkness is associated with things deathly, devilish, infernal, fallen, carnal, wicked, corrupt, intemperate, mournful, miserable, bitter, fettered, benighted, and ultimately ill-fated.

Despite their opposition, light and darkness may be confused. Isaiah speaks of persons who “put darkness for light, and light for darkness” (Isa. 5:20). Further, individuals may prefer darkness to light. John cites Christ’s condemnation of those who love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil, which may induce hatred of light (John 3:19–20).

The proportion of light to darkness within one’s body is considered a function of the eye and, specifically, the orientation of the eye. Jesus said in the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, “The light of the body is the eye; if therefore thine eye be single [here the JST adds “to the glory of God”] thy whole body shall be full of light. But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness” (Matt. 6:22–23; cf. JST Matt. 6:22). The Doctrine and Covenants explains, “And if your eye be single to my glory, your whole bodies shall be filled with light, and there shall be no darkness in you; and that body which is filled with light comprehendeth all things” (D&C 88:67). And “the day shall come when you shall comprehend even God, being quickened in him and by him” (D&C 88:49).

Christ is a God-appointed source and giver of light, a revealer of God’s glory, a banisher of darkness. The apostle Paul wrote, “For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ” (2 Cor. 4:6). Peter spoke of Christ who “hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light” (1 Pet. 2:9). The Book of Mormon describes the epiphanous experience of the Lamanite king Lamoni: “The dark veil of unbelief was being cast away from his mind, and the light which did light up his mind, which was the light of the glory of God, which was a marvelous light of his goodness—yea, this light had infused such joy into his soul, the cloud of darkness having been dispelled, that the light of everlasting life was lit up in his soul” (Alma 19:6; cf. Alma 32:35). In modern revelation Christ has reiterated his divine function as “the light which shineth in darkness,” which the darkness cannot comprehend nor extinguish (e.g., D&C 6:21; 88:49).

The interplay of these literal and symbolic meanings is perhaps most graphically portrayed in LDS CHRISTOLOGY. On the occasion of his birth in Bethlehem, there was a miraculous interruption of the conventional twenty-four-hour light-dark cycle in the Western Hemisphere; it was, in essence, a celebration of light. The Book of Mormon records that “There was no darkness in all that night, but it was as light as though it was mid-day. . . . The sun did rise in the morning again, according to its proper order; and they knew that it was the day that the Lord should be born, because of the sign which had been given (3 Ne. 1:15, 19). In contrast, at the crucifixion of Christ and for three consecutive days “there was thick darkness upon all the face of the land, insomuch that the inhabitants thereof who had not fallen could feel the vapor of darkness; and there could be no light” (3 Ne. 8:20–23).

The same vividness of contrast between light and darkness is seen in Joseph Smith’s experiences (see FIRST VISION).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Madsen, Truman G. “Man Illumined.” In To the Glory of God, pp. 121–133, ed. C. Tate. Salt Lake City, 1972.

HAROLD L. MILLER, JR.

---

LIGHT-MINDEDNESS

Modern scripture deals with “light-mindedness” as trivializing the sacred or making light of sacred things. Latter-day Saints were admonished early in the history of the Church to “trifle not with sacred things” (D&C 6:12; 8:10). At its worst, light-mindedness may become ridicule and then sacrilege and blasphemy—a deliberate irreverence for the things of God.

Divine personages and their names, temple ceremonies, the priesthood and its ordinances, and the saintly life, for example, are intrinsically holy. Other things are holy by association. The Lord has said, “That which cometh from above is sacred, and must be spoken with care, and by constraint of the Spirit” (D&C 63:64). The Saints were warned against “excess of laughter,” “light speeches,” and “light-mindedness,” yet were taught to worship “with a glad heart and a cheerful countenance” (D&C 59:15; 88:121).

In practice, Latter-day Saints distinguish light-mindedness from lightheartedness; the latter is a triumph of the zestful, joyful spirit of the gospel over life’s trials. Such cheerfulness and good humor do not preclude, but rather can complement, spirituality. While imprisoned in Liberty Jail, Joseph SMITH wrote that the things of God are only made known to those who exercise “careful and ponderous and solemn thoughts” (HC 3:295); yet he later spoke of himself as “playful and cheerful” (TPJS, p. 307). The Church counsels against a light-minded attitude toward sacred matters but encourages joyfulness in worship and wholesome pleasure in recreation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. We Should Be a Reverent People (pamphlet), pp. 1–5. Salt Lake City, 1976.

WILLIAM L. FILLMORE

---

LITERATURE, MORMON WRITERS OF

[This entry is made up of five essays:

- Drama
- Novels
- Personal Essays
- Poetry
- Short Stories

They discuss the development of Mormon literature after Orson F. Whitney’s plea for members of the Church to write wholesome, instructive “Home Literature” (1888) to counter the intrusion of the “faithless” literature of the world that was coming into LDS homes. This charge initiated a creative and didactic impulse which continues as one vein of LDS literature to the present. The resulting stories, plays, and poems on Mormon themes, promoting LDS values and ideals helped build testimony among the youth of the Church.]

DRAMA

Theater has enjoyed a prominent position in the Church from its earliest days in Nauvoo. Thomas A. Lyne, a prominent Philadelphia actor-manager, joined the Church in Nauvoo, and was encouraged by the Prophet Joseph Smith to produce several popular plays. One such was Pizarro, in which Brigham Young played the role of the High Priest. Lyne lifted Nauvoo theater above the amateur level and entertained the Saints with such plays as Shakespeare’s Richard III.

While the Church is justifiably proud of its overall support of the arts, the output of drama by LDS writers has been limited and rather late. The first major attempt at an LDS play written and produced by Latter-day Saints was Orestes Utah Bean’s dramatic adaptation of B. H. Roberts’ 1889 novel, Corianton, A Nephite Story, as Corianton—An Aztec Romance or The Siren and the Prophet. Between 1902 and 1912, it played from San Francisco to New York.

Other playwrights from Utah have achieved national prominence. Harold Orlob wrote musical comedies such as Listen Lester. Otto Harbaeh wrote many popular plays, including Madam Sherry; Katinka; No No Nanette; High Jinks; The Silent Witness; and Up in Mable’s Room. Edwin Milton Royle achieved a national reputation with Friends; The Squaw Man; The Struggle Everlasting; and These Are My People. Despite the prominence of these playwrights, virtually no Latter-day Saints wrote plays with LDS characters or themes until late in the twentieth century.

The 1960s saw something of a flowering of LDS drama by Latter-day Saints about LDS subjects. Clinton F. Larson published a number of serious poetic dramas, several of which were produced, such as Moroni; Mantle of the Prophet; and Mary of Nazareth. Keith Engar’s work includes Right Honorable Saint and Montrose Crossing, a thoughtful look at the exodus from Nauvoo. Doug Stewart and Lex de Azevedo’s popular musical Saturday’s Warrior and its sequel Starchild proved that LDS audiences would support overtly LDS theater with high production values. Predictably, a spate of musicals followed, including Carol Lynn Pearson’s My Turn on Earth. Pearson also wrote

lege and blasphemy—a deliberate irreverence for the things of God.

Divine personages and their names, temple ceremonies, the priesthood and its ordinances, and the saintly life, for example, are intrinsically holy. Other things are holy by association. The Lord has said, “That which cometh from above is sacred, and must be spoken with care, and by constraint of the Spirit” (D&C 63:64). The Saints were warned against “excess of laughter,” “light speeches,” and “light-mindedness,” yet were taught to worship “with a glad heart and a cheerful countenance” (D&C 59:15; 88:121).

In practice, Latter-day Saints distinguish light-mindedness from lightheartedness; the latter is a triumph of the zestful, joyful spirit of the gospel over life’s trials. Such cheerfulness and good humor do not preclude, but rather can complement, spirituality. While imprisoned in Liberty Jail, Joseph SMITH wrote that the things of God are only made known to those who exercise “careful and ponderous and solemn thoughts” (HC 3:295); yet he later spoke of himself as “playful and cheerful” (TPJS, p. 307). The Church counsels against a light-minded attitude toward sacred matters but encourages joyfulness in worship and wholesome pleasure in recreation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. We Should Be a Reverent People (pamphlet), pp. 1–5. Salt Lake City, 1976.

WILLIAM L. FILLMORE

LITERATURE, MORMON WRITERS OF

[This entry is made up of five essays:

- Drama
- Novels
- Personal Essays
- Poetry
- Short Stories

They discuss the development of Mormon literature after Orson F. Whitney’s plea for members of the Church to write wholesome, instructive “Home Literature” (1888) to counter the intrusion of the “faithless” literature of the world that was coming into LDS homes. This charge initiated a creative and didactic impulse which continues as one vein of LDS literature to the present. The resulting stories, plays, and poems on Mormon themes, promoting LDS values and ideals helped build testimony among the youth of the Church.]

DRAMA

Theater has enjoyed a prominent position in the Church from its earliest days in Nauvoo. Thomas A. Lyne, a prominent Philadelphia actor-manager, joined the Church in Nauvoo, and was encouraged by the Prophet Joseph Smith to produce several popular plays. One such was Pizarro, in which Brigham Young played the role of the High Priest. Lyne lifted Nauvoo theater above the amateur level and entertained the Saints with such plays as Shakespeare’s Richard III.

While the Church is justifiably proud of its overall support of the arts, the output of drama by LDS writers has been limited and rather late. The first major attempt at an LDS play written and produced by Latter-day Saints was Orestes Utah Bean’s dramatic adaptation of B. H. Roberts’ 1889 novel, Corianton, A Nephite Story, as Corianton—An Aztec Romance or The Siren and the Prophet. Between 1902 and 1912, it played from San Francisco to New York.

Other playwrights from Utah have achieved national prominence. Harold Orlob wrote musical comedies such as Listen Lester. Otto Harbaeh wrote many popular plays, including Madam Sherry; Katinka; No No Nanette; High Jinks; The Silent Witness; and Up in Mable’s Room. Edwin Milton Royle achieved a national reputation with Friends; The Squaw Man; The Struggle Everlasting; and These Are My People. Despite the prominence of these playwrights, virtually no Latter-day Saints wrote plays with LDS characters or themes until late in the twentieth century.

The 1960s saw something of a flowering of LDS drama by Latter-day Saints about LDS subjects. Clinton F. Larson published a number of serious poetic dramas, several of which were produced, such as Moroni; Mantle of the Prophet; and Mary of Nazareth. Keith Engar’s work includes Right Honorable Saint and Montrose Crossing, a thoughtful look at the exodus from Nauvoo. Doug Stewart and Lex de Azevedo’s popular musical Saturday’s Warrior and its sequel Starchild proved that LDS audiences would support overtly LDS theater with high production values. Predictably, a spate of musicals followed, including Carol Lynn Pearson’s My Turn on Earth. Pearson also wrote

The Order Is Love; The Dance; and a one-person show, Mother Wove the Morning.

James Arrington is an actor/playwright/producer who has become known among Latter-day Saints through touring his one-person production of Here's Brother Brigham. He also wrote and produced Golden, a one-person portrayal of the wit and wisdom of J. Golden Kimball (1853–1938), of the Seventy. In his Farley Family Reunion, Arrington plays all the characters, both male and female. He also collaborated with Tim Slover to produce another one-person show, Wilford Woodruff: God's Fisherman, a portrayal of the early years of an apostle and later President of the Church.

For decades Nathan and Ruth Hale wrote and produced plays in southern California, many of LDS theme and for LDS audiences. Since the mid-1980s they have done their work in Utah. Thomas F. Rogers has written a number of dramatic adaptations of nineteenth-century Russian novels, as well as works he describes as “plays of mitigated conscience,” some overtly LDS, including Huebner; Fire in the Bones; Reunion; and Journey to Golgotha.

Promising younger LDS playwrights include Orson Scott Card (Stone Tables, and Father, Mother, Mother, and Mom); Robert Elliot (Fires of the Mind); Susan Howe (Burdens of Earth); Martin Kelly (And They Shall Be Gathered); Reed McColm (Together Again for the First Time, and Holding Patterns); and Tim Slover (Dreambuilder and Scales).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cracroft, Richard H., and Neal E. Lambert, eds. “Drama.” In A Believing People: Literature of the Latter-day Saints, pp. 403–488. Provo, Utah, 1974.

ROBERT A. NELSON

NOVELS

Until recently, novels written by Latter-day Saints have tended to fall into two disparate categories: “faithful fiction” of the Home Literature tradition, a didactic and cautionary fiction intended primarily to instruct and inspire the youth of the Church; and “faithless fiction” of the Lost Generation tradition, generally a more sophisticated fiction in which dissenting or expatriate Latter-day Saints examine Church members’ lives from a position critical of LDS history and tradition, teachings, leadership, and culture. In recent years, an increasing number of LDS writers have crafted novels that affirm their history and tradition and assert an LDS worldview while achieving artistic sophistication and literary craftsmanship.

HOME LITERATURE TRADITION. From the beginnings of the Church (1830) until after 1888, the Latter-day Saints, like many other nineteenth-century literal-minded American religious groups, manifested a deep distrust of fiction. Church leaders considered fiction simply not true, and counseled the Saints to avoid reading it. During the late 1870s and the 1880s, however, young Latter-day Saints, aware of their provincialism and isolation in the Utah Territory, were attracted by the allure of eastern education, sophistication, and lifestyles, and some began to show impatience, indifference, and even rebellion. To counter this tendency, Orson F. Whitney (1855–1931, ordained an apostle in 1906) delivered a landmark sermon, “Home Literature” (Contributor 9 [June 1888]:297–302; reprinted in Cracroft and Lambert, pp. 203–207), calling on Latter-day Saints to produce a pure and powerful literature on LDS themes and to promote LDS values among the youth.

Latter-day Saints began writing “faith promoting stories,” a didactic literary impulse which continues today. The most important responses to Whitney, himself the author of an epic poem, Elias (1904), came from the prolific writing and editing of Susa Young GATES (1856–1933), young women’s leader, daughter and confidante of Brigham Young, and founding mother of the Home Literature movement. She published more than thirty poems, forty-five short stories, and three novels, including John Stevens’ Courtship: A Story of the Echo Canyon War (serialized in Contributor, 16–17 [1895–1896]). B. H. Roberts (1857–1933, set apart as one of the presidents of the Seventy in 1888) published the novel Corianton: A Nephite Story (serialized in Contributor 10 [1889]), based on Book of Mormon characters and events, and later redacted into a drama that played to large audiences in Utah, Chicago, and New York.

The most important author in this tradition is Nephi Anderson (1865–1923), a son of Norwegian converts to the Church, who published ten novels. The most famous and enduring is Added Upon (1898, fifty reprintings). Despite its heavy doctrine, light plot, and wooden characters, the book has inspired spinoffs in such late twentieth-century musicals as Saturday's Warrior and My Turn on Earth.

Anderson demonstrated better than any other LDS novelist to date the possibilities for fiction in Mormon experience, theology, and worldview. His primary purpose was to teach the restored gospel and promote, through telling an exciting story, "the good, pure, and the elevating" in LDS life and beliefs (IE 1 [Jan. 1898]:186–88).

LOST GENERATION. Though Home Literature fell into a tedious pattern until taking on a new life in the 1960s, the rise of "Mormondom's Lost Generation" expatriate writers of "faithless fiction" in the 1930s and 1940s set in motion the second important literary impulse in Mormon literature. Five writers of varying accomplishment best illustrate this direction: Paul Drayton Bailey (b. 1906), Samuel Woolley Taylor (b. 1907), Maurine Whipple (b. 1910), Virginia Sorensen (b. 1912), and Vardis Fisher (1895–1968).

Paul Bailey's For Time and All Eternity (1964), though flawed, is his finest novel. Samuel Taylor, a son of an apostle and grandson of a President of the Church, is a noted film scenarist. His Heaven Knows Why (1948; 1979) is one of the funniest Mormon novels to date. His histories and biographies Family Kingdom (1951), Nightfall at Nauvoo (1971), and The Kingdom or Nothing (1976) are written with such imaginative license that they must be considered quasifictional. Maurine Whipple's The Giant Joshua (1941) is considered by many to be the finest Mormon novel. Though a "flawed masterpiece," it is, according to Eugene England, "the truest fiction about the pioneer experience" (p. 148). Another Lost Generation novelist, Virginia Sorensen, grew up in Utah, left the Church, married the novelist Alec Waugh (brother of Evelyn), and established herself as a Newbery Award writer of children's books. She is one of the best novelists produced by the LDS culture, and her finest novel, The Evening and the Morning, was published in 1949. An earlier novel, A Little Lower Than the Angels (1942), was her most popular.

A major novelist among the Lost Generation writers is Vardis Fisher (1895–1968), whose saga, Children of God: An American Epic (1939), won the Harper Prize. Fisher grew up in Annis, Idaho, in a devout LDS family, but became disaffected with the Church in his youth. In Children of God he returns to his roots and sweeps across LDS history from the First Vision of Joseph Smith of 1820 through the Manifesto of 1890 (after which he feels the Church lost its vitality). While he claims this was his only Mormon novel, several other works have strong autobiographical threads.

The Lost Generation impulse continues to assert itself in such works as Levi S. Peterson's The Backslider (1986), Linda Sillitoe's Sideways To The Sun (1987), and Judith Freeman's The Chinchilla Farm (1989).

CONTEMPORARY HOME LITERATURE. Writers in the revived Home Literature vein borrow from the popular sentimental and genteel tradition to write "faithful" novels teaching Mormon values and beliefs, but often oversimplify human problems and responses to those problems. Aimed primarily at LDS teenagers and young adults, the formula romance is a major literary tool for teaching them how to cope faithfully in a secularized world. Such works include Shirley Sealy's Beyond This Moment (1977), Susan Evans McCloud's Where the Heart Leads (1979), and Lee Nelson's multi-volume The Storm Testament (1982–1990). To date, the most successful and prolific writers for modern Mormon youth have been Jack Weyland and Blaine and Brenton Yorgason. Blaine Yorgason's Charlie's Monument (1976), The Windwalker, and Massacre at Salt Creek (1979) have been regional best sellers, as has their jointly written The Bishop's Horse Race (1979). Jack Weyland's Charly (1980) and Sam (1981) tell faith-promoting stories replete with hope, optimism, and happy endings.

FAITHFUL REALISM. Many late-twentieth-century Mormon writers are both faithful Latter-day Saints and skilled writers. Foremost among these novelists is Orson Scott Card (b. 1951). A native of Orem, Utah, Card has won the Hugo and the Nebula awards, and has established himself as one of America's foremost science fiction and fantasy writers. His science fiction and fantasy have strong LDS undertones, especially his Alvin Maker series Seventh Son (1987), Red Prophet (1988), and Prentice Alvin (1989). His novel Saints (1984) is considered by many to be the best Mormon historical novel written since The Giant Joshua.

In the same spirit of faithful realism, a number of well-written novels examining the lives of Latter-day Saints have appeared in the last quarter of the twentieth century: Emma Lou Thayne's Never Past the Gate (1975), Robert H. Moss's Nephite Chronicles (seven novels to date); Douglas H. Thayer's Summer Fire (1983); Donald R. Marshall's Zinnie Stokes, Zinnie Stokes (1984); Randall Hall's Cory Davidson (1984); Larry E. Morris's The Edge of the Reservoir (1988); Chris Heimerdinger's Tennis Shoes Among the Nephites (1989); and Gerald Lund's The Alliance (1983) and The Work and the Glory: A Pillar of Light (1990). These works are encouraging examples of truthful and faithful fictional treatment of the Latter-day Saints.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Graefelt, Richard H., and Neal E. Lambert, eds. A Believing People: Literature of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City, 1974.
- England, G. Eugene. "The Dawning of a Brighter Day: Mormon Literature After 150 Years." BYU Studies 22 (Spring 1982):131–60.
- Geary, Edward A. "Mormondom's Lost Generation: The Novelists of the 1940s." BYU Studies 18 (Fall 1977):89–98.
- Hunsaker, Kenneth B. "Mormon Novels." In A Literary History of the American West, ed. Thomas J. Lyon et al., pp. 849–61. Fort Worth, Texas, 1987.

RICHARD H. CRACROFT

PERSONAL ESSAYS

Growing out of the LDS sermon and partaking of the honest reflection and responsible self-revelation often characteristic of "personal witness" or "testimony," the personal essay has become an important literary form for LDS writers. As essay writers explore personal experiences, draw lessons from them, and apply these lessons to the concerns of the community, they may describe, analyze, and frequently mitigate criticism, pain, and doubt. The result is often a satisfying piece of literature that can serve to entertain and enlighten, and to influence religious and moral conviction.

The personal essay was not a significant literary vehicle among the early Latter-day Saints. While they did keep diaries and write sermons and personal reminiscences, their group struggle for existence left them little time for interest in examining in writing their Church, their beliefs, or their individual differences. By the middle of the twentieth century, however, the Church was essentially at peace with its external surroundings, and a few LDS writers opened the era of the Mormon personal essay. In 1948, BYU English professor P. A. Christensen published his collection All in a Teacher's Day; his second collection, Of a Number of Things, appeared in 1962. Virginia Sorensen's landmark work, Where Nothing Is Long Ago: Memories of a Mormon Childhood, appeared in 1955. This work, usually thought of as fiction, has the point of view and effect on the reader of a personal essay, and it has influenced many recent LDS writers.

Since 1966, when the first issue of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought appeared, LDS personal essays have been published with increasing regularity, in its columns "From the Pulpit" and (since 1971) "Personal Voices," and in such publications as ENSIGN, Sunstone, BYU Studies, Exponent II, Utah Holiday, BYU Today, This People, and Network.

By the late 1970s, the Mormon personal essay was in full flower, with, for example, Lowell Bennion's collection The Things That Matter Most (1978); President Spencer W. KIMBALL's sermon-essays "The False Gods We Worship" (Ensign, June 1976) and "Fundamental Principles to Ponder and Live," popularly known as "Don't Kill the Little Birds" (1978), published in Ensign; and Hugh Nibley's distinctive, scholarly-personal essays, Nibley on the Timely and the Timeless (1978). In the 1980s, three writers directly influenced by Virginia Sorensen published collections that marked the blossoming of the LDS personal essay as a distinct literary genre: Eugene England (Dialogues with Myself: Personal Essays on Mormon Experience, 1984, and Why the Church Is as True as the Gospel, 1988), Edward Geary (Goodbye to Poplarhaven: Recollections of a Utah Boyhood, 1985), and Mary Lythgoe Bradford (Leaving Home: Personal Essays, 1987).

The essays of many others writing during this time were collected by Mary Bradford in Mormon Women Speak: A Collection of Essays (1982) and Personal Voices: A Celebration of Dialogue (1987). Most recently Don Norton has edited Approaching Zion, Volume 9 of The Collected Works of Hugh Nibley (1989), and Elouise Bell has published Only When I Laugh (1990), a collection growing out of her Network columns.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- For important evaluations of the Mormon personal essay, see Clifton Jolley, "Mormons and the Beast: In Defense of the Personal Essay," Dialogue 11 (Autumn 1978):137–39; Eugene England, "The Dawning of a Brighter Day: Mormon Literature After 150 Years," BYU Studies 22 (Spring 1982):131–60; and Mary Lythgoe Bradford, "I, Eye, Aye: A Personal Essay on Personal Essays," Dialogue 11 (Summer 1978):81-89, reprinted in her Personal Voices: A Celebration of Dialogue (Salt Lake City, 1987).

DONLU DEWITT THAYER

POETRY

Poetry may well be the most essential art. Its uses are numerous. It is most needed in times of urgency and danger, if one may take the quality and amount of poetry written, for example, in times of war as an indication. At such a time the need for poetry is social and communal; it is needed to exhort, to encourage, to unite, to comfort, to state once more those qualities and beliefs which are fundamental to the community from which it springs.

Such benefits were needed from the poems written by early Latter-day Saints. Their community was endangered, its beliefs were called into question, and its leaders were martyred; all this was material for poetry that was confirmatory and, in a sense, repetitive. It repeated, mostly in the form of hymns, and as simply and directly as possible, the truths accepted by the faithful. Such poetry is so much the result of the known situation that it is almost anonymous, balladlike.

Later, when some permanence seemed probable to the community, Mormon poetry became didactic. Its use was still communal, as distinct from the personal use of poetry today—largely a matter between poet and reader—and its purpose was to instruct and to retell, in narrative form, those stories which were peculiar to the traditions of the Church.

There was little room for experiment in such work, nor was there much opportunity for individual lyric poetry in what Orson F. Whitney called Home Literature. It was produced for the promotion and continuation of faith, and necessarily designed for an LDS audience. This is a restriction which contemporary poets have felt increasingly less necessary. As Latter-day Saints have moved away from Utah in larger numbers, established viable communities in many places, and taken more and more positions of authority and importance in the world at large, they have seen more clearly the place they may assume in the general community. This has been at once a liberation and a source of individual concern to poets. That concern is often seen in contemporary poetry. The men and women who write that poetry are very much aware of what is happening in their art, are sophisticated and adventurous in technique, and completely modern in outlook, yet still need to hold to the clear values and confident virtues of the Church, a complex undertaking in a world and time as doubtful as today's.

This has meant that, like the poetry of the English-speaking world in general, a great deal of contemporary LDS poetry is personal, lyric poetry, even if the subject matter is often purely Mormon, or at least clearly composed from an LDS point of view. At the same time, the range of such poetry is much wider. An LDS poet—indeed, an artist in any medium—feels little need now to teach, to speak to an entirely LDS audience, or to use the traditional LDS environments of farm and home.

All this may be clearly recognized in Harvest, an anthology of contemporary LDS poetry edited by Eugene England and Dennis Clark. Both men, themselves poets, had realized the importance of changes taking place in LDS poetry as they read the contributions of men and women to such journals as BYU Studies, Dialogue, Literature and Belief, and Sunstone.

Naturally, the poets themselves were the first to realize the direction in which their work was heading. Perhaps the first of them to devote his life to poetry, to dedicate serious and full-time effort to his craft, was Clinton F. Larson. Versatile, prolific, and skillful, and with a curious and searching mind, he shows a range of form and material that is unusually wide. Larson is a poet with a distinctive voice, and his influence is less specific than general; he may well have demonstrated to younger writers that the boundaries of their meditations extend farther than they thought, and that their images can be drawn from all aspects of life.

This is not to say that the great subjects of LDS poetry have vanished, but they have changed subtly. Harvest contains a surprising number of poems in which an idealized version of the old, simple, pastoral life of earlier years is celebrated. Generally, until the very youngest generation of poets, those who may live in New York or Los Angeles, who have traveled in Peru or China, the imagery is largely drawn from Utah, Idaho or Wyoming. And many poems continue to deal with parents and children, with homes and families. Harvest even contains a short section called "Hymns and Songs," which suggests that the very earliest strain of Mormon poetry still exists, old-fashioned as it seems, to call the community to share belief and sing together.

There are, of course, exotic exceptions to this general statement. Arthur Henry King, who came late and from England to the Church, offers quite other traditional virtues in his verse; R. A. Christmas speaks in a wry and memorably different voice. Loretta Randall Sharp has written some stanzas so beautiful and personal ("At Utah Lake" is such a gem) that they transcend such blanket generalizations as this article necessarily contains. The few poems of Bruce Jorgensen are of so steely a delicacy that one could wish from him a more fruitful dedication to his craft.

This last is a concern that might be examined seriously. Of all Utah poets, it may be that May Swenson is best known, and there is little doubt that she has spent her life as a serious poet. It may be time for other Latter-day Saints who write poetry to become poets in effect. It may even be happening. Donnell Hunter, whose verse carries the benign influence of William Stafford, publishes his work and that of others from his little Honeybrook Press in Rexburg, Idaho. Michael R. Collings, a poet represented in Sunstone and elsewhere, is about to start Zarahemla: a magazine of poetry, which should be a most helpful addition to those LDS journals which already publish poetry. But perhaps most hopeful of all, the very youngest LDS poets are beginning to see their work in national periodicals. In their twenties, most of them pursuing degrees in universities outside Utah or employed in various professions in many states and cities, these LDS poets are putting their poems alongside those of other young writers. Mormon poetry is finding a wider audience.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Cracroft, Richard H., and Neal E. Lambert, eds. A Believing People: Literature of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City, 1974.
- England, G. Eugene, and Dennis M. Clark, eds. Harvest: Contemporary Mormon Poems. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Lambert, Neal E., and Richard H. Cracroft, eds. Twenty-two Young Mormon Writers. Provo, Utah, 1975.

LESLIE NORRIS

SHORT STORIES

The history of the Mormon short story begins with the quasi-official encouragement of all forms of LDS literary expression signaled in Orson F. Whitney's 1888 address "Home Literature." The first generation of "Home Literature" story writers included Susa Young GATES, Augusta Joyee Crocheron, B. H. Roberts, and, most prominently, Josephine Spencer and Nephi Anderson. In "A Plea for Fiction" and "Purpose in Fiction" (1898), Anderson urged the didactic value of "the good, pure, elevating kind" of fiction with "a message to deliver." Anderson's work displays some traits of good "regional" or "local color" fiction, yet none of it is generally read or remembered today. Spencer's stories, also moralistic, are less heavy-handed than Anderson's (characters, not the author, deliver the "message"), and show more skill and attention to craft; seven appeared in her book The Senator from Utah (1895).

Into the 1940s, Mormon writers seem to have worked in isolation from the high artistry of Continental, English, and American short-story writers from the 1890s through the 1920s. Despite a leavening of entertainment and humor after 1920, LDS stories largely remained parochial; didactic; thematically and experientially superficial, unreal, or idealized; prescriptive; and artistically weak. One exception might be the stories of Ora Pate Stewart gathered in Buttermilk and Bran (1964) but written earlier.

In the 1940s and 1950s there emerged a generation of Mormon "expatriate" writers, born between 1900 and 1930, well read in the Continental and Anglo-American traditions, sometimes trained in literary criticism, and unable to subscribe to the didacticism of "Home Literature." Their stories, though often nourished on the experience and values of growing up in Mormon country, were largely "lost" to an LDS audience. Ray B. West's "The Last of the Grizzly Bears" (1950), Richard Young Thurman's "Not Another Word" (1957), and Jarvis Thurston's "The Cross" (1959) show varying tensions between rejection and nostalgia. Wayne Carver's "With Voice of Joy and Praise" (1965) displays a rich sense of Utah folk culture, especially its humor and its speech. The youngest expatriate, David L. Wright, died before his promise could come to full fruition, but he did publish five stories in literary quarterlies in 1960 and 1961 and saw successful productions of plays based on two of the best, "Speak Ye Tenderly of Kings" (1960) and "A Summer in the Country" (1960, 1976). The oldest expatriate, the novelist Virginia Sorensen, published Where Nothing Is Long Ago (1963), likely to remain one of the best collections of Mormon short stories. Finely written, richly nostalgic, yet self-questioning, Sorensen's stories offer insights into the "complex fate" of a Mormon writer removed from, yet deeply attached to, the LDS home place and the community that settled and still inhabits it.

The mid-1960s brought a major expansion in the Mormon short story with the inception of Dialogue (1966-) and the revitalization of BYU Studies (1967-), which opened outlets to LDS writers in both the "unsponsored" sector and the sponsored. Encouraged by anthologies such as A Believing People (1974, 1979), 22 Young Mormon Writers (1975), the LDSF series (1982-), and Greening Wheat (1983); by awards and readings offered by the Association for Mormon Letters and other groups; by periodicals such as Exponent II (1974-), Mountainwest (1975-1981), and Sunstone (1975-), and by self-published books and the establishment of independent presses such as Signature Books, the expansion continued exponentially through the 1970s and 1980s. A new generation of writers, most born between 1930 and 1950, is still writing mainly, but not exclusively, for and about Latter-day Saints; yet they are no longer limited by didactic aesthetics, and are thoroughly committed to high standards of literary craft, complexity, and seriousness.

Donald R. Marshall's The Rummage Sale (1972, 1985) and Frost in the Orchard (1977, 1985) include some of the most various, experimental, multivoiced, and comical Mormon short fiction. "The Sound of Drums" (1972) and "The Wheelbarrow" (1977) examine the "good Mormon" as a sensitive, conscious, committed person who must find a way to love and live in a world that is often obtuse and vulgar.

Douglas H. Thayer's protagonists in Under the Cottonwoods (1977, 1983) are driven into perplexity by "perfection"; his craft is severe, his tone seldom humorous, his style deliberate, chiseled, almost mannered. Earlier stories draw on Romantic lyric form in their meditative strategies, and reveal a tense subsurface engagement between Romantic poetics and LDS theology. Thayer's later-published stories in Mr. Wahlquist in Yellowstone (1989) explore the seductive American myths of "wilderness" from a perspective implicit in LDS theology.

Gladys Clark Farmer's Elders and Sisters (1977) and Bela Petsco's Nothing Very Important and Other Stories (1979), both integrated collections, almost novels, deal with the special world of Mormon missionaries in France and in southern California and Arizona. Petsco's book was the first entirely non-Utah-Idaho Mormon fiction.

Eileen Gibbons Kump's Bread and Milk and Other Stories (1979) employs a chronological sequence to portray the life of one woman, Amy Taylor Gordon, from age eight (the time of the Edmunds-Tucker Act) to her death many years later, in what may be the finest LDS historical stories yet written. Treating isolation and grace in a peculiarly Mormon way, her stories also suggest that though women submit to masculine will in ways that divide men from women and children from fathers ("Four and Twenty Blackbirds"), they are often humorously resilient ("Sayso or Sense").

Lewis Horne, in Saskatchewan, is geographically expatriated from Utah Mormondom but remains in touch with Latter-day Saint community and family life, as is shown in "Thor Thorsen's Book of Days" (1970). His sometimes "open-ended" stories have appeared widely in American and Canadian literary quarterlies since 1968, have been often cited, and have twice been included in the annual Best American Short Stories.

Karen Rosenbaum also experiments with "openness." Her agile, comic voice sounds in "The Joys of Mormonish" (1977) and "Hit the Frolicking, Rippling Brooks" (1978), but she also examines the erosion of simple faith in more somber tones in "The Mustard Seed" (1964) and "Low Tide" (1980).

Stories like those of the older "Home Literature" continue to flourish, represented by Shirley Sealy's professedly didactic Beauty in Being (1980) and Jack Weyland's witty teenage and young-adult situation- or problem-comedy stories in the Church youth magazine, New Era, collected in First Day of Forever (1980), Punch and Cookies Forever (1981), and A Small Light in the Darkness (1987). Lynne Larson's half-dozen Wyoming stories in Mountainwest (1976-1978), straddle the categories of "popular" and "literary"; her best may be "Original Sin" (1978; reprinted in Greening Wheat).

Harold K. Moon's collection Possible Dreams (1982) is literarily playful, a fact underscored in an introduction and a preface by the author and by the Bivilswiltz, the fantastic protagonist of several fables in the book.

Levi Peterson's Canyons of Grace (1982) was the first book of Mormon short stories since Sorensen's to be published outside the LDS circuit; and, in the title story and "The Confessions of Augustine" and "Road to Damascus," the first to deal overtly, in dramatic action, with significant tensions in Mormon theology, especially that between the “obduracy” of “inehoate matter” and the order imposed by divine will. His second collection, Night Soil (1990), gives wider play to the rambunctiously comic, folkloric, and tenderly humane elements in Peterson’s imagination.

Marden J. Clark’s Morgan Triumphs (1984) and Sharon M. Hawkinson’s Only Strangers Travel (1984) are both linked series of stories in the Mormon tradition of “personal history”; like Sorensen, both mix memoir, personal essay, and short story.

Darrell Speneer’s A Woman Packing a Pistol (1987) shows few overt signs of being the work of a Mormon writer; yet his mostly secular characters “live with the acts of God.” Speneer writes post-modern, “open” stories to explore a moral universe that is radically open to personal agency and decision, full of possibility and surprise.

Judith Freeman’s well-received Family Attractions (1988) includes four Mormon stories: “The Death of a Mormon Elder,” “Pretend We’re French,” “Going Out to Sea,” and “Clearfield.”

In 1989 and 1990, several excellent collections of Mormon short stories were published: Douglas Thayer’s Mr. Wahlquist in Yellowstone (1989), Neal Chandler’s Benediction (1989), Linda Sillitoe’s Windows on the Sea (1989), Pauline Mortensen’s Back Before the World Turned Nasty (1989), Phyllis Barber’s The School of Love (1990), Orson Scott Card’s The Folk of the Fringe (1990), Levi Peterson’s Night Soil (1990), and Michael Fillerup’s Visions (1990).

Including many other writers who have not yet published collections, the Mormon expansion of the short story parallels and is part of a larger American and international renaissance of the genre, though so far it derives more from that renaissance than it contributes to it. Younger LDS writers seem simultaneously critical and loyal in their criticism; they find in Mormonism a sufficiently spacious world, and they locate the conflicts of their stories within that world, even within the parameters of their theology. This source of strength in their fiction makes them valuable, if sometimes disquieting, to the community within which they have chosen to remain.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cracroft, Richard H., and Neal E. Lambert. “Fiction.” In A Believing People: Literature of the Latter-day Saints, pp. 255–306. Provo, Utah, 1974, 1979.

BRUCE W. JORGENSEN

---

LORD

See: God: Names and Titles; Jesus Christ: Names and Titles of

---

LORD’S PRAYER

Latter-day Saints regard the Lord’s Prayer, which appears twice in the New Testament and once in the Book of Mormon (Matt. 6:9–13; Luke 11:2–4; 3 Ne. 13:9–13), as a guide for all prayer, whether public or private. The three versions teach similar principles but are not identical. The JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION (JST) of the Bible clarifies some phrases in the biblical texts.

Luke gives a version of the Lord’s Prayer after Jesus was asked by his disciples to “teach us to pray” (Luke 11:1). In the sermons recounted in Matthew and in the Book of Mormon, Jesus introduces the prayer by first cautioning his listeners to avoid “vain repetitions” and to pray “after this manner,” indicating that the prayer is meant as a pattern.

All versions of the Lord’s Prayer open with the salutation “Our Father,” which implies a close and abiding relationship between God and human beings, his spirit children, and sets the pattern of addressing prayers to God the Father.

The salutation is followed by the phrase “hallowed be thy name,” which exemplifies respect and a worshipful attitude appropriate to the holy nature of prayer. Then, after expressing hope for the divine kingdom to come, the Savior submits his will to God’s with the words “thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven” (Matt. 6:10), exemplifying another important component of prayer.

After setting a proper context for prayer, Christ makes his first request—for “daily bread.” When regarded as a model for prayer, this phrase can be seen as supplication for both temporal necessities and spiritual food. Christ’s second request, that God “forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors” (Matt. 6:12 and 3 Ne. 13:11), appears in Luke as “forgive us our sins; for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us” (Luke 11:4). An important element in personal prayer is acknowledging and asking forgiveness for one’s sins, but always in conjunction with forgiving the offenses of others (cf. D&C 64:10).

The texts then include a phrase that is perhaps the most difficult to understand in most common

the “obduracy” of “inehoate matter” and the order imposed by divine will. His second collection, Night Soil (1990), gives wider play to the rambunctiously comic, folkloric, and tenderly humane elements in Peterson’s imagination.

Marden J. Clark’s Morgan Triumphs (1984) and Sharon M. Hawkinson’s Only Strangers Travel (1984) are both linked series of stories in the Mormon tradition of “personal history”; like Sorensen, both mix memoir, personal essay, and short story.

Darrell Speneer’s A Woman Packing a Pistol (1987) shows few overt signs of being the work of a Mormon writer; yet his mostly secular characters “live with the acts of God.” Speneer writes post-modern, “open” stories to explore a moral universe that is radically open to personal agency and decision, full of possibility and surprise.

Judith Freeman’s well-received Family Attractions (1988) includes four Mormon stories: “The Death of a Mormon Elder,” “Pretend We’re French,” “Going Out to Sea,” and “Clearfield.”

In 1989 and 1990, several excellent collections of Mormon short stories were published: Douglas Thayer’s Mr. Wahlquist in Yellowstone (1989), Neal Chandler’s Benediction (1989), Linda Sillitoe’s Windows on the Sea (1989), Pauline Mortensen’s Back Before the World Turned Nasty (1989), Phyllis Barber’s The School of Love (1990), Orson Scott Card’s The Folk of the Fringe (1990), Levi Peterson’s Night Soil (1990), and Michael Fillerup’s Visions (1990).

Including many other writers who have not yet published collections, the Mormon expansion of the short story parallels and is part of a larger American and international renaissance of the genre, though so far it derives more from that renaissance than it contributes to it. Younger LDS writers seem simultaneously critical and loyal in their criticism; they find in Mormonism a sufficiently spacious world, and they locate the conflicts of their stories within that world, even within the parameters of their theology. This source of strength in their fiction makes them valuable, if sometimes disquieting, to the community within which they have chosen to remain.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cracroft, Richard H., and Neal E. Lambert. “Fiction.” In A Believing People: Literature of the Latter-day Saints, pp. 255–306. Provo, Utah, 1974, 1979.

BRUCE W. JORGENSEN

---

LORD

See: God: Names and Titles; Jesus Christ: Names and Titles of

---

LORD’S PRAYER

Latter-day Saints regard the Lord’s Prayer, which appears twice in the New Testament and once in the Book of Mormon (Matt. 6:9–13; Luke 11:2–4; 3 Ne. 13:9–13), as a guide for all prayer, whether public or private. The three versions teach similar principles but are not identical. The JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION (JST) of the Bible clarifies some phrases in the biblical texts.

Luke gives a version of the Lord’s Prayer after Jesus was asked by his disciples to “teach us to pray” (Luke 11:1). In the sermons recounted in Matthew and in the Book of Mormon, Jesus introduces the prayer by first cautioning his listeners to avoid “vain repetitions” and to pray “after this manner,” indicating that the prayer is meant as a pattern.

All versions of the Lord’s Prayer open with the salutation “Our Father,” which implies a close and abiding relationship between God and human beings, his spirit children, and sets the pattern of addressing prayers to God the Father.

The salutation is followed by the phrase “hallowed be thy name,” which exemplifies respect and a worshipful attitude appropriate to the holy nature of prayer. Then, after expressing hope for the divine kingdom to come, the Savior submits his will to God’s with the words “thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven” (Matt. 6:10), exemplifying another important component of prayer.

After setting a proper context for prayer, Christ makes his first request—for “daily bread.” When regarded as a model for prayer, this phrase can be seen as supplication for both temporal necessities and spiritual food. Christ’s second request, that God “forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors” (Matt. 6:12 and 3 Ne. 13:11), appears in Luke as “forgive us our sins; for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us” (Luke 11:4). An important element in personal prayer is acknowledging and asking forgiveness for one’s sins, but always in conjunction with forgiving the offenses of others (cf. D&C 64:10).

The texts then include a phrase that is perhaps the most difficult to understand in most common translations of the Lord's Prayer—"lead us not into temptation," which could be read to imply that God might influence toward evil unless implored to do otherwise. This problem is resolved in the JST, which reads, "And suffer us not to be led into temptation" (JST Matt. 6:14; cf. the Syriac translation; see also James 1:13). Christ's purpose appears to be to inspire mortals to ask daily for God's help as they try to resist evil and to live purely.

In closing the prayer, Christ again acknowledges God's power and glory and then ends with "Amen," as do all LDS prayers. (On the long ending of the Lord's Prayer, cf. Welch, 1990, pp. 157–60).

By praying with their personal heartfelt feelings "after this manner," rather than reciting the Lord's Prayer as a memorized piece, Latter-day Saints seek to find true communion with God the Father, through his Son Jesus Christ.

[See also Sermon on the Mount.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Welch, John W. "The Lord's Prayers." Ensign 6 (Jan. 1976): 14–17.

———. The Sermon at the Temple and the Sermon on the Mount. Salt Lake City, 1990.

SUE BERGIN

LORD'S SUPPER

See: Sacrament

LOST SCRIPTURE

Latter-day Saints recognize that many ancient scriptures have been lost. Some contents of these sacred records are known, but much remains obscure. Latter-day Saints look forward to a time when all things revealed from God will be restored and made known again.

The Bible is of inestimable worth; nevertheless, it testifies to its own incompleteness. It mentions sacred works that are no longer available (Josh. 10:13; 1 Kgs. 11:41; 1 Chr. 29:29; Eph. 3:3; Col. 4:16; Jude 1:14–15), and it refers to Old Testament prophecies presently missing (see Matt. 2:23; John 8:56).

Likewise, the Book of Mormon identifies several prophetic writings absent from the Bible, such as words of ZENOS, ZENOCK, NEUM, EZIAS, and JOSEPH OF EGYPT (see also HC 2:236), which were found on the brass PLATES. Their prophecies dealt with the future of Israel and the coming of Jesus Christ. Nephi's brother Jacob stated that all the prophets had testified of Jesus Christ (Jacob 4:4–6; 7:9–11; cf. John 5:39), a fact not readily apparent in the Old Testament as it now exists. The Prophet Joseph SMITH wrote in 1832, "From sundry revelations which had been received, it was apparent that many important points touching the salvation of man, had been taken from the Bible, or lost before it was compiled" (HC 1:245; cf. 1 Ne. 13:26–42). Remedying this, in part, was one of the purposes of the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST).

The Doctrine and Covenants speaks of lost writings of JOHN (D&C 7:1–8; 93:5–18) and refers to a law of dealing with enemies given by God to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph, but not found in the Bible (D&C 98:28–37); the Pearl of Great Price restores a portion of the writings of Abraham, Moses, Enoch, and Adam, especially about the Creation and early history of God's dealings with man. Enoch mentioned an ancient BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE and a genealogy of Adam (Moses 6:5–8, 46), along with now missing blessings and prophecies uttered by Adam and his descendants at the valley of ADAM-OND1-AHMAN before Adam's death (D&C 107:53–57).

Many Book of Mormon source materials are not now accessible. The GOLD PLATES given to Joseph Smith in 1827 mention a record of LEHI (1 Ne. 1:16–17) and other writings of Nephi<sub>1</sub> (1 Ne. 9:1–6). JACOB, MORMON, and MORONI<sub>2</sub> note that they could scarcely include "the hundredth part" of what could have been written (Jacob 3:13; 3 Ne. 5:8; Ether 15:33). The Lord often commanded the Nephite record keepers not to write or circulate certain things (see 1 Ne. 14:25–28; 3 Ne. 26:11–12), and Joseph Smith was similarly commanded by the Lord not to translate a large sealed portion of the gold plates (D&C 17:6; see also Ether 4:1–7; 5:1–6).

In another, broader sense, much "scripture" was never written down by mortals at all. Whatever God's authorized servants say "when moved upon by the Holy Ghost" is scripture (D&C 68:1–6). If all the acts and words of the Savior had been recorded, John said "the world itself could not contain the books that should be written" (John 20:30–31; 21:25). Also not in written form are myriads of translations of the Lord's Prayer—"lead us not into temptation," which could be read to imply that God might influence toward evil unless implored to do otherwise. This problem is resolved in the JST, which reads, "And suffer us not to be led into temptation" (JST Matt. 6:14; cf. the Syriac translation; see also James 1:13). Christ's purpose appears to be to inspire mortals to ask daily for God's help as they try to resist evil and to live purely.

In closing the prayer, Christ again acknowledges God's power and glory and then ends with "Amen," as do all LDS prayers. (On the long ending of the Lord's Prayer, cf. Welch, 1990, pp. 157–60).

By praying with their personal heartfelt feelings "after this manner," rather than reciting the Lord's Prayer as a memorized piece, Latter-day Saints seek to find true communion with God the Father, through his Son Jesus Christ.

[See also Sermon on the Mount.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Welch, John W. "The Lord's Prayers." Ensign 6 (Jan. 1976): 14–17.

———. The Sermon at the Temple and the Sermon on the Mount. Salt Lake City, 1990.

SUE BERGIN

---

LORD'S SUPPER

See: Sacrament

---

LOST SCRIPTURE

Latter-day Saints recognize that many ancient scriptures have been lost. Some contents of these sacred records are known, but much remains obscure. Latter-day Saints look forward to a time when all things revealed from God will be restored and made known again.

The Bible is of inestimable worth; nevertheless, it testifies to its own incompleteness. It mentions sacred works that are no longer available (Josh. 10:13; 1 Kgs. 11:41; 1 Chr. 29:29; Eph. 3:3; Col. 4:16; Jude 1:14–15), and it refers to Old Testament prophecies presently missing (see Matt. 2:23; John 8:56).

Likewise, the Book of Mormon identifies several prophetic writings absent from the Bible, such as words of ZENOS, ZENOCK, NEUM, EZIAS, and JOSEPH OF EGYPT (see also HC 2:236), which were found on the brass PLATES. Their prophecies dealt with the future of Israel and the coming of Jesus Christ. Nephi's brother Jacob stated that all the prophets had testified of Jesus Christ (Jacob 4:4–6; 7:9–11; cf. John 5:39), a fact not readily apparent in the Old Testament as it now exists. The Prophet Joseph SMITH wrote in 1832, "From sundry revelations which had been received, it was apparent that many important points touching the salvation of man, had been taken from the Bible, or lost before it was compiled" (HC 1:245; cf. 1 Ne. 13:26–42). Remedying this, in part, was one of the purposes of the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST).

The Doctrine and Covenants speaks of lost writings of JOHN (D&C 7:1–8; 93:5–18) and refers to a law of dealing with enemies given by God to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph, but not found in the Bible (D&C 98:28–37); the Pearl of Great Price restores a portion of the writings of Abraham, Moses, Enoch, and Adam, especially about the Creation and early history of God's dealings with man. Enoch mentioned an ancient BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE and a genealogy of Adam (Moses 6:5–8, 46), along with now missing blessings and prophecies uttered by Adam and his descendants at the valley of ADAM-OND1-AHMAN before Adam's death (D&C 107:53–57).

Many Book of Mormon source materials are not now accessible. The GOLD PLATES given to Joseph Smith in 1827 mention a record of LEHI (1 Ne. 1:16–17) and other writings of Nephi<sub>1</sub> (1 Ne. 9:1–6). JACOB, MORMON, and MORONI<sub>2</sub> note that they could scarcely include "the hundredth part" of what could have been written (Jacob 3:13; 3 Ne. 5:8; Ether 15:33). The Lord often commanded the Nephite record keepers not to write or circulate certain things (see 1 Ne. 14:25–28; 3 Ne. 26:11–12), and Joseph Smith was similarly commanded by the Lord not to translate a large sealed portion of the gold plates (D&C 17:6; see also Ether 4:1–7; 5:1–6).

In another, broader sense, much "scripture" was never written down by mortals at all. Whatever God's authorized servants say "when moved upon by the Holy Ghost" is scripture (D&C 68:1–6). If all the acts and words of the Savior had been recorded, John said "the world itself could not contain the books that should be written" (John 20:30–31; 21:25). Also not in written form are myriads of inspired utterances of prophets and apostles and of other men and women filled with the Holy Ghost. Such scripture is not lost to God. "All things are written by the Father," Jesus said (3 Ne. 27:26), and testimonies spoken on earth are recorded in heaven for the angels to look upon (D&C 62:3) and will be recalled at some future day.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Matthews, Robert J. A Bible! A Bible! Salt Lake City, 1990.
McConkie, Joseph Fielding. Prophets and Prophecy, pp. 141–54. Salt Lake City, 1988.

ROBERT A. CLOWARD

---

LOTTERIES

See: Gambling

---

LOVE

The "pure love of Christ" (Moro. 7:47) is the foundation of true religion. A lawyer once asked Jesus Christ, "Master, which is the great commandment in the law? Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (Matt. 22:36–40; cf. Gal. 5:14).

Love is manifest in its perfection in God the Eternal Father and his son Jesus Christ. John declared that "God is love" (1 Jn. 4:8). His love has no portions and no bounds; love given to one does not diminish that given to another. The Father desires to share with his children all that he has—all truth, power, and goodness. He is the Father of all human SPIRITS. He placed human beings upon this earth and provided the plan through which his Only Begotten Son makes it possible for individuals to come back into his presence and receive EXALTATION and ETERNAL LIFE. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3:16).

Jesus Christ also loved the Father's children, his brothers and sisters, so much that he freely shed his blood and laid down his life to atone for their sins and bring about a universal RESURRECTION. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John 15:13).

While his death and ATONEMENT were the supreme manifestations of love, his actions during his life in the Holy Land and during his post-resurrection ministry among the NEPHITES in the Western Hemisphere also exemplify this principle. His heart was filled with compassion for the poor and for all who suffered. He healed the sick, raised the dead, fed the hungry, and blessed the children. Then, when his life was ending and he hung in agony on the cross, he besought God to forgive the soldiers who crucified him (JST Luke 23:34[35]).

Within his example are found all the characteristics of what is called in the scriptures charity or "the pure love of Christ" (Moro. 7:47). Love is kind and long-suffering, humble, "seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, and rejoiceth not in iniquity but rejoiceth in the truth, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things" (Moro. 7:45; cf. 1 Cor. 13:4–7).

To his disciples Jesus said, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another" (John 13:34–35).

Human beings show their love to God through obedience to his COMMANDMENTS (2 Jn. 6). Love of God, according to the prophet NEPHI of the Book of Mormon, is "most desirable above all things" (1 Ne. 11:22). According to King BENJAMIN, another Book of Mormon leader, to gain the love of God individuals must put off the natural man, learn to listen to the HOLY GHOST, accept the ATONEMENT OF JESUS CHRIST, and become as children—submissive, meek, humble, patient, and willing to submit to all things, even as a child submits to his father (Mosiah 3:19).

MORMON, another Book of Mormon prophet, declared that the gift of love must be sought: "Pray unto the Father with all the energy of heart," he advised, "that ye may be filled with this love, which he hath bestowed upon all who are true followers of his Son, Jesus Christ" (Moro. 7:48).

Obedience to the first great commandment is not possible without obedience to the second: "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also" (1 Jn. 4:20–21).

As the Savior manifested his love through service, so do human beings. The Saints of God are inspired utterances of prophets and apostles and of other men and women filled with the Holy Ghost. Such scripture is not lost to God. "All things are written by the Father," Jesus said (3 Ne. 27:26), and testimonies spoken on earth are recorded in heaven for the angels to look upon (D&C 62:3) and will be recalled at some future day.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Matthews, Robert J. A Bible! A Bible! Salt Lake City, 1990.
McConkie, Joseph Fielding. Prophets and Prophecy, pp. 141–54. Salt Lake City, 1988.

ROBERT A. CLOWARD

---

LOTTERIES

See: Gambling

---

LOVE

The "pure love of Christ" (Moro. 7:47) is the foundation of true religion. A lawyer once asked Jesus Christ, "Master, which is the great commandment in the law? Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (Matt. 22:36–40; cf. Gal. 5:14).

Love is manifest in its perfection in God the Eternal Father and his son Jesus Christ. John declared that "God is love" (1 Jn. 4:8). His love has no portions and no bounds; love given to one does not diminish that given to another. The Father desires to share with his children all that he has—all truth, power, and goodness. He is the Father of all human SPIRITS. He placed human beings upon this earth and provided the plan through which his Only Begotten Son makes it possible for individuals to come back into his presence and receive EXALTATION and ETERNAL LIFE. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3:16).

Jesus Christ also loved the Father's children, his brothers and sisters, so much that he freely shed his blood and laid down his life to atone for their sins and bring about a universal RESURRECTION. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John 15:13).

While his death and ATONEMENT were the supreme manifestations of love, his actions during his life in the Holy Land and during his post-resurrection ministry among the NEPHITES in the Western Hemisphere also exemplify this principle. His heart was filled with compassion for the poor and for all who suffered. He healed the sick, raised the dead, fed the hungry, and blessed the children. Then, when his life was ending and he hung in agony on the cross, he besought God to forgive the soldiers who crucified him (JST Luke 23:34[35]).

Within his example are found all the characteristics of what is called in the scriptures charity or "the pure love of Christ" (Moro. 7:47). Love is kind and long-suffering, humble, "seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, and rejoiceth not in iniquity but rejoiceth in the truth, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things" (Moro. 7:45; cf. 1 Cor. 13:4–7).

To his disciples Jesus said, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another" (John 13:34–35).

Human beings show their love to God through obedience to his COMMANDMENTS (2 Jn. 6). Love of God, according to the prophet NEPHI of the Book of Mormon, is "most desirable above all things" (1 Ne. 11:22). According to King BENJAMIN, another Book of Mormon leader, to gain the love of God individuals must put off the natural man, learn to listen to the HOLY GHOST, accept the ATONEMENT OF JESUS CHRIST, and become as children—submissive, meek, humble, patient, and willing to submit to all things, even as a child submits to his father (Mosiah 3:19).

MORMON, another Book of Mormon prophet, declared that the gift of love must be sought: "Pray unto the Father with all the energy of heart," he advised, "that ye may be filled with this love, which he hath bestowed upon all who are true followers of his Son, Jesus Christ" (Moro. 7:48).

Obedience to the first great commandment is not possible without obedience to the second: "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also" (1 Jn. 4:20–21).

As the Savior manifested his love through service, so do human beings. The Saints of God are recognized by the love they show one to another. Love includes kindness, tenderness, understanding, mercy, forgiveness, affection, and ultimately a willingness to sacrifice all that one has, if necessary. The absence of love is a sign of APOSTASY.

Love is particularly important in the family unit. It begins in the home between husband and wife. "Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and shalt cleave unto her and none else" (D&C 42:22). This encompasses both a spiritual and a physical fidelity. Then, when husbands and wives as parents govern their households by the principle of love, "the same spirit will be sooner or later diffused through every member of [the] family. . . . Love is the only correct governing principle" (Cannon, p. 383). As David O. MCKAY, a latter-day prophet, said, "I picture heaven to be a continuation of the ideal home" (Gospel Ideals, Salt Lake City, 1953, p. 490).

Love established in the home then extends out to the neighborhood, the state, the nation, and the world and has the power to bind people together and make them one. "Differences of language, of education, of race and of nationality all disappear. Under its influence, prejudices and animosities vanish" (Cannon, p. 299).

The love of the Saints also includes loving those who are considered adversaries. The Savior taught, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them who despitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good" (3 Ne. 12:44-45; cf. Matt. 5:44-45).

Love of one's enemies does not extend to love of their wickedness but does extend to efforts to turn them from such actions. It includes respect for their significance and potential as children of God.

Jesus prophesied that in the LAST DAYS evil will have great power and the love of many shall wax cold (Matt. 24:12), but the scriptures also promise great blessings "held in reserve for them that love him" (D&C 138:52).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Beardall, Douglas, and Jewel Beardall, comps. The Qualities of Love. Salt Lake City, 1978.
- Cannon, George Q. Gospel Truth. Jerreld L. Newquist, comp. Salt Lake City, 1987.
- Madsen, Truman G. Four Essays on Love. Salt Lake City, 1971.

VIVIAN PAULSEN

LUCIFER

See: Devils

LYMAN, AMY BROWN

Amy Brown Lyman (1872-1959) was the eighth general president of the RELIEF SOCIETY, an author, Utah state legislator, teacher, and social worker. She possessed an active mind, warm personality, good humor, indomitable spirit, and strong desire to serve.

Born in Pleasant Grove, Utah, on February 7, 1872, to pioneers John and Margaret Zimmerman Brown, Amy was a beautiful, popular, and intelligent child, with dark hair and eyes and a joyous zest for living. She attended public school in Pleasant Grove, then the Brigham Young Academy from 1888 to 1890. Her enthusiasm for learning blossomed under Dr. Karl Maeser, with whose family she boarded for several years. She taught at the academy for four years and then in Salt Lake City elementary schools two more years.

On September 9, 1896, she married Richard R. Lyman, a professor of civil engineering at the University of Utah; he later served as a member of recognized by the love they show one to another. Love includes kindness, tenderness, understanding, mercy, forgiveness, affection, and ultimately a willingness to sacrifice all that one has, if necessary. The absence of love is a sign of APOSTASY.

Amy Brown Lyman (1872-1959), eighth general president of the Relief Society, served from 1940 to 1945.

Love is particularly important in the family unit. It begins in the home between husband and wife. "Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and shalt cleave unto her and none else" (D&C 42:22). This encompasses both a spiritual and a physical fidelity. Then, when husbands and wives as parents govern their households by the principle of love, "the same spirit will be sooner or later diffused through every member of [the] family. . . . Love is the only correct governing principle" (Cannon, p. 383). As David O. MCKAY, a latter-day prophet, said, "I picture heaven to be a continuation of the ideal home" (Gospel Ideals, Salt Lake City, 1953, p. 490).

Love established in the home then extends out to the neighborhood, the state, the nation, and the world and has the power to bind people together and make them one. "Differences of language, of education, of race and of nationality all disappear. Under its influence, prejudices and animosities vanish" (Cannon, p. 299).

The love of the Saints also includes loving those who are considered adversaries. The Savior taught, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them who despitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good" (3 Ne. 12:44-45; cf. Matt. 5:44-45).

Love of one's enemies does not extend to love of their wickedness but does extend to efforts to turn them from such actions. It includes respect for their significance and potential as children of God.

Jesus prophesied that in the LAST DAYS evil will have great power and the love of many shall wax cold (Matt. 24:12), but the scriptures also promise great blessings "held in reserve for them that love him" (D&C 138:52).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Beardall, Douglas, and Jewel Beardall, comps. The Qualities of Love. Salt Lake City, 1978.
- Cannon, George Q. Gospel Truth. Jerreld L. Newquist, comp. Salt Lake City, 1987.
- Madsen, Truman G. Four Essays on Love. Salt Lake City, 1971.

VIVIAN PAULSEN

LUCIFER

See: Devils

LYMAN, AMY BROWN

Amy Brown Lyman (1872-1959) was the eighth general president of the RELIEF SOCIETY, an author, Utah state legislator, teacher, and social worker. She possessed an active mind, warm personality, good humor, indomitable spirit, and strong desire to serve.

Born in Pleasant Grove, Utah, on February 7, 1872, to pioneers John and Margaret Zimmerman Brown, Amy was a beautiful, popular, and intelligent child, with dark hair and eyes and a joyous zest for living. She attended public school in Pleasant Grove, then the Brigham Young Academy from 1888 to 1890. Her enthusiasm for learning blossomed under Dr. Karl Maeser, with whose family she boarded for several years. She taught at the academy for four years and then in Salt Lake City elementary schools two more years.

On September 9, 1896, she married Richard R. Lyman, a professor of civil engineering at the University of Utah; he later served as a member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles for twenty-five years. The Lymans had two children, Wendell Brown and Margaret; they also raised their granddaughter, Amy Kathryn Lyman, after the death of her parents.

Amy Brown Lyman (1872-1959), eighth general president of the Relief Society, served from 1940 to 1945.

Amy continued to develop her talents while raising her family and accompanying her husband on travels for his doctoral studies. She took classes at the University of Utah, the University of Chicago, and Cornell University. While in Chicago, she became interested in social work and spent several days at Hull House, where she met Jane Addams and gained experiences that changed her life. During summers, she studied family welfare work at the University of Colorado, earned a special certificate in social service, and received in-service training at the city and county welfare departments in Denver.

In 1909 she began her long service to the Relief Society, in which she displayed great organizational and leadership skills. She served two years as a general board member, two years as assistant secretary, and fifteen years as general secretary-treasurer. As secretary-treasurer, she brought to the Relief Society office up-to-date practices, introducing the use of secretaries, office machines, and new filing systems; prepared the first uniform record books for ward Relief Societies; and collected all the minutes and historical documents of the Relief Society since its inception in Nauvoo in 1842. For eleven years she served as first counselor in the general presidency, and she also presided over the women's organizations in the European Mission while her husband served as mission president.

Amy Brown Lyman was authorized by President Joseph F. SMITH to organize and promote family welfare work. She established and directed the Relief Society general board's Social Service Department, with its employment bureau and child-placement agency; taught thousands of volunteer Relief Society workers fundamental principles of family welfare; developed extensive health and nurse training programs; and served in public and private welfare agencies through both world wars and the Great Depression of the 1930s.

During this time, she also rendered important service in many civic organizations and in the Utah state legislature (1923–1924), where she sponsored legislation to provide for maternity and infant care. She held offices in the National Council of Women and in 1929 helped establish the Utah State Training School, where she served as a trustee for eleven years.

In January 1940, the centennial year for the Relief Society, Amy Brown Lyman became general president of the Relief Society. In this position she reemphasized the Relief Society's unique position among women's groups in providing opportunities for education and service outside the home. Under her presidency, the Relief Society actively supported the new Church welfare program, especially sponsoring sewing projects to supply Church welfare storehouses and to meet Red Cross needs in World War II.

Amy Brown Lyman experienced much personal tragedy in her life. Besides the early deaths of her son and daughter-in-law, she endured a great ordeal when her husband was released from the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles and subsequently excommunicated from the Church in November 1943. She continued to serve as general president of the Relief Society until she asked to be released in September 1944; the following spring her request was granted. She continued to stand by her husband, who was rebaptized in the Church in 1954.

Her testimony sustained and strengthened her throughout her life. She wrote, "My testimony has been my anchor and my stay, my satisfaction in times of joy and gladness, my comfort in times of discouragement" (Lyman, pp. 160–61). Her vision, wisdom, spirituality, and concern for others made Amy Brown Lyman a fitting president to usher in the Relief Society's second century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- History of Relief Society 1842-1966*. Salt Lake City, 1966.
 Lyman, Amy B. In Retrospect: Autobiography of Amy Brown Lyman. Salt Lake City, 1945.
 Peterson, Janet, and LaRene Gaunt. Elect Ladies, Presidents of the Relief Society. Salt Lake City, 1990.

ANN WILLARDSON ENGAR
 AMY LYMAN ENGAR

---

M

---

---

MAGAZINES

From the earliest years of the Church, it has sought to build and strengthen the LDS community through a wide variety of periodical publications. Although the early LDS periodicals looked like newspapers (some were called “papers” and carried some news), they mostly printed religious and general interest articles, multipart serials, editorials, sermons, revelations, Christian and Church history, hymns, poems, advertisements, and letters from missionaries. Church magazines have always endeavored “to strengthen the faith of Church members, . . . promulgate the truths of the restored gospel, [and] keep members abreast of current and vital Church policies, programs, and happenings” (IE 73 [July 1970]:8). Many LDS missions started their own publications to communicate with and teach their people (see INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINES).

Other periodicals were financed, edited, and published independently by members of the Church, and thus technically were not official Church publications. However, some of these journals were brought under the umbrella of the Church AUXILIARIES, and then of the Church. After 1866, many LDS English-language periodicals printed lesson materials and fiction. In 1971, the Church consolidated its English-language periodicals into three new magazines assigned to serve different groups: ENSIGN (adults), NEW ERA (youth, ages twelve to eighteen), and FRIEND (children, to age twelve). BYU Studies (1959–) was retained to be published by Brigham Young University for LDS scholars. The chart in Appendix 3 lists the major Church periodicals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- “Church Publications.” Deseret News 1989–1990 Church Almanac, pp. 187–91. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Green, Doyle L. “The Church and Its Magazines.” Ensign 1 (Jan. 1971):12–15.

RICHARD TICE

---

MAGIC

“Magic” anciently implied something akin to sorcery, and modern definitions retain this sense as well as a host of other meanings that have accrued around the term over many years and from many cultures. On one point there is general agreement: “Magic” suggests the supernatural. Pretending to use the occult when so-called magic tricks are displayed is simply part of the entertainment. When it implies governing the forces of nature through supernatural means, however, magic takes on a markedly different character.

Latter-day Saints reject magic as a serious manipulation of nature and are advised to avoid

---

M

---

---

MAGAZINES

From the earliest years of the Church, it has sought to build and strengthen the LDS community through a wide variety of periodical publications. Although the early LDS periodicals looked like newspapers (some were called “papers” and carried some news), they mostly printed religious and general interest articles, multipart serials, editorials, sermons, revelations, Christian and Church history, hymns, poems, advertisements, and letters from missionaries. Church magazines have always endeavored “to strengthen the faith of Church members, . . . promulgate the truths of the restored gospel, [and] keep members abreast of current and vital Church policies, programs, and happenings” (IE 73 [July 1970]:8). Many LDS missions started their own publications to communicate with and teach their people (see INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINES).

Other periodicals were financed, edited, and published independently by members of the Church, and thus technically were not official Church publications. However, some of these journals were brought under the umbrella of the Church AUXILIARIES, and then of the Church. After 1866, many LDS English-language periodicals printed lesson materials and fiction. In 1971, the Church consolidated its English-language periodicals into three new magazines assigned to serve different groups: ENSIGN (adults), NEW ERA (youth, ages twelve to eighteen), and FRIEND (children, to age twelve). BYU Studies (1959–) was retained to be published by Brigham Young University for LDS scholars. The chart in Appendix 3 lists the major Church periodicals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- “Church Publications.” Deseret News 1989–1990 Church Almanac, pp. 187–91. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Green, Doyle L. “The Church and Its Magazines.” Ensign 1 (Jan. 1971):12–15.

RICHARD TICE

---

MAGIC

“Magic” anciently implied something akin to sorcery, and modern definitions retain this sense as well as a host of other meanings that have accrued around the term over many years and from many cultures. On one point there is general agreement: “Magic” suggests the supernatural. Pretending to use the occult when so-called magic tricks are displayed is simply part of the entertainment. When it implies governing the forces of nature through supernatural means, however, magic takes on a markedly different character.

Latter-day Saints reject magic as a serious manipulation of nature and are advised to avoid

any practice that claims supernatural power apart from the PRIESTHOOD and spiritual gifts of the Church (see DEVILS; SATANISM). They are also counseled against using any fortune-telling devices. Both so-called white and black magic can be Satanic.

True miracles are done by the power of Jesus Christ. Devils may be cast out, but only in humility and by fasting, faith, and prayer, and the power of the true priesthood, with no fanfare or public acclaim (cf. Matt. 17:21; D&C 84:66–73). Regarding the DISCERNMENT of true spirits from evil ones, the Prophet Joseph SMITH taught that without the priesthood and “a knowledge of the laws by which spirits are governed,” it is impossible to discover the difference between the miracles of Moses and the magicians of the pharaoh or between those of the apostles and Simon the sorcerer (TPJS, pp. 202–206). A test of a godly spirit is to discern whether there is “any intelligence communicated” or “the purposes of God developed” (TPJS, p. 204).

Ultimately, it is irrelevant to the determination of its sources to note that a so-called miracle is for the good of mankind. The Savior recognized that miracles may come from an evil source: “Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity” (Matt. 7:22–23).

The Lord gave instruction to Israel that the righteous were to call upon him for revelation and to avoid magical devices and incantations that were prevalent among the other ancient nations (Isa. 8:19–20; Ex. 22:18). One danger of preoccupation with forms of magic based on the power of Satan is that it draws people away from the true source of inspiration and makes the worker of magic a servant of the adversary.

The Church holds that no person need unduly fear magic or those who claim magical powers, for magic can have no power over anyone unless the person believes that it can.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hinckley, Gordon B. “Lord, Increase Our Faith.” Ensign 17 (Nov. 1987):52.
McConkie, Bruce R. “Magic.” MD, pp. 462–63.
Smith, Joseph F. GD, pp. 375–77.

JANET THOMAS

---

MAGNIFYING ONE'S CALLING

Magnifying one's calling is a common exhortation among Latter-day Saints. In the OATH AND COVENANT OF THE PRIESTHOOD the promise that “all that [the] Father hath” is given to those who are faithful in obtaining both the Aaronic and Melchizedek priesthoods and “magnifying their calling” (D&C 84:33–39). Paul told the Romans that he magnified his office by teaching the GENTILES (Rom. 11:13). JACOB taught his Book of Mormon people to magnify their CALLINGS (Jacob 1:19; 2:2). And the Lord has given modern admonitions to Latter-day Saints to “magnify” or prepare to “magnify” their callings (D&C 24:3, 9; 66:11; 88:80).

Magnifying one's calling means taking callings seriously, following through responsibly, and realizing the importance of one's efforts. Magnifying one's calling does not mean to enlarge it beyond one's STEWARDSHIP or to make it appear great in the eyes of others, although there is a need to give one's own calling appropriate personal importance.

In Paul's declaration to the Romans that he magnified his office, the Greek verb doxazo is used, meaning to make honorable or glorious, the same verb used by New Testament authors to exhort their readers to glorify God (cf. Matt. 5:16; Rom. 15:6). Thus, to magnify a calling means to make it honorable and glorious, even to glorify God through service. Jacob explained that magnifying callings meant that he and his brother Joseph took upon themselves “the responsibility [of] answering the sins of the people upon our own heads if we did not teach them the word of God with all diligence” (Jacob 1:19). The Lord told William E. M'Lellin that if he, M'Lellin, would carry out his assignment fully as explained to him, including obeying the injunction to personal worthiness, he would thereby magnify his office (D&C 66:10–11).

Those who seek to respond to the Lord's admonition to magnify their callings take even the simplest calling seriously as an opportunity to glorify God and serve his children.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Millet, Robert L. Magnifying Priesthood Power. Bountiful, Utah, 1989.

WILLIAM E. EVENSON

any practice that claims supernatural power apart from the PRIESTHOOD and spiritual gifts of the Church (see DEVILS; SATANISM). They are also counseled against using any fortune-telling devices. Both so-called white and black magic can be Satanic.

True miracles are done by the power of Jesus Christ. Devils may be cast out, but only in humility and by fasting, faith, and prayer, and the power of the true priesthood, with no fanfare or public acclaim (cf. Matt. 17:21; D&C 84:66–73). Regarding the DISCERNMENT of true spirits from evil ones, the Prophet Joseph SMITH taught that without the priesthood and “a knowledge of the laws by which spirits are governed,” it is impossible to discover the difference between the miracles of Moses and the magicians of the pharaoh or between those of the apostles and Simon the sorcerer (TPJS, pp. 202–206). A test of a godly spirit is to discern whether there is “any intelligence communicated” or “the purposes of God developed” (TPJS, p. 204).

Ultimately, it is irrelevant to the determination of its sources to note that a so-called miracle is for the good of mankind. The Savior recognized that miracles may come from an evil source: “Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity” (Matt. 7:22–23).

The Lord gave instruction to Israel that the righteous were to call upon him for revelation and to avoid magical devices and incantations that were prevalent among the other ancient nations (Isa. 8:19–20; Ex. 22:18). One danger of preoccupation with forms of magic based on the power of Satan is that it draws people away from the true source of inspiration and makes the worker of magic a servant of the adversary.

The Church holds that no person need unduly fear magic or those who claim magical powers, for magic can have no power over anyone unless the person believes that it can.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hinckley, Gordon B. “Lord, Increase Our Faith.” Ensign 17 (Nov. 1987):52.
McConkie, Bruce R. “Magic.” MD, pp. 462–63.
Smith, Joseph F. GD, pp. 375–77.

JANET THOMAS

---

MAGNIFYING ONE'S CALLING

Magnifying one's calling is a common exhortation among Latter-day Saints. In the OATH AND COVENANT OF THE PRIESTHOOD the promise that “all that [the] Father hath” is given to those who are faithful in obtaining both the Aaronic and Melchizedek priesthoods and “magnifying their calling” (D&C 84:33–39). Paul told the Romans that he magnified his office by teaching the GENTILES (Rom. 11:13). JACOB taught his Book of Mormon people to magnify their CALLINGS (Jacob 1:19; 2:2). And the Lord has given modern admonitions to Latter-day Saints to “magnify” or prepare to “magnify” their callings (D&C 24:3, 9; 66:11; 88:80).

Magnifying one's calling means taking callings seriously, following through responsibly, and realizing the importance of one's efforts. Magnifying one's calling does not mean to enlarge it beyond one's STEWARDSHIP or to make it appear great in the eyes of others, although there is a need to give one's own calling appropriate personal importance.

In Paul's declaration to the Romans that he magnified his office, the Greek verb doxazo is used, meaning to make honorable or glorious, the same verb used by New Testament authors to exhort their readers to glorify God (cf. Matt. 5:16; Rom. 15:6). Thus, to magnify a calling means to make it honorable and glorious, even to glorify God through service. Jacob explained that magnifying callings meant that he and his brother Joseph took upon themselves “the responsibility [of] answering the sins of the people upon our own heads if we did not teach them the word of God with all diligence” (Jacob 1:19). The Lord told William E. M'Lellin that if he, M'Lellin, would carry out his assignment fully as explained to him, including obeying the injunction to personal worthiness, he would thereby magnify his office (D&C 66:10–11).

Those who seek to respond to the Lord's admonition to magnify their callings take even the simplest calling seriously as an opportunity to glorify God and serve his children.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Millet, Robert L. Magnifying Priesthood Power. Bountiful, Utah, 1989.

WILLIAM E. EVENSON

MALACHI, PROPHECIES OF

The importance of Malachi's prophecies is reflected in their prominence in nonbiblical LDS scriptures. For example, the resurrected Jesus instructed hearers in the Western Hemisphere (c. A.D. 34) to include Malachi 3 and 4 with their records (3 Ne. 24–25), and references to Malachi's prophecies appear in the DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS and the PEARL OF GREAT PRICE. Those prophecies pertaining to the latter days concern (1) the Lord's latter-day advent; (2) the messenger sent to prepare his way; (3) the sons of Levi and their offering; (4) TITHING; (5) the lot of the wicked; and (6) Elijah's mission. Some of his timeless teachings pertain to such matters as the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man (Mal. 2:10), the problems of divorce (2:14–16), and problems of immorality (3:5–6).

Malachi prophesied that the Lord would come suddenly to his temple (Mal. 3:1). Latter-day Saints believe that one such appearance occurred in the KIRTLAND TEMPLE when Jesus appeared there in 1836. Other messengers also restored KEYS (D&C 110), making possible the "complete salvation and exaltation of all who are willing to obey the gospel" (Smith 2:47; see also JESUS CHRIST: LATTER-DAY APPEARANCES OF).

The "messenger" sent to prepare the way (Mal. 3:1) can refer to all messengers whom God may send to restore blessings and authority lost through apostasy (see ELIAS). Most messengers who have assisted in establishing the latter-day kingdom of God have bestowed priesthood powers and keys vital to the authoritative performance of saving ordinances (D&C 1:17–18; 128:20–21).

The Lord promised that he will "purge" the Levites so that they will become worthy to function again (Mal. 3:3). When he has done this, he will direct the restoration of sacrifices (cf. D&C 13). Joseph Smith wrote that the "offering of [animal] sacrifice has ever been connected and forms a part of the duties of the Priesthood. It began with the Priesthood, and will be continued until after the coming of Christ . . . when the [Aaronic] Priesthood is restored with all its authority, power and blessings" (HC 4:211).

Malachi emphasizes tithing. Indicting those who have "gone away" by failing to pay tithes and offerings, the Lord promises that if they will return, "I will return" (Mal. 3:7). The principle of tithing, which was practiced as early as Abraham (cf. Gen. 14:20; 28:22), has been renewed in the latter days (D&C 119:4), and blessings are assured for those who give tithes and offerings. The "windows of heaven will be opened," including the pouring out of "revelations" as a reward for such sacrifice (Lee, p. 16).

In the last days, trouble awaits the wicked. "The day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; . . . and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble." They shall be burned, leaving neither "root [ancestors] nor branch [children]" (Mal. 4:1; cf. T. Burton, IE 70 [Dec. 1967]:80–82). This burning "is not a figure of speech" (Smith, Vol. 1, p. 238). "It may be . . . that nothing except the power of faith and the authority of the priesthood can save individuals" (McConkie, p. 93). But the "Sun of righteousness" (Mal. 4:2; cf. 3 Ne. 25:2) will bring the healing power of the resurrection and redemption (2 Ne. 25:13), and the righteous will be nourished "as calves of the stall" because of their obedience to the Lord (1 Ne. 22:24).

Malachi's prophecies climax with the mission of Elijah, which receives prominent attention in latter-day sacred writings. During the angel Moroni's visits to Joseph Smith in 1823, he quoted Malachi 4:5–6 with modifications: "Behold, I will reveal unto you the Priesthood, by the hand of Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall plant in the hearts of the children the promises made to their fathers. . . . If it were not so, the whole earth would be utterly wasted at his coming" (JS—H 1:38–39). In fulfillment, Elijah appeared to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery in the Kirtland Temple on April 3, 1836 (Passover time), and restored the sealing powers (D&C 110:13–16).

Speaking of Malachi 4:5–6, Joseph Smith asked, "How is [this prophecy] to be fulfilled? The keys are to be delivered, the spirit of Elijah is to come, the Gospel to be established, the Saints of God gathered, Zion built up, and the Saints to come up as saviors on Mount Zion. But how? . . . By building their temples . . . and receiving all the ordinances, baptisms, confirmations, washings, anointings, ordinations and sealing powers upon their heads, in behalf of all their progenitors who are dead, and redeem them; . . . and herein is the chain that binds the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the children to the fathers, which fulfills the mission of Elijah" (HC 6:184). If this eternal goal could not be achieved, one of the major purposes of the plan of redemption would fail.

An integral part of this plan is to “further the work of turning the hearts of the children to the fathers by getting . . . sacred family records in order. These records, including especially the ‘book containing the records of our dead’ (D&C 128:24), are a portion of the ‘offering in righteousness’ referred to by Malachi (3:3), which we are to present in His holy temple, and without which we shall not abide the day of His coming” (Kimball, pp. 542–43; see also GENEALOGY).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W. The Teachings of Spencer W. Kimball, ed. Edward L. Kimball. Salt Lake City, 1982.
- Lee, Harold B. “The Way to Eternal Life.” Ensign 1 (Nov. 1971):9–17.
- McConkie, Bruce R. “Stand Independent Above All Other Creatures.” Ensign 9 (May 1979):92–94.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. Church History and Modern Revelation, 2 vols. Salt Lake City, 1953.

GEORGE A. HORTON, JR.

---

MANCHESTER, NEW YORK

See: History of the Church, c. 1820–1831

---

MAN OF HOLINESS

According to ENOCH’s record, Man of Holiness is one NAME OF GOD: “In the language of Adam, Man of Holiness is his name, and the name of his Only Begotten is the Son of Man, even Jesus Christ” (Moses 6:57). God further declared in the revelation to Enoch: “Behold, I am God; Man of Holiness is my name” (Moses 7:35). This name reinforces the observation that GOD THE FATHER is an exalted man of flesh and bones (D&C 130:22), and that every aspect of his character is holy.

In almost a dozen instances, the pre-Christian Nag Hammadi text “Eugnostos the Blessed” uses similar terms—“Immortal Man,” “First Man” and “Man”—for the Father (Robinson, pp. 229–31). Another Nag Hammadi tractate, “The Second Treatise of the Great Seth,” refers to God as “the Man” and “Man of Greatness” (Robinson, p. 364). Thus, ancient authors likewise seem to have defined the Father as a glorified person with a body in whose image man was created.

[See also God the Father: Names and Titles of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brown, S. Kent. “Man and Son of Man.” In The Pearl of Great Price: Revelations From God, ed. H. Donl Peterson and C. Tate. Provo, 1989.
- Robinson, James M., ed. The Nag Hammadi Library, 3rd rev. ed. San Francisco, 1988.

CERALD E. JONES

---

MANIFESTO OF 1890

The Manifesto of 1890 was a proclamation by President Wilford WOODRUFF that the Church had discontinued PLURAL MARRIAGE. It ended a decade of persecution and hardship in which Latter-day Saints tenaciously resisted what they saw as unconstitutional federal attempts to curb polygamy. While the Manifesto is often referred to as a REVELATION, the declaration was actually a press release that followed President Woodruff’s revelatory experiences. In this respect, the Manifesto is similar to DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS OFFICIAL DECLARATION—2.

Following the passage of the Edmunds-Tucker Act in 1887, the Church found it difficult to operate as a viable institution (see ANTIPOLYCAMY LEGISLATION). Among other things, this legislation disincorporated the Church, confiscated its properties, and even threatened seizure of its temples. After visiting with priesthood leaders in many settlements, President Woodruff left for San Francisco on September 3, 1890, to meet with prominent businessmen and politicians. He returned to Salt Lake City on September 21, determined to obtain divine confirmation to pursue a course that seemed to be agonizingly more and more clear. As he explained to Church members a year later, the choice was between, on the one hand, continuing to practice plural marriage and thereby losing the temples, “stopping all the ordinances therein,” and, on the other, ceasing plural marriage in order to continue performing the essential ordinances for the living and the dead. President Woodruff hastened to add that he had acted only as the Lord directed: “I should have let all the temples go out of our hands; I should have gone to prison myself, and let every other man go there, had not the God major purposes of the plan of redemption would fail.

An integral part of this plan is to “further the work of turning the hearts of the children to the fathers by getting . . . sacred family records in order. These records, including especially the ‘book containing the records of our dead’ (D&C 128:24), are a portion of the ‘offering in righteousness’ referred to by Malachi (3:3), which we are to present in His holy temple, and without which we shall not abide the day of His coming” (Kimball, pp. 542–43; see also GENEALOGY).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W. The Teachings of Spencer W. Kimball, ed. Edward L. Kimball. Salt Lake City, 1982.
- Lee, Harold B. “The Way to Eternal Life.” Ensign 1 (Nov. 1971):9–17.
- McConkie, Bruce R. “Stand Independent Above All Other Creatures.” Ensign 9 (May 1979):92–94.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. Church History and Modern Revelation, 2 vols. Salt Lake City, 1953.

GEORGE A. HORTON, JR.

---

MANCHESTER, NEW YORK

See: History of the Church, c. 1820–1831

---

MAN OF HOLINESS

According to ENOCH’s record, Man of Holiness is one NAME OF GOD: “In the language of Adam, Man of Holiness is his name, and the name of his Only Begotten is the Son of Man, even Jesus Christ” (Moses 6:57). God further declared in the revelation to Enoch: “Behold, I am God; Man of Holiness is my name” (Moses 7:35). This name reinforces the observation that GOD THE FATHER is an exalted man of flesh and bones (D&C 130:22), and that every aspect of his character is holy.

In almost a dozen instances, the pre-Christian Nag Hammadi text “Eugnostos the Blessed” uses similar terms—“Immortal Man,” “First Man” and “Man”—for the Father (Robinson, pp. 229–31). Another Nag Hammadi tractate, “The Second Treatise of the Great Seth,” refers to God as “the Man” and “Man of Greatness” (Robinson, p. 364). Thus, ancient authors likewise seem to have defined the Father as a glorified person with a body in whose image man was created.

[See also God the Father: Names and Titles of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brown, S. Kent. “Man and Son of Man.” In The Pearl of Great Price: Revelations From God, ed. H. Donl Peterson and C. Tate. Provo, 1989.
- Robinson, James M., ed. The Nag Hammadi Library, 3rd rev. ed. San Francisco, 1988.

CERALD E. JONES

---

MANIFESTO OF 1890

The Manifesto of 1890 was a proclamation by President Wilford WOODRUFF that the Church had discontinued PLURAL MARRIAGE. It ended a decade of persecution and hardship in which Latter-day Saints tenaciously resisted what they saw as unconstitutional federal attempts to curb polygamy. While the Manifesto is often referred to as a REVELATION, the declaration was actually a press release that followed President Woodruff’s revelatory experiences. In this respect, the Manifesto is similar to DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS OFFICIAL DECLARATION—2.

Following the passage of the Edmunds-Tucker Act in 1887, the Church found it difficult to operate as a viable institution (see ANTIPOLYCAMY LEGISLATION). Among other things, this legislation disincorporated the Church, confiscated its properties, and even threatened seizure of its temples. After visiting with priesthood leaders in many settlements, President Woodruff left for San Francisco on September 3, 1890, to meet with prominent businessmen and politicians. He returned to Salt Lake City on September 21, determined to obtain divine confirmation to pursue a course that seemed to be agonizingly more and more clear. As he explained to Church members a year later, the choice was between, on the one hand, continuing to practice plural marriage and thereby losing the temples, “stopping all the ordinances therein,” and, on the other, ceasing plural marriage in order to continue performing the essential ordinances for the living and the dead. President Woodruff hastened to add that he had acted only as the Lord directed: “I should have let all the temples go out of our hands; I should have gone to prison myself, and let every other man go there, had not the God major purposes of the plan of redemption would fail.

An integral part of this plan is to “further the work of turning the hearts of the children to the fathers by getting . . . sacred family records in order. These records, including especially the ‘book containing the records of our dead’ (D&C 128:24), are a portion of the ‘offering in righteousness’ referred to by Malachi (3:3), which we are to present in His holy temple, and without which we shall not abide the day of His coming” (Kimball, pp. 542–43; see also GENEALOGY).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W. The Teachings of Spencer W. Kimball, ed. Edward L. Kimball. Salt Lake City, 1982.
- Lee, Harold B. “The Way to Eternal Life.” Ensign 1 (Nov. 1971):9–17.
- McConkie, Bruce R. “Stand Independent Above All Other Creatures.” Ensign 9 (May 1979):92–94.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. Church History and Modern Revelation, 2 vols. Salt Lake City, 1953.

GEORGE A. HORTON, JR.

---

MANCHESTER, NEW YORK

See: History of the Church, c. 1820–1831

---

MAN OF HOLINESS

According to ENOCH’s record, Man of Holiness is one NAME OF GOD: “In the language of Adam, Man of Holiness is his name, and the name of his Only Begotten is the Son of Man, even Jesus Christ” (Moses 6:57). God further declared in the revelation to Enoch: “Behold, I am God; Man of Holiness is my name” (Moses 7:35). This name reinforces the observation that GOD THE FATHER is an exalted man of flesh and bones (D&C 130:22), and that every aspect of his character is holy.

In almost a dozen instances, the pre-Christian Nag Hammadi text “Eugnostos the Blessed” uses similar terms—“Immortal Man,” “First Man” and “Man”—for the Father (Robinson, pp. 229–31). Another Nag Hammadi tractate, “The Second Treatise of the Great Seth,” refers to God as “the Man” and “Man of Greatness” (Robinson, p. 364). Thus, ancient authors likewise seem to have defined the Father as a glorified person with a body in whose image man was created.

[See also God the Father: Names and Titles of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brown, S. Kent. “Man and Son of Man.” In The Pearl of Great Price: Revelations From God, ed. H. Donl Peterson and C. Tate. Provo, 1989.
- Robinson, James M., ed. The Nag Hammadi Library, 3rd rev. ed. San Francisco, 1988.

CERALD E. JONES

---

MANIFESTO OF 1890

The Manifesto of 1890 was a proclamation by President Wilford WOODRUFF that the Church had discontinued PLURAL MARRIAGE. It ended a decade of persecution and hardship in which Latter-day Saints tenaciously resisted what they saw as unconstitutional federal attempts to curb polygamy. While the Manifesto is often referred to as a REVELATION, the declaration was actually a press release that followed President Woodruff’s revelatory experiences. In this respect, the Manifesto is similar to DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS OFFICIAL DECLARATION—2.

Following the passage of the Edmunds-Tucker Act in 1887, the Church found it difficult to operate as a viable institution (see ANTIPOLYCAMY LEGISLATION). Among other things, this legislation disincorporated the Church, confiscated its properties, and even threatened seizure of its temples. After visiting with priesthood leaders in many settlements, President Woodruff left for San Francisco on September 3, 1890, to meet with prominent businessmen and politicians. He returned to Salt Lake City on September 21, determined to obtain divine confirmation to pursue a course that seemed to be agonizingly more and more clear. As he explained to Church members a year later, the choice was between, on the one hand, continuing to practice plural marriage and thereby losing the temples, “stopping all the ordinances therein,” and, on the other, ceasing plural marriage in order to continue performing the essential ordinances for the living and the dead. President Woodruff hastened to add that he had acted only as the Lord directed: “I should have let all the temples go out of our hands; I should have gone to prison myself, and let every other man go there, had not the God of heaven commanded me to do what I do; and when the hour came that I was commanded to do that, it was all clear to me" (see Appendix; "Excerpts" accompanying Official Declaration—1).

The final element in President Woodruff's revelatory experience came on the evening of September 23, 1890. The following morning, he reported to some of the General Authorities that he had struggled throughout the night with the Lord regarding the path that should be pursued. "Here is the result," he said, placing a 510-word handwritten manuscript on the table. The document was later edited by George Q. Cannon of the FIRST PRESIDENCY and others to its present 356 words. On October 6, 1890, it was presented to the Latter-day Saints at the General Conference and approved.

While nearly all Church leaders in 1890 regarded the Manifesto as inspired, there were differences among them about its scope and permanence. Some leaders were understandably reluctant to terminate a long-standing practice that was regarded as divinely mandated. As a result, a limited number of plural marriages were performed over the next several years. Not surprisingly, rumors of such marriages soon surfaced, and beginning in January 1904, testimony given in the SMOOT HEARINGS made it clear that plural marriage had not been completely extinguished. The ambiguity was ended in the General Conference of April 1904, when the First Presidency issued the "second manifesto," an emphatic declaration that prohibited plural marriage and proclaimed that offenders would be subject to Church discipline, including excommunication.

The Manifesto of 1890 should be regarded as a pivotal event in the history of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and of the state of Utah. Not only did it mark the beginning of the end of the official practice of plural marriage, but it also heralded a new age as Latter-day Saints relinquished the isolationist practices of the past and commenced a period of greater accommodation and integration into the fabric of American society (see UTAH STATEHOOD).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Alexander, Thomas G. Mormonism in Transition, pp. 3–15. Urbana, Ill., 1986.
- Gibbons, Francis M. Wilford Woodruff, pp. 353–61. Salt Lake City, 1988.

PAUL H. PETERSON

MANKIND

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints views all descendants of ADAM and EVE as the children of God—not in an abstract or metaphorical sense, but as actual spirit offspring of GOD THE FATHER and a MOTHER IN HEAVEN. This basic premise has profound implications for the LDS understanding of what human beings are, why they are here on earth, and what they can become.

As children of God, men and women have infinite potential (see 2 Ne. 2:20; Heb. 12:9). As a result of their divine heritage, all people carry the inherent capacity and the predisposition to become as their heavenly parents. Latter-day Saints seek to follow the injunction of Christ to be "perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). Their view of each person's relationship with God stresses that life is as a maturing process, a working toward becoming like God, of becoming worthy to be with God (see DEIFICATION; EXALTATION; GODHOOD). Mortal life may be only a beginning, but the potential is there.

This view of mankind emphasizes the FAMILY. MARRIAGE is central to the LDS spiritual experience: "Neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord" (1 Cor. 11:11). Marriage is not intended to last for this life only, but for eternity; therefore, Latter-day Saints marry in the TEMPLE for TIME AND ETERNITY. As members of the family of God, Latter-day Saints see the family as the most important arena of life. "No other success," President David O. MCKAY frequently declared, "can compensate for failure in the home" (Family Home Evening Manual, "Preface," Salt Lake City, 1966).

The LDS ideal also reaches out toward the universal family of humanity. People with infinite potential have infinite value; all people matter because they are brothers and sisters in the family of God. The LDS perspective affirms the infinite love of God for all mankind, and the essential goodness of human beings and their capacity to improve the world. The conviction that people are responsible for their moral behavior, "agents unto themselves" (D&C 58:28), tends to make Latter-day Saints supporters of political systems that maximize free choices (see AGENCY; POLITICS). The intelligence, or inner core of the soul, is seen in LDS theology as self-existent, not created ex nihilo, but having existed always, and thus ultimately responsible for

of heaven commanded me to do what I do; and when the hour came that I was commanded to do that, it was all clear to me" (see Appendix; "Excerpts" accompanying Official Declaration—1).

The final element in President Woodruff's revelatory experience came on the evening of September 23, 1890. The following morning, he reported to some of the General Authorities that he had struggled throughout the night with the Lord regarding the path that should be pursued. "Here is the result," he said, placing a 510-word handwritten manuscript on the table. The document was later edited by George Q. Cannon of the FIRST PRESIDENCY and others to its present 356 words. On October 6, 1890, it was presented to the Latter-day Saints at the General Conference and approved.

While nearly all Church leaders in 1890 regarded the Manifesto as inspired, there were differences among them about its scope and permanence. Some leaders were understandably reluctant to terminate a long-standing practice that was regarded as divinely mandated. As a result, a limited number of plural marriages were performed over the next several years. Not surprisingly, rumors of such marriages soon surfaced, and beginning in January 1904, testimony given in the SMOOT HEARINGS made it clear that plural marriage had not been completely extinguished. The ambiguity was ended in the General Conference of April 1904, when the First Presidency issued the "second manifesto," an emphatic declaration that prohibited plural marriage and proclaimed that offenders would be subject to Church discipline, including excommunication.

The Manifesto of 1890 should be regarded as a pivotal event in the history of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and of the state of Utah. Not only did it mark the beginning of the end of the official practice of plural marriage, but it also heralded a new age as Latter-day Saints relinquished the isolationist practices of the past and commenced a period of greater accommodation and integration into the fabric of American society (see UTAH STATEHOOD).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Alexander, Thomas G. Mormonism in Transition, pp. 3–15. Urbana, Ill., 1986.
- Gibbons, Francis M. Wilford Woodruff, pp. 353–61. Salt Lake City, 1988.

PAUL H. PETERSON

MANKIND

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints views all descendants of ADAM and EVE as the children of God—not in an abstract or metaphorical sense, but as actual spirit offspring of GOD THE FATHER and a MOTHER IN HEAVEN. This basic premise has profound implications for the LDS understanding of what human beings are, why they are here on earth, and what they can become.

As children of God, men and women have infinite potential (see 2 Ne. 2:20; Heb. 12:9). As a result of their divine heritage, all people carry the inherent capacity and the predisposition to become as their heavenly parents. Latter-day Saints seek to follow the injunction of Christ to be "perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). Their view of each person's relationship with God stresses that life is as a maturing process, a working toward becoming like God, of becoming worthy to be with God (see DEIFICATION; EXALTATION; GODHOOD). Mortal life may be only a beginning, but the potential is there.

This view of mankind emphasizes the FAMILY. MARRIAGE is central to the LDS spiritual experience: "Neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord" (1 Cor. 11:11). Marriage is not intended to last for this life only, but for eternity; therefore, Latter-day Saints marry in the TEMPLE for TIME AND ETERNITY. As members of the family of God, Latter-day Saints see the family as the most important arena of life. "No other success," President David O. MCKAY frequently declared, "can compensate for failure in the home" (Family Home Evening Manual, "Preface," Salt Lake City, 1966).

The LDS ideal also reaches out toward the universal family of humanity. People with infinite potential have infinite value; all people matter because they are brothers and sisters in the family of God. The LDS perspective affirms the infinite love of God for all mankind, and the essential goodness of human beings and their capacity to improve the world. The conviction that people are responsible for their moral behavior, "agents unto themselves" (D&C 58:28), tends to make Latter-day Saints supporters of political systems that maximize free choices (see AGENCY; POLITICS). The intelligence, or inner core of the soul, is seen in LDS theology as self-existent, not created ex nihilo, but having existed always, and thus ultimately responsible for its own decisions and its own destiny as well (see INTELLIGENCES).

The vast potential of human beings, as literal spirit children of God, brings to the LDS view of mankind a purposeful and weighty sense of responsibility. Sons and daughters of God have an obligation to develop their divinely given talents, to magnify what God has given them. Latter-day Saints privately, and through the Church, labor to make the most of individuals. They believe that through the ages people are accountable for their responses to God, which determine what they now are and what they will be, and that it is God's work and glory to bring about the exaltation of mankind.

Each human intelligence is born of God as a spirit child, and that spirit child is later born into MORTALITY in a physical body. Spirit is unusually real to the Latter-day Saints, for whom everything that exists has spiritual essence: "All things . . . are spiritual" (D&C 29:34; Moses 3:5). Mortal life thus becomes for Latter-day Saints not only a difficult and risky time, but also a time of infinite opportunities and possibilities, a pivotal step in the eternal process of becoming as wise and good as the heavenly parents.

This sense of possibility and of responsibility tends to make Latter-day Saints strong proponents of all forms of ennobling EDUCATION: "the glory of God is intelligence" (D&C 93:36). In a world fraught with risk and temptation on the one hand and the possibility of godliness on the other, the wise Latter-day Saint will "seek learning, even by study and also by faith" (D&C 88:118).

Thus, the PURPOSE OF EARTH LIFE is to prepare for eternity through learning and experience. In mortal life Latter-day Saints expect TRIALS, challenges, and tests. But the expectation of difficulty in life holds within it the promise of real happiness, of having life "more abundantly" (John 10:10). The Book of Mormon prophet LEHI summarizes the LDS sense of the challenge and reward of this mortal experience made possible by the fortunate FALL OF ADAM: "Adam fell that men might be; and men are, that they might have joy" (2 Nc. 2:25).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Madsen, Truman G. Eternal Man. Salt Lake City, 1966.
Talmage, James E. The Vitality of Mormonism. Boston, 1919.

STEVEN C. WALKER

---

MAN'S SEARCH FOR HAPPINESS

"Man's Search for Happiness" (1964) is a motion picture noted for its skillful blending of aesthetic and spiritual qualities. The film was produced by the Brigham Young University Motion Picture Studio. It is less than fifteen minutes long, yet explores every man's search for meaning in life: the whence, the why, and the whither.

Narrated by Elder Richard L. Evans, long-time announcer of the MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR broadcasts, the film stresses the gifts of life, freedom, and time, and the blessings of the atonement of Jesus Christ. It is climaxed by a poignant family reunion scene in the life to come.

Over 5 million people saw the film at the Mormon Pavilion in the 1964 New York's World Fair, and over 6.5 million at the Japan World Exposition in 1970. It has since been shown daily at the Temple Square Visitors Center in Salt Lake City and has had special screenings elsewhere. In 1986 the Church commissioned an updated version of the film for worldwide use. The remake retains the original narration by Elder Richard L. Evans.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Top, Brent L. "Legacy of the Mormon Pavilion." Ensign 19 (Oct. 1989):22-28.

PETER N. JOHNSON

---

MANUSCRIPT, LOST 116 PAGES

The first 116 pages of the original manuscript of Joseph SMITH's translation of the Book of Mormon from the plates of Mormon are commonly known as "the 116 pages" or the "lost manuscript." These foolscap-size pages were hand-written in HARMONY, Pennsylvania, between April and June 14, 1828. Although principally transcribed by Martin HARRIS from dictation by Joseph Smith, some of the pages may also have been transcribed by Joseph's wife, Emma SMITH, or her brother, Reuben Hale.

The pages contained materials "from the Book of Lehi, which was an account abridged from the plates of Lehi, by the hand of Mormon," as Joseph explained in the preface to the first edition of the Book of Mormon (see also HC 1:56). LEHI's record is mentioned in 1 Nephi 1:17 and, today, is par-

its own decisions and its own destiny as well (see INTELLIGENCES).

The vast potential of human beings, as literal spirit children of God, brings to the LDS view of mankind a purposeful and weighty sense of responsibility. Sons and daughters of God have an obligation to develop their divinely given talents, to magnify what God has given them. Latter-day Saints privately, and through the Church, labor to make the most of individuals. They believe that through the ages people are accountable for their responses to God, which determine what they now are and what they will be, and that it is God's work and glory to bring about the exaltation of mankind.

Each human intelligence is born of God as a spirit child, and that spirit child is later born into MORTALITY in a physical body. Spirit is unusually real to the Latter-day Saints, for whom everything that exists has spiritual essence: "All things . . . are spiritual" (D&C 29:34; Moses 3:5). Mortal life thus becomes for Latter-day Saints not only a difficult and risky time, but also a time of infinite opportunities and possibilities, a pivotal step in the eternal process of becoming as wise and good as the heavenly parents.

This sense of possibility and of responsibility tends to make Latter-day Saints strong proponents of all forms of ennobling EDUCATION: "the glory of God is intelligence" (D&C 93:36). In a world fraught with risk and temptation on the one hand and the possibility of godliness on the other, the wise Latter-day Saint will "seek learning, even by study and also by faith" (D&C 88:118).

Thus, the PURPOSE OF EARTH LIFE is to prepare for eternity through learning and experience. In mortal life Latter-day Saints expect TRIALS, challenges, and tests. But the expectation of difficulty in life holds within it the promise of real happiness, of having life "more abundantly" (John 10:10). The Book of Mormon prophet LEHI summarizes the LDS sense of the challenge and reward of this mortal experience made possible by the fortunate FALL OF ADAM: "Adam fell that men might be; and men are, that they might have joy" (2 Nc. 2:25).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Madsen, Truman G. Eternal Man. Salt Lake City, 1966.
Talmage, James E. The Vitality of Mormonism. Boston, 1919.

STEVEN C. WALKER

---

MAN'S SEARCH FOR HAPPINESS

"Man's Search for Happiness" (1964) is a motion picture noted for its skillful blending of aesthetic and spiritual qualities. The film was produced by the Brigham Young University Motion Picture Studio. It is less than fifteen minutes long, yet explores every man's search for meaning in life: the whence, the why, and the whither.

Narrated by Elder Richard L. Evans, long-time announcer of the MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR broadcasts, the film stresses the gifts of life, freedom, and time, and the blessings of the atonement of Jesus Christ. It is climaxed by a poignant family reunion scene in the life to come.

Over 5 million people saw the film at the Mormon Pavilion in the 1964 New York's World Fair, and over 6.5 million at the Japan World Exposition in 1970. It has since been shown daily at the Temple Square Visitors Center in Salt Lake City and has had special screenings elsewhere. In 1986 the Church commissioned an updated version of the film for worldwide use. The remake retains the original narration by Elder Richard L. Evans.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Top, Brent L. "Legacy of the Mormon Pavilion." Ensign 19 (Oct. 1989):22-28.

PETER N. JOHNSON

---

MANUSCRIPT, LOST 116 PAGES

The first 116 pages of the original manuscript of Joseph SMITH's translation of the Book of Mormon from the plates of Mormon are commonly known as "the 116 pages" or the "lost manuscript." These foolscap-size pages were hand-written in HARMONY, Pennsylvania, between April and June 14, 1828. Although principally transcribed by Martin HARRIS from dictation by Joseph Smith, some of the pages may also have been transcribed by Joseph's wife, Emma SMITH, or her brother, Reuben Hale.

The pages contained materials "from the Book of Lehi, which was an account abridged from the plates of Lehi, by the hand of Mormon," as Joseph explained in the preface to the first edition of the Book of Mormon (see also HC 1:56). LEHI's record is mentioned in 1 Nephi 1:17 and, today, is par-

its own decisions and its own destiny as well (see INTELLIGENCES).

The vast potential of human beings, as literal spirit children of God, brings to the LDS view of mankind a purposeful and weighty sense of responsibility. Sons and daughters of God have an obligation to develop their divinely given talents, to magnify what God has given them. Latter-day Saints privately, and through the Church, labor to make the most of individuals. They believe that through the ages people are accountable for their responses to God, which determine what they now are and what they will be, and that it is God's work and glory to bring about the exaltation of mankind.

Each human intelligence is born of God as a spirit child, and that spirit child is later born into MORTALITY in a physical body. Spirit is unusually real to the Latter-day Saints, for whom everything that exists has spiritual essence: "All things . . . are spiritual" (D&C 29:34; Moses 3:5). Mortal life thus becomes for Latter-day Saints not only a difficult and risky time, but also a time of infinite opportunities and possibilities, a pivotal step in the eternal process of becoming as wise and good as the heavenly parents.

This sense of possibility and of responsibility tends to make Latter-day Saints strong proponents of all forms of ennobling EDUCATION: "the glory of God is intelligence" (D&C 93:36). In a world fraught with risk and temptation on the one hand and the possibility of godliness on the other, the wise Latter-day Saint will "seek learning, even by study and also by faith" (D&C 88:118).

Thus, the PURPOSE OF EARTH LIFE is to prepare for eternity through learning and experience. In mortal life Latter-day Saints expect TRIALS, challenges, and tests. But the expectation of difficulty in life holds within it the promise of real happiness, of having life "more abundantly" (John 10:10). The Book of Mormon prophet LEHI summarizes the LDS sense of the challenge and reward of this mortal experience made possible by the fortunate FALL OF ADAM: "Adam fell that men might be; and men are, that they might have joy" (2 Nc. 2:25).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Madsen, Truman G. Eternal Man. Salt Lake City, 1966.
Talmage, James E. The Vitality of Mormonism. Boston, 1919.

STEVEN C. WALKER

---

MAN'S SEARCH FOR HAPPINESS

"Man's Search for Happiness" (1964) is a motion picture noted for its skillful blending of aesthetic and spiritual qualities. The film was produced by the Brigham Young University Motion Picture Studio. It is less than fifteen minutes long, yet explores every man's search for meaning in life: the whence, the why, and the whither.

Narrated by Elder Richard L. Evans, long-time announcer of the MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR broadcasts, the film stresses the gifts of life, freedom, and time, and the blessings of the atonement of Jesus Christ. It is climaxed by a poignant family reunion scene in the life to come.

Over 5 million people saw the film at the Mormon Pavilion in the 1964 New York's World Fair, and over 6.5 million at the Japan World Exposition in 1970. It has since been shown daily at the Temple Square Visitors Center in Salt Lake City and has had special screenings elsewhere. In 1986 the Church commissioned an updated version of the film for worldwide use. The remake retains the original narration by Elder Richard L. Evans.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Top, Brent L. "Legacy of the Mormon Pavilion." Ensign 19 (Oct. 1989):22-28.

PETER N. JOHNSON

---

MANUSCRIPT, LOST 116 PAGES

The first 116 pages of the original manuscript of Joseph SMITH's translation of the Book of Mormon from the plates of Mormon are commonly known as "the 116 pages" or the "lost manuscript." These foolscap-size pages were hand-written in HARMONY, Pennsylvania, between April and June 14, 1828. Although principally transcribed by Martin HARRIS from dictation by Joseph Smith, some of the pages may also have been transcribed by Joseph's wife, Emma SMITH, or her brother, Reuben Hale.

The pages contained materials "from the Book of Lehi, which was an account abridged from the plates of Lehi, by the hand of Mormon," as Joseph explained in the preface to the first edition of the Book of Mormon (see also HC 1:56). LEHI's record is mentioned in 1 Nephi 1:17 and, today, is partially preserved through NEPHI's abridgment of it primarily in 1 Nephi 1-10.

In June 1828 Martin Harris asked Joseph Smith repeatedly to allow him to show the 116 pages to family members to allay their skepticism and criticism of the translation. After prayerful inquiry of the Lord, Joseph Smith twice emphatically denied these requests. As Joseph's 1832 and 1839 histories indicate, a third request received divine permission for Harris to take the 116 manuscript pages to Palmyra, New York. The Prophet required Harris to solemnly covenant that he would show them only to his brother, his parents, his wife, and her sister.

Harris's failure to return to Harmony as promised caused Joseph great anxiety and necessitated a strenuous journey to Manchester. There, a reluctant Harris reported that someone had stolen the manuscript from his home after he had broken his covenant and indiscriminately showed it to persons outside his family. Grief-stricken, Joseph Smith readily shared responsibility for the loss. The most widespread rumor was that Harris' wife, irritated at having earlier been denied a glimpse of the ancient PLATES, had removed the manuscript translation from Martin's unlocked bureau and burned it. Not long afterward, she and Martin separated.

In consequence of this loss and of having wearied the Lord with the requests to let Harris take the pages, Joseph temporarily lost custody of the plates and the URIM AND THUMMIM to the angel MORONI (D&C 3). Lucy Mack SMITH notes also that two-thirds of Harris's crop was oddly destroyed by a dense fog, which she interpreted as a sign of God's displeasure (Smith, p. 132). Following much humble and painful affliction of soul, Joseph Smith again received the plates as well as the Urim and Thummim and his gifts were restored.

Joseph Smith was forbidden by the Lord to retranslate that part of the record previously translated because those who had stolen the manuscript planned to publish it in an altered form to discredit his ability to translate accurately (D&C 10:9-13). Instead, he was to translate the Small Plates of Nephi (1 Nephi-Omni) down to that which he had translated (D&C 10:41). Those plates covered approximately the same period as had the lost manuscript, or four centuries from Lehi to BENJAMIN. Mormon had been so impressed with the choice prophecies and sayings contained in the small plates that he had included them with his own abridgment of Nephite writings when told to by the Spirit for "a wise purpose" known only to the Lord (W of M 1:7).

The loss of the 116 pages taught Joseph Smith and his associates several lessons: that one should be satisfied with the first answers of the Lord, that keeping one's COVENANTS is a serious matter, that God forgives the repentant in spite of human weakness, and that through his caring foresight and wisdom the Lord fulfills his purposes.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bushman, Richard L. Joseph Smith and the Beginnings of Mormonism, pp. 89-94. Urbana, Ill., 1984.
- Jessee, Dean C., ed. The Papers of Joseph Smith, Vol. 1, pp. 9-10, 286-88. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Smith, Lucy Mack. History of Joseph Smith, pp. 124-32. Salt Lake City, 1958.

WILLIAM J. CRITCHLOW III

---

MARRIAGE

[This entry consists of two articles: The first article, Social and Behavioral Perspectives, is an overview of the concept of marriage patterns in LDS society; the second article, Eternal Marriage, focuses on distinctive marriage beliefs practiced by members of the LDS Church in their temples. One of the highest religious goals for Latter-day Saints, both male and female, is to be married eternally in an LDS temple and to strive continually to strengthen the bonds of love and righteousness in marriage. Civil marriages are recognized as lawful and beneficial, but they do not continue after death.]

SOCIAL AND BEHAVIORAL PERSPECTIVES

Marriage is more than a matter of social convention or individual need fulfillment in Latter-day Saint society and lifestyle; it is central to the exaltation of the individual person: "If a man marry a wife by my word, which is my law, and by the new and everlasting covenant, and it is sealed unto them by the Holy Spirit of promise, by him who is anointed, unto whom I have appointed this power and the keys of this priesthood, and . . . [they] abide in my covenant . . . [that marriage] shall be of full force when they are out of the world; . . . then shall they be gods, because they have no end; therefore shall they be from everlasting to everlasting" (D&C 132:19-20). Thus, Latter-day Saints consider it of utmost importance, "1. To marry the right person, in the right place, by the right authority; and 2. To keep the covenant made in

tially preserved through NEPHI's abridgment of it primarily in 1 Nephi 1-10.

In June 1828 Martin Harris asked Joseph Smith repeatedly to allow him to show the 116 pages to family members to allay their skepticism and criticism of the translation. After prayerful inquiry of the Lord, Joseph Smith twice emphatically denied these requests. As Joseph's 1832 and 1839 histories indicate, a third request received divine permission for Harris to take the 116 manuscript pages to Palmyra, New York. The Prophet required Harris to solemnly covenant that he would show them only to his brother, his parents, his wife, and her sister.

Harris's failure to return to Harmony as promised caused Joseph great anxiety and necessitated a strenuous journey to Manchester. There, a reluctant Harris reported that someone had stolen the manuscript from his home after he had broken his covenant and indiscriminately showed it to persons outside his family. Grief-stricken, Joseph Smith readily shared responsibility for the loss. The most widespread rumor was that Harris' wife, irritated at having earlier been denied a glimpse of the ancient PLATES, had removed the manuscript translation from Martin's unlocked bureau and burned it. Not long afterward, she and Martin separated.

In consequence of this loss and of having wearied the Lord with the requests to let Harris take the pages, Joseph temporarily lost custody of the plates and the URIM AND THUMMIM to the angel MORONI (D&C 3). Lucy Mack SMITH notes also that two-thirds of Harris's crop was oddly destroyed by a dense fog, which she interpreted as a sign of God's displeasure (Smith, p. 132). Following much humble and painful affliction of soul, Joseph Smith again received the plates as well as the Urim and Thummim and his gifts were restored.

Joseph Smith was forbidden by the Lord to retranslate that part of the record previously translated because those who had stolen the manuscript planned to publish it in an altered form to discredit his ability to translate accurately (D&C 10:9-13). Instead, he was to translate the Small Plates of Nephi (1 Nephi-Omni) down to that which he had translated (D&C 10:41). Those plates covered approximately the same period as had the lost manuscript, or four centuries from Lehi to BENJAMIN. Mormon had been so impressed with the choice prophecies and sayings contained in the small plates that he had included them with his own abridgment of Nephite writings when told to by the Spirit for "a wise purpose" known only to the Lord (W of M 1:7).

The loss of the 116 pages taught Joseph Smith and his associates several lessons: that one should be satisfied with the first answers of the Lord, that keeping one's COVENANTS is a serious matter, that God forgives the repentant in spite of human weakness, and that through his caring foresight and wisdom the Lord fulfills his purposes.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bushman, Richard L. Joseph Smith and the Beginnings of Mormonism, pp. 89-94. Urbana, Ill., 1984.
- Jessee, Dean C., ed. The Papers of Joseph Smith, Vol. 1, pp. 9-10, 286-88. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Smith, Lucy Mack. History of Joseph Smith, pp. 124-32. Salt Lake City, 1958.

WILLIAM J. CRITCHLOW III

---

MARRIAGE

[This entry consists of two articles: The first article, Social and Behavioral Perspectives, is an overview of the concept of marriage patterns in LDS society; the second article, Eternal Marriage, focuses on distinctive marriage beliefs practiced by members of the LDS Church in their temples. One of the highest religious goals for Latter-day Saints, both male and female, is to be married eternally in an LDS temple and to strive continually to strengthen the bonds of love and righteousness in marriage. Civil marriages are recognized as lawful and beneficial, but they do not continue after death.]

SOCIAL AND BEHAVIORAL PERSPECTIVES

Marriage is more than a matter of social convention or individual need fulfillment in Latter-day Saint society and lifestyle; it is central to the exaltation of the individual person: "If a man marry a wife by my word, which is my law, and by the new and everlasting covenant, and it is sealed unto them by the Holy Spirit of promise, by him who is anointed, unto whom I have appointed this power and the keys of this priesthood, and . . . [they] abide in my covenant . . . [that marriage] shall be of full force when they are out of the world; . . . then shall they be gods, because they have no end; therefore shall they be from everlasting to everlasting" (D&C 132:19-20). Thus, Latter-day Saints consider it of utmost importance, "1. To marry the right person, in the right place, by the right authority; and 2. To keep the covenant made in connection with this holy and perfect order of matrimony" (MD, p. 118).

Central to LDS theology is the belief that men and women existed as spirit offspring of heavenly parents in a PREMORTAL LIFE. Latter-day Saints view life on earth as a time to prepare to meet God (Alma 12:24) and strive toward becoming like him (Matt. 5:48; 3 Nc. 12:48). Becoming like God is dependent to a large extent on entering into "celestial marriage" for "time and all eternity," for eventually all exalted beings shall have entered into this highest PATRIARCHAL ORDER OF THE PRIESTHOOD. Latter-day Saints believe that the marital and family bond can continue in the post-earth life, and indeed is necessary for ETERNAL LIFE, or life in the CELESTIAL KINGDOM with GOD THE FATHER; MOTHER IN HEAVEN; JESUS CHRIST, and other glorified beings.

Given these doctrines, LDS marriages are distinct and different in several aspects from marriages in other denominations, and marriages of faithful Latter-day Saints differ from those of less observant Church members. Research on LDS marriages shows distinctions in four areas: sexual attitudes and behavior, marriage formation, divorce, and gender roles within the marriage.

SEXUAL ATTITUDES AND BEHAVIOR. Because of the importance of the marital bond and family relationships in both this life and the life to come, premarital or extramarital sexual relations are viewed as totally unacceptable. The power of procreation is vital to the entire PLAN OF SALVATION. It is held sacred, to be used "only as the Lord has directed"; as such it is viewed as the "very key" to happiness (Packer, "Why Stay Morally Clean," Ensign [July 1972]:113). Studies conducted through the 1970s and 1980s consistently showed that Latter-day Saints have more restrictive attitudes about and are less likely to have participated in premarital sexual intercourse than members of other religious denominations. Active Latter-day Saints also have more conservative attitudes about and are less likely to have engaged in premarital sexual intercourse than those who are less active in the Church (see SEXUALITY).

A recent sampling of U.S. households showed Mormons to be significantly less approving of teenagers having sex or of premarital cohabitation than non-Mormons (Heaton et al., 1989). Another study, of over 2,000 adolescents in public high schools in the western United States, showed that 17 percent of the Latter-day Saints had had premarital intercourse, compared to 48 percent of the Catholics, 51 percent of those with no religious affiliation, and 67 percent of the Protestants (Heaton, 1988). The difference continues when Church activity is taken into account and active Latter-day Saints are compared to inactive ones. The attitudes and behavior of inactive Mormons are more similar to those of other faiths (religiously active or inactive) than to active Latter-day Saints (Heaton, 1988).

Latter-day Saint attitudes about sex in marriage and frequency of sexual intercourse in marriage are similar to those in other faiths. Although no data exist on the frequency of extramarital sexuality, Latter-day Saints in general are less approving of extramarital sex than other American populations (Heaton et al., 1989).

MARITAL FORMATION. Members of the Church in the United States and Canada are more likely to marry and remarry than Catholics, conservative Protestants, liberal Protestants, or those with no religious affiliation (Heaton and Goodman, 1985). One study of Canadians indicates that Canadian Catholics are three times as likely, Protestants twice as likely, and those without a religious affiliation four times as likely as Latter-day Saints not to have married by age thirty (Heaton, 1988). The most recent national U.S. data show LDS more likely to be currently married and less likely to have never married than other similarly situated Americans (Heaton et al., 1989). Furthermore, the same data show that LDS men marry about one and one-half years earlier than their non-Mormon counterparts, but LDS females marry at about the same age as other females.

Although the findings are not conclusive, it appears that less active Mormons (those not marrying in a TEMPLE) marry at younger ages than those marrying in a temple (Thomas, 1983). Some of this difference may be accounted for by the number of active Latter-day Saint males serving MISSIONS during these early years. Most unmarried young LDS men who go on missions serve from about age nineteen until twenty-one.

Given the necessity of marrying another Latter-day Saint in a temple to achieve the greatest happiness in this life and exaltation in the highest level of the celestial kingdom hereafter, one would expect that Mormons in general, and active Latter-day Saints in particular, would have lower rates of interfaith marriages than members of other faiths or those with no affiliation. What little research has been done on LDS interfaith marriages tends to be based on small, localized samples. It appears, however, that in general (1) Mormon females are more likely to marry outside the Church than are Mormon males; (2) active Mormons are less likely to marry non-Mormons than are less active Mormons; and (3) non-Mormon spouses (especially non-Mormon husbands) are more likely to convert to the Church than Mormons are to convert to a non-Mormon spouse's faith (Barlow, 1977).

DIVORCE. Based on research done in the 1970s and early 1980s, it has been concluded that Latter-day Saints are less likely to divorce than Catholics and Protestants and are far less likely than those with no religious affiliation. A study comparing Mormons in the United States and Canada with Protestants, Catholics, and those with no religious affiliation found that 14 percent of the Mormon men and 19 percent of the women had divorced. Comparable figures among the other groups were 20 percent and 23 percent for Catholic males and females; 24 percent and 31 percent for liberal Protestant males and females; 28 percent and 31 percent for conservative Protestant males and females; and 39 percent for males and 45 percent for females with no religious affiliation (Heaton and Goodman, 1985).

Latter-day Saints married in a temple ceremony are considerably less likely to divorce than those married outside the temple (Thomas, 1983). Among men and women who were married in the temple, 6 percent of the men and 7 percent of the women have been divorced, while among men and women not married in the temple the figures were 28 percent and 33 percent, respectively (Heaton, 1988).

GENDER ROLES. "God established that fathers are to preside in the home. Fathers are to provide, to love, to teach, and to direct. But a mother's role is also God-ordained. Mothers are to conceive, to bear, to nourish, to love, and to train. So declare the revelations" (Benson, p. 2). This statement, made by Church President Ezra Taft Benson, exemplifies the LDS teaching that men and women have different—but closely intertwined and mutually supporting—roles in the marital and family setting. Research bears out this distinctive emphasis. Mormon males and females tend to be more conservative and traditional in their gender role attitudes and behavior than members of other faiths (Brinkerhoff and MacKie, 1988; Heaton, 1988; Heaton et al., 1989). LDS males spend about the same amount of time performing household tasks as non-Mormon males, but Mormon females spend significantly more time at such tasks than non-Mormon females. LDS females spend more time performing not only traditional female tasks, but also traditional male tasks (e.g., outdoor tasks, paying bills, and auto maintenance) than do female non-Mormons. These differences in both attitudes and behavior are not viewed negatively by either LDS men or women. They are as likely to be satisfied with their marriages and their roles in marriage as their non-Mormon counterparts (Heaton et al., 1989).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bahr, Howard M., and Renata Tonks Forste. "Toward a Social Science of Contemporary Mormondom." BYU Studies 26 (1986):73–121.
- Barlow, Brent A. "Notes on Mormon Interfaith Marriages." Family Coordinator 26 (1977):143–50.
- Benson, Ezra Taft. To the Mothers in Zion. Salt Lake City, 1987.
- Brinkerhoff, Merlin B., and Marlene MacKie. "Religious Sources of Gender Traditionalism." In The Religion and Family Connection, ed. D. Thomas. Provo, Utah, 1988.
- Heaton, Tim B. "Four C's of the Mormon Family: Chastity, Conjugality, Children, and Chauvinism." In The Religion and Family Connection, ed. D. Thomas. Provo, Utah, 1988.
- Heaton, Tim B., and Kristin L. Goodman. "Religion and Family Formation." Review of Religious Research 26 (1985):343–59.
- Heaton, Tim B.; Darwin L. Thomas; and Kristin L. Goodman. "In Search of a Peculiar People: Are Mormon Families Really Different?" Society for the Scientific Study of Religion, Oct. 1989.
- Thomas, Darwin L. "Family in the Mormon Experience." In Families and Religion, ed. W. D'Antonio and J. Aldous. Beverly Hills, Calif., 1983.

THOMAS B. HOLMAN

ETERNAL MARRIAGE

The principle of eternal marriage and the ordinances implementing it constitute a very distinctive and valuable part of the Church. It involves a ceremony performed in a holy TEMPLE by an officiator endowed with the PRIESTHOOD AUTHORITY to invoke covenants intended to be efficacious for TIME AND ETERNITY. This is a sacred and simple ceremony to unite husband and wife in the bonds of everlasting love and in the hopes of eternity. President Joseph Fielding SMITH taught that such a marriage involves “an eternal principle ordained before the foundation of the world and instituted on this earth before death came into it” (Smith, p. 251), for ADAM and EVE were given in marriage to each other by God in the GARDEN OF EDEN before the Fall (Gen. 2:22–25; Moses 3:22–25). This sacred act of marriage was the crowning act of all creation: “In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him: Male and Female created he them; and blessed them” (Gen. 5:1–2). With his blessing they truly could set the pattern for their descendants thereafter who two by two, a man and a woman, could leave father and mother, cleave to each other, and “be one flesh” (Gen. 2:24). Thus began the great plan of God for the happiness of all his children.

Latter-day Saints believe that life is more secure and more joyous when it is experienced in the sacred relationships of the eternal family. Those who maintain such worthy relationships on earth will live as families in the CELESTIAL KINGDOM following the RESURRECTION. Thus, a person who lives a righteous life in mortality and who has entered into an eternal marriage may look forward to an association in the postmortal world with a worthy spouse, and with those who were earthly children, fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters. Bruce R. McConkie, an apostle, explained that an eternal family starts with “a husband and a wife, united in a family unit. It then goes out to our children—the spirits that God gives us to be members of our family—to our grandchildren and so on, to the latest generation. It also reaches back to our parents and our grandparents to the earliest generation” (p. 82). President Brigham YOUNG said that eternal marriage “is the thread which runs from the beginning to the end of the holy Gospel of Salvation—of the Gospel of the Son of God; it is from eternity to eternity” (Discourses of Brigham Young, John A. Widtsoe, ed., Salt Lake City, 1971, p. 195).

Even as marriage marks an apex in God’s creative processes, so, too, it is for each person the sacred culmination of the covenants and ordinances of the priesthood of God and, indeed, is truly a new and everlasting covenant (D&C 131:2). Eternal marriage is a covenant, a sacred promise that a wife and a husband make with each other and with God, attested to by both mortal witnesses and heavenly angels. Under proper conditions such marriages are sealed by the HOLY SPIRIT OF PROMISE, and the couple, through their faithfulness, can eventually inherit EXALTATION and glory in the celestial kingdom of God (D&C 132:19). The scriptures confirm that eternal marriage, performed by the authority of the priesthood, sealed or affirmed by the Holy Ghost, and sustained by a righteous life, “shall be of full force” after death (D&C 132:19; cf. 1 Cor. 11:11). The phrase “until death do you part” is regarded as a tragic one that predicts the ultimate dissolution of the marriage, and this phase is not stated in the temple marriage ceremony.

The sacred ceremony of temple marriage is conducted in reverence and simplicity, and the occasion is a beautiful and joyous one for Latter-day Saints. The bride and the groom meet with family and friends in a designated sealing room of the temple. The officiator typically greets the couple with a few words of welcome, counsel, and fatherly commendations. He may admonish the couple to treat each other throughout life with the same love and kindness that they feel at this moment, and may add other words of encouragement, with his blessing upon their righteous undertaking. The couple is invited to come forward and kneel facing each other across an altar in the middle of the room. The sealer sometimes directs the attention of all present to the mirrors on opposite walls, reflecting endlessly the images of the couple at the altar, and he may comment on the symbolism. Then the sealer pronounces the simple words of the ceremony, which promise, on condition of obedience, lasting bonds with the potential for eternal joy between these two sealed for eternity. President Ezra Taft BENSON said, "Faithfulness to the marriage covenant brings the fullest joy here and glorious rewards hereafter" (pp. 533-34). At the conclusion of the ceremony, the couple kiss over the altar and may then arise and leave the altar to exchange rings.

A couple in 1986 outside the Manila Philippines Temple (dedicated September 1984). Performed only in temples, the ordinance of eternal marriage is intended to create marriage bonds that last for eternity. Courtesy Floyd Holdman.

Through this ordinance of eternal marriage, men and women commit themselves in pure love to remain true to each other and to God through all eternity. Divorce is discouraged, and couples are taught to confine their intimate affections and sexuality solely to each other. To undertake and honor the covenants of temple marriage require living in ways that contribute to happy and successful family life. A couple's future may include conflicts and even divorce, which when it occurs is often a result of violating temple covenants; but the divorce rate among couples who have been sealed in a temple is very low (see DIVORCE; VITAL STATISTICS).

Eternal marriage is, of course, not just for the blessing, happiness, or benefit of the spouses. It is an act of service, commitment, and love that blesses the next generation. God commanded Adam and Eve to "be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen. 1:28). A primary purpose of temple marriage in this life is to grow and mature in sharing God's creative work in raising a family in righteousness. Parents enter into a partnership with God by participating in the PROCREATION of mortal bodies, which house the spirit children of God. At some future time all the worthy sons and daughters of God will be reunited with their Heavenly Parents as one eternal extended family in a state of resurrected glory.

People who live a worthy life but do not marry in the temples, for various reasons beyond their control, which might include not marrying, not having heard the gospel, or not having a temple available so that the marriage could be sealed for eternity, will at some time be given this opportunity (see BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD; SALVATION OF THE DEAD; SEALING). Latter-day Saints believe it is their privilege and duty to perform these sacred ordinances vicariously for deceased progenitors, and for others insofar as possible. Most of the sealing ordinances (temple marriage ceremonies) performed for the deceased are for couples who were married by civil authority in mortality but died without hearing the fulness of the gospel. In this program of vicarious service, men and women meet by appointment in the temple where they stand as proxies for parents, grandparents, or others who have passed into the next world and make the solemn covenants that will reach fruition for all who accept them in the SPIRIT WORLD, to culminate in the day of RESURRECTION.

All leaders of the Church encourage couples to initiate their marriage vows in a holy temple. For those who do not, whether converts to the Church, LDS couples coming to devotion to the Church in later life, or young LDS couples who have married outside the temple and then felt the desire for eternal covenants, temple marriage is a renewal of vows first spoken in a civil marriage ceremony. For those commitments to be honored through eternity, couples must be married by an officiator having the power to bind on earth and in heaven (Matt. 16:19; D&C 124:93). Thus, they must go to a temple, where there are those ordained and appointed to the power to seal covenants for time and eternity.

For Latter-day Saints, eternal marriage is an avenue to everlasting joy. Matthew Cowley, an apostle, expressed his conviction that it is "a wonderful thing . . . to kneel at an altar in the temple of God, clasping the hand of one who is to be your companion not only for time, but also for all eternity, and then to have born into that sacred and eternal covenant children for eternity. God is love. Love is eternal. Marriage is the sweetest and most sacred expression of love, therefore, marriage is eternal" (Cowley, p. 444).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Ezra Taft. The Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson. Salt Lake City, 1988.
- Brown, Hugh B. You and Your Marriage. Salt Lake City, 1960.
- Burton, Theodore M. God's Greatest Gift. Salt Lake City, 1976.
- Cowley, Matthew. Matthew Cowley Speaks. Salt Lake City, 1954.
- McConkie, Bruce R. "The Eternal Family Concept." In Genealogical Devotional Addresses, pp. 81-93. Second Annual Priesthood Genealogical Research Seminar, Brigham Young University. Provo, Utah, 1967.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. The Way to Perfection. Salt Lake City, 1931.

JAMES T. DUKE

---

MARRIAGE RATES

See: Vital Statistics

---

MARRIAGE SUPPER OF THE LAMB

According to ancient and modern scripture, Jesus Christ, the bridegroom (Matt. 25:1–13), will host a “marriage supper” at his second coming when he symbolically claims his bride, the faithful members of his Church (Rev. 19:5–9; D&C 109:73–74).

In Jesus’ parable of the marriage of the king’s son (Matt. 22:1–14), “the king” represents God, and “his son” is Jesus. The guests first “bidden to the wedding,” are the house of Israel. Guests invited later from “the highways” are the GENTILES to whom the gospel went after most Jews rejected it in the MERIDIAN OF TIME (JC, pp. 536–40).

Latter-day Saints believe that by teaching and exemplifying the gospel of Jesus Christ throughout the world they are extending to all mankind the invitation to come to the marriage feast. “For this cause I have sent you . . . that the earth may know that . . . all nations shall be invited. First, the rich and the learned, the wise and the noble; . . . then shall the poor, the lame, and the blind, and the deaf, come in unto the marriage of the Lamb, and partake of the supper of the Lord” (D&C 58:6–11).

After partaking of the sacrament with his apostles, Jesus said, “I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father’s kingdom” (Matt. 26:29). In latter days, the Lord declared, “The hour cometh that I will drink of the fruit of the vine with you” (D&C 27:5–12). “There is to be a day when . . . those who have kept the faith will be . . . admitted to the marriage feast; . . . they will partake of the fruit of the vine,” or the sacramental emblems of Christ’s atoning sacrifice, and reign with him on the EARTH (TPJS, p. 66).

[See also Last Days; Millennium.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McConkie, Bruce R. The Millennial Messiah, pp. 346–47. Salt Lake City, 1982.

JOHN M. MADSEN

---

MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH

The violent deaths of the Prophet Joseph SMITH at the age of thirty-eight and his brother Hyrum SMITH (age forty-four), Associate President and PATRIARCH of the Church, dramatically ended the founding period of the LDS Church. On June 27, 1844, they were mobbed and shot while confined at CARTHAGE JAIL in Hancock County, in western Illinois. Climaxing more than two decades of persecution across several states, this event gave them an enduring place as MARTYRS in the hearts of Latter-day Saints.

NAUVOO in 1844, gathering place for the Saints on the Mississippi River, contained elements of both greatness and dissension. Almost overnight, it grew from a village of religious refugees and new converts to the point where it rivaled Chicago as the largest city in Illinois. With Democrats and Whigs both vying for the Mormon vote, Nauvoo was granted one of the most liberal city charters in the state, an independent military force, and a strong judicial system (see NAUVOO CHARTER). However, as in Missouri during the 1830s, natural rivalry with older citizens in neighboring towns like Carthage (the county seat) and Warsaw (the next largest port city) turned to jealousy and hatred as Nauvoo’s economic and political power grew (see NAUVOO ECONOMY; NAUVOO POLITICS).

These tensions coalesced around Joseph Smith. In addition to being prophet and President of the Church, he also served as mayor, commander of the NAUVOO LEGION state militia, justice of the peace, and university chancellor. Non-Mormon fears of this concentration of powers were intensified by the Church’s belief in the theocratic union of spiritual, economic, and political matters under the PRIESTHOOD. This and other “unorthodox” doctrines, such as continuing revelation, temple ordinances for the living and the dead, new scripture, and plural marriage, further intensified political and economic rivalries.

Illinois anti-Mormons, perhaps assisted by old enemies from Missouri, joined with a handful of determined Mormon defectors within Nauvoo. Several had held high Church positions and, when excommunicated, fueled efforts to destroy Joseph Smith and the Church.

---

MARRIAGE RATES

See: Vital Statistics

---

MARRIAGE SUPPER OF THE LAMB

According to ancient and modern scripture, Jesus Christ, the bridegroom (Matt. 25:1–13), will host a “marriage supper” at his second coming when he symbolically claims his bride, the faithful members of his Church (Rev. 19:5–9; D&C 109:73–74).

In Jesus’ parable of the marriage of the king’s son (Matt. 22:1–14), “the king” represents God, and “his son” is Jesus. The guests first “bidden to the wedding,” are the house of Israel. Guests invited later from “the highways” are the GENTILES to whom the gospel went after most Jews rejected it in the MERIDIAN OF TIME (JC, pp. 536–40).

Latter-day Saints believe that by teaching and exemplifying the gospel of Jesus Christ throughout the world they are extending to all mankind the invitation to come to the marriage feast. “For this cause I have sent you . . . that the earth may know that . . . all nations shall be invited. First, the rich and the learned, the wise and the noble; . . . then shall the poor, the lame, and the blind, and the deaf, come in unto the marriage of the Lamb, and partake of the supper of the Lord” (D&C 58:6–11).

After partaking of the sacrament with his apostles, Jesus said, “I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father’s kingdom” (Matt. 26:29). In latter days, the Lord declared, “The hour cometh that I will drink of the fruit of the vine with you” (D&C 27:5–12). “There is to be a day when . . . those who have kept the faith will be . . . admitted to the marriage feast; . . . they will partake of the fruit of the vine,” or the sacramental emblems of Christ’s atoning sacrifice, and reign with him on the EARTH (TPJS, p. 66).

[See also Last Days; Millennium.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McConkie, Bruce R. The Millennial Messiah, pp. 346–47. Salt Lake City, 1982.

JOHN M. MADSEN

---

MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH

The violent deaths of the Prophet Joseph SMITH at the age of thirty-eight and his brother Hyrum SMITH (age forty-four), Associate President and PATRIARCH of the Church, dramatically ended the founding period of the LDS Church. On June 27, 1844, they were mobbed and shot while confined at CARTHAGE JAIL in Hancock County, in western Illinois. Climaxing more than two decades of persecution across several states, this event gave them an enduring place as MARTYRS in the hearts of Latter-day Saints.

NAUVOO in 1844, gathering place for the Saints on the Mississippi River, contained elements of both greatness and dissension. Almost overnight, it grew from a village of religious refugees and new converts to the point where it rivaled Chicago as the largest city in Illinois. With Democrats and Whigs both vying for the Mormon vote, Nauvoo was granted one of the most liberal city charters in the state, an independent military force, and a strong judicial system (see NAUVOO CHARTER). However, as in Missouri during the 1830s, natural rivalry with older citizens in neighboring towns like Carthage (the county seat) and Warsaw (the next largest port city) turned to jealousy and hatred as Nauvoo’s economic and political power grew (see NAUVOO ECONOMY; NAUVOO POLITICS).

These tensions coalesced around Joseph Smith. In addition to being prophet and President of the Church, he also served as mayor, commander of the NAUVOO LEGION state militia, justice of the peace, and university chancellor. Non-Mormon fears of this concentration of powers were intensified by the Church’s belief in the theocratic union of spiritual, economic, and political matters under the PRIESTHOOD. This and other “unorthodox” doctrines, such as continuing revelation, temple ordinances for the living and the dead, new scripture, and plural marriage, further intensified political and economic rivalries.

Illinois anti-Mormons, perhaps assisted by old enemies from Missouri, joined with a handful of determined Mormon defectors within Nauvoo. Several had held high Church positions and, when excommunicated, fueled efforts to destroy Joseph Smith and the Church.

Death masks of Joseph Smith (right) and Hyrum Smith (left; chin reconstructed). From the collection of Wilford C. Wood. Courtesy Nelson Wadsworth.

The Prophet's life and his plans to resettle many of the Saints in the West (see WESTWARD MIGRATION) were cut short by a series of explosive confrontations with these conspirators. The igniting spark was the destruction of the defectors' intemperate newspaper, the Nauvoo Expositor, as a public nuisance by the Nauvoo city marshal, under orders from Joseph Smith and the city council. Removal of this press came after the first and only issue had vilified Joseph Smith, pledged to cause repeal of the protective Nauvoo charters, and invited mob action against the Saints. Joseph Smith's enemies countered the destroying of the press with criminal charges against him and his brother for inciting a riot. The brothers soon gained release from arrest on a habeas corpus before an LDS tribunal. Then, following the advice of a state circuit court judge, they appeared before a non-Mormon justice in Nauvoo and were exonerated of the charges against them.

However, threats of mob violence increased. In Warsaw and Carthage, newspapers called for extermination of the Mormons. On June 18, Joseph Smith mobilized his troops to protect Nauvoo. When Illinois governor Thomas Ford apparently sided with the opposition and ordered the Church leaders to stand trial again on the same charges, this time in Carthage, Joseph and Hyrum first considered appealing to U.S. President John Tyler, but then decided instead to cross the Mississippi and escape to the West. Pressured by family and friends who felt abandoned and who believed Joseph to be nearly invincible, he agreed to return and surrender; but he prophesied that he would be going "like a lamb to the slaughter" and would be "murdered in cold blood" (HC 6:555, 559). Joseph urged Hyrum to save himself and succeed him as prophet, but Hyrum refused and accompanied his brother to Carthage.

Despite his promises of protection and a fair trial, Governor Ford allowed the Smiths to be imprisoned by their enemies without bail and without a hearing on a wholly new charge of treason for having declared martial law in Nauvoo. Stating that he had to "satisfy the people," the Governor ignored clear warnings of danger and disbanded most of the troops. He then left the hostile Carthage Greys to guard the jail and took the most dependable troops with him to Nauvoo.

During the governor's absence, a mob of between one hundred and two hundred armed men—many of them from the disbanded Warsaw militia—gathered in late afternoon, blackened their faces with mud and gunpowder, and then stormed the jail. In less than two minutes, they overcame feigned resistance from the Greys, rushed upstairs, and fired through the closed door. Hyrum, shot first, died instantly. John TAYLOR, an apostle, tried to escape out a window and was shot five times, but survived to later become the Church's third President. Only Willard Richards, another apostle, survived unharmed. Trying to go out the window to deflect attention from the two survivors inside, Joseph Smith was hit in the chest and collarbone with two shots from the open doorway and two more from outside the window. His final words as he fell to the ground outside the jail were, "O Lord, my God!" (HC 6:618). As rumors spread that the Mormons were coming, the mob dispersed.

Hancock County Courthouse, in Carthage, Illinois (c. 1900), the county seat where the assassins of Joseph Smith were tried and found not guilty. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

Several times during his last days Joseph Smith told the Saints that while he had enjoyed God's safekeeping until his mission was fulfilled, he had now completed all that God required of him and could claim no special protection. Early in his career, the Prophet had recorded that the Lord told him, "Even if they do unto you . . . as they have done unto me, blessed are ye, for you shall dwell with me in glory" (D&C 6:30). Church leaders then and now have taught that the shedding of these martyrs' innocent blood was necessary to seal their testimony of the latter-day work that they "might be honored and the wicked might be condemned" (D&C 136:39).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Esplin, Ronald K. "Joseph Smith's Mission and Timetable: 'God will Protect Me Until My Work Is Done.'" In The Prophet Joseph Smith: Essays on the Life and Mission of Joseph Smith, ed. L. Porter and S. Black, pp. 280–319. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- HC 6:519–631, esp. 561–622.
- Jessee, Dean G. "Return to Garthage: Writing the History of Joseph Smith's Martyrdom." Journal of Mormon History 8 (1981):3–19.
- Madsen, Truman G. Joseph Smith the Prophet, pp. 109–126, 174–83. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Miller, David E., and Della S. Miller. Nauvoo: The City of Joseph, pp. 130–74. Salt Lake City, 1974.
- Oaks, Dallin H., and Marvin S. Hill. Carthage Conspiracy: The Trial of the Accused Assassins of Joseph Smith. Urbana, Ill., 1979.

JOSEPH I. BENTLEY

MARTYRS

The term "martyr" (Greek martys, "a witness") in Christianity refers to a person who has suffered death because of his or her Christian witness or commitment and who subsequently has been accorded honors by a church. While Latter-day Saints honor Joseph and Hyrum SMITH as martyrs, they do not venerate them in annual celebrations of their death dates, nor do they view them as heavenly intercessors for mortals.

The ancient use of the term "martyr" involves the legal environment—witnesses testifying in a legal proceeding. The basic idea relates to establishing facts or assertions that concern matters beyond the experience of the listeners. The meaning has reference to objective events or to personal testimonies. However, the usual scriptural use carries the additional meaning of revelation by the Holy Spirit, which would empower a witness to bear inspired testimony of religious truths.

OLD TESTAMENT. In the ancient usage, the name of the Mosaic tabernacle was "tent of testigathered in late afternoon, blackened their faces with mud and gunpowder, and then stormed the jail. In less than two minutes, they overcame feigned resistance from the Greys, rushed upstairs, and fired through the closed door. Hyrum, shot first, died instantly. John TAYLOR, an apostle, tried to escape out a window and was shot five times, but survived to later become the Church's third President. Only Willard Richards, another apostle, survived unharmed. Trying to go out the window to deflect attention from the two survivors inside, Joseph Smith was hit in the chest and collarbone with two shots from the open doorway and two more from outside the window. His final words as he fell to the ground outside the jail were, "O Lord, my God!" (HC 6:618). As rumors spread that the Mormons were coming, the mob dispersed.

Hancock County Courthouse, in Carthage, Illinois (c. 1900), the county seat where the assassins of Joseph Smith were tried and found not guilty. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

Several times during his last days Joseph Smith told the Saints that while he had enjoyed God's safekeeping until his mission was fulfilled, he had now completed all that God required of him and could claim no special protection. Early in his career, the Prophet had recorded that the Lord told him, "Even if they do unto you . . . as they have done unto me, blessed are ye, for you shall dwell with me in glory" (D&C 6:30). Church leaders then and now have taught that the shedding of these martyrs' innocent blood was necessary to seal their testimony of the latter-day work that they "might be honored and the wicked might be condemned" (D&C 136:39).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Esplin, Ronald K. "Joseph Smith's Mission and Timetable: 'God will Protect Me Until My Work Is Done.'" In The Prophet Joseph Smith: Essays on the Life and Mission of Joseph Smith, ed. L. Porter and S. Black, pp. 280–319. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- HC 6:519–631, esp. 561–622.
- Jessee, Dean G. "Return to Garthage: Writing the History of Joseph Smith's Martyrdom." Journal of Mormon History 8 (1981):3–19.
- Madsen, Truman G. Joseph Smith the Prophet, pp. 109–126, 174–83. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Miller, David E., and Della S. Miller. Nauvoo: The City of Joseph, pp. 130–74. Salt Lake City, 1974.
- Oaks, Dallin H., and Marvin S. Hill. Carthage Conspiracy: The Trial of the Accused Assassins of Joseph Smith. Urbana, Ill., 1979.

JOSEPH I. BENTLEY

MARTYRS

The term "martyr" (Greek martys, "a witness") in Christianity refers to a person who has suffered death because of his or her Christian witness or commitment and who subsequently has been accorded honors by a church. While Latter-day Saints honor Joseph and Hyrum SMITH as martyrs, they do not venerate them in annual celebrations of their death dates, nor do they view them as heavenly intercessors for mortals.

The ancient use of the term "martyr" involves the legal environment—witnesses testifying in a legal proceeding. The basic idea relates to establishing facts or assertions that concern matters beyond the experience of the listeners. The meaning has reference to objective events or to personal testimonies. However, the usual scriptural use carries the additional meaning of revelation by the Holy Spirit, which would empower a witness to bear inspired testimony of religious truths.

OLD TESTAMENT. In the ancient usage, the name of the Mosaic tabernacle was "tent of testimony” or “tabernacle of witness.” The ark within the tabernacle contained the tablets of stone with the Lord’s Ten Commandments, Aaron’s rod that budded, and a pot of manna. These were tokens of the spiritual power of God.

While most referenes to “witness” and “testify” carry legal meanings, one sees the additional revelatory sense of a witness in Isaiah’s revelation, in which he “saw” the Lord and heard the seraphim cry, gave him an understanding of bearing witness to prophetic matters that are beyond usual human experience (Isa. 6:1–7). Isaiah also recorded a divine commission in which the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, promised to gather his sons and daughters from the ends of the earth. As a result, Israel would come to know the acts of God on their behalf: “Therefore, ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, that I am God” (Isa. 43:1–12). Though afflicted and hated for their testimony, it would not be in vain: Generations to come would be blessed by it (Isa. 60:14–15). In another instance, the Lord instructed Jeremiah to purchase a plot of land from his cousin. He summoned legal witnesses, paid for the land with silver according to “law and custom,” and wondered why he should buy land falling to Babylon. The Lord explained that his purchase of land by a deed foreshadowed that later the people of the city would buy and sell land, a prophetic or spiritual witness of their future return from Babylon (Jer. 32:6–44).

NEW TESTAMENT. The terms “record,” “testimony,” and “witness” are used more than two hundred times in the New Testament. In speaking to Pilate, Jesus asserted that he had been born into the world to “bear witness unto the truth” (John 18:37; cf. 1 Tim. 6:13). Further, one of Jesus’ discourses illuminating the basis of witnessing identified six foundations for a testimony: Jesus himself, John the Baptist, Jesus’ own works, the Father, the scriptures, and Moses (John 8:14; cf. 5:32–47). Just prior to his ascension, Jesus explained to the apostles that, after the Holy Ghost had come upon them, they would be “witnesses” to him in Jerusalem and the “uttermost part of the earth” (Acts 1:8). He had warned them they might be hated, afflicted, and killed for his name’s sake (Matt. 5:10–12; 24:9). The apostles’ association with Jesus during the post-Resurrection ministry satisfied the legal aspect of witnessing, but their testimony of his messianic character would be conferred and confirmed by the Holy Ghost. In a related vein, one’s death could be viewed as a martyrdom for Christ, with eternal rewards to follow, as seen in Revelation 2:8–10; cf. 14:13. Certainly those true to the Savior, and redeemed by him, are his witnesses and are rewarded by him (Rev. 7:13–17).

LATTER-DAY SCRIPTURE. In the Book of Mormon, several persons die and are honored as martyrs. The prophet ABINADI is the most notable example (Mosiah 12:1–17:1). Others include the women and children of Ammonihah who were burned to death for their beliefs (Alma 14:1–10). At the death of those women and children, the prophet ALMA<sub>2</sub> assured his friend AMULEK that “the Lord receiveth them up unto himself, in glory” (Alma 14:11).

The Doctrine and Covenants teaches that “all they who have given their lives for [God’s] name shall be crowned” (D&C 101:15) and that the blood of the innocent ascends to God “in testimony” (D&C 109:49; cf. 98:13). In this connection, members of the Church refer to the murder of Joseph and Hyrum Smith as “the martyrdom of Joseph Smith the Prophet, and Hyrum Smith the Patriarch” (D&C 135:1). The Lord spoke through Brigham YOUNG that “it was needful that [Joseph Smith] should seal his testimony with his blood, that he might be honored and the wicked might be condemned” (D&C 136:39; cf. 135).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Patch, Robert C. “The Spiritual Connotation in the Scriptural Concept of Witness.” Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1964.
- Trites, Allison A. The New Testament Concept of Witness. Cambridge, 1977.

ROBERT C. PATCH

---

MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS

Centuries before her birth, Book of Mormon prophets referred to Mary by name in prophecies of her vital mission (Mosiah 3:8). Describing her as “most beautiful and fair above all other virgins” (1 Ne. 11:13–20) and a “precious and chosen vessel” (Alma 7:10), they prophesied that Mary would bear the Son of God and was therefore blessed above all other women. “We cannot but think that the Father would choose the greatest female spirit to be the mother of his Son, even as he chose the

mony” or “tabernacle of witness.” The ark within the tabernacle contained the tablets of stone with the Lord’s Ten Commandments, Aaron’s rod that budded, and a pot of manna. These were tokens of the spiritual power of God.

While most referenes to “witness” and “testify” carry legal meanings, one sees the additional revelatory sense of a witness in Isaiah’s revelation, in which he “saw” the Lord and heard the seraphim cry, gave him an understanding of bearing witness to prophetic matters that are beyond usual human experience (Isa. 6:1–7). Isaiah also recorded a divine commission in which the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, promised to gather his sons and daughters from the ends of the earth. As a result, Israel would come to know the acts of God on their behalf: “Therefore, ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, that I am God” (Isa. 43:1–12). Though afflicted and hated for their testimony, it would not be in vain: Generations to come would be blessed by it (Isa. 60:14–15). In another instance, the Lord instructed Jeremiah to purchase a plot of land from his cousin. He summoned legal witnesses, paid for the land with silver according to “law and custom,” and wondered why he should buy land falling to Babylon. The Lord explained that his purchase of land by a deed foreshadowed that later the people of the city would buy and sell land, a prophetic or spiritual witness of their future return from Babylon (Jer. 32:6–44).

NEW TESTAMENT. The terms “record,” “testimony,” and “witness” are used more than two hundred times in the New Testament. In speaking to Pilate, Jesus asserted that he had been born into the world to “bear witness unto the truth” (John 18:37; cf. 1 Tim. 6:13). Further, one of Jesus’ discourses illuminating the basis of witnessing identified six foundations for a testimony: Jesus himself, John the Baptist, Jesus’ own works, the Father, the scriptures, and Moses (John 8:14; cf. 5:32–47). Just prior to his ascension, Jesus explained to the apostles that, after the Holy Ghost had come upon them, they would be “witnesses” to him in Jerusalem and the “uttermost part of the earth” (Acts 1:8). He had warned them they might be hated, afflicted, and killed for his name’s sake (Matt. 5:10–12; 24:9). The apostles’ association with Jesus during the post-Resurrection ministry satisfied the legal aspect of witnessing, but their testimony of his messianic character would be conferred and confirmed by the Holy Ghost. In a related vein, one’s death could be viewed as a martyrdom for Christ, with eternal rewards to follow, as seen in Revelation 2:8–10; cf. 14:13. Certainly those true to the Savior, and redeemed by him, are his witnesses and are rewarded by him (Rev. 7:13–17).

LATTER-DAY SCRIPTURE. In the Book of Mormon, several persons die and are honored as martyrs. The prophet ABINADI is the most notable example (Mosiah 12:1–17:1). Others include the women and children of Ammonihah who were burned to death for their beliefs (Alma 14:1–10). At the death of those women and children, the prophet ALMA<sub>2</sub> assured his friend AMULEK that “the Lord receiveth them up unto himself, in glory” (Alma 14:11).

The Doctrine and Covenants teaches that “all they who have given their lives for [God’s] name shall be crowned” (D&C 101:15) and that the blood of the innocent ascends to God “in testimony” (D&C 109:49; cf. 98:13). In this connection, members of the Church refer to the murder of Joseph and Hyrum Smith as “the martyrdom of Joseph Smith the Prophet, and Hyrum Smith the Patriarch” (D&C 135:1). The Lord spoke through Brigham YOUNG that “it was needful that [Joseph Smith] should seal his testimony with his blood, that he might be honored and the wicked might be condemned” (D&C 136:39; cf. 135).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Patch, Robert C. “The Spiritual Connotation in the Scriptural Concept of Witness.” Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1964.
- Trites, Allison A. The New Testament Concept of Witness. Cambridge, 1977.

ROBERT C. PATCH

---

MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS

Centuries before her birth, Book of Mormon prophets referred to Mary by name in prophecies of her vital mission (Mosiah 3:8). Describing her as “most beautiful and fair above all other virgins” (1 Ne. 11:13–20) and a “precious and chosen vessel” (Alma 7:10), they prophesied that Mary would bear the Son of God and was therefore blessed above all other women. “We cannot but think that the Father would choose the greatest female spirit to be the mother of his Son, even as he chose the male spirit like unto him to be the Savior" (McConkie, p. 327).

Mary's willingness to submit to the will of the Father was noted in the biblical account. When Gabriel announced that she would be the mother of the Savior, Mary was perplexed; yet she did not waiver in her humble OBEDIENCE and FAITH in God. Her response was unadorned: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word" (Luke 1:38).

Had Judah been a free nation, Mary could have been recognized as a "princess of royal blood through descent from David" (JC, p. 90). Being of that earthly lineage, Jesus was correctly called a descendant of David (see JESUS CHRIST IN THE SCRIPTURES: THE BIBLE).

As a faithful Jewish woman, she followed the customs of her day. At least forty-one days after giving birth to her first son, Mary went to the Court of the Women, where she became ceremonially clean in the purification rite, offering two turtledoves or two pigeons at the temple as a sacrifice (Luke 2:22–24). In the years that followed, Mary bore additional children by her earthly husband Joseph (Matt. 1:25; 13:55–56; Mark 6:3). One of them, "James the Lord's brother" (Gal. 1:19), became a Christian leader in Jerusalem.

In the New Testament, Mary is mentioned in conjunction with the accounts of the youthful Jesus teaching in the temple (Luke 2:41–51), his turning the water to wine at Cana (John 2:2–5), his crucifixion (John 19:25–26), and as mourning with the apostles after Jesus' ascension (Acts 1:14).

Doctrinally, Latter-day Saints do not view Mary as the intercessor with her son in behalf of those who pray and they do not pray to her. They affirm the VIRGIN BIRTH but reject the traditions of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, of Mary's perpetual virginity, and of her "assumption" (cf. McConkie, p. 327). Mary, like all mortals, returns to the Father only through the atonement of her son Jesus Christ.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McConkie, Bruce R. The Mortal Messiah, Book I. Salt Lake City, 1981.

CAMILLE FRONK

---

MATERIAL CULTURE

The artifacts of a society are known as its material culture. Latter-day Saints, like all other cultural groups, have altered their physical surroundings to reflect their own worldview. Every object created or modified by members of a group is part of that group's material culture. LDS material culture encompasses a particular constellation of objects, only a few of which are unique. But, taken together, they create what can be identified as a Mormon environment.

In parts of the American West settled heavily by Latter-day Saints in the nineteenth century, the landscape reflects their peculiar approach to town building (see COMMUNITY; COLONIZATION). One of the top priorities for early settlers was the establishment of extensive irrigation systems that brought mountain water to every farm. Ditches were dug, and dams of a variety of designs were and still are used to divert water onto a plot of land in a rotating calendar of "water turns." The influence of irrigation can be seen to this day in Mormon-settled areas where green fields, shady, flower-filled yards, and rows of Lombardy poplars mark the landscape, even in the driest desert areas (see AGRICULTURE).

A settlement pattern used frequently by Mormon pioneers has become known as the Mormon village (see CITY PLANNING; WARD), with homes and businesses situated closely around the central square, streets oriented toward the cardinal directions, and farm lands extending out around this settlement. Farmers left the village to work fields allotted to them by their ecclesiastical leaders. Designs of outbuildings and houses were based on settlers' previous experience or on knowledge gained from neighbors through a process of oral tradition and example (see FOLKLORE). Hay was stacked with a "Mormon derrick," a device that can still be seen in several variations although no longer used, in the Mormon-settled West.

The most distinctive Mormon architecture has been in religious buildings: temples, tithing houses, and meetinghouses, for instance. Important LDS symbols, such as the beehive; the sun, moon, and stars; and the all-seeing eye, appear on many of these structures.

Most material objects found in early LDS homes were similar to those found in other American homes. Ethnic origins of the makers often influenced furniture design. Some furniture built by Mormon craftspeople bore cultural symbols similar to those found on buildings. Prior to the coming of the railroad, locally made furniture was distinctive, mostly because it had to be built out of local softwoods rather than eastern hardwoods. Thus, spin-

male spirit like unto him to be the Savior" (McConkie, p. 327).

Mary's willingness to submit to the will of the Father was noted in the biblical account. When Gabriel announced that she would be the mother of the Savior, Mary was perplexed; yet she did not waiver in her humble OBEDIENCE and FAITH in God. Her response was unadorned: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word" (Luke 1:38).

Had Judah been a free nation, Mary could have been recognized as a "princess of royal blood through descent from David" (JC, p. 90). Being of that earthly lineage, Jesus was correctly called a descendant of David (see JESUS CHRIST IN THE SCRIPTURES: THE BIBLE).

As a faithful Jewish woman, she followed the customs of her day. At least forty-one days after giving birth to her first son, Mary went to the Court of the Women, where she became ceremonially clean in the purification rite, offering two turtledoves or two pigeons at the temple as a sacrifice (Luke 2:22–24). In the years that followed, Mary bore additional children by her earthly husband Joseph (Matt. 1:25; 13:55–56; Mark 6:3). One of them, "James the Lord's brother" (Gal. 1:19), became a Christian leader in Jerusalem.

In the New Testament, Mary is mentioned in conjunction with the accounts of the youthful Jesus teaching in the temple (Luke 2:41–51), his turning the water to wine at Cana (John 2:2–5), his crucifixion (John 19:25–26), and as mourning with the apostles after Jesus' ascension (Acts 1:14).

Doctrinally, Latter-day Saints do not view Mary as the intercessor with her son in behalf of those who pray and they do not pray to her. They affirm the VIRGIN BIRTH but reject the traditions of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, of Mary's perpetual virginity, and of her "assumption" (cf. McConkie, p. 327). Mary, like all mortals, returns to the Father only through the atonement of her son Jesus Christ.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McConkie, Bruce R. The Mortal Messiah, Book I. Salt Lake City, 1981.

CAMILLE FRONK

---

MATERIAL CULTURE

The artifacts of a society are known as its material culture. Latter-day Saints, like all other cultural groups, have altered their physical surroundings to reflect their own worldview. Every object created or modified by members of a group is part of that group's material culture. LDS material culture encompasses a particular constellation of objects, only a few of which are unique. But, taken together, they create what can be identified as a Mormon environment.

In parts of the American West settled heavily by Latter-day Saints in the nineteenth century, the landscape reflects their peculiar approach to town building (see COMMUNITY; COLONIZATION). One of the top priorities for early settlers was the establishment of extensive irrigation systems that brought mountain water to every farm. Ditches were dug, and dams of a variety of designs were and still are used to divert water onto a plot of land in a rotating calendar of "water turns." The influence of irrigation can be seen to this day in Mormon-settled areas where green fields, shady, flower-filled yards, and rows of Lombardy poplars mark the landscape, even in the driest desert areas (see AGRICULTURE).

A settlement pattern used frequently by Mormon pioneers has become known as the Mormon village (see CITY PLANNING; WARD), with homes and businesses situated closely around the central square, streets oriented toward the cardinal directions, and farm lands extending out around this settlement. Farmers left the village to work fields allotted to them by their ecclesiastical leaders. Designs of outbuildings and houses were based on settlers' previous experience or on knowledge gained from neighbors through a process of oral tradition and example (see FOLKLORE). Hay was stacked with a "Mormon derrick," a device that can still be seen in several variations although no longer used, in the Mormon-settled West.

The most distinctive Mormon architecture has been in religious buildings: temples, tithing houses, and meetinghouses, for instance. Important LDS symbols, such as the beehive; the sun, moon, and stars; and the all-seeing eye, appear on many of these structures.

Most material objects found in early LDS homes were similar to those found in other American homes. Ethnic origins of the makers often influenced furniture design. Some furniture built by Mormon craftspeople bore cultural symbols similar to those found on buildings. Prior to the coming of the railroad, locally made furniture was distinctive, mostly because it had to be built out of local softwoods rather than eastern hardwoods. Thus, spindles, legs, and other parts had to be thicker than normal to support the same weight. One item of furniture, a lounge with a section that pulled out to accommodate two sleepers, became known as the “Mormon couch” because of its popularity in Utah.

Emery, Utah, Relief Society quilting, c. 1942–1943. In this project, 104 women spent 3,246 hours in a 75-day period, and made 158 quilts.

Today, Latter-day Saints continue to surround themselves with objects typical of their home countries. In addition, an LDS home may contain elements that identify its occupants as practicing Saints. Often, there is a picture of a temple—usually the one where the residents received their endowments or were married. The temple motif may be carried out in other objects, such as quilts and embroidery (see FOLK ART). Photos of family members are often found in profusion, reflecting the cultural and personal emphasis on family.

The Church’s emphasis on emergency preparedness, especially home food storage, has caused members to devise methods for creating storage space in homes of limited size. What appears to be a round table covered by a long tablecloth may actually be a large cylindrical container of wheat, beans, or rice. Food practices of the Latter-day Saints, also a part of material culture, often focus on the rotating use of storage foods.

LDS women contribute to their material culture through monthly RELIEF SOCIETY homemaking meetings, where they share recipes, craft ideas, and work methods. Particularly popular are inexpensive projects that transform utilitarian objects into decorative ones, such as a small kitchen strainer becoming a Christmas reindeer decoration through the application of colored felt shapes. A craft that becomes popular can sweep through homemaking meetings throughout the Church, and eventually may be seen in a majority of LDS homes for a time.

Even after death, material reminders of Latter-day Saints’ religious values can be found in their gravestones. Symbols such as clasped hands and doves, while not unique to Mormon culture, evoke images of eternity for Latter-day Saints that are reflective of their beliefs. Modern gravestones often have an image of a temple on one side, with a list of the couple’s children on the other, emphasizing again the idea that a good marriage and family are the best measures of a life well lived.

The Church itself contributes to the material culture of its members. It produces or has produced books of scripture, pictures, journals, lesson manuals, videotapes, sacrament trays, Primary bandalos, commemorative jewelry, and other items used by members in practicing their religion. Some, such as printed programs for ward SACRAMENT MEETINGS, are ephemeral, but they are no less part of the material culture.

Today, as the Church spreads throughout the world, it is more difficult to identify specifically LDS objects. The Salt Lake Temple is one symbol that is frequently represented in crafts from many cultures, including Tongan tapa cloth and Native American beadwork. Some symbols and objects may be universal to all Church members, while others will be localized. A bottle of home-preserved peaches is not unique in itself, but the sense of religious obligation to "put up fruit" and the implications of righteousness attached to the preserver are unique to this culture. All objects identifiable as "Mormon" are expressive of the values of their makers. Latter-day Saints will continue to manipulate their physical environment, mixing their religious values with influences from their ethnic or national cultures to create a landscape that is uniquely their own.

Navajo pot by Lucy Leuppe McKelvey (1989, fired earthenware). Motifs on this pot include four Book of Mormon brothers (Laman, Lemuel, Sam, and Nephi), gold plates, and serpent designs reminiscent of those associated with the white Aztec god Quetzalcoatl. Some Latter-day Saints believe that Quetzalcoatl mythology derived in part from the resurrected Jesus Christ's visit to the American continent, an event recorded in the Book of Mormon. Church Museum of History and Art.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Brunvand, Jan Harold. A Guide for Collectors of Folklore in Utah. Salt Lake City, 1971.

Cannon, Hal. The Grand Beehive. Salt Lake City, 1980.

———. Utah Folk Art: A Catalog of Material Culture. Provo, Utah, 1980.

Edison, Carol. "Mormon Cravestones: A Folk Expression of Identity and Belief." Dialogue 22 (Winter 1989):89–94. Also photos of folk art throughout the issue.

Fife, Austin E., and James M. Fife. "Hay Derrieks of the Great Basin and Upper Snake River Valley." Western Folklore 10 (1951):320–22; and Idaho Folklife: Homesteads to Headstones, ed. Louie Attebery. Salt Lake City, 1985.

"The Tangible Past." Utah Historical Quarterly 56 (Fall 1988), special issue edited by Tom Carter.

ELAINE THATCHER

---

MATERNITY AND CHILD HEALTH CARE

Before professional doctors and nurses assumed primary responsibility for delivering health care, LDS women played a major role in providing maternity and child health care in their communities. Their efforts continued into the twentieth century with the establishment of maternity and children's hospitals and clinics under the sponsorship of the RELIEF SOCIETY and PRIMARY and with some women still serving as midwives in rural areas. The Relief Society also sponsored educational programs to prepare mothers for the delivery and care of infants and children. Concern for the health of mothers and children continues in Relief Society lessons today, and members are advised to seek the best medical care available. Specially trained Church missionaries also assist in programs to improve health care in developing countries.

At the time the Church was established (1830), the methods of many doctors were experimental and often harsh, and women usually did not call upon men for maternity care because it was thought unseemly. When available, midwives often assisted during childbirth. As the Church grew, leaders called and set apart women to serve as midwives. In Nauvoo in the 1840s, the Prophet Joseph SMITH set apart three midwives. After the main body of the Church moved to the Salt Lake Valley, other women were called to serve as midwives both in Salt Lake City and in the outlying settlements. Because midwives were called by priesthood authority, they were accorded trust and respect similar to that given ecclesiastical leaders. They often dispensed herb treatments, passed on by experimentation and word of mouth, and sometimes administered health blessings.

Navajo pot by Lucy Leuppe McKelvey (1989, fired earthenware). Motifs on this pot include four Book of Mormon brothers (Laman, Lemuel, Sam, and Nephi), gold plates, and serpent designs reminiscent of those associated with the white Aztec god Quetzalcoatl. Some Latter-day Saints believe that Quetzalcoatl mythology derived in part from the resurrected Jesus Christ's visit to the American continent, an event recorded in the Book of Mormon. Church Museum of History and Art.

cultures, including Tongan tapa cloth and Native American beadwork. Some symbols and objects may be universal to all Church members, while others will be localized. A bottle of home-preserved peaches is not unique in itself, but the sense of religious obligation to "put up fruit" and the implications of righteousness attached to the preserver are unique to this culture. All objects identifiable as "Mormon" are expressive of the values of their makers. Latter-day Saints will continue to manipulate their physical environment, mixing their religious values with influences from their ethnic or national cultures to create a landscape that is uniquely their own.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Brunvand, Jan Harold. A Guide for Collectors of Folklore in Utah. Salt Lake City, 1971.

Cannon, Hal. The Grand Beehive. Salt Lake City, 1980.

———. Utah Folk Art: A Catalog of Material Culture. Provo, Utah, 1980.

Edison, Carol. "Mormon Cravestones: A Folk Expression of Identity and Belief." Dialogue 22 (Winter 1989):89–94. Also photos of folk art throughout the issue.

Fife, Austin E., and James M. Fife. "Hay Derrieks of the Great Basin and Upper Snake River Valley." Western Folklore 10 (1951):320–22; and Idaho Folklife: Homesteads to Headstones, ed. Louie Attebery. Salt Lake City, 1985.

"The Tangible Past." Utah Historical Quarterly 56 (Fall 1988), special issue edited by Tom Carter.

ELAINE THATCHER

---

MATERNITY AND CHILD HEALTH CARE

Before professional doctors and nurses assumed primary responsibility for delivering health care, LDS women played a major role in providing maternity and child health care in their communities. Their efforts continued into the twentieth century with the establishment of maternity and children's hospitals and clinics under the sponsorship of the RELIEF SOCIETY and PRIMARY and with some women still serving as midwives in rural areas. The Relief Society also sponsored educational programs to prepare mothers for the delivery and care of infants and children. Concern for the health of mothers and children continues in Relief Society lessons today, and members are advised to seek the best medical care available. Specially trained Church missionaries also assist in programs to improve health care in developing countries.

At the time the Church was established (1830), the methods of many doctors were experimental and often harsh, and women usually did not call upon men for maternity care because it was thought unseemly. When available, midwives often assisted during childbirth. As the Church grew, leaders called and set apart women to serve as midwives. In Nauvoo in the 1840s, the Prophet Joseph SMITH set apart three midwives. After the main body of the Church moved to the Salt Lake Valley, other women were called to serve as midwives both in Salt Lake City and in the outlying settlements. Because midwives were called by priesthood authority, they were accorded trust and respect similar to that given ecclesiastical leaders. They often dispensed herb treatments, passed on by experimentation and word of mouth, and sometimes administered health blessings.

Ward Relief Societies began coordinated health programs in the late 1860s after President Brigham YOUNG assigned two of his plural wives, Eliza R. SNOW and Zina D. H. YOUNG, to promote health-care education among the Saints and to train midwives. In 1873 he asked each ward Relief Society to appoint three women to study nursing and midwifery, and a nursing school was opened for their training.

In the same year, President Young said that the time had come for women to study at medical schools in the East. At least six women responded, earning medical degrees in the 1870s. Most influential among these early doctors were Romania Pratt, Ellis Shipp, and Ellen Ferguson, who set up Utah's earliest professional training programs. Dr. Pratt wrote many articles on health. Dr. Shipp opened the School of Obstetrics and Nursing in Salt Lake City in 1878 and taught two six-month long courses each year, from which more than five hundred students eventually graduated. In 1888 she helped found Utah's first medical journal, the

Salt Lake Sanitarian. Dr. Ferguson helped initiate plans for the Church-sponsored DESERET HOSPITAL, which opened in 1882 and shortly thereafter became the center for the School of Obstetrics and Nursing.

In 1899 the Salt Lake Stake organized the Relief Society Nursing School to provide nursing training especially for women who lived in rural communities and came to Salt Lake City for instruction. The school continued successfully until 1920.

By 1900 there were at least 34 female and 236 male doctors practicing medicine in Utah (Waters, pp. 108–111). The role of midwives began to diminish, but the Church's concern for maternity and child health care continued.

In 1911 the general presidency and general board of the Primary undertook the establishment of a hospital fund and the endowment of two rooms for children in the LDS Hospital. Primary-sponsored hospital care for children continued, culminating in 1952 in the establishment of the Primary

One of the first graduating classes of nurses stands in front of the Dr. W. H. Groves Latter-day Saints Hospital (c. 1905). Courtesy Utah State Historical Society.

Children's Hospital, which was operated by the Church until 1975, when it was transferred to private ownership (see HOSPITALS).

In 1912, following the publication of a Utah State Board of Health report linking many infant deaths to inadequate prenatal and postnatal care (Morrell, p. 197), the Relief Society began an intensive program for educating mothers in health care for infants and children. Local Relief Societies sponsored day-long clinics. Stake Relief Societies in Cottonwood, Utah, and Snowflake, Arizona, established their own maternity hospitals. Clinics and health care for children remained high-priority items for Relief Societies until the mid-1930s, when the federal Social Security Act was passed, subsidizing educational programs, prenatal clinics, and immunization programs.

Today, Relief Society women are encouraged to seek appropriate professional medical care and to participate in nursing and first-aid classes. Relief Society manuals include chapters on health care and nursing. Among the full-time missionaries of the Church are a great many young women (approximately 270 in 1990) with health and teaching backgrounds who, in addition to fulfilling proselytizing responsibilities, are assigned to teach disease prevention, nutrition, and home health care to Church members in developing countries. Like the midwives of the early Church, they devote their time and talents to improving health care in the various communities where they have been called to serve.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Divett, Robert T. Medicine and the Mormons. Bountiful, Utah, 1981.
- Morrell, Joseph R. Utah's Health and You: A History of Utah's Public Health. Salt Lake City, 1956.
- Waters, Christine Croft. "Pioneering Physicians in Utah, 1847–1900." Master's thesis, University of Utah, 1977.

CHRISTINE CROFT WATERS

---

MATTER

By the end of the eighteenth century, modern scientific methods had begun to provide new insights into the fundamental nature of matter, and these negated the Greek philosophical position of form over matter. This change in scientific thinking was contemporary with the teachings of the Prophet Joseph SMITH in the theological realm. His teachings returned theology to the intimate relationship between God and mankind of early Judeo-Christian writings. These concepts were in contrast to the position that deity is an embodiment of principles and philosophical ideals that transcend in importance the physical realities of matter. Furthermore, the view that matter was created from nothing (ex nihilo), a concept dominating theological and scientific thought for many centuries and still widespread in nineteenth-century thought, lost the support of modern science and was opposed by the gospel restored by Joseph Smith. Modern scientific theories of matter, from Antoine Lavoisier's (1743–1794) to Erwin Schrödinger's (1887–1961), maintain the permanence of matter.

In the twentieth century, atomic theory has embodied a number of fundamental nuclear particles and powerful mathematical theories. Some, falling outside human intuition, account for properties of matter newly discovered in this century. Concepts have led to the development of unified quantum mechanical and quantum dynamic theories for both matter and light. The conservation law of Lavoisier has been extended to include all equivalent forms of matter and energy and still constitutes one of the primary pillars of modern science.

It is significant that the teachings of the restored gospel on the eternal nature of physical matter, along with a parallel in the spiritual realm, embody these conservation principles. These are key statements: "The elements are eternal" (D&C 93:33). "The spirit of man is not a created being; it existed from eternity, and will exist to eternity. Anything created cannot be eternal; and earth, water, etc., had their existence in an elementary state, from eternity" (Joseph Smith, in IIC 3:387).

Addressing the issue of creation ex nihilo, Joseph Smith asserted in one of his final sermons: "Now, the word create . . . does not mean to create out of nothing; it means to organize; the same as a man would organize materials and build a ship. Hence, we infer that God had materials to organize the world out of chaos—chaotic matter, which is element. . . . Element had an existence from the time [God] had. The pure principles of element are principles which can never be destroyed; they may be organized and reorganized, but not destroyed. They had no beginning and can have no end" (IIC 6:308–309).

Children's Hospital, which was operated by the Church until 1975, when it was transferred to private ownership (see HOSPITALS).

In 1912, following the publication of a Utah State Board of Health report linking many infant deaths to inadequate prenatal and postnatal care (Morrell, p. 197), the Relief Society began an intensive program for educating mothers in health care for infants and children. Local Relief Societies sponsored day-long clinics. Stake Relief Societies in Cottonwood, Utah, and Snowflake, Arizona, established their own maternity hospitals. Clinics and health care for children remained high-priority items for Relief Societies until the mid-1930s, when the federal Social Security Act was passed, subsidizing educational programs, prenatal clinics, and immunization programs.

Today, Relief Society women are encouraged to seek appropriate professional medical care and to participate in nursing and first-aid classes. Relief Society manuals include chapters on health care and nursing. Among the full-time missionaries of the Church are a great many young women (approximately 270 in 1990) with health and teaching backgrounds who, in addition to fulfilling proselytizing responsibilities, are assigned to teach disease prevention, nutrition, and home health care to Church members in developing countries. Like the midwives of the early Church, they devote their time and talents to improving health care in the various communities where they have been called to serve.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Divett, Robert T. Medicine and the Mormons. Bountiful, Utah, 1981.
- Morrell, Joseph R. Utah's Health and You: A History of Utah's Public Health. Salt Lake City, 1956.
- Waters, Christine Croft. "Pioneering Physicians in Utah, 1847–1900." Master's thesis, University of Utah, 1977.

CHRISTINE CROFT WATERS

---

MATTER

By the end of the eighteenth century, modern scientific methods had begun to provide new insights into the fundamental nature of matter, and these negated the Greek philosophical position of form over matter. This change in scientific thinking was contemporary with the teachings of the Prophet Joseph SMITH in the theological realm. His teachings returned theology to the intimate relationship between God and mankind of early Judeo-Christian writings. These concepts were in contrast to the position that deity is an embodiment of principles and philosophical ideals that transcend in importance the physical realities of matter. Furthermore, the view that matter was created from nothing (ex nihilo), a concept dominating theological and scientific thought for many centuries and still widespread in nineteenth-century thought, lost the support of modern science and was opposed by the gospel restored by Joseph Smith. Modern scientific theories of matter, from Antoine Lavoisier's (1743–1794) to Erwin Schrödinger's (1887–1961), maintain the permanence of matter.

In the twentieth century, atomic theory has embodied a number of fundamental nuclear particles and powerful mathematical theories. Some, falling outside human intuition, account for properties of matter newly discovered in this century. Concepts have led to the development of unified quantum mechanical and quantum dynamic theories for both matter and light. The conservation law of Lavoisier has been extended to include all equivalent forms of matter and energy and still constitutes one of the primary pillars of modern science.

It is significant that the teachings of the restored gospel on the eternal nature of physical matter, along with a parallel in the spiritual realm, embody these conservation principles. These are key statements: "The elements are eternal" (D&C 93:33). "The spirit of man is not a created being; it existed from eternity, and will exist to eternity. Anything created cannot be eternal; and earth, water, etc., had their existence in an elementary state, from eternity" (Joseph Smith, in IIC 3:387).

Addressing the issue of creation ex nihilo, Joseph Smith asserted in one of his final sermons: "Now, the word create . . . does not mean to create out of nothing; it means to organize; the same as a man would organize materials and build a ship. Hence, we infer that God had materials to organize the world out of chaos—chaotic matter, which is element. . . . Element had an existence from the time [God] had. The pure principles of element are principles which can never be destroyed; they may be organized and reorganized, but not destroyed. They had no beginning and can have no end" (IIC 6:308–309).

Extending the concept of the eternal nature of matter to the substance of spirit, Joseph Smith revealed, "There is no such thing as immaterial matter. All spirit is matter, but it is more fine or pure, and can only be discerned by purer eyes; we cannot see it; but when our bodies are purified we shall see that it is all matter" (D&C 131:7–8).

Parley P. Pratt, an apostle and close associate of Joseph Smith, wrote, "Matter and spirit are the two great principles of all existence. Everything animate and inanimate is composed of one or the other, or both of these eternal principles. . . . Matter and spirit are of equal duration; both are self-existent, they never began to exist, and they never can be annihilated. . . . Matter as well as spirit is eternal, uncreated, self existing. However infinite the variety of its changes, forms and shapes; . . . eternity is inscribed in indelible characters on every particle" (HC 4:55).

In strict analogy to principles governing physical matter, the revelations to Joseph Smith stress that eternity for spirits also derives from the eternal existence of spiritual matter or elements. The preeminent manifestation of the eternal nature of both physical and spiritual matter is found in the eternal existence of God and ultimately his human children as discrete, indestructible entities. In this unique LDS doctrine, matter in all of its many forms, instead of occupying a subordinate role relative to philosophical paradigms, assumes a sovereign position, along with the principles and laws governing its properties and characteristics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pratt, Parley P. "Eternal Duration of Matter." HC 4:55.

DAVID M. GRANT

---

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF

Latter-day Saints consider the Gospel of Matthew as the preeminent introduction to the New Testament. The Gospel of Matthew is reproduced and revised in LDS scripture more than any other biblical text except the Genesis creation account. It is edited throughout in the Prophet Joseph Smith's inspired revision of the Bible (see JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE [JST]), and the edited version of Matthew 24 is reproduced in the Pearl of Great Price (JS—M 1:1–55). The Sermon on the Mount is virtually repeated in the Book of Mormon

by the resurrected Savior to his "other sheep" (John 10:16; 3 Ne. 15:21) in the Western Hemisphere (3 Ne. 12–14); but it is made explicit that it is the poor in spirit who come unto him who are blessed; and it is implied that blessedness comes to all other categories mentioned in the beatitudes by the same means (3 Ne. 12:2–12). The Doctrine and Covenants provides an explanation of the parable of the wheat and the tares in a latter-day context (D&C 86). Each rendition is easily recognized as basically the same sermon. However, the inspired changes are significant to Latter-day Saints, as they often establish or support major points of doctrine.

Latter-day Saints, like many others, equate Levi and Matthew, acknowledging the "publican" apostle as author of the gospel (Matt. 9:9). As a Jew, Matthew saw Christianity as the culmination of Judaism, with Jesus as the promised Messiah. In many details of Jesus' life, Matthew saw fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy (see JESUS CHRIST IN THE SCRIPTURES), and the JST enriches the Matthean theme that all this was done "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets" (Matt. 2:23; cf. Millet, 1985, pp. 152–54). Through a royal line, beginning with Abraham, Matthew establishes Jesus' Davidic ancestry (Matt. 1:1–17) and his right to reign as "king of the Jews" (Matt. 27:37); and he relates the nativity story from Joseph's viewpoint (Matt. 1:18–25; Matt. 2:1–25). The Prophet Joseph Smith adds that Jesus grew up with his brethren and waited for his ministry to come, serving under his "father," and "needed not that any man should teach him" (JST Matt. 3:24–25).

Many scriptures note that the Messiah will be "like unto Moses" (Deut. 18:15–19; Moses 1:6; 1 Ne. 22:20–21; Acts 7:37; JS—H 1:40), and in the Matthew account readers see parallels between some of the experiences of Moses and Jesus: There was a sovereign who slew children, a return from Egypt, forty days on a mountain, and the miraculous feeding of multitudes. Most of all, there was an enunciation of divine law by both. The promised similitude, however, may have established expectations in Jewish hearts that Jesus failed to satisfy.

To Latter-day Saints, the Sermon on the Mount is a concise summary of much of Jesus' teaching, emphasizing the spirit of the law and encouraging righteous acts for righteous reasons. They recognize it as a single discourse of Jesus in light of his complete repetition of it among the Nephites (3 Ne. 12–14). Both the JST and 3 Nephi

Extending the concept of the eternal nature of matter to the substance of spirit, Joseph Smith revealed, "There is no such thing as immaterial matter. All spirit is matter, but it is more fine or pure, and can only be discerned by purer eyes; we cannot see it; but when our bodies are purified we shall see that it is all matter" (D&C 131:7–8).

Parley P. Pratt, an apostle and close associate of Joseph Smith, wrote, "Matter and spirit are the two great principles of all existence. Everything animate and inanimate is composed of one or the other, or both of these eternal principles. . . . Matter and spirit are of equal duration; both are self-existent, they never began to exist, and they never can be annihilated. . . . Matter as well as spirit is eternal, uncreated, self existing. However infinite the variety of its changes, forms and shapes; . . . eternity is inscribed in indelible characters on every particle" (HC 4:55).

In strict analogy to principles governing physical matter, the revelations to Joseph Smith stress that eternity for spirits also derives from the eternal existence of spiritual matter or elements. The preeminent manifestation of the eternal nature of both physical and spiritual matter is found in the eternal existence of God and ultimately his human children as discrete, indestructible entities. In this unique LDS doctrine, matter in all of its many forms, instead of occupying a subordinate role relative to philosophical paradigms, assumes a sovereign position, along with the principles and laws governing its properties and characteristics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pratt, Parley P. "Eternal Duration of Matter." HC 4:55.

DAVID M. GRANT

---

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF

Latter-day Saints consider the Gospel of Matthew as the preeminent introduction to the New Testament. The Gospel of Matthew is reproduced and revised in LDS scripture more than any other biblical text except the Genesis creation account. It is edited throughout in the Prophet Joseph Smith's inspired revision of the Bible (see JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE [JST]), and the edited version of Matthew 24 is reproduced in the Pearl of Great Price (JS—M 1:1–55). The Sermon on the Mount is virtually repeated in the Book of Mormon

by the resurrected Savior to his "other sheep" (John 10:16; 3 Ne. 15:21) in the Western Hemisphere (3 Ne. 12–14); but it is made explicit that it is the poor in spirit who come unto him who are blessed; and it is implied that blessedness comes to all other categories mentioned in the beatitudes by the same means (3 Ne. 12:2–12). The Doctrine and Covenants provides an explanation of the parable of the wheat and the tares in a latter-day context (D&C 86). Each rendition is easily recognized as basically the same sermon. However, the inspired changes are significant to Latter-day Saints, as they often establish or support major points of doctrine.

Latter-day Saints, like many others, equate Levi and Matthew, acknowledging the "publican" apostle as author of the gospel (Matt. 9:9). As a Jew, Matthew saw Christianity as the culmination of Judaism, with Jesus as the promised Messiah. In many details of Jesus' life, Matthew saw fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy (see JESUS CHRIST IN THE SCRIPTURES), and the JST enriches the Matthean theme that all this was done "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets" (Matt. 2:23; cf. Millet, 1985, pp. 152–54). Through a royal line, beginning with Abraham, Matthew establishes Jesus' Davidic ancestry (Matt. 1:1–17) and his right to reign as "king of the Jews" (Matt. 27:37); and he relates the nativity story from Joseph's viewpoint (Matt. 1:18–25; Matt. 2:1–25). The Prophet Joseph Smith adds that Jesus grew up with his brethren and waited for his ministry to come, serving under his "father," and "needed not that any man should teach him" (JST Matt. 3:24–25).

Many scriptures note that the Messiah will be "like unto Moses" (Deut. 18:15–19; Moses 1:6; 1 Ne. 22:20–21; Acts 7:37; JS—H 1:40), and in the Matthew account readers see parallels between some of the experiences of Moses and Jesus: There was a sovereign who slew children, a return from Egypt, forty days on a mountain, and the miraculous feeding of multitudes. Most of all, there was an enunciation of divine law by both. The promised similitude, however, may have established expectations in Jewish hearts that Jesus failed to satisfy.

To Latter-day Saints, the Sermon on the Mount is a concise summary of much of Jesus' teaching, emphasizing the spirit of the law and encouraging righteous acts for righteous reasons. They recognize it as a single discourse of Jesus in light of his complete repetition of it among the Nephites (3 Ne. 12–14). Both the JST and 3 Nephi versions include enriching details not found in extant biblical texts, including the setting of the sermon. For example, Jesus directed only his chosen twelve and other selected disciples to take no thought for their life or for the morrow (3 Ne. 13:25) and to teach from house to house, noting that while the world will persecute them, their Heavenly Father will provide for them (JST Matt. 6:2, 25–27). Then he turned to the multitude and warned of unrighteous judgment (3 Ne. 14:1). Latter-day Saints acknowledge the necessity of good judgment and seek to judge righteously (see JST Matt. 7:2; cf. Moro. 7:15–19).

The JST revision of Matthew is replete with subtle but meaningful differences from the King James text. It becomes clear, for instance, that Jesus entered the Judean wilderness primarily to commune with his Father, not merely to be tempted (JST Matt. 4:1–2), and, unswayed by any doubt of his divinity as the One foretold by the prophets, he called his apostles (JST Matt. 4:18). JST Matthew 17:14 introduces a latter-day Elias: “Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist, and also of another who should come and restore all things, as it is written by the prophets.” A doctrinal principle is strengthened when Jesus declares that he came to save the lost, but little children need no repentance (JST Matt. 18:2; 19:13; cf. Moro. 8:5–24).

Latter-day Saints recognize the importance of faith, good works, and ordinances, and do not stress one above the others, as all are essential for salvation. They draw support from Matthew’s many references to faith and good works (e.g., Matt. 16:27), and they recognize the ordinances of BAPTISM by immersion (Matt. 3:16; JST Matt. 3:44–45), ORDINATION TO THE PRIESTHOOD (Matt. 10:1), and healing of the sick (Matt. 9:18). In addition, they believe that Jesus established a formal church organization under the supervision of his ordained apostles, and they cite the Matthean text both for Jesus’ intent to establish a church (Matt. 16:18) and for the existence of the Church (Matt. 18:17; cf. Millet, 1985, pp. 148–51). At Caesarea Philippi, when Peter declared Christ’s divinity (Matt. 16:15), Jesus affirmed that he knew this only through revelation from the Father, noting, “Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church” (Matt. 16:17–18). While Mormons acknowledge Peter’s primacy in the early Church, they quickly point out that Christ’s Church—both in Peter’s day and in the latter days—was and is founded upon the rock of revelation and that living prophets still look to that rock for guidance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Millet, Robert L. “The JST and the Synoptic Gospels: Literary Style.” In The Joseph Smith Translation, ed. M. Nyman and R. Millet. Provo, Utah, 1985.
- . “The Testimony of Matthew.” In Studies in Scripture, ed. K. Jackson and R. Millet, Vol. 5, pp. 38–60. Salt Lake City, 1986.

WM. REVELL PHILLIPS

---

MCKAY, DAVID O.

David O. McKay (1873–1970), sustained as the ninth President of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints on April 9, 1951, served as a General Authority for nearly sixty-four years, longer than any other person in Church history. During that time he served as a counselor in the First Presidency for seventeen years and was President for nearly nineteen years. He is remembered for his contributions to education, his exemplary family life, his emphasis on missionary work, his humanitarianism, his practical advice on achieving a happy life, and his participation in civic affairs, and for leading the Church toward increased internationalism.

The third child of David and Jennette Evans McKay, David Oman McKay was born in Huntsville, Utah, on September 8, 1873. While growing up on his father’s farm, he faced tragedy and privation much earlier than many children. When he was six, his two older sisters died, and just a year later, his father was called on a two-year mission to his native Scotland. Young David matured quickly when he was left to help his mother care for the farm and the family, which included a younger brother and two younger sisters, one a two-year-old and the other a baby girl born ten days after his father left. The enterprising family, with the help of neighbors, had realized enough profit to surprise their father and husband with a much-needed addition to the house when he returned from his mission.

Young David continued to attend school, work on the farm, and, during the summer, deliver the Ogden Standard Examiner to a nearby mining town. He had an insatiable hunger for learning, and during his round trips on horseback, he spent versions include enriching details not found in extant biblical texts, including the setting of the sermon. For example, Jesus directed only his chosen twelve and other selected disciples to take no thought for their life or for the morrow (3 Ne. 13:25) and to teach from house to house, noting that while the world will persecute them, their Heavenly Father will provide for them (JST Matt. 6:2, 25–27). Then he turned to the multitude and warned of unrighteous judgment (3 Ne. 14:1). Latter-day Saints acknowledge the necessity of good judgment and seek to judge righteously (see JST Matt. 7:2; cf. Moro. 7:15–19).

The JST revision of Matthew is replete with subtle but meaningful differences from the King James text. It becomes clear, for instance, that Jesus entered the Judean wilderness primarily to commune with his Father, not merely to be tempted (JST Matt. 4:1–2), and, unswayed by any doubt of his divinity as the One foretold by the prophets, he called his apostles (JST Matt. 4:18). JST Matthew 17:14 introduces a latter-day Elias: “Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist, and also of another who should come and restore all things, as it is written by the prophets.” A doctrinal principle is strengthened when Jesus declares that he came to save the lost, but little children need no repentance (JST Matt. 18:2; 19:13; cf. Moro. 8:5–24).

Latter-day Saints recognize the importance of faith, good works, and ordinances, and do not stress one above the others, as all are essential for salvation. They draw support from Matthew’s many references to faith and good works (e.g., Matt. 16:27), and they recognize the ordinances of BAPTISM by immersion (Matt. 3:16; JST Matt. 3:44–45), ORDINATION TO THE PRIESTHOOD (Matt. 10:1), and healing of the sick (Matt. 9:18). In addition, they believe that Jesus established a formal church organization under the supervision of his ordained apostles, and they cite the Matthean text both for Jesus’ intent to establish a church (Matt. 16:18) and for the existence of the Church (Matt. 18:17; cf. Millet, 1985, pp. 148–51). At Caesarea Philippi, when Peter declared Christ’s divinity (Matt. 16:15), Jesus affirmed that he knew this only through revelation from the Father, noting, “Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church” (Matt. 16:17–18). While Mormons acknowledge Peter’s primacy in the early Church, they quickly point out that Christ’s Church—both in Peter’s day and in the latter days—was and is founded upon the rock of revelation and that living prophets still look to that rock for guidance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Millet, Robert L. “The JST and the Synoptic Gospels: Literary Style.” In The Joseph Smith Translation, ed. M. Nyman and R. Millet. Provo, Utah, 1985.
- . “The Testimony of Matthew.” In Studies in Scripture, ed. K. Jackson and R. Millet, Vol. 5, pp. 38–60. Salt Lake City, 1986.

WM. REVELL PHILLIPS

---

MCKAY, DAVID O.

David O. McKay (1873–1970), sustained as the ninth President of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints on April 9, 1951, served as a General Authority for nearly sixty-four years, longer than any other person in Church history. During that time he served as a counselor in the First Presidency for seventeen years and was President for nearly nineteen years. He is remembered for his contributions to education, his exemplary family life, his emphasis on missionary work, his humanitarianism, his practical advice on achieving a happy life, and his participation in civic affairs, and for leading the Church toward increased internationalism.

The third child of David and Jennette Evans McKay, David Oman McKay was born in Huntsville, Utah, on September 8, 1873. While growing up on his father’s farm, he faced tragedy and privation much earlier than many children. When he was six, his two older sisters died, and just a year later, his father was called on a two-year mission to his native Scotland. Young David matured quickly when he was left to help his mother care for the farm and the family, which included a younger brother and two younger sisters, one a two-year-old and the other a baby girl born ten days after his father left. The enterprising family, with the help of neighbors, had realized enough profit to surprise their father and husband with a much-needed addition to the house when he returned from his mission.

Young David continued to attend school, work on the farm, and, during the summer, deliver the Ogden Standard Examiner to a nearby mining town. He had an insatiable hunger for learning, and during his round trips on horseback, he spent much of the time reading and memorizing passages from the world's great literature that were later to permeate his sermons and writings. He also loved riding horses, swimming, and other sports; dramatics; debate; singing; and playing the piano with the Huntsville town orchestra.

President David O. McKay (1873–1970), an educator, served in the Quorum of the Twelve or the First Presidency for sixty-three years and nine months, longer than any other General Authority in the history of the Church. Courtesy Utah State Historical Society.

After completing the eighth grade, David enrolled in the Church's Weber Stake Academy in Ogden, Utah. Two years later, he was back in Huntsville as principal of the community school, but after a year he decided that he needed more schooling for a career in teaching and enrolled at the University of Utah. He graduated in June 1897 as class president and valedictorian. The theme of his valedictory address, "An Unsatisfied Appetite for Knowledge Means Progress and Is the State of a Normal Mind," characterized his life.

After graduation Elder McKay accepted a mission call to Great Britain. He arrived in Liverpool on August 25, 1897, and, like his father before him, was soon appointed to preside over the Scottish conference (later known as district). During a special priesthood meeting, he received a powerful spiritual manifestation confirming the truthfulness of the gospel. He had been seeking that confirmation since childhood, and it remained with him throughout his life. In Liverpool in 1899, he discovered a saying that became a lifetime motto. Homesick and discouraged, he noticed over the doorway of an unfinished house an unusual stone arch bearing the inscription "What-E'er Thou Art, Act Well Thy Part." His attitude changed, and that perspective exemplified his life.

He returned home in the fall of 1899 and accepted a teaching position at Weber Stake Academy. On January 2, 1901, he married Emma Ray Riggs in the Salt Lake Temple; they had seven children.

As a teacher, McKay was popular, effective, and deeply concerned that his students absorb more than facts. He believed that teachers must lead students to stretch their minds into the world of ideas. "If you will give your class a thought, even one new thought during your recitation period," he later told other educators, "you will find that they will go away satisfied. But it is your obligation to be prepared to give that new thought" (1953, p. 439). He also believed that teachers must develop in students the moral and ethical values that lead to responsible citizenship. "Teaching is the noblest profession in the world," he proclaimed, for "upon the proper education of youth depend the permanency and purity of the home, the safety and perpetuity of the nation" (1953, p. 436). "True education," he said, "seeks . . . to make men and women not only good mathematicians, proficient linguists, profound scientists, or brilliant literary lights, but also honest men, combined with virtue, temperance, and brotherly love—men and women who prize truth, justice, wisdom, benevolence, and self-control as the choicest acquisitions of a successful life" (1953, p. 441). Teachers must be the exemplars, and he scolded the nation for not recognizing the need to pay for outstanding teachers in the classroom.

In 1902 McKay became the principal of Weber Stake Academy, and he soon instituted a number of progressive and innovative program changes. His Church assignments during these years also centered on education, as he served on the Weber Stake Sunday School board and then as a member of the superintendency (see SUNDAY SCHOOL). He was fully satisfied with what he believed would be a lifelong career in education when in 1906 everything changed: three members of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles died, and David O. McKay, at age thirty-two, was called to that quorum.

President McKay (1947) with his horses "Lady" and "Bess." His love of horses began as a boy on the family farm in Huntsville, Utah.

In addition to his new responsibilities, Elder McKay remained active in educational administration. He stayed on as head of Weber Academy until 1908 and then served on its board of trustees until 1922. He was a member of the Board of Regents of the University of Utah in 1921–1922, and in 1940–1941 he was a member of the Board of Trustees of Utah State Agricultural College (later Utah State University). As a General Authority of the Church he became a member of the superintendency of the Church's Sunday School, and from 1918 to 1934 was the superintendent. In 1919 he became the Church's first Commissioner of Education, and in this assignment he had some difficult decisions to make. In 1920 he advised the closing of most Church-owned academies and the establishment of SEMINARIES adjacent to all high schools with sufficient LDS population. Religious instruction would still be given to high school students, but without the expense of full high school programs. A seminary adjacent to Granite High in Salt Lake City had already proved successful, and the new recommendation was quickly put into effect. He also recommended that Brigham Young University adopt a full college curriculum and that the other five Church colleges (four in Utah and one in Idaho) develop just two-year programs, primarily for training teachers. Within the next ten years, all the Utah colleges except Brigham Young University were transferred to the state.

Elder McKay became the most widely traveled Church leader of his day, an emissary to the growing worldwide Church. In 1920–1921 he toured the missions of the world, stopping at many places never before visited by a General Authority. From 1922 to 1924, he was back in Europe, this time as president of the European Mission (see EUROPE). His success there became legendary, as he did much to improve the public image of the Church. He also revitalized missionary work by urging every Latter-day Saint to make a commitment to bring one new member into the Church each year. In later years he became famous for his motto "Every member a missionary," an emphasis that began in Europe in 1923. In addition, he urged the Saints to remain in Europe rather than to emigrate to America, promising them that one day the full program of the Church, including sacred TEMPLES, would be made available in their homelands.

In 1934 President Heber J. GRANT chose David O. McKay to be his Second Counselor in the FIRST PRESIDENCY of the Church. In 1951, the same year that he and Emma Ray celebrated their golden wedding anniversary, he became President of the Church. Tall, still robust despite his seventy-seven years, possessing a full head of wavy white hair, and with eyes that one man characterized as "fiercely tender," David O. McKay looked every bit the prophet his followers revered him to be.

President McKay's administration covered an important period of transition. As he guided the Church into the last half of the twentieth century, he faced critical new challenges connected with numerical growth, international expansion, and a variety of political and social problems related to the rapidly changing world. Church membership nearly tripled, from 1.1 million to 2.8 million; the number of STAKES grew from 184 to 500; the number of missions more than doubled; the missionary force expanded six times; temples were erected in Switzerland, New Zealand, and Great Britain, as well as California; and the Church was established in several new countries. As an experienced leader with both a firm hand and a humanitarian nature, President McKay was admirably suited for the task of moving the Church toward the new internationalism that would characterize the later twentieth century.

In the summer of 1952 he visited nine European countries on what may have been the most significant tour of his career. His announcement that a site had been selected for the erection of a temple just outside Bern, Switzerland, ushered in a new era, symbolizing the establishment of the full program of the Church in nations outside North America. Having temples within traveling distance strengthened the Saints spiritually and encouraged them to remain in their homelands to build up the Church. President McKay dedicated the Swiss Temple in 1955, and soon temples began to dot the world. Smaller and less expensive than previous temples, the new temples introduced design changes and technological innovations (including special films) that made the temple ceremonies available in many languages.

Another step in the maturation of the Church outside North America was the organization of stakes. Having local stakes indicated that the local leaders were experienced enough to assume leadership in place of American mission presidents and that local members, rather than missionaries, could direct Church activities. The first stakes outside North America were organized in Hawaii (1935 and 1955) before President McKay's administration, and the second, in New Zealand (1958). These were followed, during his time as President, by stakes in Australia, England, the Netherlands, Germany, Switzerland, Mexico, Samoa, Scotland, Brazil, Argentina, Guatemala, Uruguay, Tonga, Peru, and Japan.

President McKay's humanitarian impulse, even in controversial areas of Church policy, was demonstrated during a mission tour of South Africa in 1954. There he was reminded of the difficulties involved with the Church's policy of not allowing BLACKS or people with black ancestry to hold the PRIESTHOOD. At that time, to be ordained, members in South Africa had to trace their ancestral lines beyond the continent of Africa because of the high possibility of black ancestry. President McKay listened with great empathy to those whose inability to trace their genealogy kept them from bearing the priesthood, and he felt inspired to modify the policy so that the genealogical test would not apply. It remained for one of his successors, President Spencer W. KIMBALL, to be given the revelation on priesthood in 1978.

Other controversial questions confronted President McKay, one concerning education. In 1954 the continued state support of Utah's junior colleges became a heated political issue. At the urging of Governor J. Bracken Lee and as a money-saving device for the state, the legislature authorized the transfer of Snow, Weber, and Dixie colleges back to the Church. Citizens placed the issue on the ballot as a referendum measure, and President McKay, concerned that the colleges would deteriorate if the state continued to operate them without adequate financing, announced that the Church was willing to take the schools back and operate them on a sound financial basis. In the referendum, however, the people of the state voted against the move.

President McKay made a myriad of far-reaching administrative decisions. As an avid missionary, he approved a new proselytizing plan, A Systematic Program for Teaching the Gospel, and in 1961 he presided over the first world seminar for mission presidents, where the plan was introduced. He promoted the continuing expansion of seminaries, INSTITUTES OF RELIGION, and Church schools in areas where public educational opportunities were limited. Other administrative decisions demonstrated his willingness to innovate as needs arose. In 1961 he authorized ordaining members of the First Council of the Seventy to the office of high priest, which gave them the right to preside at stake conferences and thus eased the growing administrative burdens of the Quorum of the Twelve, and in 1967 he inaugurated the position of Regional Representative of the Twelve. In 1965 he also took the unusual step of expanding the number of counselors in the First Presidency, as his own ability to function effectively became impaired with age.

Honored by civic leaders of many faiths in Salt Lake City on December 10, 1962, David O. McKay and his wife Emma Ray were presented with the gift of an organ to be installed in the LDS chapel then under construction in Merthyr Tydfil, Wales, the birthplace of President McKay's mother.

President David O. McKay believed that Church leadership also implied civic responsibility. Throughout his career he remained active in public affairs and was frequently asked to head important civic committees. During most of his presidential administration, he held weekly breakfast meetings with the head of the Salt Lake area Chamber of Commerce and the publisher of the Salt Lake Tribune, which gave him an opportunity to share concerns with these civic leaders and reach agreements on many areas of mutual interest. Politically, he made every effort to keep the Church nonpartisan and constantly encouraged Church members in the United States to be active in both major political parties. At times, however, he took clear stands on controversial political issues when it was apparent to him that they were also moral issues. His denunciation of communism, for example, was uncompromising, on the grounds of its atheistic nature and its threat to the democratic institutions he valued. In 1969, amid the tense civil rights struggles that were dividing Americans as they had seldom been divided since the Civil War, he authorized the issuing of a strong official statement calling upon Church members everywhere to do their part to see that civil rights for all races were held inviolate.

President McKay kept up a steady pace of travel and administrative work until, in his nineties, his age required him to slow down. On January 18, 1970, at age ninety-six, he died in Salt Lake City.

David O. McKay's values were enunciated in his sermons and writings. His emphasis on education included equal emphasis on good reading. "Good reading is to the intellect what good food is to the body," he observed. "Thoughts, like food, should be properly digested" (1967, p. 53). He was vitally concerned with the family and constantly called upon parents to spend time with their children and to train them in all the virtues of good citizenship. His main religious message concerned the reality of Christ, his atonement and resurrection, and the restoration of the gospel of Christ through the Prophet Joseph Smith. He taught that Christ's gospel was meant to transform the individual and thus change society. The sanctity of the home, kindness, mercy, tolerance, spirituality, love of freedom, the power of prayer, charity, personal integrity—these were the subjects of his sermons and writings.

President David O. McKay and his friend, movie producer/director Cecil B. DeMille, stand in front of the Los Angeles Temple (c. 1955). Courtesy Frederick G. Williams III.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B. "David O. McKay." In The Presidents of the Church, ed. L. Arrington, pp. 274–313. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- McKay, David Lawrence. My Father, David O. McKay. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- McKay, David O. Gospel Ideals: Selections from the Discourses of David O. McKay. Salt Lake City, 1953.
- . Secrets of a Happy Life, comp. Llewelyn R. McKay. Salt Lake City, 1967.
- McKay, Llewelyn R. Home Memories of President David O. McKay. Salt Lake City, 1956.

Middlemiss, Clare, comp. Man May Know for Himself: Teachings of President David O. McKay. Salt Lake City, 1966.

Morrell, Jeanette McKay. Highlights in the Life of President David O. McKay. Salt Lake City, 1967.

Symposium. "President David O. McKay, 1873–1970." Dialogue 4 (Winter 1969):47–62.

JAMES B. ALLEN

MEDICAL PRACTICES

At the time the Church was established (1830), medical science was in its infancy. Fundamental mechanisms of disease were just beginning to be understood, and modern diagnostic approaches and notions about infection were only embryonic. Medical treatment for most conditions was ineffective and sometimes harmful. Early Church leaders, including the Prophet Joseph SMITH and President Brigham YOUNG, urged reliance on faith and priesthood blessings and treatment with herbs and mild food. Consistent with advances in medical science and education, Church leaders, including Brigham Young, began about 1870 to rely more on professionally trained physicians than in earlier years. Since that time, Latter-day Saints have been urged by their leaders to take advantage of the best possible medical care along with availing themselves of appropriate priesthood blessings.

In the early nineteenth century, practitioners trained in orthodox medicine relied heavily on bleeding and calomel (mercurous chloride) purges, treatments that were sometimes fatal. Joseph Smith lost his brother Alvin in 1823 when calomel, prescribed for what may have been appendicitis, lodged in his intestines, causing gangrene. This was one of several unfortunate experiences that supported a family inclination against these methods (sometimes called "heroic medicine").

Other practitioners, including Willard Richards, an early member of the Quorum of the Twelve, were trained (most often self-trained) in the Thomsonian system, which used various botanical products, water, and massage. Neither allopathic nor homeopathic in orientation, Thomsonian medicine was perhaps closest to today's naturopathy. While not aggressively dangerous, as were many of the then common practitioners of quackery or some of the orthodox practitioners, most often the Thomsonians could do little more than offer kindness.

In 1831 Joseph Smith received the following revelation regarding health care: "And whosoever among you are sick, and have not faith to be healed, but believe, shall be nourished with all tenderness, with herbs and mild food, and that not by the hand of an enemy. . . . And again, it shall come to pass that he that hath faith in me to be healed, and is not appointed unto death, shall be healed" (D&C 42:43, 48). Many Latter-day Saints from that era recorded remarkable healing experiences following priesthood blessings.

Against this background, Brigham Young, who succeeded Joseph Smith, cautioned Church members against heroic medical care and emphasized reliance on common sense, safe and conservative treatments, and blessings by the priesthood. While critical of both the medical profession and individual practitioners on occasion, he acknowledged their value with fractures and some other conditions.

Medical science advanced rapidly in the latter half of the nineteenth century, and Brigham Young began to rely on physicians for more of his own medical care. During the decade beginning in 1867, he was responsible for sending several of the most gifted young men and women in the Church, among them his nephew Seymour Young, to medical schools in the East. Brigham Young died in 1877 of what his nephew later concluded must have been appendicitis.

Today, many LDS women and men are involved in health care practice and research. Church members, who are advised to seek medical assistance from competent licensed physicians, generally believe that advances in medical science and health care have come through the inspiration of the Lord. They also continue to seek priesthood blessings together with appropriate medical care.

[See also Hospitals; Maternity and Child Health Care.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bush, Lester E. "The Mormon Tradition." In Caring and Curing: Health and Medicine in Western Religious Traditions, ed. R. Numbers and E. Amundsen, pp. 397–420. New York, 1986.
- Divett, Robert T. Medicine and Mormons: An Introduction to the History of Latter-day Saint Health Care. Bountiful, Utah, 1981.

CECIL O. SAMUELSON, JR.

Middlemiss, Clare, comp. Man May Know for Himself: Teachings of President David O. McKay. Salt Lake City, 1966.

Morrell, Jeanette McKay. Highlights in the Life of President David O. McKay. Salt Lake City, 1967.

Symposium. "President David O. McKay, 1873–1970." Dialogue 4 (Winter 1969):47–62.

JAMES B. ALLEN

MEDICAL PRACTICES

At the time the Church was established (1830), medical science was in its infancy. Fundamental mechanisms of disease were just beginning to be understood, and modern diagnostic approaches and notions about infection were only embryonic. Medical treatment for most conditions was ineffective and sometimes harmful. Early Church leaders, including the Prophet Joseph SMITH and President Brigham YOUNG, urged reliance on faith and priesthood blessings and treatment with herbs and mild food. Consistent with advances in medical science and education, Church leaders, including Brigham Young, began about 1870 to rely more on professionally trained physicians than in earlier years. Since that time, Latter-day Saints have been urged by their leaders to take advantage of the best possible medical care along with availing themselves of appropriate priesthood blessings.

In the early nineteenth century, practitioners trained in orthodox medicine relied heavily on bleeding and calomel (mercurous chloride) purges, treatments that were sometimes fatal. Joseph Smith lost his brother Alvin in 1823 when calomel, prescribed for what may have been appendicitis, lodged in his intestines, causing gangrene. This was one of several unfortunate experiences that supported a family inclination against these methods (sometimes called "heroic medicine").

Other practitioners, including Willard Richards, an early member of the Quorum of the Twelve, were trained (most often self-trained) in the Thomsonian system, which used various botanical products, water, and massage. Neither allopathic nor homeopathic in orientation, Thomsonian medicine was perhaps closest to today's naturopathy. While not aggressively dangerous, as were many of the then common practitioners of quackery or some of the orthodox practitioners, most often the Thomsonians could do little more than offer kindness.

In 1831 Joseph Smith received the following revelation regarding health care: "And whosoever among you are sick, and have not faith to be healed, but believe, shall be nourished with all tenderness, with herbs and mild food, and that not by the hand of an enemy. . . . And again, it shall come to pass that he that hath faith in me to be healed, and is not appointed unto death, shall be healed" (D&C 42:43, 48). Many Latter-day Saints from that era recorded remarkable healing experiences following priesthood blessings.

Against this background, Brigham Young, who succeeded Joseph Smith, cautioned Church members against heroic medical care and emphasized reliance on common sense, safe and conservative treatments, and blessings by the priesthood. While critical of both the medical profession and individual practitioners on occasion, he acknowledged their value with fractures and some other conditions.

Medical science advanced rapidly in the latter half of the nineteenth century, and Brigham Young began to rely on physicians for more of his own medical care. During the decade beginning in 1867, he was responsible for sending several of the most gifted young men and women in the Church, among them his nephew Seymour Young, to medical schools in the East. Brigham Young died in 1877 of what his nephew later concluded must have been appendicitis.

Today, many LDS women and men are involved in health care practice and research. Church members, who are advised to seek medical assistance from competent licensed physicians, generally believe that advances in medical science and health care have come through the inspiration of the Lord. They also continue to seek priesthood blessings together with appropriate medical care.

[See also Hospitals; Maternity and Child Health Care.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bush, Lester E. "The Mormon Tradition." In Caring and Curing: Health and Medicine in Western Religious Traditions, ed. R. Numbers and E. Amundsen, pp. 397–420. New York, 1986.
- Divett, Robert T. Medicine and Mormons: An Introduction to the History of Latter-day Saint Health Care. Bountiful, Utah, 1981.

CECIL O. SAMUELSON, JR.

MEETINGHOUSE

Meetinghouses for members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are often called chapels, but technically the chapel is a special part of the meetinghouse in which worship services are held. In the tradition of the New England meetinghouse, LDS meetinghouses are multipurpose facilities. They developed from a single-room, multiuse building to multiroom complexes.

THE MEETINGHOUSE, 1847–1869. Before 1847 there were few LDS meetinghouses. Soon after the Saints arrived in the Great Basin region in 1847, single-room structures were constructed of indigenous materials in all established communities. Where it was deemed prudent to build forts for the protection of the settlers, such meetinghouses were included within the overall design of the protective enclosure. They had earthen or plank floors, small paned windows, open ceilings, and a roof that could be made from a variety of natural materials. Each served as a chapel, a general meeting facility, and often also a school, making it the focus for the activities of the COMMUNITY or settlement.

The chapel of an LDS meetinghouse (built in 1986). In the foreground are seats for those presiding or speaking at a meeting and for the choir. Not visible to the sides are an organ and piano. At center is the podium, with the sacrament table to the left and a desk for the clerk on the right. The partition at the back opens for additional seating. The simple design of a modern LDS chapel does not include artwork or religious symbols. Courtesy Doug Martin.

Later meetinghouses in this period exhibited a greater sense of style than their earlier counterparts. Classical pediments, bracket motifs, pilasters, small steeples, and inside columns became more frequent. Yet one may not classify these meetinghouses stylistically as Federal, Greek, or Gothic Revival, or as New England variations on English architect Christopher Wren. Rather, the majority remained either eclectic or of a vernacular “high style.”

THE MEETINGHOUSE, 1869–1890. More sophisticated designs were developed to accommodate the rapid growth of the Church following the completion of the transcontinental railroad in 1869. Ward needs were met by the construction of halls or chapels of appropriate size with seating benches that faced a raised pulpit area. In some meetinghouses, the floor of the hall was sloped downward toward the pulpit area, and there was a backwall gallery, reached by staircases located at either corner of the hall or by an outside entrance. At times, the gallery extended from the back along the side walls of the meetinghouse. The ceilings were either flat or elliptical depending on the abilities of the artisans. Often, instructional and meeting rooms were placed behind the pulpit area to augment those in the undercroft or basement.

THE MEETINGHOUSE, 1890–1920. Important changes were made in the general design of LDS meetinghouses in the early twentieth century. At first separate halls were built adjacent to many meetinghouses for use in needed cultural and recreational activities of the AUXILIARY ORGANIZATIONS of the Church and for the service activities of the RELIEF SOCIETY. Later modified designs incorporated the separate structures into the overall design of the meetinghouse. The combination of prospering LDS communities, growing numbers of qualified artisans, and a broader knowledge of architectural design led to a greater level of architectural sophistication. Wrenish entrance fronts with associated towers and spires became more frequent. The overall architectural styles of meetinghouses in this period can best be described as Classical, Romanesque/Gothic, and Victorian.

The period between 1890 and 1920 is usually regarded as the most individualistic period in Church architecture. Some of the Church’s gifted artisans were sent to study at distinguished educational institutions and brought their knowledge and skills back to Utah. For instance, Joseph Don Carlos Young, a son of Brigham YOUNG, went to Rennselaer Polytechnical Institute in New York and earned a degree in architecture. Shortly after his return, he was appointed Church architect. One of his responsibilities was to complete the SALT LAKE TEMPLE, which he did in 1893. His virtuosity in architecture soon led him and others to employ distinctive and sometimes exotic variations in style.

The most unique aspect late in this period was the introduction of the "Wrightian style." Derived from the cubic forms of the American modernist Frank Lloyd Wright, it was adapted to LDS meetinghouse architecture by Utah architects Hyrum Pope, Harold W. Burton, and Taylor Woolley (the latter having served as the head of Wright's Detroit office). It became known as the "Mormon style."

THE MEETINGHOUSE AND STANDARD PLANNING, 1920–1990. Standard planning has characterized LDS architecture since 1920, beginning with Joseph Don Carlos Young in the late years of his work as Church architect. The transformation came in response to Church growth and the need for a more cost effective use of limited Church funds. In the process, attempts were made to arrive at what might be considered an authentic form of LDS architecture. Young devised a plan that structurally joined the previously separate chapel and classrooms with the recreational or cultural hall through a connecting foyer/office/classroom complex. The joining of the two building types created a diversity in ground plans reminiscent of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century English domestic architecture. They became known as "Young's Twins" or the "Colonel's Twins." Most often they were designed in the Colonial style, and soon they became the prominent building type within the Church in the western United States.

During the Depression and war years of the 1930s and 1940s, the Colonial style of the 1920s gave way to a pragmatic or "plain style."

Then in the administration of President David O. MCKAY (1951–1970), a new plan was introduced to replace what had become an impoverished form born of economic necessity. Devised by architect Theodore Pope, the new plan connected the cultural hall to the back of the chapel. A modification of the plan connected two chapels on the opposite ends of a single cultural hall, creating a double-ender or double-chapel design. The latter configuration was intended to reduce land and construction costs where there were larger concentrations of Church members in a small geographic area. Both arrangements allowed for the potential overflow from the chapel to expand into the cultural hall, making both areas more functional and increasing the frequency of use. Classrooms and other meeting areas were attached to or extended around the chapel and cultural hall areas. This concept remains in effect today, though there are differences in outward appearances, interior spatial flow, and room arrangements.

Edgemont Stake Center, Provo, Utah (dedicated 1990). LDS meetinghouses contain a chapel and many facilities for religious, social, cultural, and athletic events. Buildings are often shared by two or three congregations. Members are responsible for routine upkeep of the building and grounds. Courtesy Doug Martin.

Another concept developed in recent years allows for structural expansion by building additions in regulated phases, to accommodate a small but growing congregation. These later changes stem from events associated with the energy crisis in the 1970s, the rapid growth of the Church, and rising construction costs.

Colonial or classical exterior styles continue to be popular both in America and internationally. Whatever historical or modern motifs are now used, they remain subordinate to the overall standard design concept based on pragmatic functionalism. However, some individualistic plans have been used to conform to special geographic or cultural requirements. Regardless of the resulting style or plan, a Latter-day Saint meetinghouse still serves the same function as the New England meetinghouse—as a multipurpose center for worship and cultural activities.

C. MARK HAMILTON

---

MEETINGHOUSE LIBRARIES

Meetinghouse libraries in the wards and branches of the Church are provided to assist Latter-day Saints in both learning and teaching the gospel, whether in Church meetings or at home. Instructional materials are indexed to correlate with the Churchwide curriculum and are designed to enrich lives, helping people develop spiritually, emotionally, and intellectually.

An integral part of each meetinghouse, the library ideally contains selected books, pictures, flannel board stories and flannel boards, audiocassettes and players, videocassettes and players, a photocopier, a typewriter, screens, and projectors for the available videocassette tapes, filmstrips, and slides. Additional teaching resources include supplies such as easels, maps, charts, indexes, paper, and chalk. Ward members are allowed access to virtually all library materials for both teaching and home use.

Printed materials in the library typically consist of the standard works, doctrinal works by Church authorities, copies of the current hymnal and children's songbook, current and back issues of Church magazines, copies of current and past lesson manuals for all courses of study, general conference reports, and guide books for self-instruction in genealogical or family history work.

Learning and teaching aids are available for the Bible, Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, Pearl of Great Price, Church history, Church leaders, FAMILY LIFE, and other resources used in the Church organizations. Many of these materials are prepared under the Church's CORRELATION guidelines.

The librarian and one or more assistants, who are called to the work by the ward BISHOP, instruct members about available items and how to use them. The librarian is normally trained by both the previous librarian and the stake or regional librarian. The librarian orders needed supplies normally from a Church DISTRIBUTION CENTER, planning the order in coordination with ward organization leaders, and subject to an established budget.

Teachers in Church organizations use the library most heavily on worship days. During the week, ward members may draw on library resources for family activities, FAMILY HOME EVENINGS, FIRESIDES, and other occasions.

BETH M. MARLOW

---

MEETINGS, MAJOR CHURCH

Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are a meeting-going people. When the Church was organized, the instruction was given, "It is expedient that the church meet together often" (D&C 20:75). The pattern for meeting every SUNDAY to pray, speak, and partake of the SACRAMENT or "Lord's Supper" was established immediately, following the Book of Mormon norm (Moro. 6:5–6). The pattern of holding a Church CONFERENCE every three months also began in 1830 (D&C 20:61–62). Since that time other meetings have been added to the Church agenda. The main meetings on Sunday are (1) SACRAMENT MEETING; (2) SUNDAY SCHOOL; and (3) concurrent PRIESTHOOD quorum meetings for men and RELIEF SOCIETY for women, with children under twelve years of age simultaneously attending PRIMARY. Young women meet in their own sessions, while young men of equivalent age are in priesthood meeting.

In addition, families are expected, usually on Monday evening, to meet in their own homes in a FAMILY HOME EVENING, which can include instruction from a Church-prepared manual, an activity, and refreshments. Most families also use this evening as a time to discuss family concerns and make plans for the week. Single Latter-day Saints are encouraged to participate with nearby family groups or in groups of their peers.

Besides the meetings for all members, there are special meetings related to Church CALLINGS. For example, a presidency of three plus a secretary or clerk meet regularly to oversee the many functions of a stake and its wards. Then within each ward are the bishopric, priesthood quorums, Sunday School, Relief Society, Primary, Young dard design concept based on pragmatic functionalism. However, some individualistic plans have been used to conform to special geographic or cultural requirements. Regardless of the resulting style or plan, a Latter-day Saint meetinghouse still serves the same function as the New England meetinghouse—as a multipurpose center for worship and cultural activities.

C. MARK HAMILTON

---

MEETINGHOUSE LIBRARIES

Meetinghouse libraries in the wards and branches of the Church are provided to assist Latter-day Saints in both learning and teaching the gospel, whether in Church meetings or at home. Instructional materials are indexed to correlate with the Churchwide curriculum and are designed to enrich lives, helping people develop spiritually, emotionally, and intellectually.

An integral part of each meetinghouse, the library ideally contains selected books, pictures, flannel board stories and flannel boards, audiocassettes and players, videocassettes and players, a photocopier, a typewriter, screens, and projectors for the available videocassette tapes, filmstrips, and slides. Additional teaching resources include supplies such as easels, maps, charts, indexes, paper, and chalk. Ward members are allowed access to virtually all library materials for both teaching and home use.

Printed materials in the library typically consist of the standard works, doctrinal works by Church authorities, copies of the current hymnal and children's songbook, current and back issues of Church magazines, copies of current and past lesson manuals for all courses of study, general conference reports, and guide books for self-instruction in genealogical or family history work.

Learning and teaching aids are available for the Bible, Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, Pearl of Great Price, Church history, Church leaders, FAMILY LIFE, and other resources used in the Church organizations. Many of these materials are prepared under the Church's CORRELATION guidelines.

The librarian and one or more assistants, who are called to the work by the ward BISHOP, instruct members about available items and how to use them. The librarian is normally trained by both the previous librarian and the stake or regional librarian. The librarian orders needed supplies normally from a Church DISTRIBUTION CENTER, planning the order in coordination with ward organization leaders, and subject to an established budget.

Teachers in Church organizations use the library most heavily on worship days. During the week, ward members may draw on library resources for family activities, FAMILY HOME EVENINGS, FIRESIDES, and other occasions.

BETH M. MARLOW

---

MEETINGS, MAJOR CHURCH

Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are a meeting-going people. When the Church was organized, the instruction was given, "It is expedient that the church meet together often" (D&C 20:75). The pattern for meeting every SUNDAY to pray, speak, and partake of the SACRAMENT or "Lord's Supper" was established immediately, following the Book of Mormon norm (Moro. 6:5–6). The pattern of holding a Church CONFERENCE every three months also began in 1830 (D&C 20:61–62). Since that time other meetings have been added to the Church agenda. The main meetings on Sunday are (1) SACRAMENT MEETING; (2) SUNDAY SCHOOL; and (3) concurrent PRIESTHOOD quorum meetings for men and RELIEF SOCIETY for women, with children under twelve years of age simultaneously attending PRIMARY. Young women meet in their own sessions, while young men of equivalent age are in priesthood meeting.

In addition, families are expected, usually on Monday evening, to meet in their own homes in a FAMILY HOME EVENING, which can include instruction from a Church-prepared manual, an activity, and refreshments. Most families also use this evening as a time to discuss family concerns and make plans for the week. Single Latter-day Saints are encouraged to participate with nearby family groups or in groups of their peers.

Besides the meetings for all members, there are special meetings related to Church CALLINGS. For example, a presidency of three plus a secretary or clerk meet regularly to oversee the many functions of a stake and its wards. Then within each ward are the bishopric, priesthood quorums, Sunday School, Relief Society, Primary, Young dard design concept based on pragmatic functionalism. However, some individualistic plans have been used to conform to special geographic or cultural requirements. Regardless of the resulting style or plan, a Latter-day Saint meetinghouse still serves the same function as the New England meetinghouse—as a multipurpose center for worship and cultural activities.

C. MARK HAMILTON

---

MEETINGHOUSE LIBRARIES

Meetinghouse libraries in the wards and branches of the Church are provided to assist Latter-day Saints in both learning and teaching the gospel, whether in Church meetings or at home. Instructional materials are indexed to correlate with the Churchwide curriculum and are designed to enrich lives, helping people develop spiritually, emotionally, and intellectually.

An integral part of each meetinghouse, the library ideally contains selected books, pictures, flannel board stories and flannel boards, audiocassettes and players, videocassettes and players, a photocopier, a typewriter, screens, and projectors for the available videocassette tapes, filmstrips, and slides. Additional teaching resources include supplies such as easels, maps, charts, indexes, paper, and chalk. Ward members are allowed access to virtually all library materials for both teaching and home use.

Printed materials in the library typically consist of the standard works, doctrinal works by Church authorities, copies of the current hymnal and children's songbook, current and back issues of Church magazines, copies of current and past lesson manuals for all courses of study, general conference reports, and guide books for self-instruction in genealogical or family history work.

Learning and teaching aids are available for the Bible, Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, Pearl of Great Price, Church history, Church leaders, FAMILY LIFE, and other resources used in the Church organizations. Many of these materials are prepared under the Church's CORRELATION guidelines.

The librarian and one or more assistants, who are called to the work by the ward BISHOP, instruct members about available items and how to use them. The librarian is normally trained by both the previous librarian and the stake or regional librarian. The librarian orders needed supplies normally from a Church DISTRIBUTION CENTER, planning the order in coordination with ward organization leaders, and subject to an established budget.

Teachers in Church organizations use the library most heavily on worship days. During the week, ward members may draw on library resources for family activities, FAMILY HOME EVENINGS, FIRESIDES, and other occasions.

BETH M. MARLOW

---

MEETINGS, MAJOR CHURCH

Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are a meeting-going people. When the Church was organized, the instruction was given, "It is expedient that the church meet together often" (D&C 20:75). The pattern for meeting every SUNDAY to pray, speak, and partake of the SACRAMENT or "Lord's Supper" was established immediately, following the Book of Mormon norm (Moro. 6:5–6). The pattern of holding a Church CONFERENCE every three months also began in 1830 (D&C 20:61–62). Since that time other meetings have been added to the Church agenda. The main meetings on Sunday are (1) SACRAMENT MEETING; (2) SUNDAY SCHOOL; and (3) concurrent PRIESTHOOD quorum meetings for men and RELIEF SOCIETY for women, with children under twelve years of age simultaneously attending PRIMARY. Young women meet in their own sessions, while young men of equivalent age are in priesthood meeting.

In addition, families are expected, usually on Monday evening, to meet in their own homes in a FAMILY HOME EVENING, which can include instruction from a Church-prepared manual, an activity, and refreshments. Most families also use this evening as a time to discuss family concerns and make plans for the week. Single Latter-day Saints are encouraged to participate with nearby family groups or in groups of their peers.

Besides the meetings for all members, there are special meetings related to Church CALLINGS. For example, a presidency of three plus a secretary or clerk meet regularly to oversee the many functions of a stake and its wards. Then within each ward are the bishopric, priesthood quorums, Sunday School, Relief Society, Primary, Young Women, and so forth. Each of these presidencies typically also holds a planning meeting each week. Even though there are many meetings, leaders are encouraged to spend less time in meetings and more time in service.

Most Church meetings are formally organized with hymns, prayers, sermons, lessons, and/or instructions. To involve teenagers and children, many meetings use participative methods such as discussion groups, panels, case studies, and role playing.

In all conferences—ward, stake, regional, and general—Church leaders give presentations of counsel and inspiration. Special meetings are held during the year for the priesthood (e.g., stake and general priesthood meetings), and for the women of the Church (general meeting). There are likewise seminary meetings for participating teenagers attending high school, missionary meetings for those on MISSIONS, and meetings for temple workers, scout leaders, activity directors, nursery teachers, and Sunday School workers. The Latter-day Saint culture flourishes on the principle of meeting together often in order to “be prepared in all things” (D&C 88:80).

In business and planning meetings, there is an attempt to have everyone contribute, but those with official status usually conduct the proceedings and have the most decisive influence. These meeting patterns extend worldwide and are a major part of the cohesiveness that keeps Mormons in touch, involved, acquainted, and united in the common cause of building the KINGDOM OF GOD on earth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B., and Glen M. Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City, 1976.
- Arrington, Leonard. Great Basin Kingdom. Lincoln, Neb., 1966, pp. 28–33.
- McKay, David O. Gospel Ideals, chap. 11. Salt Lake City, 1975.

WILLIAM G. DYER

MELCHIZEDEK

[This entry consists of two articles: LDS Sources, a discussion of what is known of Melchizedek from Church scripture and revelation, and Ancient Sources, a historical view of Melchizedek from ancient writings and traditions.]

LDS SOURCES

As a king and HIGH PRIEST of the Most High God (Gen. 14:18), Melchizedek holds a place of great honor and respect among Latter-day Saints. An example of righteousness and the namesake of the higher PRIESTHOOD, he represents the scriptural ideal of one who obtains the power of God through FAITH, REPENTANCE, and sacred ORDINANCES, for the purpose of inspiring and blessing his fellow beings.

Melchizedek was evidently a prince by birth, for he became king of Salem (later JERUSALEM—Gen. 14:18; Ps. 76:2), where he reigned “under his father” (Alma 13:18). “Melchizedek was a man of faith, who wrought righteousness; and when a child he feared God, and stopped the mouths of lions, and quenched the violence of fire” (JST Gen. 14:26). Yet the people among whom he lived “waxed strong in iniquity and abomination; yea, they had all gone astray; they were full of all manner of wickedness” (Alma 13:17).

Though living among a wicked people, Melchizedek “exercised mighty faith, and received the office of the high priesthood according to the holy order of God” (Alma 13:18). This priesthood was after the order of the COVENANT that God had made with Enoch (JST Gen. 14:27), and Melchizedek ruled both as king and priest over his people.

As high priest, some of his functions were keeping “the storehouse of God” where the “tithes for the poor” were held (JST Gen. 14:37–38), giving blessings to individuals such as ABRAHAM (JST Gen. 14:18, 25, 37), preaching repentance (Alma 13:18; cf. 5:49), and administering ordinances “after this manner, that thereby the people might look forward on the Son of God . . . for a remission of their sins, that they might enter into the rest of the Lord” (Alma 13:16; JST Gen. 14:17). With extraordinary goodness and power, Melchizedek diligently administered in the office of high priest and “did preach repentance unto his people. And behold, they did repent; and Melchizedek did establish peace in the land in his days” (Alma 13:18). Consequently, Melchizedek became known as “the prince of peace” (JST Gen. 14:33; Heb. 7:1–2; Alma 13:18). “His people wrought righteousness, and obtained heaven” (JST Gen. 14:34). His Hebrew name means “King of Righteousness.”

For ALMA<sub>2</sub> and several biblical authors, the order of the priesthood to which Melchizedek was ordained was of prime importance. It was this

Women, and so forth. Each of these presidencies typically also holds a planning meeting each week. Even though there are many meetings, leaders are encouraged to spend less time in meetings and more time in service.

Most Church meetings are formally organized with hymns, prayers, sermons, lessons, and/or instructions. To involve teenagers and children, many meetings use participative methods such as discussion groups, panels, case studies, and role playing.

In all conferences—ward, stake, regional, and general—Church leaders give presentations of counsel and inspiration. Special meetings are held during the year for the priesthood (e.g., stake and general priesthood meetings), and for the women of the Church (general meeting). There are likewise seminary meetings for participating teenagers attending high school, missionary meetings for those on MISSIONS, and meetings for temple workers, scout leaders, activity directors, nursery teachers, and Sunday School workers. The Latter-day Saint culture flourishes on the principle of meeting together often in order to “be prepared in all things” (D&C 88:80).

In business and planning meetings, there is an attempt to have everyone contribute, but those with official status usually conduct the proceedings and have the most decisive influence. These meeting patterns extend worldwide and are a major part of the cohesiveness that keeps Mormons in touch, involved, acquainted, and united in the common cause of building the KINGDOM OF GOD on earth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B., and Glen M. Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City, 1976.
- Arrington, Leonard. Great Basin Kingdom. Lincoln, Neb., 1966, pp. 28–33.
- McKay, David O. Gospel Ideals, chap. 11. Salt Lake City, 1975.

WILLIAM G. DYER

MELCHIZEDEK

[This entry consists of two articles: LDS Sources, a discussion of what is known of Melchizedek from Church scripture and revelation, and Ancient Sources, a historical view of Melchizedek from ancient writings and traditions.]

LDS SOURCES

As a king and HIGH PRIEST of the Most High God (Gen. 14:18), Melchizedek holds a place of great honor and respect among Latter-day Saints. An example of righteousness and the namesake of the higher PRIESTHOOD, he represents the scriptural ideal of one who obtains the power of God through FAITH, REPENTANCE, and sacred ORDINANCES, for the purpose of inspiring and blessing his fellow beings.

Melchizedek was evidently a prince by birth, for he became king of Salem (later JERUSALEM—Gen. 14:18; Ps. 76:2), where he reigned “under his father” (Alma 13:18). “Melchizedek was a man of faith, who wrought righteousness; and when a child he feared God, and stopped the mouths of lions, and quenched the violence of fire” (JST Gen. 14:26). Yet the people among whom he lived “waxed strong in iniquity and abomination; yea, they had all gone astray; they were full of all manner of wickedness” (Alma 13:17).

Though living among a wicked people, Melchizedek “exercised mighty faith, and received the office of the high priesthood according to the holy order of God” (Alma 13:18). This priesthood was after the order of the COVENANT that God had made with Enoch (JST Gen. 14:27), and Melchizedek ruled both as king and priest over his people.

As high priest, some of his functions were keeping “the storehouse of God” where the “tithes for the poor” were held (JST Gen. 14:37–38), giving blessings to individuals such as ABRAHAM (JST Gen. 14:18, 25, 37), preaching repentance (Alma 13:18; cf. 5:49), and administering ordinances “after this manner, that thereby the people might look forward on the Son of God . . . for a remission of their sins, that they might enter into the rest of the Lord” (Alma 13:16; JST Gen. 14:17). With extraordinary goodness and power, Melchizedek diligently administered in the office of high priest and “did preach repentance unto his people. And behold, they did repent; and Melchizedek did establish peace in the land in his days” (Alma 13:18). Consequently, Melchizedek became known as “the prince of peace” (JST Gen. 14:33; Heb. 7:1–2; Alma 13:18). “His people wrought righteousness, and obtained heaven” (JST Gen. 14:34). His Hebrew name means “King of Righteousness.”

For ALMA<sub>2</sub> and several biblical authors, the order of the priesthood to which Melchizedek was ordained was of prime importance. It was this “order,” coupled with faith, that gave Melchizedek the power and knowledge that influenced his people to repent and become worthy to be with God. This order was “after the order of the Son of God; which order came, not by man, nor the will of man; neither by father nor mother; neither by beginning of days nor end of years; but of God” (JST Gen. 14:28; JST Heb. 7:3; Ps. 110:4). It was given to Melchizedek “through the lineage of his fathers, even till Noah,” and from Melchizedek to Abraham (D&C 84:14). Those ordained to this order were to “have power, by faith,” and, according to “the will of the Son of God,” to work miracles. Ultimately, those in this order were “to stand in the presence of God” (JST Gen. 14:30–31). This was accomplished by participating in the ordinances of this order (Alma 13:16; D&C 84:20–22). The result was that “men having this faith, coming up unto this order of God, were translated and taken up into heaven” (JST Gen. 14:32). Accordingly, the Prophet Joseph SMITH taught that the priesthood held by Melchizedek had “the power of ‘endless lives’” (TPJS, p. 322; see also ETERNAL LIFE).

This mosaic shows Melchizedek standing behind an altar symbolically receiving the sacrifices of Abel and Abraham. Saint Apollinaire in Classe, Ravenna, Italy (sixth century A.D.). Courtesy John W. Welch.

So righteous and faithful was Melchizedek in the execution of his high priestly duties that he became a prototype of Jesus Christ (Heb. 7:15). The Book of Mormon prophet Alma said of him, “Now, there were many [high priests] before him, and also there were many afterwards, but none were greater” (Alma 13:19). The Doctrine and Covenants states that Melchizedek was “such a great high priest” that the higher priesthood was called after his name. “Before his day it was called the Holy Priesthood, after the Order of the Son of God. But out of respect or reverence to the name of the Supreme Being, to avoid the too-frequent repetition of his name, they, the church, in the ancient days, called that priesthood after Melchizedek, or the Melchizedek Priesthood” (D&C 107:2–4; italics in original).

It was asserted by some early LDS leaders that Melchizedek was Shem, son of Noah (see, e.g., T&S 5:746). Though Shem is also identified as a great high priest (D&C 138:41), it would appear from the Doctrine and Covenants 84:14 that the two might not be the same individual (MD, p. 475), and Jewish sources equating Melchizedek and Shem are late and tendentious.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Madsen, Ann N. “Melchizedek, the Man and the Tradition.” Master’s thesis, Brigham Young University, 1975.
- Welch, John W. “The Melchizedek Material in Alma 13:13–19.” In By Study and Also by Faith, ed. J. Lundquist and S. Ricks, Vol. 2, pp. 238–72. Salt Lake City, 1990.
- Widtsoe, John A. “Who Was Melchizedek?” Evidences and Reconciliations, pp. 231–33. Salt Lake City, 1960.

BRUCE SATTERFIELD

ANCIENT SOURCES

Genesis 14:17–24 reports that Abram (“the Hebrew,” 14:3), upon his victorious return from a battle, was met by the king of Sodom (“Bera,” 14:2), who was eager to reward Abram for coming to his and his allies’ aid. The narrative is interrupted by an enigmatic insertion (14:18–20) featuring “Melchizedek king of Salem,” “priest of God Most High” (RSV). Melchizedek “brought out bread and wine” and blessed Abram in the name of God Most High (Hebrew ’el ’elyôn). Abram then gave Melchizedek a tithe of his booty. This priest-king of Salem has enjoyed a wide range of interpretation among Jewish, Christian, and Gnostic writings, some that brought him up to the heights of heaven, and others—of developing Christian and Jewish orthodoxy—that brought him down to earth again.

The story of Genesis 14 has raised numerous questions. Most modern scholars entertain a possible connection of this Melchizedek with a pre-Israelite kingship and/or priesthood in the Jebusite city of Jerusalem (“Salem”) before its conquest by King David (2 Sam. 5:6–10). The incorporation of the story into Judean traditions reflects the interests of the Jerusalem royal ideology.

The only other Old Testament occurrence of the name Melchizedek is found in a royal Jerusalemite psalm, Psalm 110:4. There God (“the Lord”) addresses the king thus: “You are a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.”

Melchizedek occurs in the New Testament only in the Epistle to the Hebrews (5:6–10; 6:20; 7:1–17), where the Old Testament figure is interpreted as a type of the “high priest” of the New Covenant, Jesus Christ. The key passage is Hebrews 7:3, where it is said that Melchizedek “resembles the Son of God.” Melchizedek’s priesthood, superior to that of the “descendants of Levi” (Heb. 7:5), is a foreshadowing of the priesthood of the Son of God. Hebrews 7:3 becomes the basis for most Christian interpretation of the figure of Melchizedek (Horton, pp. 111, 152, 161–64).

An important witness to pre-Christian Jewish speculation on Melchizedek has surfaced among the Dead Sea Scrolls: 11QMelch. The fragmentary Hebrew text, usually dated to the first century B.C., features Melchizedek as a heavenly end-time redeemer, with attributes of the archangel Michael. He appears in the tenth and final jubilee of world history to rescue the elect, the “men of the lot of Melchizedek” (ii.8), doing battle with Belial and his fellow evil spirits. Melchizedek’s triumph is described as a high-priestly act of “expiation” (ii.8; cf. Kobelski, pp. 5–23).

Melchizedek is mentioned by Philo, a first-century Jewish philosopher of Alexandria, in three writings (Legum Allegoriae 3.79–82; De Congressu 89; De Abrahamo 235). Philo interprets the text of Genesis in a Platonic-allegorical fashion, seeing in Melchizedek a reference to the divine Logos, the thought of God in which the pattern of all existing things is conceived and the “image” of God according to which man was created.

Another important text, 2 Enoch, attests to early Jewish interest in the figure of Melchizedek. The date and place of this document are controversial, but recent scholarship places its original Greek version in the first century A.D. in Alexandria (cf. F. I. Andersen’s introduction and translation in Charlesworth, Vol. 1, pp. 91–213). In this text (chaps. 71–72), a child is born miraculously to Noah’s recently deceased sister-in-law, and the child, marked on his chest with a priestly seal, speaks and praises God. The boy is named Melchizedek by Noah and his brother Nir, whose wife had been posthumously delivered. In a night vision Nir is told of the impending flood; he is also informed that the archangel Michael will bring Melchizedek to paradise, thus enabling him to escape the flood waters. Melchizedek will eventually become the chief of priests among the people, and in the end of days he will be revealed yet another time as the chief priest. In this text, Melchizedek has three different earthly manifestations: born before the Flood, serving in the postdiluvian age as a great priest, and functioning in the end-time as a messianic priest (cf. Gruenewald, pp. 90–92; Delcor, pp. 127–30).

Some of these Jewish interpretations were taken over by Gnostics and are now reflected in some Christian Gnostic texts preserved in Coptic manuscripts of the fourth and fifth centuries (Pearson, 1990). In one fragmentary manuscript, the disciple John asks Jesus to explain what is said about Melchizedek in Hebrews 7:3. Unfortunately, the text breaks off before Jesus’ interpretation is given.

A fragmentary text from Nag Hammadi (IX.1: Melchizedek; cf. Pearson, 1981, pp. 19–85) contains an apocalypse given by angels to Melchizedek, “priest of God Most High.” It is revealed to Melchizedek that he will ultimately reappear as Jesus Christ, Son of God, to do battle with the cosmic forces of darkness. Here one can see influence not only from the Epistle to the Hebrews but also from non-Christian lore.

In the Second Book of Jeu, “Zorokothora Melchizedek” is a heavenly priest who presides over a heavenly baptism. No trace of influence from Hebrews is found in this text.

The most developed levels of speculation on Melchizedek, also lacking any influence from Hebrews, are found in Pistis Sophia, Book 4, in which Melchizedek plays a key role in the process of purifying human souls for entry into the “Treasury of Light” and transferring them from the domain of the archons, or earthly rulers, to that heavenly region. The younger material in books 1–3 of Pistis Sophia develops these ideas further: Melchizedek is a heavenly being who seals the saved souls upon their entry into the realm of light.

The church fathers attest to several heterodox ideas associated with Melchizedek. Hippolytus of Rome (Refutatio 7.35–36) and Epiphanius of Salamis (Panarion 55) are the most important witnesses to a group of heretics called Melchizedekians. They had a low Christology and exalted Melchizedek as a heavenly power superior to Christ. Others equated Melchizedek with the Holy Spirit (Panarion 67), and some “even in the true church” (i.e., not “heretics”) naively regarded Melchizedek as the Son of God (Panarion 55.7.3). The later view seems also to have been present among the monasteries of Egypt (Apophthegmata Patrum, in Patrologia Graeca 65.160) and was even defended in a treatise on Melchizedek by a fifth-century resident of the Judean desert, Mark the Hermit (PG 65.1117–40). Such views were eventually overcome by teacher-bishops such as Cyril of Alexandria (PG 65.160).

On the Jewish side, while early rabbis continued to speculate on Melchizedek’s role in scripture (e.g., equating him with Shem, son of Noah; cf. b. Nedarim 32b; Midrash Gen. R. 44.7; Targum Ps.-J. Gen. 14:18), a major stream of rabbinic tradition viewed Melchizedek negatively, a fact that indicates some Jewish sensitivity to the use of Melchizedek traditions by Christians (Gianotto, pp. 172–85).

[See also Apoerypha and Pseudepigrapha.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Charlesworth, James H. Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. Garden City, N.Y., 1983.
- Deleor, M. “Melchizedek from Genesis to the Qumran Texts and the Epistle to the Hebrews.” Journal of Jewish Studies 2 (1971):115–35.
- Gianotto, Claudio. Melchizedek e la sua tipologia. Supplementi alla Rivista Biblica 12. Brescia, 1984.
- Gruenewald, Ithamar. “The Messianic Image of Melchizedek” (in Hebrew). Mahanayim 124 (1970):88–98.
- Horton, Fred L., Jr. The Melchizedek Tradition. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 30. Cambridge, 1976.
- Kobelski, Paul J. Melchizedek and Melchire’sa’. Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series 10. Washington, D.C., 1981.
- Pearson, Birger A. “The Figure of Melchizedek in Gnostic Literature.” In Pearson, Gnosticism, Judaism, and Egyptian Christianity. Studies in Antiquity and Christianity 5. Minneapolis, 1990.
- , ed. Nag Hammadi Codices IX and X. Leiden, 1981.

BIRGER A. PEARSON

MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD

[This entry consists of two articles: Powers and Offices in the Melchizedek Priesthood is a general discussion of the Melchizedek Priesthood, and Restoration is a historical treatment of the restoring of this priesthood in this dispensation.]

POWERS AND OFFICES IN THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD

The Melchizedek Priesthood is the AUTHORITY, responsibility, and power to act in the name of Jesus Christ and to organize and direct part of his work. Through the opportunities of this PRIESTHOOD, men and women in partnership with God can conduct the work of the family and the Church. “It is the duty of this vast body of men holding the holy Priesthood . . . to exert their influence and exercise their power for good among the people of Israel and the people of the world . . . to preach and to work righteousness, both at home and abroad” (Smith, p. 157).

In the words of the Prophet Joseph SMITH, “All Priesthood is Melchizedek, but there are different portions or degrees of it” (TPJS, p. 180). Most often, however, the name Melchizedek Priesthood is used in the Church to describe the higher priesthood and its offices. “There are, in the church, two priesthoods, namely, the Melchizedek and Aaronic. . . . The Melchizedek Priesthood holds the right of presidency, and has power and authority over all the offices in the church in all ages of the world, to administer in spiritual things” (D&C 107:1, 8). The Melchizedek Priesthood holds the keys to the kingdom, and “in the ordinances thereof, the power of godliness is manifest” (D&C 84:20).

ORDINATION TO THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD. Every faithful, worthy man in the Church may receive the Melchizedek Priesthood. As with the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD, the Melchizedek Priesthood is conferred on those who have qualified themselves and have been called by those in authority.

Specific standards of worthiness to receive the Melchizedek Priesthood include personal integrity, chastity, obedience to the divine laws of health, and faithful contribution of tithes to the Church. Beyond these traits, it is expected that men will progress in developing attributes of godliness. Like all followers of Christ, they should be faithful, diligent, and amenable to righteous is a heavenly being who seals the saved souls upon their entry into the realm of light.

The church fathers attest to several heterodox ideas associated with Melchizedek. Hippolytus of Rome (Refutatio 7.35–36) and Epiphanius of Salamis (Panarion 55) are the most important witnesses to a group of heretics called Melchizedekians. They had a low Christology and exalted Melchizedek as a heavenly power superior to Christ. Others equated Melchizedek with the Holy Spirit (Panarion 67), and some “even in the true church” (i.e., not “heretics”) naively regarded Melchizedek as the Son of God (Panarion 55.7.3). The later view seems also to have been present among the monasteries of Egypt (Apophthegmata Patrum, in Patrologia Graeca 65.160) and was even defended in a treatise on Melchizedek by a fifth-century resident of the Judean desert, Mark the Hermit (PG 65.1117–40). Such views were eventually overcome by teacher-bishops such as Cyril of Alexandria (PG 65.160).

On the Jewish side, while early rabbis continued to speculate on Melchizedek’s role in scripture (e.g., equating him with Shem, son of Noah; cf. b. Nedarim 32b; Midrash Gen. R. 44.7; Targum Ps.-J. Gen. 14:18), a major stream of rabbinic tradition viewed Melchizedek negatively, a fact that indicates some Jewish sensitivity to the use of Melchizedek traditions by Christians (Gianotto, pp. 172–85).

[See also Apoerypha and Pseudepigrapha.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Charlesworth, James H. Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. Garden City, N.Y., 1983.
- Deleor, M. “Melchizedek from Genesis to the Qumran Texts and the Epistle to the Hebrews.” Journal of Jewish Studies 2 (1971):115–35.
- Gianotto, Claudio. Melchizedek e la sua tipologia. Supplementi alla Rivista Biblica 12. Brescia, 1984.
- Gruenewald, Ithamar. “The Messianic Image of Melchizedek” (in Hebrew). Mahanayim 124 (1970):88–98.
- Horton, Fred L., Jr. The Melchizedek Tradition. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 30. Cambridge, 1976.
- Kobelski, Paul J. Melchizedek and Melchire’sa’. Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series 10. Washington, D.C., 1981.
- Pearson, Birger A. “The Figure of Melchizedek in Gnostic Literature.” In Pearson, Gnosticism, Judaism, and Egyptian Christianity. Studies in Antiquity and Christianity 5. Minneapolis, 1990.
- , ed. Nag Hammadi Codices IX and X. Leiden, 1981.

BIRGER A. PEARSON

MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD

[This entry consists of two articles: Powers and Offices in the Melchizedek Priesthood is a general discussion of the Melchizedek Priesthood, and Restoration is a historical treatment of the restoring of this priesthood in this dispensation.]

POWERS AND OFFICES IN THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD

The Melchizedek Priesthood is the AUTHORITY, responsibility, and power to act in the name of Jesus Christ and to organize and direct part of his work. Through the opportunities of this PRIESTHOOD, men and women in partnership with God can conduct the work of the family and the Church. “It is the duty of this vast body of men holding the holy Priesthood . . . to exert their influence and exercise their power for good among the people of Israel and the people of the world . . . to preach and to work righteousness, both at home and abroad” (Smith, p. 157).

In the words of the Prophet Joseph SMITH, “All Priesthood is Melchizedek, but there are different portions or degrees of it” (TPJS, p. 180). Most often, however, the name Melchizedek Priesthood is used in the Church to describe the higher priesthood and its offices. “There are, in the church, two priesthoods, namely, the Melchizedek and Aaronic. . . . The Melchizedek Priesthood holds the right of presidency, and has power and authority over all the offices in the church in all ages of the world, to administer in spiritual things” (D&C 107:1, 8). The Melchizedek Priesthood holds the keys to the kingdom, and “in the ordinances thereof, the power of godliness is manifest” (D&C 84:20).

ORDINATION TO THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD. Every faithful, worthy man in the Church may receive the Melchizedek Priesthood. As with the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD, the Melchizedek Priesthood is conferred on those who have qualified themselves and have been called by those in authority.

Specific standards of worthiness to receive the Melchizedek Priesthood include personal integrity, chastity, obedience to the divine laws of health, and faithful contribution of tithes to the Church. Beyond these traits, it is expected that men will progress in developing attributes of godliness. Like all followers of Christ, they should be faithful, diligent, and amenable to righteous change, learning, and loving: "We can make advancement only upon the principles of eternal truth. In proportion as we become established upon the foundation of these principles which have been revealed from the heavens in the latter days, and determine to accomplish the purposes of the Lord, will we progress, and the Lord will all the more exalt and magnify us" (Smith, p. 141).

The PROPHET and PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH holds and exercises all of the authority and KEYS of the Melchizedek Priesthood. He delegates to STAKE PRESIDENTS and BISHOPS and others the authority to ordain others to priesthood offices. Conferral of the Melchizedek Priesthood by the LAYING ON OF HANDS must also be approved by the COMMON CONSENT of the priesthood bearers or general membership of the candidate's STAKE or DISTRICT.

After the Melchizedek Priesthood is conferred upon them, all priesthood holders are ordained to an office within the priesthood, usually ELDER. They may later be ordained to the office of HIGH PRIEST or PATRIARCH as their Church CALLINGS require. Those called to be GENERAL AUTHORITIES for the whole Church will be ordained SEVENTIES or APOSTLES. Ordination to an office within the priesthood gives specific responsibilities within the Church.

Finally, a man may be SET APART to carry out an assignment, such as to be president of a quorum of elders, a stake president, or a member of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. As appropriate, he will be given the keys of authority necessary to carry out that assignment. This procedure makes it possible for every act performed under priesthood authority to be done at the proper time and place and in the proper way. The authority to direct those specific activities constitutes the keys of the priesthood.

An individual accepts his ordination to the Melchizedek Priesthood by making a covenant in his mind and heart with God (TPJS, p. 323; see also OATH AND COVENANT OF THE PRIESTHOOD). He covenants to honor, dignify, and learn the duties of his priesthood, to keep the commandments of God, to live by God's counsel, and to walk uprightly and virtuously as he carries out his responsibilities. God promises that if the man keeps his commitments, he will be given eternal life and be exalted in a godly state, inheriting all that the Father has, and will participate with God and the Savior in their continued work (D&C 84:39).

The pulpits in the upper Assembly Hall of the Salt Lake Temple.

FUNCTIONING OF THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD. All who hold the priesthood can use it to benefit others, regardless of their particular Church assignment or priesthood office. For example, in working with their families, men are authorized to carry out their patriarchal responsibilities (see FATHERHOOD), including blessing family members. In addition, they are authorized to heal the sick, seek personal knowledge, and give general help and comfort to those whom they contact.

To supervise and carry out priesthood ordinances within the Church, it is necessary to have both the Melchizedek Priesthood and the appropriate keys. For example, to confirm baptized members and bestow the gift of the Holy Ghost upon them, it is necessary to have the power of the Melchizedek Priesthood and to be authorized to use it. In this way, there is order, and the work done on earth is acceptable to the Savior in mortality and in the hereafter (see SEALING).

In addition to providing the authority to represent Christ on earth, the Melchizedek Priesthood provides a revelatory channel through which instructions and doctrine from Christ can be made known. Every individual has access to God and the right to receive personal REVELATION pertaining to his or her life and callings, but when revelation concerning principles or the implementation of principles is required for the Church or a priesthood unit of it, God gives this revelation only through appropriate priesthood leaders. The prophet and President of the Church receives revclation for the entire Church. A bishop receives the revelation necessary for leading the WARD. This way of making truth known underscores the right and responsibility of each individual to seek and obtain revelation and at the same time preserves order and harmony by working through the priesthood structure that Christ has set in place.

"The rights of the priesthood are inseparably connected with the powers of heaven; . . . [this power] cannot be controlled nor handled [except] upon the principles of righteousness" (D&C 121:36). One can officiate for God only when administering the work in wisdom and love, in a way consistent with the ways of God. Assignments must be pursued with long-suffering, gentleness, meekness, kindness, love unfeigned, pure knowledge, and charity toward all. In this way, God promises that the "doctrine of the priesthood shall distil upon thy soul as the dews from heaven" (D&C 121:41–45).

Priesthood can be lost as a result of a DISCIPLINARY PROCEDURE for serious sin. When a man is excommunicated, he loses his priesthood. Disfellowshipment or probation may restrict a man from using his priesthood until the repentance process is complete. In addition, "when we undertake to cover our sins, or gratify our pride, our vain ambition, or to exercise control or dominion or compulsion upon the souls of the children of men, in any degree of unrighteousness . . . Amen to the priesthood or the authority of that man" (D&C 121:37).

ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD. The Melchizedek Priesthood is an eternal priesthood. Before mortality, God delegated authority and responsibility to worthy individuals. This holy priesthood was the means by which that action was taken. After this life, those who have been valiant and have honored their priesthood will continue to bear it and to have the responsibility to use it in serving others.

Adam, the first of the spirit children of God to live on earth, received the holy priesthood, with all its power, authority, and keys. "And thus all things were confirmed unto Adam, by an holy ordinance" (Moses 5:59). This authority was delegated to others in an unbroken chain from one prophet to another. "All the prophets had the Melchizedek Priesthood" (TPJS, p. 181).

Abraham sought the blessings of his fathers and the right to be ordained to the priesthood.

Because he had qualified himself for the priesthood, even though his own father had not, Abraham obtained the priesthood from MELCHIZEDEK, the king of Salem and a priest of God (Abr. 1:2–5). Melchizedek met Abraham and blessed him, and Abraham gave him a tenth part of all he had (Heb. 7:1–3). Melchizedek exercised mighty faith and used his priesthood to bring a people practicing iniquity to repentance. None was greater than he (Alma 13:17–19). Originally, the priesthood was known as the "Holy Priesthood, after the Order of the Son of God" (D&C 107:3). To avoid too frequent use of God's name, the Church in ancient days called the priesthood by the name of this noted priesthood leader, Melchizedek (D&C 107:2–4).

Moses received the Melchizedek Priesthood from his father-in-law, Jethro (D&C 84:6). Moses held the Melchizedek Priesthood until he was translated, at which time the keys of the greater priesthood went with him, and what remained with the people was an appendage to the Melchizedek Priesthood called the Aaronic Priesthood, a priesthood with limited authority. After the time of Moses, individual prophets were given the holy priesthood at various times by God, but it was restricted from the general populace.

The Book of Mormon reports that Nephite prophets held the priesthood called after the order of the Son of God, the Melchizedek Priesthood (Alma 13:10). Those who had the authority directed the work of God among the people (Alma 29:13).

The apostles were given the Melchizedek Priesthood by Jesus Christ while he ministered on earth. He gave them authority and responsibility to direct his Church. After Christ left, the apostles continued to officiate for him and conferred the Melchizedek Priesthood on others when it was appropriate (Eph. 4:11–13; Acts 1:22–26; see also ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH IN NEW TESTAMENT TIMES). Over time, both the principles and the priesthood authority and keys were lost through APOSTASY.

MODERN HISTORY OF THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD. The Melchizedek Priesthood was given to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery (see below). As directed, they ordained one another first and second elders of the Church on April 6, 1830 (see ELDER). In turn, they conferred the priesthood upon, ordained, and set apart others to offices and callings in the priesthood (see ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH, 1830). The first bishop was ordained in 1831 to care for the poor and needy and to govern the temporal affairs of the Church. On June 3, 1831, Joseph Smith directed more than twenty men to be ordained to the "high priesthood," as the president of this high priesthood. High priest councils governed the Church until 1834.

In 1835 the Church structure was adjusted to accommodate the additional revelation and increased numbers; PRIESTHOOD QUORUMS made up of men ordained to particular offices were in operation (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTION 107). Three PRESIDING HIGH PRIESTS were established as the quorum of the FIRST PRESIDENCY. The Quorum of the Twelve Apostles was a traveling high council directed by the First Presidency. The Seventy were to travel internationally to preach. Stake high councils were established to govern within their stakes, and bishops cared for the temporal concerns of the Church.

It was necessary for additional Melchizedek Priesthood keys to be restored to carry out the higher temple ordinances. Messengers from God brought these keys and instructions on April 3, 1836 (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTION 110).

On July 12, 1843, Joseph Smith recorded the revelation concerning eternal marriage relationships, wherein Christ said he would "give unto thee the law of my Holy Priesthood, as was ordained by me and my Father before the world was" (D&C 132:28). He conferred upon Joseph "the keys and power of the priesthood" (D&C 132:45; see also PATRIARCHAL ORDER OF THE PRIESTHOOD).

The First Presidency presides over the Melchizedek Priesthood and directs the work of the Church. The Quorum of the Twelve Apostles shares this responsibility according to the keys given to the apostles. In turn, stake presidents supervise the wards and branches of the Church by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood and the specific keys given them.

All men who have the Melchizedek Priesthood are members of a priesthood quorum. These quorums are established within geographic boundaries and are made up of a group of men who hold the same office in the priesthood or who are of the same age group and may come to hold that office. Quorums administer the work of the Church assigned to them, train members in their priesthood responsibility, and provide opportunities for service and brotherhood for those working toward common goals.

In each stake there is one high priests quorum. The stake president and his counselors serve as the quorum presidency. A high priests group functions in each ward, presided over by a group leader, one or more assistants, and a secretary. An elders quorum, presided over by a president, two counselors, and a secretary, is organized in every ward and independent branch. The stake presidency and high counselors oversee all Melchizedek Priesthood quorum activities in the stake.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Backman, Milton V., Jr. The Heavens Resound: A History of the Latter-day Saints in Ohio 1830-1838, pp. 237-56. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- Critchlow, William J., Jr. "Priesthood—Asset or Liability?" IE 66 (Dec. 1963):1067-69.
- Hartley, William G. "The Priesthood Reform Movement, 1908-1922." BYU Studies 13 (Winter 1973):137-56.
- Kimball, Spencer W., et al. Priesthood. Salt Lake City, 1981.
- Smith, Joseph F. GD, pp. 136-200.
- Widtsoe, John A. Priesthood and Church Government, rev. ed. Salt Lake City, 1954.

JAE R. BALLIF

RESTORATION OF MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD

To act for God in organizing his Church and administering all the ordinances, Joseph SMITH received the Melchizedek Priesthood in the divinely established way. Authority and responsibility for specific assignments are essential (D&C 18:9, 27-32, 35-37; 27:12; see KEYS). In addition, Joseph Smith and others received and taught the significance of each ordinance and key. Since no one on earth possessed that authority at the time, the Prophet Joseph Smith and his associate Oliver COWDERY received both instruction and ordination from God and from his messengers.

The Prophet and Oliver Cowdery received the Aaronic Priesthood on May 15, 1829, under the hands of John the Baptist. He informed them that he acted under the direction of Peter, James, and John, who held the keys of the Melchizedek Priesthood, and that that priesthood would be given to them (JS—H 1:72). Although the precise date of this restoration is not known, it is certain that it occurred after May 15, 1829, and before August 1830 (D&C 27:12). The documents available and the date of the formal organization of the Church give support to a time of restoration before April 6, 1830. Many students have concluded that late May or early June 1829 is the most probable time frame (HC 1:40n–42n; Porter, pp. 5–10).

Restoration of the Melchizedek Priesthood, by R. M. Hadi Pranato (1985, Indonesia, dyed fabric batik, 55" × 31"). This batik by LDS artist R. M. Hadi Pranato of Indonesia portrays Peter, James, and John appearing to the Prophet Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery to restore the Melchizedek Priesthood. Church Museum of History and Art.

Sometime before June 14, 1829, the Lord instructed Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery concerning their ordination as ELDERS, which is a Melchizedek Priesthood office (HC 1:60–61). Furthermore, when Peter, James, and John appeared to Joseph and Oliver, they ordained them also as apostles (D&C 27:12) and committed to them “the keys of the kingdom, and of the dispensation of the fulness of times” (D&C 128:20; cf. 27:13).

Several records document the occurrence and significance of this visitation. An early confirmation of the receipt of apostolic powers is evidenced in an 1829 revelation recorded in the hand of Oliver Cowdery in which the Lord stated, “I command all men every where to repent & I speak unto you even as unto Paul mine apostle for ye are called even with that same calling with which he was called” (Cowdery, 1829; cf. D&C 18:9). In his 1832 history of the Church the Prophet Joseph Smith declared that he had received “the holy Priesthood by the ministering Angels to administer the letter of the Gospel” and that he had been given “a confirmation and reception of the high Priesthood after the holy order of the son of the living God power and ordinance from on high to preach the Gospel in the administration and demonstration of the spirit the Keys of the Kingdom of God conferred upon him and the continuation of the blessings of God to him” (Jessee, p. 3).

Oliver Cowdery on many occasions bore witness that he “was present with Joseph when an holy angel from God came down from heaven and conferred, or restored, the Aaronic Priesthood and . . . was also present with Joseph when the Melchizedek Priesthood was conferred on each other, by the will and commandment of God” (Anderson, p. 22).

Joseph Smith said that Peter, James, and John made their visit “in the wilderness between Harmony, Susquehanna county, and Colesville, Broome county, on the Susquehanna river” (D&C 128:20).

On April 3, 1836, Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery knelt in prayer in the KIRTLAND TEMPLE and received another profoundly important vision in which certain Melchizedek Priesthood keys were restored. MOSES appeared and committed the keys of the gathering of Israel. ELIAS gave to them keys of the DISPENSATION of the gospel of Abraham. Finally, ELIJAH stood before them as promised by MALACHI and MORONI and bestowed the keys of SEALING families together (D&C 110:11–16; 2:1–3).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard L. “The Second Witness of Priesthood Restoration.” IE 71 (Sept. 1968):15–24.
- Barney, Ronald O. “Priesthood Restoration Narratives in the Early LDS Church.” Planned for BYU Studies 31 (Summer 1991).
- Bushman, Richard L. Joseph Smith and the Beginnings of Mormonism. Urbana, Ill., 1984.

Cowdery, Oliver. "Written in the year of our Lord & Savior 1829—A true copy of the articles of the Church of Christ." Ms. 1829. LDS Church Archives. Ms. in handwriting of Oliver Cowdery.

Hartley, William G. "Upon You My Fellow Servants: Restoration of the Priesthood." In The Prophet Joseph: Essays on the Life and Mission of Joseph Smith, ed. Larry C. Porter and Susan Easton Black, pp. 49–72. Salt Lake City, 1988.

Jessee, Dean C., ed. The Papers of Joseph Smith, Vol. 1. Salt Lake City, 1989.

Porter, Larry C. "Dating the Restoration of the Melchizedek Priesthood." Ensign 9 (June 1979):5–10.

JAE R. BALLIF

---

MEMBERSHIP

Membership in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is a fulfilling, lifelong undertaking. It begins with the ordinance of BAPTISM, which represents a COVENANT made between the convert and God. By this act, the convert promises to follow Jesus Christ and keep all his commandments in love and righteousness. God, in return, promises the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST and the opportunity for ETERNAL LIFE. A newly baptized individual is confirmed a member of the Church by the LAYING ON OF HANDS by a MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD holder, who also blesses the new member with the gift of the Holy Ghost. This is a gift of spiritual discernment to help and sustain members as they attempt to live Christlike lives.

Figuratively, membership means becoming a member of the body of Christ: Each member is an essential part of the whole, just as the foot, the hand, or the eye is an integral part of the body. Each member serves different purposes and has individual gifts, but each is necessary, and if one suffers, "all the members suffer with it"; they are "many members, yet but one body" (1 Cor. 12:20).

The purpose of such membership is to facilitate fulfillment of one's baptismal covenant and to promote personal and spiritual growth unto the "perfecting of the saints, . . . for the edifying of the body of Christ" (Eph. 4:12). To this end, members participate in many religious activities. These include personal activities (such as prayer, fasting, scripture study, payment of tithing and other offerings; observing wholesome behavioral standards regarding sexual and moral conduct; observing the health principles of the WORD OF WISDOM); family endeavors (such as family prayer and FAMILY HOME EVENING); congregational and community functions (such as attending Sunday meetings, especially SACRAMENT MEETING, where members may partake of the sacrament); and serving faithfully in various CALLINGS (such as acting as a teacher, a clerk, or a musician). Members are encouraged to participate in various welfare projects designed to provide goods and services to needy people. Activity in the Church is considered both a privilege and a duty of membership.

Another important characteristic of membership is proclaiming the gospel (McKay, p. 479). Members fulfill this responsibility in several ways: by serving full-time missions and financially supporting missionaries; by donating several hours per week proselytizing in their own locale as stake or ward missionaries; and by sharing their religion both by word and way of life as opportunities arise during informal daily interactions with others.

Members are also responsible for gathering the names of their ancestors and performing ordinances in the TEMPLE on behalf of those who did not receive them while alive. Once converts have been members for at least a year and have met certain standards of worthiness, they can enter the temple and receive these ordinances personally and thereafter can receive them as proxies for deceased persons.

Membership in the Church is highly valued by Latter-day Saints. It figures prominently in the self-image of faithful members who willingly consecrate and donate as needed of their time, talents, and blessings from God to the building up of the Church of Jesus Christ on this earth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McKay, David O. "Closing Address." IE 62 (June 1959):479.

LINDA A. CHARNEY

---

MEMBERSHIP RECORDS

When the Church was organized in 1830, Joseph SMITH was instructed "that a regular list of all the names of the whole church . . . be kept" (D&C 20:82). This revelation was in harmony with other scriptures (cf. Ex. 28:9–12; Num. 1:2; Phil. 4:3; Mosiah 6:1; 26:36; Alma 5:58). Accordingly, each congregation (WARD and BRANCH) kept records thereafter containing the names of all members in Cowdery, Oliver. "Written in the year of our Lord & Savior 1829—A true copy of the articles of the Church of Christ." Ms. 1829. LDS Church Archives. Ms. in handwriting of Oliver Cowdery.

Hartley, William G. "Upon You My Fellow Servants: Restoration of the Priesthood." In The Prophet Joseph: Essays on the Life and Mission of Joseph Smith, ed. Larry C. Porter and Susan Easton Black, pp. 49–72. Salt Lake City, 1988.

Jessee, Dean C., ed. The Papers of Joseph Smith, Vol. 1. Salt Lake City, 1989.

Porter, Larry C. "Dating the Restoration of the Melchizedek Priesthood." Ensign 9 (June 1979):5–10.

JAE R. BALLIF

---

MEMBERSHIP

Membership in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is a fulfilling, lifelong undertaking. It begins with the ordinance of BAPTISM, which represents a COVENANT made between the convert and God. By this act, the convert promises to follow Jesus Christ and keep all his commandments in love and righteousness. God, in return, promises the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST and the opportunity for ETERNAL LIFE. A newly baptized individual is confirmed a member of the Church by the LAYING ON OF HANDS by a MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD holder, who also blesses the new member with the gift of the Holy Ghost. This is a gift of spiritual discernment to help and sustain members as they attempt to live Christlike lives.

Figuratively, membership means becoming a member of the body of Christ: Each member is an essential part of the whole, just as the foot, the hand, or the eye is an integral part of the body. Each member serves different purposes and has individual gifts, but each is necessary, and if one suffers, "all the members suffer with it"; they are "many members, yet but one body" (1 Cor. 12:20).

The purpose of such membership is to facilitate fulfillment of one's baptismal covenant and to promote personal and spiritual growth unto the "perfecting of the saints, . . . for the edifying of the body of Christ" (Eph. 4:12). To this end, members participate in many religious activities. These include personal activities (such as prayer, fasting, scripture study, payment of tithing and other offerings; observing wholesome behavioral standards regarding sexual and moral conduct; observing the health principles of the WORD OF WISDOM); family endeavors (such as family prayer and FAMILY HOME EVENING); congregational and community functions (such as attending Sunday meetings, especially SACRAMENT MEETING, where members may partake of the sacrament); and serving faithfully in various CALLINGS (such as acting as a teacher, a clerk, or a musician). Members are encouraged to participate in various welfare projects designed to provide goods and services to needy people. Activity in the Church is considered both a privilege and a duty of membership.

Another important characteristic of membership is proclaiming the gospel (McKay, p. 479). Members fulfill this responsibility in several ways: by serving full-time missions and financially supporting missionaries; by donating several hours per week proselytizing in their own locale as stake or ward missionaries; and by sharing their religion both by word and way of life as opportunities arise during informal daily interactions with others.

Members are also responsible for gathering the names of their ancestors and performing ordinances in the TEMPLE on behalf of those who did not receive them while alive. Once converts have been members for at least a year and have met certain standards of worthiness, they can enter the temple and receive these ordinances personally and thereafter can receive them as proxies for deceased persons.

Membership in the Church is highly valued by Latter-day Saints. It figures prominently in the self-image of faithful members who willingly consecrate and donate as needed of their time, talents, and blessings from God to the building up of the Church of Jesus Christ on this earth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McKay, David O. "Closing Address." IE 62 (June 1959):479.

LINDA A. CHARNEY

---

MEMBERSHIP RECORDS

When the Church was organized in 1830, Joseph SMITH was instructed "that a regular list of all the names of the whole church . . . be kept" (D&C 20:82). This revelation was in harmony with other scriptures (cf. Ex. 28:9–12; Num. 1:2; Phil. 4:3; Mosiah 6:1; 26:36; Alma 5:58). Accordingly, each congregation (WARD and BRANCH) kept records thereafter containing the names of all members in

Cowdery, Oliver. "Written in the year of our Lord & Savior 1829—A true copy of the articles of the Church of Christ." Ms. 1829. LDS Church Archives. Ms. in handwriting of Oliver Cowdery.

Hartley, William G. "Upon You My Fellow Servants: Restoration of the Priesthood." In The Prophet Joseph: Essays on the Life and Mission of Joseph Smith, ed. Larry C. Porter and Susan Easton Black, pp. 49–72. Salt Lake City, 1988.

Jessee, Dean C., ed. The Papers of Joseph Smith, Vol. 1. Salt Lake City, 1989.

Porter, Larry C. "Dating the Restoration of the Melchizedek Priesthood." Ensign 9 (June 1979):5–10.

JAE R. BALLIF

---

MEMBERSHIP

Membership in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is a fulfilling, lifelong undertaking. It begins with the ordinance of BAPTISM, which represents a COVENANT made between the convert and God. By this act, the convert promises to follow Jesus Christ and keep all his commandments in love and righteousness. God, in return, promises the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST and the opportunity for ETERNAL LIFE. A newly baptized individual is confirmed a member of the Church by the LAYING ON OF HANDS by a MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD holder, who also blesses the new member with the gift of the Holy Ghost. This is a gift of spiritual discernment to help and sustain members as they attempt to live Christlike lives.

Figuratively, membership means becoming a member of the body of Christ: Each member is an essential part of the whole, just as the foot, the hand, or the eye is an integral part of the body. Each member serves different purposes and has individual gifts, but each is necessary, and if one suffers, "all the members suffer with it"; they are "many members, yet but one body" (1 Cor. 12:20).

The purpose of such membership is to facilitate fulfillment of one's baptismal covenant and to promote personal and spiritual growth unto the "perfecting of the saints, . . . for the edifying of the body of Christ" (Eph. 4:12). To this end, members participate in many religious activities. These include personal activities (such as prayer, fasting, scripture study, payment of tithing and other offerings; observing wholesome behavioral standards regarding sexual and moral conduct; observing the health principles of the WORD OF WISDOM); family endeavors (such as family prayer and FAMILY HOME EVENING); congregational and community functions (such as attending Sunday meetings, especially SACRAMENT MEETING, where members may partake of the sacrament); and serving faithfully in various CALLINGS (such as acting as a teacher, a clerk, or a musician). Members are encouraged to participate in various welfare projects designed to provide goods and services to needy people. Activity in the Church is considered both a privilege and a duty of membership.

Another important characteristic of membership is proclaiming the gospel (McKay, p. 479). Members fulfill this responsibility in several ways: by serving full-time missions and financially supporting missionaries; by donating several hours per week proselytizing in their own locale as stake or ward missionaries; and by sharing their religion both by word and way of life as opportunities arise during informal daily interactions with others.

Members are also responsible for gathering the names of their ancestors and performing ordinances in the TEMPLE on behalf of those who did not receive them while alive. Once converts have been members for at least a year and have met certain standards of worthiness, they can enter the temple and receive these ordinances personally and thereafter can receive them as proxies for deceased persons.

Membership in the Church is highly valued by Latter-day Saints. It figures prominently in the self-image of faithful members who willingly consecrate and donate as needed of their time, talents, and blessings from God to the building up of the Church of Jesus Christ on this earth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McKay, David O. "Closing Address." IE 62 (June 1959):479.

LINDA A. CHARNEY

---

MEMBERSHIP RECORDS

When the Church was organized in 1830, Joseph SMITH was instructed "that a regular list of all the names of the whole church . . . be kept" (D&C 20:82). This revelation was in harmony with other scriptures (cf. Ex. 28:9–12; Num. 1:2; Phil. 4:3; Mosiah 6:1; 26:36; Alma 5:58). Accordingly, each congregation (WARD and BRANCH) kept records thereafter containing the names of all members in the congregation and all blessings, baptisms, confirmations, ordinations, marriages, excommunications, and deaths. Through the years, the Church used several successive ways to keep track of membership information prior to the present electronic automated system. Many improvements have been made in the automated records system, and with rapid growth, reaching more than 7 million members by 1990, the Church is studying ways to reduce and simplify the amount of information being kept. Information concerning Church ordinances (baptism, confirmation, priesthood ordination, etc.) is so important that if the record is lost, the ordinances must be performed again.

In the 1800s, the presiding officer of a congregation would give members who were moving a letter to take to the presiding officer in the new congregation who would then enter that information in his own record book of members. In 1906 the Church formalized the procedure for transferring membership records as members moved from one congregation to another by having the presiding officer send a certificate of membership to the new congregation via the office of the Presiding Bishopric, even though at that time no duplicate or "master" record was kept at central Church offices. There were, however, member censuses taken approximately every five years to update records between 1914 and 1950.

In 1941, membership books were replaced by individual membership record cards, and duplicate records were created for each member. One copy was retained by the congregation, and the other was sent to the Church's master file in Salt Lake City. (Church membership at the time was approximately 890,000.) Each time a baptism, ordination, endowment, or marriage took place, it was recorded on the membership record in the local congregation. All changes were sent to Salt Lake City once a year. When members moved, their membership records were routed through the office of the Presiding Bishopric, and the new address was added to the master record.

The Church conducted a worldwide audit of membership records during 1969 as a forerunner to converting to an automated membership system, which was completed in the United States and Canada in 1975. The Church began decentralization of records that year. The records of all members living outside of the United States and Canada were sent to one of six area offices in which automation began in 1985. All international areas, except Samoa, were using automated systems in 1990. Master records are housed in thirty-five regional offices around the world.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Membership Records Handbook*. Salt Lake City, 1990.
Widtsoe, John A. Priesthood and Church Government. Salt Lake City, 1939, rev. ed., 1980.

THOMAS E. BROWN

MEN, ROLES OF

For men in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the ideal example of manhood is Jesus Christ, the Savior of all mankind. There is no substitute. All men must transcend cultural biases and variations when they decide to pattern themselves after the Son of God, who is the complete representative of the Father. LDS men ideally strive to follow Christ by serving family and fellowbeings through love, work, PRIESTHOOD callings, instruction, and example.

The scriptures and the prophets make it clear to Latter-day Saints what the Savior expects of a man. To the Nephites he plainly stated, "For that which ye have seen me do even that shall ye do. . . . Therefore, what manner of men ought ye to be? Verily I say unto you, even as I am" (3 Ne. 27:21, 27). King Benjamin, tutored by an angel, the congregation and all blessings, baptisms, confirmations, ordinations, marriages, excommunications, and deaths. Through the years, the Church used several successive ways to keep track of membership information prior to the present electronic automated system. Many improvements have been made in the automated records system, and with rapid growth, reaching more than 7 million members by 1990, the Church is studying ways to reduce and simplify the amount of information being kept. Information concerning Church ordinances (baptism, confirmation, priesthood ordination, etc.) is so important that if the record is lost, the ordinances must be performed again.

This membership record from 1856 certifies that Eliza C. Binder, from London, is a member of the Church in good standing. Today membership records preserve vital statistics, including dates of baptism, ordinations, and other ordinances.

In the 1800s, the presiding officer of a congregation would give members who were moving a letter to take to the presiding officer in the new congregation who would then enter that information in his own record book of members. In 1906 the Church formalized the procedure for transferring membership records as members moved from one congregation to another by having the presiding officer send a certificate of membership to the new congregation via the office of the Presiding Bishopric, even though at that time no duplicate or "master" record was kept at central Church offices. There were, however, member censuses taken approximately every five years to update records between 1914 and 1950.

In 1941, membership books were replaced by individual membership record cards, and duplicate records were created for each member. One

copy was retained by the congregation, and the other was sent to the Church's master file in Salt Lake City. (Church membership at the time was approximately 890,000.) Each time a baptism, ordination, endowment, or marriage took place, it was recorded on the membership record in the local congregation. All changes were sent to Salt Lake City once a year. When members moved, their membership records were routed through the office of the Presiding Bishopric, and the new address was added to the master record.

The Church conducted a worldwide audit of membership records during 1969 as a forerunner to converting to an automated membership system, which was completed in the United States and Canada in 1975. The Church began decentralization of records that year. The records of all members living outside of the United States and Canada were sent to one of six area offices in which automation began in 1985. All international areas, except Samoa, were using automated systems in 1990. Master records are housed in thirty-five regional offices around the world.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Membership Records Handbook*. Salt Lake City, 1990.
Widtsoe, John A. Priesthood and Church Government. Salt Lake City, 1939, rev. ed., 1980.

THOMAS E. BROWN

MEN, ROLES OF

For men in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the ideal example of manhood is Jesus Christ, the Savior of all mankind. There is no substitute. All men must transcend cultural biases and variations when they decide to pattern themselves after the Son of God, who is the complete representative of the Father. LDS men ideally strive to follow Christ by serving family and fellowbeings through love, work, PRIESTHOOD callings, instruction, and example.

The scriptures and the prophets make it clear to Latter-day Saints what the Savior expects of a man. To the Nephites he plainly stated, "For that which ye have seen me do even that shall ye do. . . . Therefore, what manner of men ought ye to be? Verily I say unto you, even as I am" (3 Ne. 27:21, 27). King Benjamin, tutored by an angel, described what has become a characterization of the challenges and potentials of manhood:

This membership record from 1856 certifies that Eliza C. Binder, from London, is a member of the Church in good standing. Today membership records preserve vital statistics, including dates of baptism, ordinations, and other ordinances.

For the natural man is an enemy to God, and has been from the fall of Adam, and will be, forever and ever, unless he yields to the enticings of the Holy Spirit, and putteth off the natural man and becometh a saint through the atonement of Christ the Lord, and becometh as a child, submissive, meek, humble, patient, full of love, willing to submit to all things which the Lord seeth fit to inflict upon him, even as a child doth submit to his father [Mosiah 3:19].

PAUL taught about manliness by addressing the husband's role: "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it. . . . So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies" (Eph. 5:25, 28). President Brigham YOUNG often expounded on this theme: "Let the father be the head of the family, the master of his own household. And let him treat [the sisters] as an angel would treat them" (JD 4:55). "Set that example before your wives and your children, before your neighbors and this people, that you can say: Follow me, as I follow Christ" (JD 15:229). "I exhort you, masters, fathers, and husbands, to be affectionate and kind to those you preside over" (JD 1:69).

Husbands and fathers are expected to emulate the love of the Savior by teaching, serving, and ministering to their families. It is the man's role to engender and nurture life in benevolent partnership with his wife. It is not the man's role to serve his own selfish interests, declining to marry and to create a family. Obviously, he cannot fulfill his proper role without a loyal wife who is likewise true to her covenants with God.

By ordination to the priesthood, LDS men covenant to magnify their callings and to so live that, after sufficient diligent service to Christ's work, "all that my Father hath shall be given unto [them]" (D&C 84:38; see also OATH AND COVENANT OF THE PRIESTHOOD). To receive all that the Father has is to be endowed with the power, knowledge, blessings, and loving responsibilities of eternal fatherhood. With this power, however, comes a sacred obligation to act in love as the Heavenly Father does, never in selfishness or lust.

The duty of men is to acquire knowledge and love so that everything they do is right and true, patterned after Jesus Christ, for "this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent" (John 17:3). The Prophet Joseph SMITH taught, "Here, then, is eternal life—to know the only wise and true God; and you have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves . . . namely, by going from one small degree to another, and from a small capacity to a great one; from grace to grace" (TPJS, pp. 346–47).

By serving according to the principles of the priesthood, each man should learn how to conduct himself like the Savior, who learned from his Father, for "no power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood, only by persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned; by kindness, and pure knowledge, which shall greatly enlarge the soul without hypocrisy, and without guile" (D&C 121:41–42). It is a general responsibility of all men in the Church to serve as HOME TEACHERS; in addition, each will usually hold another calling, such as an Aaronic Priesthood quorum adviser, a scoutmaster or eulmaster, a Sunday School or Primary teacher, an athletic director, musician, activities chairman, clerk, bishop, stake president, or General Authority (see PRIESTHOOD OFFICES).

As it is God's work and glory "to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man" (Moses 1:39), so it is the responsibility of men to work while in mortality to help other people progress toward eternal life. Work in its broadest sense becomes a mark of a true man: A man is responsible for seeing that he and his family have sufficient means to live and to develop their talents. He is expected to labor to make the place where he and they live as comfortable as possible. He is also to work to bring spiritual order to the household through family prayer, father's blessings, and gospel study, teaching his children that life's proper priorities are gospel centered. He is taught to pray for, and bless, his family members. He shows them by example how to treat a wife—and women in general and children—with utmost respect (cf. Eph. 5:25; 6:4; D&C 42:22; 75:28). The Church encourages husbands to make every possible effort to keep their families intact and, should divorce occur, to strive to influence their children for good and to pay appropriate respect to their mothers, both to make the best of a difficult situation in this life and to prepare for adjustments in the next.

LDS men are exhorted by their leaders to become strong yet mild, to be ambitious to serve yet selfless in order to add to another's eternal growth, and to measure their success by how they nurture others and how they teach and make possible the progress and growth of others rather than use others to feed their own needs. Men, in other words, are expected to become Christlike natural PATRIARCHS, as exemplified by the Father and by the Son, devoid of harshness, domination, or selfishness.

[See also Brotherhood; Fatherhood; Lay Participation and Leadership; Lifestyle; Marriage; Priesthood Quorums; Young Men.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hinckley, Gordon B. "What Will the Church Do for You, a Man?" Ensign 2 (July 1972):71-73.

VICTOR L. BROWN, JR.

---

MENTAL HEALTH

Recognizing the need for mental health services, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, like other religious organizations, supports a network of agencies through LDS SOCIAL SERVICES that provides short-term care as needed and offers referral services when more extensive treatment is required. The Church endorses the work of licensed mental health practitioners provided that the suggestions and treatment offered are consistent with Church moral and lifestyle expectations.

Historically some critics have ascribed various mental afflictions of members to the influence of the Church. Today the assertion is sometimes made that as a result of their religion Latter-day Saints have high rates of divorce, drug abuse, depression, and suicide. This is not surprising, since stereotypes are frequently applied to new and different leaders and their followers. Virtually identical defects have been attributed to Jews, Native Americans, Roman Catholics, the Irish, and other groups (Bunker and Bitton; Bromley and Shupe). Research findings, however, show no evidence of unusual mental or social problems among Latter-day Saints.

National statistics show that the state of Utah, which is 70 percent LDS, has lower rates of mental and addictive disorders than U.S. averages. A National Institute of Mental Health report for 1986 ranked Utah as the second-lowest U.S. state in new inpatient admissions to state mental hospitals as a proportion of population. The National Association of State Mental Health Program Directors report for 1986 showed Utah's rate of outpatient mental cases per million population to be lower than that of thirty-six other states. These reports also show lower-than-average rates for alcohol and drug abuse, a finding confirmed in Utah in Demographic Perspective (1986). This report indicates that Utah ranks lowest of all the states in per capita alcohol consumption, and thirty-fifth in alcoholics per 100,000 population. Drug use among adolescents is low compared with national statistics. The overall mortality rate for suicide is slightly above the national average, but slightly below the average for the Rocky Mountain states.

Comparisons of LDS students at Brigham Young University with students at other schools on standard psychological measures, such as the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory, show more similarities than differences. On accepted indices of mental health, BYU students rank normal. Studies of divorce rates in Utah show that those counties with the highest proportions of LDS have the lowest divorce rates and are significantly below national averages. Studies of depression among BYU students and returned missionaries reveal average or lower levels.

Studies of depression among women in three Utah urban areas show LDS women to be no more or less depressed than their non-Mormon counterparts. For example, using the Beck Depression Inventory, a study of women in the Salt Lake Valley found no differences between LDS women and others (Spendlove, West, and Stanish). Women who were more active in the LDS Church were found to be less depressed than those who were less active, but causal connections to Church activity were inconclusive. Educational level appeared a better predictor of depression scores than religious affiliation: The more educated were less depressed. Responses to a national questionnaire indicated LDS women to be in the middle range on depression when compared with other groups. LDS men had the lowest depression scores of any group (Bergin and Cornwall).

Overall, on average, Latter-day Saints as a group are psychologically normal. They do not manifest unusual rates or kinds of mental disorders, and they do not differ much from national normative samples. In some studies they show less illness, but results may be questioned because of the nature of the population sampled. Statistics for growth, and to measure their success by how they nurture others and how they teach and make possible the progress and growth of others rather than use others to feed their own needs. Men, in other words, are expected to become Christlike natural PATRIARCHS, as exemplified by the Father and by the Son, devoid of harshness, domination, or selfishness.

[See also Brotherhood; Fatherhood; Lay Participation and Leadership; Lifestyle; Marriage; Priesthood Quorums; Young Men.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hinckley, Gordon B. "What Will the Church Do for You, a Man?" Ensign 2 (July 1972):71-73.

VICTOR L. BROWN, JR.

---

MENTAL HEALTH

Recognizing the need for mental health services, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, like other religious organizations, supports a network of agencies through LDS SOCIAL SERVICES that provides short-term care as needed and offers referral services when more extensive treatment is required. The Church endorses the work of licensed mental health practitioners provided that the suggestions and treatment offered are consistent with Church moral and lifestyle expectations.

Historically some critics have ascribed various mental afflictions of members to the influence of the Church. Today the assertion is sometimes made that as a result of their religion Latter-day Saints have high rates of divorce, drug abuse, depression, and suicide. This is not surprising, since stereotypes are frequently applied to new and different leaders and their followers. Virtually identical defects have been attributed to Jews, Native Americans, Roman Catholics, the Irish, and other groups (Bunker and Bitton; Bromley and Shupe). Research findings, however, show no evidence of unusual mental or social problems among Latter-day Saints.

National statistics show that the state of Utah, which is 70 percent LDS, has lower rates of mental and addictive disorders than U.S. averages. A National Institute of Mental Health report for 1986 ranked Utah as the second-lowest U.S. state in new inpatient admissions to state mental hospitals

as a proportion of population. The National Association of State Mental Health Program Directors report for 1986 showed Utah's rate of outpatient mental cases per million population to be lower than that of thirty-six other states. These reports also show lower-than-average rates for alcohol and drug abuse, a finding confirmed in Utah in Demographic Perspective (1986). This report indicates that Utah ranks lowest of all the states in per capita alcohol consumption, and thirty-fifth in alcoholics per 100,000 population. Drug use among adolescents is low compared with national statistics. The overall mortality rate for suicide is slightly above the national average, but slightly below the average for the Rocky Mountain states.

Comparisons of LDS students at Brigham Young University with students at other schools on standard psychological measures, such as the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory, show more similarities than differences. On accepted indices of mental health, BYU students rank normal. Studies of divorce rates in Utah show that those counties with the highest proportions of LDS have the lowest divorce rates and are significantly below national averages. Studies of depression among BYU students and returned missionaries reveal average or lower levels.

Studies of depression among women in three Utah urban areas show LDS women to be no more or less depressed than their non-Mormon counterparts. For example, using the Beck Depression Inventory, a study of women in the Salt Lake Valley found no differences between LDS women and others (Spendlove, West, and Stanish). Women who were more active in the LDS Church were found to be less depressed than those who were less active, but causal connections to Church activity were inconclusive. Educational level appeared a better predictor of depression scores than religious affiliation: The more educated were less depressed. Responses to a national questionnaire indicated LDS women to be in the middle range on depression when compared with other groups. LDS men had the lowest depression scores of any group (Bergin and Cornwall).

Overall, on average, Latter-day Saints as a group are psychologically normal. They do not manifest unusual rates or kinds of mental disorders, and they do not differ much from national normative samples. In some studies they show less illness, but results may be questioned because of the nature of the population sampled. Statistics for the state of Utah often look better than the national average because of the state's lack of large minority and poverty populations. Other states with similar demographics, such as Wyoming, Idaho, and the Dakotas, manifest similar statistical advantages.

For mainstream, middle class people, denominational affiliation is less relevant to variations in mental health than are such factors as family background, educational level, economic class, marital status, and intrinsic versus extrinsic religious orientation. General findings obscure considerable individual variation because there are diverse ways of being religious. "Intrinsically" religious persons, who hold to personal convictions and do not depend on religion as a crutch, manifest better mental health than the "extrinsically" religious, those who focus on the external trappings of a religious or "righteous" social image. Such variation occurs among Latter-day Saints, as it does among other groups. Thus, the relation between religiosity and pathology is complex. How specific denominations enhance or undermine mental functioning is currently a matter of speculation and controversy.

The LDS culture and lifestyle manifest an interesting combination of possible positive and negative influences for mental functioning. These may cancel each other and create a normal average profile. Some possible negatives include tendencies toward perfectionism and the self-negation that inevitably accompany failure to match unreasonably high expectations. Negative emotions are not readily expressed, and thus conflicts are often difficult to resolve. LDS subcultures are very "group-oriented." Numerous organizations and activities define and reinforce the lifestyle. People "out of step" are easily recognized, and conformity is valued. Individuality and personal self-expression may be inhibited to a degree, while obedience to authority is encouraged.

In theory, these negatives may be balanced by the warmth and social support provided by a cohesive and caring social network, marked by high emphasis on family commitment and active participation in a diverse system of social, religious, athletic, and cultural activities. While members may despair over having "too much to do," they can always find sympathetic peers. Hope is engendered by a positive philosophy of human nature and the eternal potential of human beings.

LDS philosophy is growth-oriented, so there is constant encouragement toward self-improvement. Problems occur when there is not enough tolerance for human imperfection in the process. When virtues like self-sacrifice, self-control, and hard work are overdone, they can take a toll, but when balanced with honest self-reflection and mutual support, they can be a stimulus for growth.

In establishing itself as an institutional partner in human civilization, the Church has manifested some growth pains. Insecurities that have accompanied being part of a new group are slowly giving way to the securities associated with having arrived as an established entity in the joint enterprise of cultural evolution. As this process has continued, these stresses have given way to a balanced subculture comparable to other mainstream groups.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bergin, Allen E., and Marie Cornwall. "Religion and Mental Health: Mormons and Other Groups." Annual Meeting of the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Bromley, David G., and Anson Shupe. "Public Reaction Against New Religious Groups." In Cults and New Religious Movements, ed. M. Galanter. Washington, D.C., 1989.
- Bunker, Gary L., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Graphic Image, 1834-1914. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- Martin, Thomas K.; Tim B. Heaton; and Stephen J. Bahr, eds. Utah in Demographic Perspective. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- National Institute of Mental Health. Additions and Resident Patients at End of Year 1986. Rockville, Md., 1988.
- Spendlove, David; Dee West; and William Stanish. "Risk Factors and the Prevalence of Depression in Mormon Women." Social Science and Medicine 18 (1984):491-95.
- State Mental Health Program Indicators-1986*. Alexandria, Va., 1989.

ALLEN E. BERGIN

---

MERCY

See: Justice and Mercy

---

MERCY KILLING

See: Death and Dying; Murder; Prolonging Life

---

MERIDIAN OF TIME

The meridian of time has been defined by one LDS apostle as "the middle or high point of that portion of eternity which is considered to be mortal time" (MD, 1966, p. 486). It is the dis-

the state of Utah often look better than the national average because of the state's lack of large minority and poverty populations. Other states with similar demographics, such as Wyoming, Idaho, and the Dakotas, manifest similar statistical advantages.

For mainstream, middle class people, denominational affiliation is less relevant to variations in mental health than are such factors as family background, educational level, economic class, marital status, and intrinsic versus extrinsic religious orientation. General findings obscure considerable individual variation because there are diverse ways of being religious. "Intrinsically" religious persons, who hold to personal convictions and do not depend on religion as a crutch, manifest better mental health than the "extrinsically" religious, those who focus on the external trappings of a religious or "righteous" social image. Such variation occurs among Latter-day Saints, as it does among other groups. Thus, the relation between religiosity and pathology is complex. How specific denominations enhance or undermine mental functioning is currently a matter of speculation and controversy.

The LDS culture and lifestyle manifest an interesting combination of possible positive and negative influences for mental functioning. These may cancel each other and create a normal average profile. Some possible negatives include tendencies toward perfectionism and the self-negation that inevitably accompany failure to match unreasonably high expectations. Negative emotions are not readily expressed, and thus conflicts are often difficult to resolve. LDS subcultures are very "group-oriented." Numerous organizations and activities define and reinforce the lifestyle. People "out of step" are easily recognized, and conformity is valued. Individuality and personal self-expression may be inhibited to a degree, while obedience to authority is encouraged.

In theory, these negatives may be balanced by the warmth and social support provided by a cohesive and caring social network, marked by high emphasis on family commitment and active participation in a diverse system of social, religious, athletic, and cultural activities. While members may despair over having "too much to do," they can always find sympathetic peers. Hope is engendered by a positive philosophy of human nature and the eternal potential of human beings.

LDS philosophy is growth-oriented, so there is constant encouragement toward self-improvement. Problems occur when there is not enough tolerance for human imperfection in the process. When virtues like self-sacrifice, self-control, and hard work are overdone, they can take a toll, but when balanced with honest self-reflection and mutual support, they can be a stimulus for growth.

In establishing itself as an institutional partner in human civilization, the Church has manifested some growth pains. Insecurities that have accompanied being part of a new group are slowly giving way to the securities associated with having arrived as an established entity in the joint enterprise of cultural evolution. As this process has continued, these stresses have given way to a balanced subculture comparable to other mainstream groups.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bergin, Allen E., and Marie Cornwall. "Religion and Mental Health: Mormons and Other Groups." Annual Meeting of the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Bromley, David G., and Anson Shupe. "Public Reaction Against New Religious Groups." In Cults and New Religious Movements, ed. M. Galanter. Washington, D.C., 1989.
- Bunker, Gary L., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Graphic Image, 1834-1914. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- Martin, Thomas K.; Tim B. Heaton; and Stephen J. Bahr, eds. Utah in Demographic Perspective. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- National Institute of Mental Health. Additions and Resident Patients at End of Year 1986. Rockville, Md., 1988.
- Spendlove, David; Dee West; and William Stanish. "Risk Factors and the Prevalence of Depression in Mormon Women." Social Science and Medicine 18 (1984):491-95.
- State Mental Health Program Indicators-1986*. Alexandria, Va., 1989.

ALLEN E. BERGIN

---

MERCY

See: Justice and Mercy

---

MERCY KILLING

See: Death and Dying; Murder; Prolonging Life

---

MERIDIAN OF TIME

The meridian of time has been defined by one LDS apostle as "the middle or high point of that portion of eternity which is considered to be mortal time" (MD, 1966, p. 486). It is the dis-PENSATION in which Jesus Christ lived in mortality. The term does not occur in the Bible, but is found in the Doctrine and Covenants (20:26; 39:3) and in the book of Moses (5:57; 6:57, 62; 7:46).

The word “meridian” suggests the middle. According to Old Testament genealogies, from the FALL OF ADAM to the time of Jesus Christ was approximately 4,000 years. It has been nearly 2,000 years since Jesus’ birth. The millennial reign will commence “in the beginning of the seventh thousand years” (D&C 77:12). After the MILLENNIUM there will be a “little season,” the exact length of which is not revealed, but it could be several hundred years. In the context of these events, the Lord’s mortal ministry took place near the meridian, or middle, of mortal time (DS 1:81).

The meridian of time may also be seen as the high point of mortal time. Latter-day revelation shows that all of the ancient prophets looked forward to the Messiah’s coming (Jacob 4:4; Mosiah 13:33–35; 15:11). His coming fulfilled their prophecies, and he was prefigured in the LAW OF MOSES (Mosiah 13:29–32) and in ancient ceremonial ordinances (Moses 5:5–8). The meridian of time is the apex of all dispensations because of the birth, ministry, and atonement of Christ. Without him all prophetic writings and utterances would have had no efficacy, and the hopes of mankind today and forever would be but futile desires and yearnings without possibility of fulfillment.

MARSHALL T. BURTON

---

MESSENGER AND ADVOCATE

The Latter Day Saints’ Messenger and Advocate was published in Kirtland, Ohio, from October 1834 to September 1837—thirty-six sixteen-page, double-column issues. It succeeded the EVENING AND THE MORNING STAR. The name Messenger and Advocate described its purpose: to be the messenger and advocate of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, thus to help the Saints better understand its doctrines and principles. Main doctrinal contributions came from Joseph SMITH, Sidney RIGDON, Oliver COWDERY, W. W. Phelps, and John Whitmer. Other entries continued articles from the Star, a history of the Christian church, letters from missionaries, hymns, news of current Church events such as the building of the Kirtland

Temple and its dedicatory services, editorials, minutes of conferences, summaries of news of the day, marriages, notices, and obituaries.

The last issue of each annual volume contained an index of all twelve issues.

Oliver Cowdery edited the Messenger and Advocate from October 1834 to May 1835. He was succeeded by John Whitmer from June 1835 to March 1836, but returned as editor from April 1836 to January 1837. Thereafter, his brother Warren A. Cowdery served from February to September 1837, when publication ceased. Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were listed as publisher for the 1837 February and March issues. In April 1837 the printing office and contents were transferred to William Marks, who was then listed as the publisher.

When Warren A. Cowdery declined further publishing, the Messenger and Advocate noted that “a large body of the elders of the church of Latter Day Saints have united and rented the printing establishment” (3:571–72) to publish the Elders’ Journal of The Church of Latter Day Saints, which ceased publication in Far West, Missouri, in 1838.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Backman, Milton V., Jr. The Heavens Resound: A History of the Latter-day Saints in Ohio, 1830–1838. Salt Lake City, 1983.

J. LEROY CALDWELL

---

MESSIAH

MESSIAH

Messiah is a Hebrew term signifying “anointed one.” The Greek equivalent is christos, whence the name Christ. Jesus, the divinely given name of the Savior (Matt. 1:21), derives from the Hebrew Yeshua or Yehoshua (or Joshua, as it commonly appears in English), from a root meaning “to save.” With other Christians, Latter-day Saints agree that implicit in the name Jesus Christ lies the doctrine that he is the Messiah, the Anointed One who saves.

Like the New Testament, the Book of Mormon clearly identifies Jesus as the Messiah (1 Ne. 10:4–17; 2 Ne. 25:16–20; Hel. 8:13–17). It also declares that a knowledge of the Messiah existed “from the beginning of the world” (1 Ne. 12:18;

PENSATION in which Jesus Christ lived in mortality. The term does not occur in the Bible, but is found in the Doctrine and Covenants (20:26; 39:3) and in the book of Moses (5:57; 6:57, 62; 7:46).

The word “meridian” suggests the middle. According to Old Testament genealogies, from the FALL OF ADAM to the time of Jesus Christ was approximately 4,000 years. It has been nearly 2,000 years since Jesus’ birth. The millennial reign will commence “in the beginning of the seventh thousand years” (D&C 77:12). After the MILLENNIUM there will be a “little season,” the exact length of which is not revealed, but it could be several hundred years. In the context of these events, the Lord’s mortal ministry took place near the meridian, or middle, of mortal time (DS 1:81).

The meridian of time may also be seen as the high point of mortal time. Latter-day revelation shows that all of the ancient prophets looked forward to the Messiah’s coming (Jacob 4:4; Mosiah 13:33–35; 15:11). His coming fulfilled their prophecies, and he was prefigured in the LAW OF MOSES (Mosiah 13:29–32) and in ancient ceremonial ordinances (Moses 5:5–8). The meridian of time is the apex of all dispensations because of the birth, ministry, and atonement of Christ. Without him all prophetic writings and utterances would have had no efficacy, and the hopes of mankind today and forever would be but futile desires and yearnings without possibility of fulfillment.

MARSHALL T. BURTON

---

MESSENGER AND ADVOCATE

The Latter Day Saints’ Messenger and Advocate was published in Kirtland, Ohio, from October 1834 to September 1837—thirty-six sixteen-page, double-column issues. It succeeded the EVENING AND THE MORNING STAR. The name Messenger and Advocate described its purpose: to be the messenger and advocate of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, thus to help the Saints better understand its doctrines and principles. Main doctrinal contributions came from Joseph SMITH, Sidney RIGDON, Oliver COWDERY, W. W. Phelps, and John Whitmer. Other entries continued articles from the Star, a history of the Christian church, letters from missionaries, hymns, news of current Church events such as the building of the Kirtland

Temple and its dedicatory services, editorials, minutes of conferences, summaries of news of the day, marriages, notices, and obituaries.

The last issue of each annual volume contained an index of all twelve issues.

Oliver Cowdery edited the Messenger and Advocate from October 1834 to May 1835. He was succeeded by John Whitmer from June 1835 to March 1836, but returned as editor from April 1836 to January 1837. Thereafter, his brother Warren A. Cowdery served from February to September 1837, when publication ceased. Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were listed as publisher for the 1837 February and March issues. In April 1837 the printing office and contents were transferred to William Marks, who was then listed as the publisher.

When Warren A. Cowdery declined further publishing, the Messenger and Advocate noted that “a large body of the elders of the church of Latter Day Saints have united and rented the printing establishment” (3:571–72) to publish the Elders’ Journal of The Church of Latter Day Saints, which ceased publication in Far West, Missouri, in 1838.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Backman, Milton V., Jr. The Heavens Resound: A History of the Latter-day Saints in Ohio, 1830–1838. Salt Lake City, 1983.

J. LEROY CALDWELL

---

MESSIAH

MESSIAH

Messiah is a Hebrew term signifying “anointed one.” The Greek equivalent is christos, whence the name Christ. Jesus, the divinely given name of the Savior (Matt. 1:21), derives from the Hebrew Yeshua or Yehoshua (or Joshua, as it commonly appears in English), from a root meaning “to save.” With other Christians, Latter-day Saints agree that implicit in the name Jesus Christ lies the doctrine that he is the Messiah, the Anointed One who saves.

Like the New Testament, the Book of Mormon clearly identifies Jesus as the Messiah (1 Ne. 10:4–17; 2 Ne. 25:16–20; Hel. 8:13–17). It also declares that a knowledge of the Messiah existed “from the beginning of the world” (1 Ne. 12:18;

PENSATION in which Jesus Christ lived in mortality. The term does not occur in the Bible, but is found in the Doctrine and Covenants (20:26; 39:3) and in the book of Moses (5:57; 6:57, 62; 7:46).

The word “meridian” suggests the middle. According to Old Testament genealogies, from the FALL OF ADAM to the time of Jesus Christ was approximately 4,000 years. It has been nearly 2,000 years since Jesus’ birth. The millennial reign will commence “in the beginning of the seventh thousand years” (D&C 77:12). After the MILLENNIUM there will be a “little season,” the exact length of which is not revealed, but it could be several hundred years. In the context of these events, the Lord’s mortal ministry took place near the meridian, or middle, of mortal time (DS 1:81).

The meridian of time may also be seen as the high point of mortal time. Latter-day revelation shows that all of the ancient prophets looked forward to the Messiah’s coming (Jacob 4:4; Mosiah 13:33–35; 15:11). His coming fulfilled their prophecies, and he was prefigured in the LAW OF MOSES (Mosiah 13:29–32) and in ancient ceremonial ordinances (Moses 5:5–8). The meridian of time is the apex of all dispensations because of the birth, ministry, and atonement of Christ. Without him all prophetic writings and utterances would have had no efficacy, and the hopes of mankind today and forever would be but futile desires and yearnings without possibility of fulfillment.

MARSHALL T. BURTON

---

MESSENGER AND ADVOCATE

The Latter Day Saints’ Messenger and Advocate was published in Kirtland, Ohio, from October 1834 to September 1837—thirty-six sixteen-page, double-column issues. It succeeded the EVENING AND THE MORNING STAR. The name Messenger and Advocate described its purpose: to be the messenger and advocate of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, thus to help the Saints better understand its doctrines and principles. Main doctrinal contributions came from Joseph SMITH, Sidney RIGDON, Oliver COWDERY, W. W. Phelps, and John Whitmer. Other entries continued articles from the Star, a history of the Christian church, letters from missionaries, hymns, news of current Church events such as the building of the Kirtland

Temple and its dedicatory services, editorials, minutes of conferences, summaries of news of the day, marriages, notices, and obituaries.

The last issue of each annual volume contained an index of all twelve issues.

Oliver Cowdery edited the Messenger and Advocate from October 1834 to May 1835. He was succeeded by John Whitmer from June 1835 to March 1836, but returned as editor from April 1836 to January 1837. Thereafter, his brother Warren A. Cowdery served from February to September 1837, when publication ceased. Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were listed as publisher for the 1837 February and March issues. In April 1837 the printing office and contents were transferred to William Marks, who was then listed as the publisher.

When Warren A. Cowdery declined further publishing, the Messenger and Advocate noted that “a large body of the elders of the church of Latter Day Saints have united and rented the printing establishment” (3:571–72) to publish the Elders’ Journal of The Church of Latter Day Saints, which ceased publication in Far West, Missouri, in 1838.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Backman, Milton V., Jr. The Heavens Resound: A History of the Latter-day Saints in Ohio, 1830–1838. Salt Lake City, 1983.

J. LEROY CALDWELL

---

MESSIAH

MESSIAH

Messiah is a Hebrew term signifying “anointed one.” The Greek equivalent is christos, whence the name Christ. Jesus, the divinely given name of the Savior (Matt. 1:21), derives from the Hebrew Yeshua or Yehoshua (or Joshua, as it commonly appears in English), from a root meaning “to save.” With other Christians, Latter-day Saints agree that implicit in the name Jesus Christ lies the doctrine that he is the Messiah, the Anointed One who saves.

Like the New Testament, the Book of Mormon clearly identifies Jesus as the Messiah (1 Ne. 10:4–17; 2 Ne. 25:16–20; Hel. 8:13–17). It also declares that a knowledge of the Messiah existed “from the beginning of the world” (1 Ne. 12:18; Mosiah 13:33–35) and prophesies details of his life and mission. For example, the Messiah would appear in a body (1 Ne. 15:13), his name would be Jesus Christ (2 Ne. 25:19; Mosiah 3:8), and he would be baptized as an example of obedience (2 Ne. 31:4–9). Moreover, signs would attend his birth, death, and resurrection (2 Ne. 26:3; Hel. 14:2–8, 20–28). In this connection, he would be slain and rise from the dead, bringing to pass the resurrection (1 Ne. 10:11; 2 Ne. 2:8). At the last day, he is to appear in power and glory (2 Ne. 6:14), to reign as king and lawgiver (D&C 45:59; 1 Tim. 6:14–15).

[See also Jesus Christ, Names and Titles of.]

DAVID B. GALBRAITH

MESSIANIC CONCEPT AND HOPE

It is LDS doctrine that a knowledge of the role of Jesus Christ as the Messiah has been on the earth from the beginning. God taught Adam and Eve about the Messiah who would redeem mankind. Called “Only Begotten” and “Son of Man,” even his name Jesus Christ was revealed (Moses 5:7–11; 6:52–57). These are, of course, the anglicized words meaning “Savior Anointed.” God also taught ENOCH that the “Messiah, the King of Zion” would die on a cross (Moses 7:53–55).

From other sources it is evident that Hebrew people clearly believed in a redeemer, though characterizations varied. The Bible refers to him through imagery such as “the shepherd, the stone of Israel” (Gen. 49:24), the “tried stone” or “sure foundation” (Isa. 28:16), the “stem of Jesse” and “Branch” (Isa. 11:1; Jer. 33:15–16). He is also called Redeemer, Holy One of Israel, Savior, Lord of Hosts, the First and Last (Isa. 43:1–15; 44:6), and even a servant (Isa. 42:1; 49:3; 50:10; 52:13).

Because biblical prophecy uses the imagery of royalty, some believed that at his first coming the Messiah would save them from political bondage. Jacob foresaw that Shiloh would come, to whom people would gather (Gen. 49:10). Moses prophesied, “There shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel” (Num. 24:17). ISAIAH envisioned a child born, “and the government shall be upon his shoulder. . . . Of the increase of . . . peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom” (Isa. 9:6–7). Micah recorded that from Bethlehem “shall he come forth . . . to be ruler in Israel” (Micah 5:2).

JEREMIAH saw that “a King shall reign . . . and shall execute judgment and justice” (Jer. 23:5). However, such royal prophecies of a king and ruler would find fulfillment in the Messiah’s eternal, rather than his mortal, role.

The prophets planted seeds of belief in a Messiah, seeds that would flower during later periods. The DEAD SEA SCROLLS reveal a hope in two Messiahs who would lead a religious revival. Judas Maccabeus’ example (d. 160 B.C.), overthrowing the Greeks and reestablishing Jewish independence, spawned hope during the early Roman period (63 B.C.–A.D. 70) that a Messiah would deliver the Jewish nation. Although royalty and battle imagery in the Bible was interpreted to mean political deliverance, those images referred to spiritual salvation. Said Jesus, “My kingdom is not of this world” (John 18:36).

The title Messiah (Hebrew mashiah; Greek christos) means “anointed one.” Among ancient Israelites, persons set apart for God’s work were anointed with oil, including prophets, priests, and kings. Jesus, citing a messianic PROPHECY from Isaiah (61:1), told hearers in Nazareth, “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel, . . . to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives” (Luke 4:18).

Isaiah described the “servant” as one who would be smitten (Isa. 50:6), even “wounded for our transgressions, . . . bruised for our iniquities,” and yet “make intercession for the transgressors” (53:3–5, 12). Zechariah added that he would be wounded in the house of his friends (Zech. 12:10; 13:6–7). New Testament authors also understood that Jesus was to suffer before entering his glory (e.g., Luke 24:26; Acts 3:18).

Throughout his ministry Jesus clearly understood his messiahship (cf. 3 Ne. 15:20–23). For instance, when the Samaritan woman acknowledged, “I know that Messiah cometh,” Jesus responded, “I that speak unto thee am he” (John 4:25–26). Peter declared, “Thou art the Christ [Messiah]” (Matt. 16:16); and Andrew, Peter’s brother, announced, “We have found the Messiah” (John 1:41). Even devils are reported to have said, “Thou art Christ the Son of God” (e.g., Luke 4:41).

The biblical portrayal of a mortal Messiah reviled rather than ruling, rejected rather than reigning, is amplified in the Book of Mormon. As its modern subtitle indicates, the Book of Mormon is another testament of Jesus Christ, or Jesus the Messiah. Book of Mormon writers taught that all prophets spoke concerning the Messiah (Jacob 7:11; Mosiah 13:33). In approximately 600 B.C., LEHI taught that “redemption cometh in and through the Holy Messiah. . . . Behold he offereth himself a sacrifice for sin . . . that he may bring to pass the resurrection of the dead” (2 Ne. 2:6–10).

NEPHI<sub>1</sub> wrote that since all are in a fallen state, they must rely on the Messiah, the Redeemer. He learned that the Son of God was willing to come as the Messiah, preach the gospel, serve as an example of righteous living, and be slain for the sins of all (1 Ne. 10:4–6, 11; 11:26–33; 19:9; 2 Ne. 25:11–19; 31:9–16).

King BENJAMIN described how Jesus Christ would come from heaven to dwell in a mortal body, “working mighty miracles, such as healing the sick . . . [and casting] out devils,” suffering temptation and fatigue. Even blood would come “from every pore, so great shall be his anguish for the wickedness and the abominations of his people.” Saying that he was only a man and that “he hath a devil, [they] shall scourge him, and shall crucify him” (Mosiah 3:5–10).

ALMA<sub>2</sub> said of the Messiah’s ministry, “He shall go forth, suffering pains and afflictions and temptations of every kind. . . . And he will take upon him death, that he may loose the bands of death which bind his people; and he will take upon him their infirmities . . . that he may know according to the flesh how to succor his people according to their infirmities” (Alma 7:11–12).

More than five centuries before Christ’s birth, JACOB wrote, “For this intent have we written these things, that they may know that we knew of Christ, and we had a hope of his glory many hundred years before his coming; and not only we ourselves had a hope of his glory, but also all the holy prophets which were before us” (Jacob 4:4).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McConkie, Bruce R. The Promised Messiah. Salt Lake City, 1978.

D. KELLY OGDEN

---

MESSIANIC PROPHECIES IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

See: Jesus Christ: Prophecies About Jesus Christ

---

METAPHYSICS

Metaphysics is the branch of PHILOSOPHY concerned with the ultimate nature of reality, including those aspects of it, if any, that are unavailable to empirical inquiry. The historical development of metaphysics in Western philosophical thought has been carried out largely by those philosophers and theologians who have aspired more to develop a unified system of ideas than to dwell upon diverse arrays of facts. Especially important to the theologians was the task of bringing abstract philosophical concepts into harmony with the concrete teachings of SCRIPTURE. Their systems differed, but their common goal was to combine philosophy and scripture into a single coherent account of the ultimate nature of things.

TENTATIVENESS. LDS metaphysics stands apart, because the Church has not developed a traditional metaphysical THEOLOGY and does not aspire to one. It has not been much influenced by philosophical thinking. LDS faith springs from two sources, scripture and ongoing RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. The absence of any systematic metaphysics of the Church follows from the belief that scripture, as the record of divine REVELATION, may be supplemented by new revelation at any time. A metaphysical system, to be true, must be all-inclusive. But faith in continuing revelation precludes the certainty that such a system exists. Thus, LDS metaphysics remains incomplete, tentative, and unsystematic, subject to revision in the light of things yet to be revealed by God. This tentativeness about metaphysical ideas has saved the Church from the crises that can arise when a religion’s beliefs are tied to philosophical ideas which are later abandoned or discredited. The Church’s lack of a systematic metaphysical theology has prompted some students of its DOCTRINES who are used to such theology to assert that it has no theology at all, but it would be more accurate to say that its metaphysics and theology are not systematically formulated.

MATTER AND SPIRIT. In the absence of a metaphysical system, the LDS faith still displays some characteristic metaphysical ideas. Latter-day Saints regard MATTER as a fundamental principle of reality and as the primary basis for distinguishing particular beings. The import of this view reveals itself most strikingly in the doctrine concerning the material embodiment of God: “The Father is another testament of Jesus Christ, or Jesus the Messiah. Book of Mormon writers taught that all prophets spoke concerning the Messiah (Jacob 7:11; Mosiah 13:33). In approximately 600 B.C., LEHI taught that “redemption cometh in and through the Holy Messiah. . . . Behold he offereth himself a sacrifice for sin . . . that he may bring to pass the resurrection of the dead” (2 Ne. 2:6–10).

NEPHI<sub>1</sub> wrote that since all are in a fallen state, they must rely on the Messiah, the Redeemer. He learned that the Son of God was willing to come as the Messiah, preach the gospel, serve as an example of righteous living, and be slain for the sins of all (1 Ne. 10:4–6, 11; 11:26–33; 19:9; 2 Ne. 25:11–19; 31:9–16).

King BENJAMIN described how Jesus Christ would come from heaven to dwell in a mortal body, “working mighty miracles, such as healing the sick . . . [and casting] out devils,” suffering temptation and fatigue. Even blood would come “from every pore, so great shall be his anguish for the wickedness and the abominations of his people.” Saying that he was only a man and that “he hath a devil, [they] shall scourge him, and shall crucify him” (Mosiah 3:5–10).

ALMA<sub>2</sub> said of the Messiah’s ministry, “He shall go forth, suffering pains and afflictions and temptations of every kind. . . . And he will take upon him death, that he may loose the bands of death which bind his people; and he will take upon him their infirmities . . . that he may know according to the flesh how to succor his people according to their infirmities” (Alma 7:11–12).

More than five centuries before Christ’s birth, JACOB wrote, “For this intent have we written these things, that they may know that we knew of Christ, and we had a hope of his glory many hundred years before his coming; and not only we ourselves had a hope of his glory, but also all the holy prophets which were before us” (Jacob 4:4).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McConkie, Bruce R. The Promised Messiah. Salt Lake City, 1978.

D. KELLY OGDEN

---

MESSIANIC PROPHECIES IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

See: Jesus Christ: Prophecies About Jesus Christ

---

METAPHYSICS

Metaphysics is the branch of PHILOSOPHY concerned with the ultimate nature of reality, including those aspects of it, if any, that are unavailable to empirical inquiry. The historical development of metaphysics in Western philosophical thought has been carried out largely by those philosophers and theologians who have aspired more to develop a unified system of ideas than to dwell upon diverse arrays of facts. Especially important to the theologians was the task of bringing abstract philosophical concepts into harmony with the concrete teachings of SCRIPTURE. Their systems differed, but their common goal was to combine philosophy and scripture into a single coherent account of the ultimate nature of things.

TENTATIVENESS. LDS metaphysics stands apart, because the Church has not developed a traditional metaphysical THEOLOGY and does not aspire to one. It has not been much influenced by philosophical thinking. LDS faith springs from two sources, scripture and ongoing RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. The absence of any systematic metaphysics of the Church follows from the belief that scripture, as the record of divine REVELATION, may be supplemented by new revelation at any time. A metaphysical system, to be true, must be all-inclusive. But faith in continuing revelation precludes the certainty that such a system exists. Thus, LDS metaphysics remains incomplete, tentative, and unsystematic, subject to revision in the light of things yet to be revealed by God. This tentativeness about metaphysical ideas has saved the Church from the crises that can arise when a religion’s beliefs are tied to philosophical ideas which are later abandoned or discredited. The Church’s lack of a systematic metaphysical theology has prompted some students of its DOCTRINES who are used to such theology to assert that it has no theology at all, but it would be more accurate to say that its metaphysics and theology are not systematically formulated.

MATTER AND SPIRIT. In the absence of a metaphysical system, the LDS faith still displays some characteristic metaphysical ideas. Latter-day Saints regard MATTER as a fundamental principle of reality and as the primary basis for distinguishing particular beings. The import of this view reveals itself most strikingly in the doctrine concerning the material embodiment of God: “The Father has a body of flesh and bones as tangible as man's; the Son also" (D&C 130:22). This is not to be understood crassly; the matter of exalted bodies is purified, transfigured, and glorified. LDS teachings draw no ultimate contrast between SPIRIT and matter. Indeed, "all spirit is matter, but it is more fine or pure" (D&C 131:7). This position avoids traditional difficulties in explaining the interaction of spirit and body.

The reality of matter implies the reality of space and time. Scripture speaks of the place where God dwells and of "the reckoning of the Lord's time" (Abr. 3:9). So God himself exists within a spatial and temporal environment. In accepting space, time, and matter as constitutive of reality, Latter-day Saints take the everyday world of human experience as a fairly reliable guide to the nature of things. But this acceptance is no dogma, and their belief remains open to the possibility that these three ideas, as presently understood, may be auxiliaries to more fundamental ideas not yet known.

PLURALISM. LDS thought clearly emphasizes the importance of the fundamental plurality of the world, with its continuing novelties, changes, conflicts, and agreements: "For it must needs be, that there is an opposition in all things" (2 Ne. 2:11). The world is not static but dynamic, not completed but still unfolding. This unfinished and future-oriented aspect of things provides the basis for growth and improvement. A monistic world or universe in which all differences are finally absorbed in a higher UNITY is viewed as impossible. The LDS Church has been less inclined than some other religions to regard the world of common experience as an inferior order of that which must be distinguished from a higher and altogether different realm. Heaven itself is regarded as offering the hope of endless progression rather than the ease of final satisfaction.

NATURAL AND SUPERNATURAL. Latter-day Saints see a continuity between the traditional categories of natural and supernatural. They do not deny the distinction, but view it as one of degree, not of kind. God's creative act, for example, is not, as traditionally conceived, a CREATION ex nihilo, but an act of organizing material that already exists (Abr. 3:24). And creation is not a single, unique event, but an ongoing process that continues through the course of time: "And as one earth shall pass away . . . so shall another come" (Moses 1:38).

God acts upon matter within the context of space and time. In comparison with human attributes, God's attributes are supreme and perfect. But the difference between God and mankind remains one of degree. God seeks to provide the guidance and the necessary help for human beings to overcome the differences and become like him. The injunction to be perfect "even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48) is taken to mean that mankind may indeed become like God by faithfully following his COMMANDMENTS. The principles or laws of goodness that underlie these commandments have their own abiding reality. God exemplifies them but does not arbitrarily create them.

FREEDOM AND PERFECTIBILITY. Nothing is more central to LDS metaphysics than the principle of FREEDOM. The weaknesses of humanity that lead to error and sin are acknowledged. But the claim that human nature is totally depraved is denied. The LDS Church affirms that ideally "men are instructed sufficiently that they know good from evil" and that "men are free according to the flesh, . . . free to choose liberty and eternal life . . . or to choose captivity and death" (2 Ne. 2:5, 27). Human experience has as its final goal the development of virtue and holiness in a world that is not totally the product of God's will. Reality itself poses the challenge to overcome obstacles and achieve greater good. Everyone's life is a response to this challenge.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Roberts, B. H. Joseph Smith—Prophet Teacher. Salt Lake City, 1908.
- . Comprehensive History of the Church, 6 vols. Salt Lake City, 1930.

DENNIS RASMUSSEN

---

MEXICO, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN

LDS COLONIZATION in Mexico was planned as a place of refuge from PERSECUTION in the United States and as a springboard for teaching the gospel in Latin America.

In 1875, President Brigham YOUNG sent Daniel W. Jones and others to Mexico to look for possible places to settle. They found the Mexican gov-

has a body of flesh and bones as tangible as man's; the Son also" (D&C 130:22). This is not to be understood crassly; the matter of exalted bodies is purified, transfigured, and glorified. LDS teachings draw no ultimate contrast between SPIRIT and matter. Indeed, "all spirit is matter, but it is more fine or pure" (D&C 131:7). This position avoids traditional difficulties in explaining the interaction of spirit and body.

The reality of matter implies the reality of space and time. Scripture speaks of the place where God dwells and of "the reckoning of the Lord's time" (Abr. 3:9). So God himself exists within a spatial and temporal environment. In accepting space, time, and matter as constitutive of reality, Latter-day Saints take the everyday world of human experience as a fairly reliable guide to the nature of things. But this acceptance is no dogma, and their belief remains open to the possibility that these three ideas, as presently understood, may be auxiliaries to more fundamental ideas not yet known.

PLURALISM. LDS thought clearly emphasizes the importance of the fundamental plurality of the world, with its continuing novelties, changes, conflicts, and agreements: "For it must needs be, that there is an opposition in all things" (2 Ne. 2:11). The world is not static but dynamic, not completed but still unfolding. This unfinished and future-oriented aspect of things provides the basis for growth and improvement. A monistic world or universe in which all differences are finally absorbed in a higher UNITY is viewed as impossible. The LDS Church has been less inclined than some other religions to regard the world of common experience as an inferior order of that which must be distinguished from a higher and altogether different realm. Heaven itself is regarded as offering the hope of endless progression rather than the ease of final satisfaction.

NATURAL AND SUPERNATURAL. Latter-day Saints see a continuity between the traditional categories of natural and supernatural. They do not deny the distinction, but view it as one of degree, not of kind. God's creative act, for example, is not, as traditionally conceived, a CREATION ex nihilo, but an act of organizing material that already exists (Abr. 3:24). And creation is not a single, unique event, but an ongoing process that continues through the course of time: "And as one earth shall pass away . . . so shall another come" (Moses 1:38).

God acts upon matter within the context of space and time. In comparison with human attributes, God's attributes are supreme and perfect. But the difference between God and mankind remains one of degree. God seeks to provide the guidance and the necessary help for human beings to overcome the differences and become like him. The injunction to be perfect "even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48) is taken to mean that mankind may indeed become like God by faithfully following his COMMANDMENTS. The principles or laws of goodness that underlie these commandments have their own abiding reality. God exemplifies them but does not arbitrarily create them.

FREEDOM AND PERFECTIBILITY. Nothing is more central to LDS metaphysics than the principle of FREEDOM. The weaknesses of humanity that lead to error and sin are acknowledged. But the claim that human nature is totally depraved is denied. The LDS Church affirms that ideally "men are instructed sufficiently that they know good from evil" and that "men are free according to the flesh, . . . free to choose liberty and eternal life . . . or to choose captivity and death" (2 Ne. 2:5, 27). Human experience has as its final goal the development of virtue and holiness in a world that is not totally the product of God's will. Reality itself poses the challenge to overcome obstacles and achieve greater good. Everyone's life is a response to this challenge.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Roberts, B. H. Joseph Smith—Prophet Teacher. Salt Lake City, 1908.
- . Comprehensive History of the Church, 6 vols. Salt Lake City, 1930.

DENNIS RASMUSSEN

---

MEXICO, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN

LDS COLONIZATION in Mexico was planned as a place of refuge from PERSECUTION in the United States and as a springboard for teaching the gospel in Latin America.

In 1875, President Brigham YOUNG sent Daniel W. Jones and others to Mexico to look for possible places to settle. They found the Mexican government anxious for colonization in the sparsely settled areas of northern Chihuahua and Sonora. LDS colonization in Mexico did not begin, however, until after the first severe persecution precipitated by the passage of the 1882 Edmunds Act (see ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION). In 1885, hundreds of families, many of which practiced POLYGAMY, crossed the border into Mexico. In the next several years, seven colonies were founded on the Casas Grandes River and its tributaries in northwestern Chihuahua: Colonia Díaz, Colonia Dublan, Colonia Juárez, and the mountain colonies Cave Valley, Pacheco, García, and Chui-chupa. In addition, Latter-day Saints established Colonia Oaxaca and Colonia Morelos on the Bavispe River in northern Sonora.

Colonia Juárez, Mexico, c. 1900.

Hardship marked the early years as land-title problems, hunger, drought, hostile Apache Indians, and such diseases as smallpox and diphtheria challenged the Saints' determination to make the desert valleys their home. With capable leadership they persevered. In addition to local leaders, at one time or another six of the Twelve Apostles of the Church resided in the Mexican colonies.

Most of the settlers had already helped establish colonies in the western United States. With this experience, they imported to Mexico the best varieties of fruit trees for their orchards and selected breeds of cattle and horses. Within ten years, the colony lands were covered with canals, dams, man-made lakes, and irrigated crops. Thriving villages had wide streets lined with maple trees and lilacs and red-brick homes reminiscent of villages where many of the settlers had had their roots. There were stores, mills, and factories. Each community built schools to ensure the acquisition of cultural, literary, and technical skills. Through hard work, the colonists achieved a high degree of self-sufficiency.

On December 8, 1895, the first STAKE in Mexico was formed, with Colonia Juárez as its center and Anthony W. Ivins as stake president. In 1912, during the Mexican Revolution, local Church leaders led a general exodus and abandoned the colonies as the members sought refuge in the United States. Before the revolution, more than 4,000 Latter-day Saints lived in the colonies. Nearly one-fourth later returned and became part of Mexico's revolutionary history, enduring the raids of Pascual Orozco's "Red Flaggers" and American General John J. ("Black Jack") Pershing's search for Pancho Villa.

In 1990, there were again approximately 4,000 Latter-day Saints in the area, about 500 of them descendants of the original pioneers, and the area was still a major supplier of fresh fruits to other parts of Mexico. The Church schools in Mexico are bilingual, with the Juárez Academy a regional center of culture and learning (see ACADEMIES). A striking number of Church leaders have roots in the Mexican colonies. The area also produces a high number of Spanish-speaking missionaries and mission presidents, whose work has extended beyond Latin America to Spain and the Spanish-speaking population worldwide.

Juárez Academy (built 1888).

While visiting Colonia Juárez on November 11, 1989, Carlos Salinas de Gortari, the president of Mexico, commended the LDS colonists in Mexico in these words:

We appreciate your dedication, honesty, sobriety, and respect for law. You have contributed to the elevation of the regions where you live together, work and labor intensely, and with this you also elevate the level of our nation. You have incorporated new technology, more efficient productive processes, and have shared your knowledge and experience with the rest of your fellow citizens, adding generosity to the characteristics that distinguish you. We know that you are a good people who do good [transcribed and translated by Guillermo Toscano Arrambí, on file at Juárez Academy].

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hatch, Nelle Spilsbury. Colonia Juárez: An Intimate Account of a Mormon Village. Salt Lake City, 1954.
- Johnson, Annie R. Heartbeats of Colonia Díaz. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- Romney, Thomas Cottam. The Mormon Colonies in Mexico. Salt Lake City, 1938.
- Tullis, F. LaMond. Mormons in Mexico: The Dynamics of Faith and Culture. Logan, Utah, 1987.

SHIRLEY TAYLOR ROBINSON

---

MEXICO AND CENTRAL AMERICA, THE CHURCH IN ### MEXICO

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints first sent missionaries into Mexico in 1875. It had long been a hope of Church leaders to teach the gospel to these descendants of the Book of Morthem descendants of the original pioneers, and the area was still a major supplier of fresh fruits to other parts of Mexico. The Church schools in Mexico are bilingual, with the Juárez Academy a regional center of culture and learning (see ACADEMIES). A striking number of Church leaders have roots in the Mexican colonies. The area also produces a high number of Spanish-speaking missionaries and mission presidents, whose work has extended beyond Latin America to Spain and the Spanish-speaking population worldwide.

Juárez Academy (built 1888).

While visiting Colonia Juárez on November 11, 1989, Carlos Salinas de Gortari, the president of Mexico, commended the LDS colonists in Mexico in these words:

We appreciate your dedication, honesty, sobriety, and respect for law. You have contributed to the elevation of the regions where you live together, work and labor intensely, and with this you also elevate the level of our nation. You have incorporated new technology, more efficient productive processes, and have shared your knowledge and experience with the rest of your fellow citizens, adding generosity to the characteristics that distinguish you. We know that you are a good people who do good [transcribed and translated by Guillermo Toscano Arrambí, on file at Juárez Academy].

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hatch, Nelle Spilsbury. Colonia Juárez: An Intimate Account of a Mormon Village. Salt Lake City, 1954.
- Johnson, Annie R. Heartbeats of Colonia Díaz. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- Romney, Thomas Cottam. The Mormon Colonies in Mexico. Salt Lake City, 1938.
- Tullis, F. LaMond. Mormons in Mexico: The Dynamics of Faith and Culture. Logan, Utah, 1987.

SHIRLEY TAYLOR ROBINSON

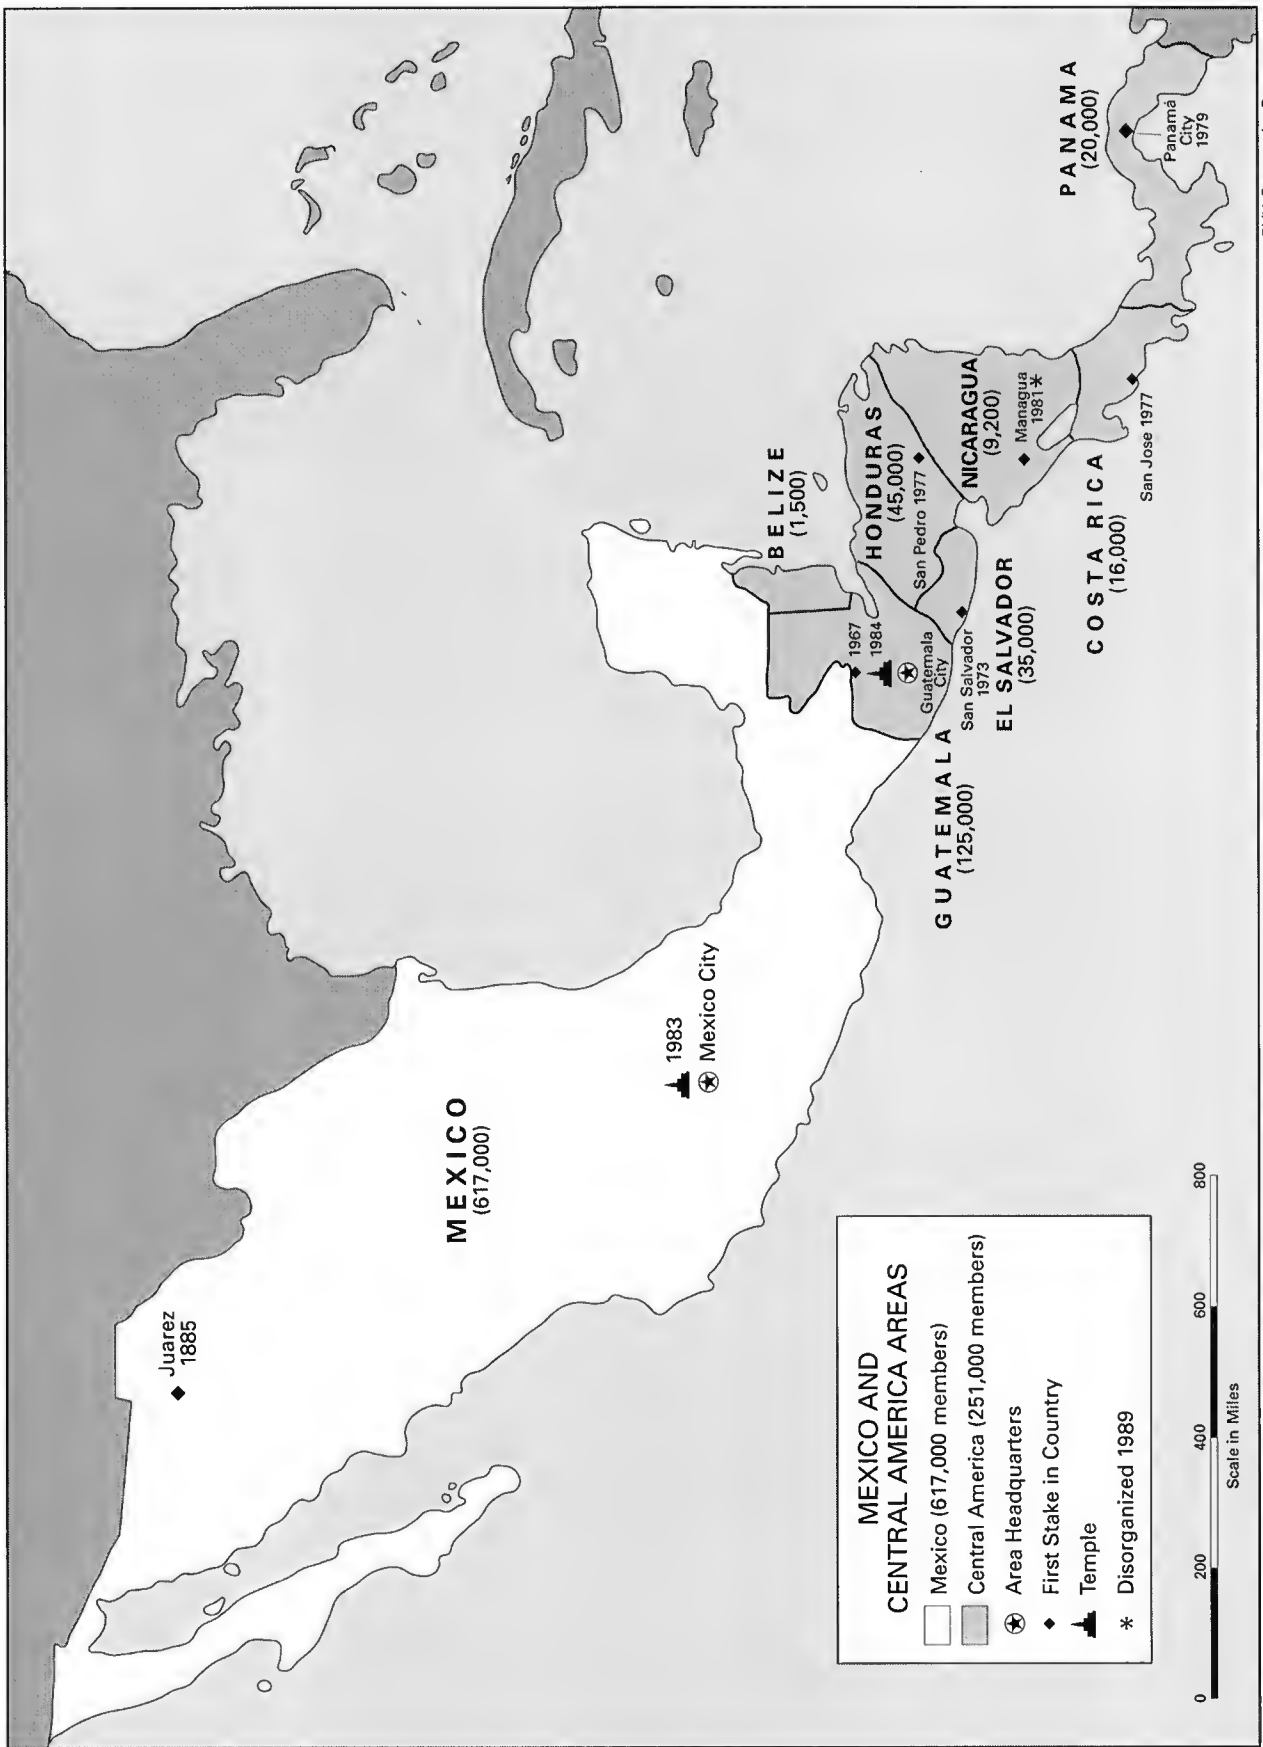

---

MEXICO AND CENTRAL AMERICA, THE CHURCH IN

MEXICO

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints first sent missionaries into Mexico in 1875. It had long been a hope of Church leaders to teach the gospel to these descendants of the Book of Mormon peoples, and to show them the sacred record of their ancestors. President Brigham YOUNG also looked at Mexico as a possible place of refuge for the Saints in the event of further persecution from the United States government. The Church established colonies in northern Mexico in 1885. Though Church growth in Mexico, and later in Central America, was sporadic and beset with political difficulties, the deep roots of nearly a century began to produce abundantly in the 1970s, so that by the end of 1990 the Church had twenty-seven missions and hundreds of stakes and wards serving approximately a million members in these areas. There are also temples in both Mexico City and Guatemala City.

FIRST MISSIONARIES. The first LDS missionaries sent to Mexico in 1875 included Daniel W. Jones, his son Wiley, Anthony W. Ivins, James Z. Stewart, and Helaman Pratt. This group was also to scout out good colonizing areas in the southwestern United States and northern Mexico. Though they recorded no baptisms, the missionaries found many possible sites for the Saints to settle, the most promising being in Chihuahua, Mexico.

From Chihuahua the group also mailed a booklet, Trozos Selectos del Libro de Mormon (selections of the Book of Mormon), to well-known citizens and government officials. The selections had been translated by Melitón González Trejo and Daniel W. Jones. Meanwhile, a second group of missionaries, called in September 1876, left for Mexico directly following the October general conference. This group was composed of two of the original missionaries, Stewart and Pratt, and four new ones—Stewart's brother Isaac, George Terry, Louis Garff, and Melitón G. Trejo. They separated in Tucson, Arizona, with Pratt and Trejo going south to Hermosillo, Sonora, Mexico, where the first five baptisms in Mexico occurred in 1877. The other four missionaries were not so fortunate as they were driven from the country by the warring Yaqui Indians.

Two of the booklets mailed by the first expedition fell into the hands of two influential citizens who wrote for more information: Ignacio Manuel Altamirano and Dr. Plotino Rhodakanaty (also spelled Rhodaeanty). Dr. Rhodakanaty studied the materials with several of his friends, and when

J. Reuben Clark, Jr., U.S. ambassador to Mexico, with Abel Paez and Isaias Juarez in Mexico (c. 1931–1932).

Elder Moses Thatcher, of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, and other missionaries arrived in Mexico City in November 1879, they soon baptized him and his study group. Within a week Thatcher organized the Mexico City branch and appointed Rhodakanaty as branch president, with Silviano Arteaga and Jose Ybarola serving as his counselors.

Thatcher dedicated Mexico for missionary work on January 25, 1880, but because many of the original members left the Church, he rededicated the land and mission on April 6, 1881, from the rim of the volcano Popocatepetl—which has great historical significance to Mexico's Indian people. He formed a second branch that August in Ozumba, a small town nestled at the base of Popocatepetl.

COLONISTS. By 1885, the U.S. persecution of the Church for polygamy resulted in many Church leaders in the United States going into foreign countries to find homes for their multiple families, and some of them founded Colonia Juárez in the state of Chihuahua, Mexico. Later colonies were founded at Díaz, Dublán, and also in Paeheco, Oaxaca, Morelos, and San José, Sonora (see MEXICO, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN).

Abel Paz speaking in Mexico in 1946. President George Albert Smith presided at this conference, which rectified issues regarding the leadership of Mexican branches and missions.

The American colonists suffered greatly from the political instability in Mexico. Sonora permanently exiled all foreign settlers, and the Chihuahua Saints were evacuated for a time, with the loss of food, possessions, and sometimes lives. However, many of the Saints returned and rebuilt their colonies and had no further trouble.

MISSION CLOSURES (1889–1946). The Mexican Mission was closed in 1889 and the missionaries recalled because of the worsening persecution in the polygamy crisis, but it was reopened in 1901 by Elder John Henry Smith, an apostle, and Presidents Anthony W. Ivins and Henry Eyring from the Juárez Stake. Missionary work continued with lengthy interruptions due to the Mexican Revolution and counterrevolutions (1910–1928).

Elder Rey L. Pratt, of the Seventy, presided over the Mexican Mission from 1907 until his death in 1931, but did not live in Mexico much of that time because the missionaries were often banned. When all foreign missionaries were exiled from 1913 until 1921, President Pratt placed Presidents Isaias Juárez, Abel Paz, and Bernabe Parra, the district presidency, in charge of the Church in Mexico, and the work of the mission continued under local leadership. Local priesthood brethren also led the Church from 1926 to 1946, when the Mexican government prohibited foreigners from doing religious work in Mexico. Church membership continued to grow.

1946 TO PRESENT. With its rapid growth in Mexico, and noting the need for education among its members there, the Church established thirty-seven schools in Mexico between 1960 and 1974, most of them elementary schools. The largest, most widely known LDS school in Mexico is its preparatory school, Centro Escolar Benemerito de las Américas, established in 1964.

The Mexican Mission was divided into four missions between 1952 and 1960. In December 1961, Mexico City established its first stake with Harold Brown, an Anglo who was reared in the Mormon colonies, as president. The second stake was organized in 1967 with Agricol Lozano, a native Mexican, as president. On November 9, 1975, Elder Howard W. Hunter, of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, organized eleven new stakes in the Mexico City area, among them the Mexico City Zarahemla Stake for the students of Benemerito. From 1976 to 1978 nearly 150 full-time missionaries were called from the membership of this stake. By 1983 Mexico had eight missions, seventy-six stakes, and several hundred thousand members (second only to the United States in membership), and the majority of the missionaries in the country were local Mexicans. Hundreds of the members had been blessed to attend Church schools.

MEXICO CITY TEMPLE. On March 21, 1977, President Spencer W. KIMBALL announced that the Church would build a temple in Mexico City. The Mexico Temple was dedicated on December 2, 1983, by President Gordon B. Hinckley, a counselor in the First Presidency. Its design was a modern adaptation of ancient Mayan architecture, showing respect for the culture and history of Mexico. Harold and Leanore Jespersen Brown were its first president and matron.

CENTRAL AMERICA

The expansion of the Church into Central America is more recent than that of Mexico. The first missionary effort beyond Mexico came in 1941, when John (Juan) O'Donnal, who had grown up in the LDS Mexican colonies, was assigned to Guatemala City by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. He taught the gospel informally in Guatemala for several years and petitioned the Church to send missionaries to what he considered a humble people ready to hear the gospel. In 1947 four missionaries were sent to Guatemala and Costa Rica, as part of the Mexican Mission. On September 7, 1947, the first sacrament meeting was held in Guatemala. Central America was dedicated for preaching the gospel and the Central America Mission was organized on November 16, 1952, by Elder Spencer W. Kimball, then of the Quorum of the Twelve. On August 1, 1965, the Guatemala-El Salvador Mission was divided from the Central American Mission. By 1990 missions had been organized in five Central American countries: Guatemala, Honduras, Panama, El Salvador, and Costa Rica. Guatemala had three missions, and El Salvador opened its second mission in July 1990. In December 1990 the Church had forty-three stakes in Central America.

Mexico City Temple, dedicated 1983. Its exterior is made of white cast stone with ornate adaptations of ancient Mayan designs. Photographer: Eldon Linschoten.

THE GUATEMALA TEMPLE. While the Mexico City Temple was being built, plans were already being made to build a temple in Guatemala City. Construction of this temple was completed in three years, and it was dedicated in December 1984, one year after the dedication of the Mexico City Temple. The construction of the temples enables thousands of Mexican and Central American Latter-day Saints to participate regularly in temple ordinances in their own language and without undertaking the long trip to the Arizona Temple in Mesa as they had done before.

In the April 1989 general conference of the Church, the first General Authorities from Mexico Primary children in Guatemala (c. 1985). Thirty percent of the one million members to join the Church in 1987–1989 came from Mexico and Central America, and another thirty percent from South America.

and Central America were called to the quorums of Seventy: Horacio Tenorio from Mexico and Carlos H. Amado from Guatemala. On April 6, 1991, Jorge A. Rojas of Mexico was also called to the Seventy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- "Central America: Saints in Six Nations Grow in the Gospel." Ensign 7 (Feb. 1977):25–26.
- Flake, Gerry R. "Mormons in Mexico: The First 96 Years." Ensign 2 (Sept. 1972):20–21.
- Gardner, Marvin K. "Taking the Gospel to Their Own People." Ensign 18 (Oct. 1988):12–16.
- Hansen, Terrence L. "The Church in Central America." Ensign 2 (Sept. 1972):40–42.
- Lozano, Agricol. Historia de la Iglesia en México. México, D.F., 1980.
- Tullis, F. LaMond. Mormons in Mexico. Logan, Utah, 1987.

BOANERGES RUBALCAVA

---

MICHAEL THE ARCHANGEL

See: Adam: LDS Sourees; Angels: Arehangels

---

MIDDLE EAST, THE CHURCH IN THE

Political turmoil in the Ottoman empire, two world wars, and restrictions imposed by local governments have challenged the efforts of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints to establish an official presence in the Middle East. Despite these difficulties, the Church has small congregations in several Middle Eastern countries, mostly because of the influx of expatriate (mainly American) Church members working there. Before 1950, Church activities were limited to the Levant (Turkey, Palestine, Lebanon, and Syria), but since then some have also occurred, temporarily at least, in Iran, Egypt, Jordan, Israel, the West Bank, Lebanon, and the Arab countries of the Gulf.

The history of LDS Church activity in the Middle East dates from 1841, when Orson Hyde, an apostle, prayed on the Mount of Olives near Jerusalem for the ingathering of Abraham's children (especially the Jews) to Palestine, for the building up of Jerusalem, and for the rearing of a temple. LDS missionary work in the Middle East began in 1884, when Jacob Spori opened the Turkish Mission in Constantinople. Branches of the Church, consisting mostly of Armenian and European converts, were eventually established in Aintab, Aleppo, and Haifa, but the mission closed in 1896. It reopened in 1897, but closed again in 1909 because of the increasing political turmoil in the Ottoman empire.

After World War I, the mission was reopened in Aleppo and renamed the Armenian Mission. In 1928 it was headquartered in Haifa, but was closed that December with the sudden death of Joseph Booth, the mission president. It reopened in 1933 as the Palestine-Syrian Mission, but was closed again in 1939 because of World War II. In 1947 the mission was reopened with Badwagan Piranian as president; it was renamed the Near East Mission in 1950 but closed again later that year. From 1950 to 1969, Church activity in the Middle East consisted mostly of small groups scattered in various countries and of a few missionaries from the Swiss Mission assigned to work in Lebanon. In September 1969 a Church group was organized in Jerusalem to accommodate Brigham Young University (BYU) faculty and students involved in a Near Eastern Studies program. Other events there included the organization of the Israel District (1977), the dedication of the Orson Hyde Memorial Garden on the Mount of Olives (1979), and the dedication of the BYU Jerusalem Center for Near Eastern Studies on Mount Scopus (1989).

The Church has established a few congregations in other Middle Eastern countries since 1950 as economic expansion, related mostly to the oil industry, has brought an influx of Western workers to the area. A branch of the Church has been operating in Cairo, Egypt, since 1974. The Iran Tehran Mission was organized in July 1975, the first formal mission in the Middle East since 1950, but it was closed in December 1978 with the worsening political situation between Iran and the United States. In 1989, Jordan became the first Arab country to grant formal recognition to the Church, allowing it to establish the Center for Cultural and Educational Affairs in Amman. The governments in these countries have allowed the Church, along with other non-Muslim groups, to hold services and other activities as long as they are unobtrusive and their members respect Islamic laws and traditions, including the restriction against proselytizing among the Muslim populace.

and Central America were called to the quorums of Seventy: Horacio Tenorio from Mexico and Carlos H. Amado from Guatemala. On April 6, 1991, Jorge A. Rojas of Mexico was also called to the Seventy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- "Central America: Saints in Six Nations Grow in the Gospel." Ensign 7 (Feb. 1977):25–26.
- Flake, Gerry R. "Mormons in Mexico: The First 96 Years." Ensign 2 (Sept. 1972):20–21.
- Gardner, Marvin K. "Taking the Gospel to Their Own People." Ensign 18 (Oct. 1988):12–16.
- Hansen, Terrence L. "The Church in Central America." Ensign 2 (Sept. 1972):40–42.
- Lozano, Agricol. Historia de la Iglesia en México. México, D.F., 1980.
- Tullis, F. LaMond. Mormons in Mexico. Logan, Utah, 1987.

BOANERGES RUBALCAVA

---

MICHAEL THE ARCHANGEL

See: Adam: LDS Sourees; Angels: Arehangels

---

MIDDLE EAST, THE CHURCH IN THE

Political turmoil in the Ottoman empire, two world wars, and restrictions imposed by local governments have challenged the efforts of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints to establish an official presence in the Middle East. Despite these difficulties, the Church has small congregations in several Middle Eastern countries, mostly because of the influx of expatriate (mainly American) Church members working there. Before 1950, Church activities were limited to the Levant (Turkey, Palestine, Lebanon, and Syria), but since then some have also occurred, temporarily at least, in Iran, Egypt, Jordan, Israel, the West Bank, Lebanon, and the Arab countries of the Gulf.

The history of LDS Church activity in the Middle East dates from 1841, when Orson Hyde, an apostle, prayed on the Mount of Olives near Jerusalem for the ingathering of Abraham's children (especially the Jews) to Palestine, for the building up of Jerusalem, and for the rearing of a temple. LDS missionary work in the Middle East began in 1884, when Jacob Spori opened the Turkish Mission in Constantinople. Branches of the Church, consisting mostly of Armenian and European converts, were eventually established in Aintab, Aleppo, and Haifa, but the mission closed in 1896. It reopened in 1897, but closed again in 1909 because of the increasing political turmoil in the Ottoman empire.

After World War I, the mission was reopened in Aleppo and renamed the Armenian Mission. In 1928 it was headquartered in Haifa, but was closed that December with the sudden death of Joseph Booth, the mission president. It reopened in 1933 as the Palestine-Syrian Mission, but was closed again in 1939 because of World War II. In 1947 the mission was reopened with Badwagan Piranian as president; it was renamed the Near East Mission in 1950 but closed again later that year. From 1950 to 1969, Church activity in the Middle East consisted mostly of small groups scattered in various countries and of a few missionaries from the Swiss Mission assigned to work in Lebanon. In September 1969 a Church group was organized in Jerusalem to accommodate Brigham Young University (BYU) faculty and students involved in a Near Eastern Studies program. Other events there included the organization of the Israel District (1977), the dedication of the Orson Hyde Memorial Garden on the Mount of Olives (1979), and the dedication of the BYU Jerusalem Center for Near Eastern Studies on Mount Seopus (1989).

The Church has established a few congregations in other Middle Eastern countries since 1950 as economic expansion, related mostly to the oil industry, has brought an influx of Western workers to the area. A branch of the Church has been operating in Cairo, Egypt, since 1974. The Iran Tehran Mission was organized in July 1975, the first formal mission in the Middle East since 1950, but it was closed in December 1978 with the worsening political situation between Iran and the United States. In 1989, Jordan became the first Arab country to grant formal recognition to the Church, allowing it to establish the Center for Cultural and Educational Affairs in Amman. The governments in these countries have allowed the Church, along with other non-Muslim groups, to hold services and other activities as long as they are unobtrusive and their members respect Islamic laws and traditions, including the restriction against proselytizing among the Muslim populace.

ISSUES AND CHALLENGES. The manner in which the Church has handled a number of sensitive issues in the Middle East illustrates its capacity to adapt to local needs and customs. Between 1841 and 1950, the most vexing problem for the missionaries was how to deal with the poverty and poor health of the members. The Church attempted to alleviate the suffering of members by teaching them new skills, organizing cooperatives to market goods in Salt Lake City, soliciting clothing and food donations from members in Utah, and arranging for relocation to Europe, Mexico, and the United States. Since 1950 the Church has adjusted to issues of a cultural and political nature. One example is the First Presidency's decision to allow members to hold Sabbath services, customarily reserved for Sunday, on the day of worship designated by local religious tradition: Friday in Muslim countries and Saturday in Israel. The Church has refrained from taking an official stand on the Arab-Israeli question; rather, the position of Church leaders is best revealed by the manner in which they have quietly sought to cultivate good relations and a reputation for impartiality with both Israelis and Palestinians. The following statement by Elder Howard W. Hunter, an apostle, is characteristic of this attitude: "Both the Jews and the Arabs are children of our Father. They are both children of promise, and as a church we do not take sides. We have love for and an interest in each" (pp. 35–36).

The greatest obstacle to Church growth today is the prohibition against proselytizing that prevails in every country in the Middle East. Despite its reputation for vigorous missionary activity in other areas of the world, the Church has observed religious restrictions in the Middle East by making nonproselytizing commitments to government leaders and by issuing strict instructions for members to honor these commitments.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Baldrige, Steven W. Grafting In: A History of the Latter-day Saints in the Holy Land. Murray, Utah, 1989.
- Hunter, Howard W. "All Are Alike Unto God." BYU Speeches of the Year, 1979, pp. 35–36. Provo, Utah.
- Lindsay, Rao H. "A History of the Missionary Activities of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the Near East, 1884–1929." Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1958.

JAMES A. TORONTO

MILITARY AND THE CHURCH

Although the Church is opposed to war and recognizes that going to war is a very poor alternative in resolving conflicts, tens of thousands of Latter-day Saints have served their countries' armed forces, sometimes even fighting in opposing forces, especially in World War II. The Church considers being loyal citizens to be a duty of its members, irrespective of nationality. Responding to a call for military service is one appropriate manner of fulfilling this duty of citizenship. Latter-day Saints who choose military careers have no restrictions on either their fellowship or their callings in the Church. While any member is free to object to military service because of conscience, Church membership in and of itself is not a justification, and Church leaders have discouraged conscientious objection in every conflict of the twentieth century.

The moral question for Church members is much more one of the spirit than of the uniform. It echoes John the Baptist's counsel to soldiers to avoid violence and extortion, and to be content with their wages (Luke 3:14). The Book of Mormon repeatedly counsels soldiers to abhor the shedding of blood (Alma 44:1–7; 48:14–16, 23; Morm. 4:11–12). However, it also contains principles as to when war may be justified. Concerning the action of the Nephites when they were attacked by the Lamanites, the record states:

Nevertheless, the Nephites were inspired by a better cause, for they were not fighting for monarchy nor power but they were fighting for their homes and their liberties, their wives and their children, and their all, yea, for their rites of worship and their church.

And they were doing that which they felt was the duty which they owed to their God; for the Lord had said unto them, and also unto their fathers, that: Inasmuch as ye are not guilty of the first offense, neither the second, ye shall not suffer yourselves to be slain by the hands of your enemies.

And again, the Lord has said that: Ye shall defend your families even unto bloodshed. Therefore for this cause were the Nephites contending with the Lamanites, to defend themselves, and their families, and their lands, their country, and their rights, and their religion [Alma 43:45–47].

One of the Church's first significant involvements with a national military was the organization and the march of the MORMON BATTALION. In

ISSUES AND CHALLENGES. The manner in which the Church has handled a number of sensitive issues in the Middle East illustrates its capacity to adapt to local needs and customs. Between 1841 and 1950, the most vexing problem for the missionaries was how to deal with the poverty and poor health of the members. The Church attempted to alleviate the suffering of members by teaching them new skills, organizing cooperatives to market goods in Salt Lake City, soliciting clothing and food donations from members in Utah, and arranging for relocation to Europe, Mexico, and the United States. Since 1950 the Church has adjusted to issues of a cultural and political nature. One example is the First Presidency's decision to allow members to hold Sabbath services, customarily reserved for Sunday, on the day of worship designated by local religious tradition: Friday in Muslim countries and Saturday in Israel. The Church has refrained from taking an official stand on the Arab-Israeli question; rather, the position of Church leaders is best revealed by the manner in which they have quietly sought to cultivate good relations and a reputation for impartiality with both Israelis and Palestinians. The following statement by Elder Howard W. Hunter, an apostle, is characteristic of this attitude: "Both the Jews and the Arabs are children of our Father. They are both children of promise, and as a church we do not take sides. We have love for and an interest in each" (pp. 35–36).

The greatest obstacle to Church growth today is the prohibition against proselytizing that prevails in every country in the Middle East. Despite its reputation for vigorous missionary activity in other areas of the world, the Church has observed religious restrictions in the Middle East by making nonproselytizing commitments to government leaders and by issuing strict instructions for members to honor these commitments.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Baldrige, Steven W. Grafting In: A History of the Latter-day Saints in the Holy Land. Murray, Utah, 1989.
- Hunter, Howard W. "All Are Alike Unto God." BYU Speeches of the Year, 1979, pp. 35–36. Provo, Utah.
- Lindsay, Rao H. "A History of the Missionary Activities of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the Near East, 1884–1929." Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1958.

JAMES A. TORONTO

MILITARY AND THE CHURCH

Although the Church is opposed to war and recognizes that going to war is a very poor alternative in resolving conflicts, tens of thousands of Latter-day Saints have served their countries' armed forces, sometimes even fighting in opposing forces, especially in World War II. The Church considers being loyal citizens to be a duty of its members, irrespective of nationality. Responding to a call for military service is one appropriate manner of fulfilling this duty of citizenship. Latter-day Saints who choose military careers have no restrictions on either their fellowship or their callings in the Church. While any member is free to object to military service because of conscience, Church membership in and of itself is not a justification, and Church leaders have discouraged conscientious objection in every conflict of the twentieth century.

The moral question for Church members is much more one of the spirit than of the uniform. It echoes John the Baptist's counsel to soldiers to avoid violence and extortion, and to be content with their wages (Luke 3:14). The Book of Mormon repeatedly counsels soldiers to abhor the shedding of blood (Alma 44:1–7; 48:14–16, 23; Morm. 4:11–12). However, it also contains principles as to when war may be justified. Concerning the action of the Nephites when they were attacked by the Lamanites, the record states:

Nevertheless, the Nephites were inspired by a better cause, for they were not fighting for monarchy nor power but they were fighting for their homes and their liberties, their wives and their children, and their all, yea, for their rites of worship and their church.

And they were doing that which they felt was the duty which they owed to their God; for the Lord had said unto them, and also unto their fathers, that: Inasmuch as ye are not guilty of the first offense, neither the second, ye shall not suffer yourselves to be slain by the hands of your enemies.

And again, the Lord has said that: Ye shall defend your families even unto bloodshed. Therefore for this cause were the Nephites contending with the Lamanites, to defend themselves, and their families, and their lands, their country, and their rights, and their religion [Alma 43:45–47].

One of the Church's first significant involvements with a national military was the organization and the march of the MORMON BATTALION. In

Elder Harold B. Lee (front row, standing) and President Hilton A. Robertson of the Japanese Mission, with LDS servicemen at the Chapel in the 8069th AU Compound, Korea, 1954. On this trip, Elder Lee investigated the possibility of opening Korea as a separate mission. Photographer: Jerry Maxwell.

1846, as the Latter-day Saints were beginning their westward migration, they responded to the U.S. Army's request for five hundred volunteers to serve in the conflict with Mexico. The battalion marched from Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, through New Mexico and Arizona into Mexico, and then on to California, without combat. Most of its men then journeyed to join their families in Utah. The relative isolation in Utah provided for very little involvement in the Civil War. The Spanish-American War saw two artillery units mobilized from Utah, with the first LDS chaplain and the first LDS servicemen's worship group organized. Involvement in World War I was similarly based in the activity of Utah soldiers but was far more extensive than in any previous military engagement.

In the period before World War II, President J. Reuben Clark, Jr., counselor in the FIRST PRESIDENCY, vigorously advocated U.S. neutrality, and opposed the maintenance of a standing army with equal vigor when hostilities ceased. However, he was the Church spokesman when it made official declarations encouraging LDS men to respond to their governments' call for military service, despite the fact that these decisions were contrary to his personal viewpoint. In October 1940, he said, "We shall confidently expect that no young man member of the Church will seek to evade his full responsibility" (CR [Oct. 1940]:16). A 1942 First Presidency statement counseled Church members worldwide to be ready to respond to their government's call to military duty and exonerated the members' acts of war: "God . . . will not hold the innocent instrumentalities of the war, our brethren in arms, responsible for the conflict" (MFP 6:159). This statement has been reiterated during each subsequent period of military action.

The Church has always made significant efforts to help its members in the armed forces live by the same moral standards they would uphold at home. The General Servicemen's Committee was organized in 1941 with Elder Harold B. Lee as chairman. Members of the committee had geographical responsibilities, visited military installations, and appointed more than three thousand servicemen as group leaders and assistants. These priesthood leaders facilitated fellowship and organized opportunities for military people who could not meet with ordinary wards and branches to partake of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The principle of servicemen's group leadership as a special case of Church organization continues in force. LDS chaplains coordinate their activities with stakes and missions and are authorized to organize groups and call group leaders any time small numbers of LDS service people are put in circumstances that might restrict their access to worship.

The activities of the General Servicemen's Committee (in 1969 it became the Military Relations Committee) ebbed and flowed with the intensity of military conflict. This committee began providing publications specifically for service personnel during World War II. It distributed pocket-sized copies of the Book of Mormon, a hymnal, and a doctrinal compendium, Principles of the Gospel, and prepared brochures on military life, sexual morality, missionary opportunities, and the Word of Wisdom. These resources formed the basis of a preservice orientation program instituted during the Vietnam era by the Military Relations Committee. Every stake was provided literature, audiovisual resources, and a curricular outline to help people entering the military prepare for that challenge.

The missionary opportunities in the stresses of military life have proven to be significant, both on a personal and on a national basis. Many military people join the Church, and missionary success in countries such as Japan and Korea has gained momentum from the work of servicemen and women. The membership of the Church commonly prays for service people as a group, much as it does for the missionaries.

Servicemen's conferences are held frequently in Europe and the Far East. An English-speaking servicemen's stake was organized in Europe in 1968, providing members living there the full program of the Church in their native tongue.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Boone, Joseph F. "The Roles of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Relation to the United States Military, 1900-1975." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1975.

ROBERT C. OAKS

MILLENARIANISM

While the word "millennium" simply means a thousand years, the Millennium is usually understood as a thousand-year period during which Christ will reign on earth. Latter-day Saints from the beginning anticipated the return of Christ and worked to prepare the world for his coming. The Bible mentions the thousand-year period only in Revelation 20:2-7, though many interpreters believe that various Old Testament prophecies, such as Isaiah's vision of the lamb and lion lying down together (Isa. 11), describe that time. "Millenarianism" refers to belief in and the study of the Millennium—how near it is and what life then will be like.

Not surprisingly, Christians have differed on these matters throughout history. Those who take a literal approach to prophecy anticipate a millennial world fundamentally distinct from the present age, an actual return to the paradisiacal conditions that prevailed in the GARDEN OF EDEN. For others, the millennial prophecies are mere metaphors for the better times ahead as the world is gradually Christianized. In nineteenth-century America, the latter interpretation was dominant. Most people believed that religious revivals and foreign missions, not the personal return of Jesus Christ, would be the means of ushering in the Millennium. They defined the Millennium in terms of the spiritual rather than the spiritual and physical transformation of the earth.

The Latter-day Saints rejected this figurative vision of the future. They believed that only the miraculous, divine intervention of Christ could fully destroy wickedness and re-create the New Eden. Mormons then and now literally expect the earth to be "renewed and receive its paradisiacal glory" (A of F 10). The extraordinary biological, geological, and social changes that will make the earth a paradise include the abolishment of infant mortality, the herbivorization of carnivores; the unification of continental landmasses; and the cessation of all enmity, strife, and warfare.

As the revelations unfolded during the early years of the Church, it was learned that Christ and those raised in the first resurrection at the beginning of the Millennium "will not probably dwell upon the earth, but will visit it when they please, or when it is necessary to govern it" (TPJS, p. 268). The Saints also came to realize that the destruction of the wicked accompanying Christ's second comgraphical responsibilities, visited military installations, and appointed more than three thousand servicemen as group leaders and assistants. These priesthood leaders facilitated fellowship and organized opportunities for military people who could not meet with ordinary wards and branches to partake of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The principle of servicemen's group leadership as a special case of Church organization continues in force. LDS chaplains coordinate their activities with stakes and missions and are authorized to organize groups and call group leaders any time small numbers of LDS service people are put in circumstances that might restrict their access to worship.

The activities of the General Servicemen's Committee (in 1969 it became the Military Relations Committee) ebbed and flowed with the intensity of military conflict. This committee began providing publications specifically for service personnel during World War II. It distributed pocket-sized copies of the Book of Mormon, a hymnal, and a doctrinal compendium, Principles of the Gospel, and prepared brochures on military life, sexual morality, missionary opportunities, and the Word of Wisdom. These resources formed the basis of a preservice orientation program instituted during the Vietnam era by the Military Relations Committee. Every stake was provided literature, audiovisual resources, and a curricular outline to help people entering the military prepare for that challenge.

The missionary opportunities in the stresses of military life have proven to be significant, both on a personal and on a national basis. Many military people join the Church, and missionary success in countries such as Japan and Korea has gained momentum from the work of servicemen and women. The membership of the Church commonly prays for service people as a group, much as it does for the missionaries.

Servicemen's conferences are held frequently in Europe and the Far East. An English-speaking servicemen's stake was organized in Europe in 1968, providing members living there the full program of the Church in their native tongue.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Boone, Joseph F. "The Roles of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Relation to the United States Military, 1900-1975." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1975.

ROBERT C. OAKS

MILLENARIANISM

While the word "millennium" simply means a thousand years, the Millennium is usually understood as a thousand-year period during which Christ will reign on earth. Latter-day Saints from the beginning anticipated the return of Christ and worked to prepare the world for his coming. The Bible mentions the thousand-year period only in Revelation 20:2-7, though many interpreters believe that various Old Testament prophecies, such as Isaiah's vision of the lamb and lion lying down together (Isa. 11), describe that time. "Millenarianism" refers to belief in and the study of the Millennium—how near it is and what life then will be like.

Not surprisingly, Christians have differed on these matters throughout history. Those who take a literal approach to prophecy anticipate a millennial world fundamentally distinct from the present age, an actual return to the paradisiacal conditions that prevailed in the GARDEN OF EDEN. For others, the millennial prophecies are mere metaphors for the better times ahead as the world is gradually Christianized. In nineteenth-century America, the latter interpretation was dominant. Most people believed that religious revivals and foreign missions, not the personal return of Jesus Christ, would be the means of ushering in the Millennium. They defined the Millennium in terms of the spiritual rather than the spiritual and physical transformation of the earth.

The Latter-day Saints rejected this figurative vision of the future. They believed that only the miraculous, divine intervention of Christ could fully destroy wickedness and re-create the New Eden. Mormons then and now literally expect the earth to be "renewed and receive its paradisiacal glory" (A of F 10). The extraordinary biological, geological, and social changes that will make the earth a paradise include the abolishment of infant mortality, the herbivorization of carnivores; the unification of continental landmasses; and the cessation of all enmity, strife, and warfare.

As the revelations unfolded during the early years of the Church, it was learned that Christ and those raised in the first resurrection at the beginning of the Millennium "will not probably dwell upon the earth, but will visit it when they please, or when it is necessary to govern it" (TPJS, p. 268). The Saints also came to realize that the destruction of the wicked accompanying Christ's second coming will not remove all unbelievers from the earth. Thus, missionary work will be a major millennial activity. Once the role of temples in the redemption of living and dead became clear, temple work was added to the list of anticipated millennial pursuits.

Since the first century, some Christians have felt that the second coming of Christ was near. Given the numerous revelations to Joseph SMITH and the other dramatic developments of early Church history, many early Latter-day Saints also expected the promised day in their lifetimes. That feeling has been strong at other periods during the subsequent history of the Church, though not as sustained or pervasive as in its earliest years. While affirming the significance of the Millennium, modern Church leaders regularly make calming and qualifying statements as a counterpoint to undue anxiety about its proximity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Clouse, Robert G., ed. The Meaning of the Millennium. New York, 1974.
- Gaustad, Edwin S., ed. The Rise of Adventism. New York, 1974.
- Underwood, Grant. "The Millenarian World of Early Mormonism." Ph.D. diss., University of California at Los Angeles, 1988.

GRANT UNDERWOOD

---

MILLENNIAL STAR

The Latter-day Saints' Millennial Star was the official publication of the Church in the BRITISH ISLES from 1840 to 1970. Filled with editorials often written by GENERAL AUTHORITIES and with expositions of the history, DOCTRINE, and organization of the Church, the Millennial Star became a literary landmark in the Church. Parley P. Pratt, an APOSTLE of the Church and the first editor of the periodical, outlined its purpose in its first issue, May, 1840, "The Millennial Star will stand aloof from the common political and commercial news of the day. Its columns will be devoted to the spread of the fulness of the gospel—the restoration of the ancient principles of Christianity—the gathering of Israel—the rolling forth of the kingdom of God among the nations—the signs of the times— . . . in short, whatever is shown forth indicative of the coming of the 'Son of Man,' and the ushering in of his universal reign on the earth."

That first issue also contained an editorial; extracts of REVELATIONS given to the Prophet Joseph SMITH and published in the United States in the Doctrine and Covenants; challenges to circulars against the Church from other churches; articles on what other religions believe; a report of the CONFERENCE on the Church in Preston, England; current history of the Church in the United States; letters from MISSIONARIES; poetry; and two HYMNS. Subsequent issues of the Star (as it was popularly known) followed a similar pattern throughout the years. Some of its poems became the lyrics for Church hymns, such as "Israel, Israel, God Is Calling."

The presidents of the British Mission were always listed as the editors, among whom were five future PRESIDENTS OF THE CHURCH: Wilford WOODRUFF, Joseph F. SMITH, Heber J. GRANT, George Albert SMITH, and David O. MCKAY.

The Star was nearly discontinued three times: in 1841 and in 1843 due to lack of subscribers, and a century later during World War II, when all the American missionaries were withdrawn from England. Its pages are an excellent source for the history and development of the Church. Its serial "History of Joseph" was a foundation document for the multivolume History of the Church.

The Millennial Star was officially retired in 1970, when it was subsumed into the Ensign, the current English-language magazine for adults in the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hill, James P. "Story of the Star." Millennial Star 130:12 (1970):10–13.

STANLEY A. PETERSON

---

MILLENNIUM

As a generic term, "millennium" connotes any period of 1,000 years' duration. In the Judeo-Christian tradition, however, one such period stands preeminent, namely, that future time when peace and righteousness will prevail under the direct providence of God and his MESSIAH.

The prophet ISAIAH spoke of this time when "they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2:4). He further declared that

ing will not remove all unbelievers from the earth. Thus, missionary work will be a major millennial activity. Once the role of temples in the redemption of living and dead became clear, temple work was added to the list of anticipated millennial pursuits.

Since the first century, some Christians have felt that the second coming of Christ was near. Given the numerous revelations to Joseph SMITH and the other dramatic developments of early Church history, many early Latter-day Saints also expected the promised day in their lifetimes. That feeling has been strong at other periods during the subsequent history of the Church, though not as sustained or pervasive as in its earliest years. While affirming the significance of the Millennium, modern Church leaders regularly make calming and qualifying statements as a counterpoint to undue anxiety about its proximity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Clouse, Robert G., ed. The Meaning of the Millennium. New York, 1974.
- Gaustad, Edwin S., ed. The Rise of Adventism. New York, 1974.
- Underwood, Grant. "The Millenarian World of Early Mormonism." Ph.D. diss., University of California at Los Angeles, 1988.

GRANT UNDERWOOD

---

MILLENNIAL STAR

The Latter-day Saints' Millennial Star was the official publication of the Church in the BRITISH ISLES from 1840 to 1970. Filled with editorials often written by GENERAL AUTHORITIES and with expositions of the history, DOCTRINE, and organization of the Church, the Millennial Star became a literary landmark in the Church. Parley P. Pratt, an APOSTLE of the Church and the first editor of the periodical, outlined its purpose in its first issue, May, 1840, "The Millennial Star will stand aloof from the common political and commercial news of the day. Its columns will be devoted to the spread of the fulness of the gospel—the restoration of the ancient principles of Christianity—the gathering of Israel—the rolling forth of the kingdom of God among the nations—the signs of the times— . . . in short, whatever is shown forth indicative of the coming of the 'Son of Man,' and the ushering in of his universal reign on the earth."

That first issue also contained an editorial; extracts of REVELATIONS given to the Prophet Joseph SMITH and published in the United States in the Doctrine and Covenants; challenges to circulars against the Church from other churches; articles on what other religions believe; a report of the CONFERENCE on the Church in Preston, England; current history of the Church in the United States; letters from MISSIONARIES; poetry; and two HYMNS. Subsequent issues of the Star (as it was popularly known) followed a similar pattern throughout the years. Some of its poems became the lyrics for Church hymns, such as "Israel, Israel, God Is Calling."

The presidents of the British Mission were always listed as the editors, among whom were five future PRESIDENTS OF THE CHURCH: Wilford WOODRUFF, Joseph F. SMITH, Heber J. GRANT, George Albert SMITH, and David O. MCKAY.

The Star was nearly discontinued three times: in 1841 and in 1843 due to lack of subscribers, and a century later during World War II, when all the American missionaries were withdrawn from England. Its pages are an excellent source for the history and development of the Church. Its serial "History of Joseph" was a foundation document for the multivolume History of the Church.

The Millennial Star was officially retired in 1970, when it was subsumed into the Ensign, the current English-language magazine for adults in the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hill, James P. "Story of the Star." Millennial Star 130:12 (1970):10–13.

STANLEY A. PETERSON

---

MILLENNIUM

As a generic term, "millennium" connotes any period of 1,000 years' duration. In the Judeo-Christian tradition, however, one such period stands preeminent, namely, that future time when peace and righteousness will prevail under the direct providence of God and his MESSIAH.

The prophet ISAIAH spoke of this time when "they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2:4). He further declared that

ing will not remove all unbelievers from the earth. Thus, missionary work will be a major millennial activity. Once the role of temples in the redemption of living and dead became clear, temple work was added to the list of anticipated millennial pursuits.

Since the first century, some Christians have felt that the second coming of Christ was near. Given the numerous revelations to Joseph SMITH and the other dramatic developments of early Church history, many early Latter-day Saints also expected the promised day in their lifetimes. That feeling has been strong at other periods during the subsequent history of the Church, though not as sustained or pervasive as in its earliest years. While affirming the significance of the Millennium, modern Church leaders regularly make calming and qualifying statements as a counterpoint to undue anxiety about its proximity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Clouse, Robert G., ed. The Meaning of the Millennium. New York, 1974.
- Gaustad, Edwin S., ed. The Rise of Adventism. New York, 1974.
- Underwood, Grant. "The Millenarian World of Early Mormonism." Ph.D. diss., University of California at Los Angeles, 1988.

GRANT UNDERWOOD

---

MILLENNIAL STAR

The Latter-day Saints' Millennial Star was the official publication of the Church in the BRITISH ISLES from 1840 to 1970. Filled with editorials often written by GENERAL AUTHORITIES and with expositions of the history, DOCTRINE, and organization of the Church, the Millennial Star became a literary landmark in the Church. Parley P. Pratt, an APOSTLE of the Church and the first editor of the periodical, outlined its purpose in its first issue, May, 1840, "The Millennial Star will stand aloof from the common political and commercial news of the day. Its columns will be devoted to the spread of the fulness of the gospel—the restoration of the ancient principles of Christianity—the gathering of Israel—the rolling forth of the kingdom of God among the nations—the signs of the times— . . . in short, whatever is shown forth indicative of the coming of the 'Son of Man,' and the ushering in of his universal reign on the earth."

That first issue also contained an editorial; extracts of REVELATIONS given to the Prophet Joseph SMITH and published in the United States in the Doctrine and Covenants; challenges to circulars against the Church from other churches; articles on what other religions believe; a report of the CONFERENCE on the Church in Preston, England; current history of the Church in the United States; letters from MISSIONARIES; poetry; and two HYMNS. Subsequent issues of the Star (as it was popularly known) followed a similar pattern throughout the years. Some of its poems became the lyrics for Church hymns, such as "Israel, Israel, God Is Calling."

The presidents of the British Mission were always listed as the editors, among whom were five future PRESIDENTS OF THE CHURCH: Wilford WOODRUFF, Joseph F. SMITH, Heber J. GRANT, George Albert SMITH, and David O. MCKAY.

The Star was nearly discontinued three times: in 1841 and in 1843 due to lack of subscribers, and a century later during World War II, when all the American missionaries were withdrawn from England. Its pages are an excellent source for the history and development of the Church. Its serial "History of Joseph" was a foundation document for the multivolume History of the Church.

The Millennial Star was officially retired in 1970, when it was subsumed into the Ensign, the current English-language magazine for adults in the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hill, James P. "Story of the Star." Millennial Star 130:12 (1970):10–13.

STANLEY A. PETERSON

---

MILLENNIUM

As a generic term, "millennium" connotes any period of 1,000 years' duration. In the Judeo-Christian tradition, however, one such period stands preeminent, namely, that future time when peace and righteousness will prevail under the direct providence of God and his MESSIAH.

The prophet ISAIAH spoke of this time when "they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2:4). He further declared that the natural fears and enmities within the animal kingdom will cease, that “the wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid” (Isa. 11:6–9; cf. D&C 101:26). EZEKIEL prophesied that the EARTH, which lost its pristine character as a result of the FALL OF ADAM (cf. Gen. 3:17–19), will return to its paradisiacal state once again (Ezek. 36:35; cf. A of F 10). For the duration of the Millennium, Satan will be bound (Rev. 20:1–3). In place of the diabolical regime of the “prince of this world” (John 12:31; 14:30; D&C 1:35), the Lord Jesus Christ will dwell personally among the inhabitants of earth, ruling over the KINGDOM OF GOD with the aid of righteous mortals and resurrected Saints from all ages (Isa. 35:2; Dan. 7:14, 27).

Christ taught his disciples to pray to the Father for the kingdom to come when his will would be done on earth as it is in heaven (Matt. 6:10). Jesus declared to them that he would be sent again by the Father at the end of the world for a day of JUDGMENT and an era of paradisiacal glory (cf. Matt. 25:31–46; John 5:22–29; Acts 1:3–8). Some early Christians appear to have anticipated the SECOND COMING OF JESUS CHRIST and the onset of the Millennium as imminent, despite the Savior’s caution that none but the Father knew the time of his coming, and despite both angelic and apostolic pronouncements concerning events that must precede the Millennium (cf. Matt. 24; Acts 3:19–21; 2 Thes. 2:1–4). Numerous church leaders in the Post-Apostolic (Patristic) period, such as Justin Martyr of Rome, Papias of Hierapolis, Irenaeus of Lyons, and Lactantius, accepted the notion of a literal millennium following the resurrection of the dead, when a visible and glorious kingdom of Christ would exist on earth. By the late third and fourth centuries, however, church fathers such as Origen (d. c. A.D. 254) and Augustine (d. A.D. 429) had transformed the notion of a literal millennium into an allegorical or figurative one: The millennial reign of peace for them took place in the hearts of individual men and women and began with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost (cf. Acts 2:16–20). From that time until the sixteenth-century PROTESTANT REFORMATION, belief in a literal millennium was regarded as unorthodox by the institutional church. The RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS in this, the DISPENSATION OF THE FULNESS OF TIMES, affirms that Christ will return for a millennial reign of peace. During the Millennium, members of the Church of Jesus Christ from any era of time will help in the government of the earth under Christ’s direction (Dan. 7:27; D&C 103:7; cf. Matt. 5:5).

John the Revelator saw that at the commencement of the Millennium a NEW JERUSALEM would descend to earth from heaven. Traditional Christianity has generally associated this with a renewing of the city where Jesus ministered among the Jews during the meridian of time. However, the revelations given to the Prophet Joseph SMITH show that the New Jerusalem in the Western Hemisphere will coexist with the old Jerusalem, each as a hemispheric capital. From them laws, decrees, and leadership in the kingdom of God will emanate. Thus the nuances found in Isaiah 2:3 that “out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem” telling of two locations are not redundant or merely rhetorical. According to modern scripture, a New Jerusalem will yet be established within the borders of the state of Missouri in North America (D&C 84:2–4; cf. 57:2–3; A of F 10).

The Millennium symbolizes a sabbatical in human history (cf. D&C 77:12; Moses 7:64), analogous to the role of the weekly SABBATH (cf. Ex. 20:8–11). The millennial period is patterned after the Lord’s period of rest following the six creative periods (cf. Gen. 2:1–3).

Life will go on for those on earth: “And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them, . . . and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands” (Isa. 65:21–22). Righteous mortal men and women who die after the beginning of the Millennium “shall not sleep . . . in the earth, but shall be changed in the twinkling of an eye” (D&C 101:31), and children born in this era “shall grow up until they become old” (D&C 63:51; Isa. 65:20). The devil will have no “power to tempt any man,” being bound because of the righteousness of the earth’s inhabitants, and children will grow up without sin (1 Ne. 22:26; D&C 43:30–31; 45:58; 101:28–31). However, those who are wicked will not be resurrected or returned to the earth until after the millennium of righteousness (D&C 76:81, 85).

Whereas numerous temples will already dot the earth prior to the Millennium, their number and distribution will increase during this time, providing places where priesthood ordinances essential to salvation and eternal life can be performed in uninterrupted calm. The work of preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ to all the inhabitants of the earth will continue under his direction. Meanwhile, a similar teaching program will continue among the spirits of those who have departed this life and are waiting the day of their resurrection (D&C 138). While such spirits may hear the gospel of salvation and accept or reject it in the spirit worlds, mortals on earth will perform saving ordinances such as baptism on their behalf (see BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD). Conditions of peace and righteousness will prevail during the Millennium to allow this work to proceed until essential ordinances have been made available to every individual who has lived on earth since the time of Adam and Eve (cf. D&C 138).

[See also Last Days; New Heaven and New Earth; Time and Eternity.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Doxey, Roy W. "The Millennium." Relief Society Magazine 54 (Jan. 1967):58–63.
- Leonard, Glen M. "Early Saints and the Millennium." Ensign 9 (Aug. 1979):43–47.
- McConkie, Bruce R. MD, pp. 492–501. Salt Lake City, 1966.

PAUL B. PIXTON

---

MINORITIES

[In the Book of Mormon, God invites "all to come unto him and partake of his goodness; and he denieth none that come unto him, black and white, bond and free, male and female; and he remembereth the heathen; and all are alike unto God" (2 Nc. 26:33). As LDS missionaries have preached the gospel of Jesus Christ to "every nation, kindred, tongue, and people," people from many ethnic groups from all over the world have accepted baptism and become members of the Church. See Vital Statistics.

Emphasis has been placed on taking the gospel to the American Indians and to the other peoples of the Americas. See Indian Student Placement Services; Lamanites; Mexico and Central America, The Church in; Native Americans; South America, The Church in.

Substantial LDS populations also exist in the Pacific Islands. See Hawaii, The Church in; Oceania, The Church in; and Polynesians.

In 1978 a revelation extended the priesthood to all worthy males. This allowed the priesthood to be held by blacks. See Africa, The Church in; Blacks; Doctrine and Covenants; Official Declaration—2; Priesthood; South America, The Church in; Brazil; and West Indies, The Church in.]

---

MIRACLES

A miracle is a beneficial event brought about through divine power that mortals do not understand and of themselves cannot duplicate. Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints believe in the reality of miracles as a consequence of their belief in the existence of God and of his power and goodness.

Just as a shepherd tends his flocks, watches over them, and uses his power to help them, so Jesus Christ used his power and knowledge to help others when he was on earth. For instance, when the supply of wine was exhausted at the marriage feast at Cana, at his mother's request, Jesus miraculously provided wine (John 2:1–10). This act was consistent with his love and compassion, but the means by which he changed the water into wine is not understood, and of themselves people cannot duplicate it. Thus, it is called a miracle. Numerous other examples of the beneficial results of miracles performed by Jesus include the raising from the dead of the widow's son at Naim (Luke 7:11–16), the cleansing of the ten lepers (Luke 17:12–19), and the restoration of the sight of the blind man at Bethsaida (Mark 8:22–26).

Latter-day Saints value miracles because of their beneficial character. As stated in the Book of Mormon, "God has provided a means that man, through faith, might work mighty miracles; therefore he becometh a great benefit to his fellow beings" (Mosiah 8:18). Although God brings about marvelous events to bless humankind, it is known that not every spiritual manifestation necessarily comes from God (TPJS, pp. 202–214; Rev. 13:13–14; see also SIGN SEEKING).

Faith is considered necessary to bring divine intervention in behalf of those in need. For example, as the Book of Mormon prophet ALMA<sub>2</sub> noted, LEHI and his group of emigrants were given the LIAHONA, a compasslike device to direct their travels toward a new and promised land. "And it did work for them according to their faith in God; therefore, if they had faith to believe that God could cause that those spindles [of the compass] should point the way they should go, behold it was done; therefore they had this miracle, and also many other miracles wrought by the power of God, day by day" (Alma 37:40).

God desires to bless his children, and sometimes does so in ways that require the manifestation of extraordinary power. He is restrained only habitants of the earth will continue under his direction. Meanwhile, a similar teaching program will continue among the spirits of those who have departed this life and are waiting the day of their resurrection (D&C 138). While such spirits may hear the gospel of salvation and accept or reject it in the spirit worlds, mortals on earth will perform saving ordinances such as baptism on their behalf (see BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD). Conditions of peace and righteousness will prevail during the Millennium to allow this work to proceed until essential ordinances have been made available to every individual who has lived on earth since the time of Adam and Eve (cf. D&C 138).

[See also Last Days; New Heaven and New Earth; Time and Eternity.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Doxey, Roy W. "The Millennium." Relief Society Magazine 54 (Jan. 1967):58–63.
- Leonard, Glen M. "Early Saints and the Millennium." Ensign 9 (Aug. 1979):43–47.
- McConkie, Bruce R. MD, pp. 492–501. Salt Lake City, 1966.

PAUL B. PIXTON

---

MINORITIES

[In the Book of Mormon, God invites "all to come unto him and partake of his goodness; and he denieth none that come unto him, black and white, bond and free, male and female; and he remembereth the heathen; and all are alike unto God" (2 Nc. 26:33). As LDS missionaries have preached the gospel of Jesus Christ to "every nation, kindred, tongue, and people," people from many ethnic groups from all over the world have accepted baptism and become members of the Church. See Vital Statistics.

Emphasis has been placed on taking the gospel to the American Indians and to the other peoples of the Americas. See Indian Student Placement Services; Lamanites; Mexico and Central America, The Church in; Native Americans; South America, The Church in.

Substantial LDS populations also exist in the Pacific Islands. See Hawaii, The Church in; Oceania, The Church in; and Polynesians.

In 1978 a revelation extended the priesthood to all worthy males. This allowed the priesthood to be held by blacks. See Africa, The Church in; Blacks; Doctrine and Covenants; Official Declaration—2; Priesthood; South America, The Church in; Brazil; and West Indies, The Church in.]

---

MIRACLES

A miracle is a beneficial event brought about through divine power that mortals do not understand and of themselves cannot duplicate. Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints believe in the reality of miracles as a consequence of their belief in the existence of God and of his power and goodness.

Just as a shepherd tends his flocks, watches over them, and uses his power to help them, so Jesus Christ used his power and knowledge to help others when he was on earth. For instance, when the supply of wine was exhausted at the marriage feast at Cana, at his mother's request, Jesus miraculously provided wine (John 2:1–10). This act was consistent with his love and compassion, but the means by which he changed the water into wine is not understood, and of themselves people cannot duplicate it. Thus, it is called a miracle. Numerous other examples of the beneficial results of miracles performed by Jesus include the raising from the dead of the widow's son at Naim (Luke 7:11–16), the cleansing of the ten lepers (Luke 17:12–19), and the restoration of the sight of the blind man at Bethsaida (Mark 8:22–26).

Latter-day Saints value miracles because of their beneficial character. As stated in the Book of Mormon, "God has provided a means that man, through faith, might work mighty miracles; therefore he becometh a great benefit to his fellow beings" (Mosiah 8:18). Although God brings about marvelous events to bless humankind, it is known that not every spiritual manifestation necessarily comes from God (TPJS, pp. 202–214; Rev. 13:13–14; see also SIGN SEEKING).

Faith is considered necessary to bring divine intervention in behalf of those in need. For example, as the Book of Mormon prophet ALMA<sub>2</sub> noted, LEHI and his group of emigrants were given the LIAHONA, a compasslike device to direct their travels toward a new and promised land. "And it did work for them according to their faith in God; therefore, if they had faith to believe that God could cause that those spindles [of the compass] should point the way they should go, behold it was done; therefore they had this miracle, and also many other miracles wrought by the power of God, day by day" (Alma 37:40).

God desires to bless his children, and sometimes does so in ways that require the manifestation of extraordinary power. He is restrained only habitants of the earth will continue under his direction. Meanwhile, a similar teaching program will continue among the spirits of those who have departed this life and are waiting the day of their resurrection (D&C 138). While such spirits may hear the gospel of salvation and accept or reject it in the spirit worlds, mortals on earth will perform saving ordinances such as baptism on their behalf (see BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD). Conditions of peace and righteousness will prevail during the Millennium to allow this work to proceed until essential ordinances have been made available to every individual who has lived on earth since the time of Adam and Eve (cf. D&C 138).

[See also Last Days; New Heaven and New Earth; Time and Eternity.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Doxey, Roy W. "The Millennium." Relief Society Magazine 54 (Jan. 1967):58–63.
- Leonard, Glen M. "Early Saints and the Millennium." Ensign 9 (Aug. 1979):43–47.
- McConkie, Bruce R. MD, pp. 492–501. Salt Lake City, 1966.

PAUL B. PIXTON

---

MINORITIES

[In the Book of Mormon, God invites "all to come unto him and partake of his goodness; and he denieth none that come unto him, black and white, bond and free, male and female; and he remembereth the heathen; and all are alike unto God" (2 Nc. 26:33). As LDS missionaries have preached the gospel of Jesus Christ to "every nation, kindred, tongue, and people," people from many ethnic groups from all over the world have accepted baptism and become members of the Church. See Vital Statistics.

Emphasis has been placed on taking the gospel to the American Indians and to the other peoples of the Americas. See Indian Student Placement Services; Lamanites; Mexico and Central America, The Church in; Native Americans; South America, The Church in.

Substantial LDS populations also exist in the Pacific Islands. See Hawaii, The Church in; Oceania, The Church in; and Polynesians.

In 1978 a revelation extended the priesthood to all worthy males. This allowed the priesthood to be held by blacks. See Africa, The Church in; Blacks; Doctrine and Covenants: Official Declaration—2; Priesthood; South America, The Church in; Brazil; and West Indies, The Church in.]

---

MIRACLES

A miracle is a beneficial event brought about through divine power that mortals do not understand and of themselves cannot duplicate. Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints believe in the reality of miracles as a consequence of their belief in the existence of God and of his power and goodness.

Just as a shepherd tends his flocks, watches over them, and uses his power to help them, so Jesus Christ used his power and knowledge to help others when he was on earth. For instance, when the supply of wine was exhausted at the marriage feast at Cana, at his mother's request, Jesus miraculously provided wine (John 2:1–10). This act was consistent with his love and compassion, but the means by which he changed the water into wine is not understood, and of themselves people cannot duplicate it. Thus, it is called a miracle. Numerous other examples of the beneficial results of miracles performed by Jesus include the raising from the dead of the widow's son at Naim (Luke 7:11–16), the cleansing of the ten lepers (Luke 17:12–19), and the restoration of the sight of the blind man at Bethsaida (Mark 8:22–26).

Latter-day Saints value miracles because of their beneficial character. As stated in the Book of Mormon, "God has provided a means that man, through faith, might work mighty miracles; therefore he becometh a great benefit to his fellow beings" (Mosiah 8:18). Although God brings about marvelous events to bless humankind, it is known that not every spiritual manifestation necessarily comes from God (TPJS, pp. 202–214; Rev. 13:13–14; see also SIGN SEEKING).

Faith is considered necessary to bring divine intervention in behalf of those in need. For example, as the Book of Mormon prophet ALMA<sub>2</sub> noted, LEHI and his group of emigrants were given the LIAHONA, a compasslike device to direct their travels toward a new and promised land. "And it did work for them according to their faith in God; therefore, if they had faith to believe that God could cause that those spindles [of the compass] should point the way they should go, behold it was done; therefore they had this miracle, and also many other miracles wrought by the power of God, day by day" (Alma 37:40).

God desires to bless his children, and sometimes does so in ways that require the manifestation of extraordinary power. He is restrained only by their lack of faith. Thus, the absence of miracles is evidence of the lack of faith among his children, “for it is by faith that miracles are wrought; and it is by faith that angels appear and minister unto men; wherefore, if these things have ceased wo be unto the children of men, for it is because of unbelief, and all is vain” (Moro. 7:37). “For if there be no faith among the children of men God can do no miraele among them” (Ether 12:12).

Catching Quails, by C. C. A. Christensen (late nineteenth century, tempera on canvas, 6'6" × 9'9"). The last of the Mormons driven from Nauvoo were forced out with few provisions. Many were sick, and some died. On October 9, 1846, many quail flew into camp on the river bank above Montrose, Iowa. Many were caught, cooked, and eaten. To the Saints it was a miracle paralleling a similar incident in ancient Israel (cf. Exodus 16:13). Courtesy Museum of Fine Arts, Brigham Young University.

When the faithful receive a blessing from God, especially one that requires a manifestation of his extraordinary power, the proper response is gratitude to God for the blessing (D&C 46:32). Manifestations of God’s extraordinary power usually come only after faith and do not necessarily create faith (cf. Ether 12:7); it is appropriate, therefore, not to make a public show of such sacred experiences as a demonstration of religious belief. Seeking manifestations of the extraordinary power of the divine for the purpose of coming to believe is rejected as improper sign seeking.

Of the miraculous GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT that come to the righteous, the Lord says, “For verily I say unto you, they are given for the benefit of those who love me and keep all my commandments, and him that seeketh so to do; that all may be benefited that seek or that ask of me, that ask and not for a sign that they may consume it upon their lusts. . . . And all these gifts come from God, for the benefit of the children of God” (D&C 46:9, 26).

A miraculous gift especially valued is the healing of the sick. However, not every faithful soul who ails will be raised, for the Lord has said, “And whosoever among you are sick, and have not faith to be healed, but believe, shall be nourished and with all tenderness, with herbs and mild food. . . . And the elders of the church, two or more, shall be called, and shall pray for and lay their hands upon them in my name; and if they die they shall die unto me, and if they live they shall live unto me” (D&C 42:43–44). Thus though the sick may be healed (D&C 46:19), if that does not occur, the sick are nourished by all prudent means, including those available in modern medical science. The ELDERS of the Church perform this ordinance of administering to the sick, as the scriptures prescribe (cf. James 5:14–15; D&C 46:20), and the healing or other blessings are then in accordance with the will of God.

Personal experience with miracles might confirm the faith of the recipients. Further, personal experiences with miracles may give others increased confidence in scriptural accounts of miracles.

Of all the miraculous gifts of God given to his children, the one of greatest benefit is the ATONEMENT OF JESUS CHRIST. By powers and means not understood by mere mortals, Jesus was able to take upon himself the sins of the world and make it possible for anyone by REPENTANCE, to escape the otherwise inescapable suffering of sin and the doom of death, and thereby return to the presence of God. “For behold, I, God, have suffered these things for all, that they might not suffer if they would repent . . . which suffering caused myself, even God, the greatest of all, to tremble because of pain, and to bleed at every pore, and to suffer both body and spirit” (D&C 19:16, 18). The miracle of forgiveness and the marvel of resurrection are supreme indeed.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. Faith Precedes the Miracle, chap. 1. Salt Lake City, 1972.

PAUL C. HEDENGREN

---

MISSIONARY, MISSIONARY LIFE

Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints accept Jesus’ injunction to his ordained disciples, “Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost” (Matt. 28:19). They accept, indeed, a reiteration of it in modern times: “Go ye into all the world, preach the gospel to every creature, acting in the authority which I have given you, baptizing in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost” (D&C 68:8). Missionaries consider themselves emissaries of the Lord in proclaiming his message.

WHO ARE CALLED. In the first generation of the Church, married men frequently were called to be missionaries, and they left wives and families for an indeterminate length of time. In recent decades, the majority of missionaries have been young men and women who serve about two years.

Currently, the Church calls as missionaries, on a voluntary, temporary basis, single men from the ages of nineteen to twenty-six, single women twenty-one years and older, and older married couples with no dependent children. Missionary service is coordinated with military service as required.

Missionaries or their families generally cover the major costs of serving a mission. Missionaries called from developing nations may receive needed financial assistance from the general missionary fund of the Church. This assistance covers only basic living costs, as the Church has no paid ministry. No one is paid for missionary service.

As the Church has expanded, more and more missionaries have been called. Approximately 76 percent currently are young men, 18 percent are women, and 7 percent are couples. The number of retired couples accepting calls to serve missions is increasing, with many couples serving more than one mission.

CALLING AND TRAINING. The official missionary call is preceded by an interview, often requested by the prospective missionary, with the ward BISHOP, who assesses the person’s worthiness and spiritual preparation. Prolonged formal study to preach the gospel is not required, but LDS parents are expected to prepare their children for missionary service through family scripture study and participation in Church classes and programs. Parents are also encouraged to teach children basic nutrition, health care, and homemaking skills that are essential for missionary service.

When a bishop has approved a missionary candidate, he sends the recommendation to the STAKE PRESIDENT, who also interviews the prospective missionary. When this process is complete, the stake president sends the recommendation to the Missionary Department of the Church. Designated members of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES suggest a preliminary assignment for each missionary or couple. These assignments are then sent to the FIRST PRESIDENCY of the Church, who confirms or modifies them on the basis of inspiration. These procedures are in keeping with the scriptural admonition that “no man taketh this honour [of ministering in the Church or are nourished by all prudent means, including those available in modern medical science. The ELDERS of the Church perform this ordinance of administering to the sick, as the scriptures prescribe (cf. James 5:14–15; D&C 46:20), and the healing or other blessings are then in accordance with the will of God.

Personal experience with miracles might confirm the faith of the recipients. Further, personal experiences with miracles may give others increased confidence in scriptural accounts of miracles.

Of all the miraculous gifts of God given to his children, the one of greatest benefit is the ATONEMENT OF JESUS CHRIST. By powers and means not understood by mere mortals, Jesus was able to take upon himself the sins of the world and make it possible for anyone by REPENTANCE, to escape the otherwise inescapable suffering of sin and the doom of death, and thereby return to the presence of God. “For behold, I, God, have suffered these things for all, that they might not suffer if they would repent . . . which suffering caused myself, even God, the greatest of all, to tremble because of pain, and to bleed at every pore, and to suffer both body and spirit” (D&C 19:16, 18). The miracle of forgiveness and the marvel of resurrection are supreme indeed.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. Faith Precedes the Miracle, chap. 1. Salt Lake City, 1972.

PAUL C. HEDENGREN

---

MISSIONARY, MISSIONARY LIFE

Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints accept Jesus' injunction to his ordained disciples, “Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost” (Matt. 28:19). They accept, indeed, a reiteration of it in modern times: “Go ye into all the world, preach the gospel to every creature, acting in the authority which I have given you, baptizing in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost” (D&C 68:8). Missionaries consider themselves emissaries of the Lord in proclaiming his message.

WHO ARE CALLED. In the first generation of the Church, married men frequently were called to be missionaries, and they left wives and families for an indeterminate length of time. In recent decades, the majority of missionaries have been young men and women who serve about two years.

Currently, the Church calls as missionaries, on a voluntary, temporary basis, single men from the ages of nineteen to twenty-six, single women twenty-one years and older, and older married couples with no dependent children. Missionary service is coordinated with military service as required.

Missionaries or their families generally cover the major costs of serving a mission. Missionaries called from developing nations may receive needed financial assistance from the general missionary fund of the Church. This assistance covers only basic living costs, as the Church has no paid ministry. No one is paid for missionary service.

As the Church has expanded, more and more missionaries have been called. Approximately 76 percent currently are young men, 18 percent are women, and 7 percent are couples. The number of retired couples accepting calls to serve missions is increasing, with many couples serving more than one mission.

CALLING AND TRAINING. The official missionary call is preceded by an interview, often requested by the prospective missionary, with the ward BISHOP, who assesses the person's worthiness and spiritual preparation. Prolonged formal study to preach the gospel is not required, but LDS parents are expected to prepare their children for missionary service through family scripture study and participation in Church classes and programs. Parents are also encouraged to teach children basic nutrition, health care, and homemaking skills that are essential for missionary service.

When a bishop has approved a missionary candidate, he sends the recommendation to the STAKE PRESIDENT, who also interviews the prospective missionary. When this process is complete, the stake president sends the recommendation to the Missionary Department of the Church. Designated members of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES suggest a preliminary assignment for each missionary or couple. These assignments are then sent to the FIRST PRESIDENCY of the Church, who confirms or modifies them on the basis of inspiration. These procedures are in keeping with the scriptural admonition that “no man taketh this honour [of ministering in the Church or preaching the gospel in the world] unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron" (Heb. 5:4). Missionaries may be called to serve in nearby states or countries or anywhere in the world where there is an established mission of the Church. A letter calling the missionary or couple to a specific mission, bearing the signature of the President of the Church, is sent requesting a reply of acceptance or rejection of the call.

The prospective missionary generally is allowed several weeks to prepare before reporting at an appointed date to the nearest Church MISSIONARY TRAINING CENTER (MTC). Often the newly called missionary receives a letter from his assigned MISSION PRESIDENT with specific recommendations for the climate and mission service rules. Missionaries who already are fluent in the language of their assigned mission typically stay in an MTC for three weeks. Otherwise, they receive several weeks of intensive language and cultural training included with their courses in scripture study and methods of teaching the gospel.

Missionaries in an MTC also attend regular inspirational meetings and study classes. One day a week, they may attend a nearby TEMPLE and also write letters and take care of other personal needs. Sundays are devoted to attending regular Church services and studying the gospel.

At an MTC and in the mission field, missionaries are divided into administrative units called zones and districts. Single missionaries are assigned companions of the same gender who are studying the same language or going to the same mission. Married couples, of course, serve as companions to each other. Companionship is one of the most pervasive aspects of missionary life: a missionary never labors alone. The need for harmonious relationships between companions is urgent, and, although it can sometimes be a challenge, it usually leads to lifelong friendships. For missionary couples, it typically leads to an enhanced marriage relationship.

While in an MTC, missionaries begin to experience the meaning and rewards of full-time service to the Lord. The training is intensive. They do not watch television, listen to the radio, or go to places of entertainment. Letters, phone calls home, and nonmission business are limited. Their clothing is conservative business wear with distinctive name tags, except on preparation days or for service projects, physical-fitness activities, or special circumstances. The missionary's time is accounted for on reports submitted to the MTC or mission president; the principle is that one's time as a missionary is dedicated to the Lord.

ENTERING THE MISSION FIELD. When missionaries arrive in their assigned geographic areas, they are welcomed by their mission president and are given a brief orientation in the mission home or headquarters office. Each new single missionary is assigned to be trained by an experienced missionary companion. Missionary couples may be trained by another couple for a short time before they go to their assigned area within the mission.

All single missionaries are asked to follow a daily schedule somewhat as listed below, with variations as suggested by the mission president or as needed according to the customs of the country:

- 6:30 A.M. Arise
- 7:00 A.M. Study with companion
- 8:00 A.M. Breakfast
- 8:30 A.M. Personal study
- 9:30 A.M. Teaching and contacting
- 12:00 P.M. Lunch
- 1:00 P.M. Teaching and contacting
- 5:00 P.M. Dinner
- 6:00 P.M. Teaching and contacting
- 9:30 P.M. Plan next day's activities
- 10:30 P.M. Retire

Missionary couples may be given considerable latitude with their schedules because they often fill several different assignments, such as helping new converts gain experience in administering a Church unit, serving as guides at VISITORS CENTERS and HISTORIC SITES, or serving as nonproselytizing representatives of the Church in communities that do not allow proselytizing.

If missionaries are serving where they are learning another language, they spend time each day in language study. They also are encouraged to keep journals and exercise regularly. Missionaries spend most of their time finding receptive people and teaching them the restored gospel of Jesus Christ. Frequently they meet with people who have expressed an interest in knowing more about the way of life of their LDS friends and neighbors. Other people develop an interest in the Church and its teachings from media programs, street displays, pamphlets, or from simply seeing missionaries and inquiring about their background and purpose. When missionaries have time between teaching appointments, they often go door to door through a neighborhood asking those at home if they would be interested in learning more about the Church.

Missionaries work closely with local Church members, teaching people in their homes, speaking in ward or branch meetings about the importance of missionary work and on other gospel themes, and participating in social and athletic functions when their duties allow. Ward or branch members are encouraged to invite the missionaries to their homes for a meal as often as they can, to ease the financial burdens and to free their time for missionary work. Church members are often grateful to have the missionaries in their homes as role models for their children, while missionaries appreciate an hour of relaxation, home cooking, and LDS family life. Missionaries also often depend on local members for transportation, repairs on bicycles or other equipment, and advice and encouragement. Often, members of the elders quorum or Relief Society volunteer to serve as companions to male or female missionaries, respectively, so that the two full-time missionaries can split up for an evening and double their effectiveness.

Missionary apartments, while far from luxurious, must meet certain standards for health and safety, minimal space, and furniture. Apartments are rented and often become “missionary apartments” as a succession of missionaries transfer in and out of an area. In some places, Church members have apartments attached to their homes in which they invite missionaries to live. Missionaries travel on foot, by public transportation, by bicycle, or in mission cars, assigned at the mission president’s discretion based on the distances missionaries must travel and other circumstances.

Almost every missionary experiences a test of faith and courage. The experience of telling people that one represents Jesus Christ and has a message that will change their lives forever leads to solemn introspection, earnest prayer, and continual study. While some missionaries have already moved through this process, others find that they must spend many hours in prayer and scripture study before they receive a TESTIMONY.

After several months of service, missionaries become proficient in teaching the gospel, and more effective in bearing testimony of its truth. If they are speaking a foreign language, they accommodate to its dialects. As they grow and mature in experience, they may be transferred to different areas in the mission and placed with different companions, or assigned to meet new challenges and work with new people. They may in time become trainers for newly arrived missionaries. One missionary may be called to organize and preside over a branch of the Church. Another may not do formal missionary work but be called to serve the needs of underprivileged people as a welfare worker or to teach English and cultural information to refugees awaiting resettlement. Other missionaries may be placed in charge of the finances or other business of the mission and do direct missionary work only in the evenings. Older missionaries are sometimes called to serve in temples as ordinance workers.

The tasks of a missionary often are traumatic. Missionaries may experience cultural shock, language barriers, health problems, personality adjustments, hostility, and sometimes severe persecution. Yet missionaries are, for the most part, dedicated, enthusiastic, and faithful, and later may describe their service as “the best two years” of their lives to that time. Companions encourage one another, and the missionaries gain a new perspective of themselves, of people, of the place where they serve, and of the gospel. Often missionaries continue their association with a foreign country or language through their choice of a college major or profession.

GOAL OF MISSIONARY WORK. The ultimate goal of missionary work in the Church is to invite all the inhabitants of the earth to come unto Christ, through personal testimony, “by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned” (D&C 121:41). People throughout the world respond differently to the gospel message. Some quickly accept the message and within a few days or weeks request baptism into the Church. For others, it may be more difficult to leave past traditions, overcome social pressure, or break personal habits to conform to gospel standards. Occasionally, political and economic pressures countermand the inclination to conversion. Others simply feel no need for religion. All newly baptized members are accepted into The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints as “no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God” (Eph. 2:19). Missionaries develop Christlike love for those they teach about the Church and for the people in the area where they serve. They are grateful for those who “hear [the Lord’s] voice and harden not their hearts” (D&C 28:7).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bishop, Joseph. The Making of a Missionary. Salt Lake City, 1982.

SPENCER J. CONDIE

MISSIONARY TRAINING CENTERS

In 1832 a revelation given through the Prophet Joseph SMITH in KIRTLAND, OHIO, directed the elders to tarry and conduct a SOLEMN ASSEMBLY to study the “doctrines of the kingdom,” as well as a variety of secular subjects, so that they might “be prepared in all things” to go out and preach to the people (D&C 88:70–81). This initial assembly became the basis for the SCHOOL OF THE PROPHETS with similar purposes, which opened on January 24, 1833. When Church schools were founded in Utah during the latter part of the nineteenth century, they created programs for MISSIONARY training. In 1883 “missionary meetings” were added to the offerings of the Theological Department at Brigham Young Academy, the predecessor to BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY in Provo, Utah. Similar programs were inaugurated at Ricks College in Idaho and at the Latter-day Saints University in Salt Lake City.

As missionary training progressed, the FIRST PRESIDENCY approved a Church Missionary Home and Preparatory Training School. A Salt Lake City home was purchased, remodeled, and furnished to accommodate up to ninety-nine missionaries. Inaugurated in 1925, the week-long program for departing missionaries emphasized gospel topics, Church procedures, personal health, and proper manners. This home accommodated the outgoing missionaries until the 1960s, but as the number of missionaries increased, other facilities were needed.

PROGRAM AT BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY (BYU). For several years prior to 1960, Church and BYU officials considered the advisability of offering language instruction to missionaries. The occasion to launch this program came when missionaries assigned to Mexico and Argentina experienced lengthy delays in obtaining visas. On December 4, 1961, the Missionary Language Institute (MLI) opened with a class of twenty-nine elders in temporary quarters in a Provo hotel and various BYU buildings. Through classes, leadership meetings, and conferences, missionaries attending the MLI were able to develop facility in Spanish as well as in self-discipline and missionary spirit.

To enhance this program, in 1963 Church leaders gave its director the authority and stature of a MISSION PRESIDENT, and the MLI became known as the Language Training Mission (LTM). Portuguese and German were soon added to its curriculum.

In 1968 Church leaders decided to offer language instruction in all sixteen languages then being used by missionaries. To meet this major challenge, separate LTMs were established at Ricks College to teach Dutch and the Scandinavian languages and at the Church College of Hawaii to teach Polynesian and Oriental languages.

SCOPE BROADENED. The need for missionary training increased with the expansion of the Church. In 1971 over 2,500 missionaries received training at Brigham Young University in classrooms and housing that became increasingly inadequate. In 1973 the Church Missionary Committee approved plans to build a complex in Provo large enough to meet the needs of all language training for missionaries and decided to combine the three existing programs there. By 1976 the first phase was established. This multimillion-dollar complex demonstrated the Church’s resolute commitment to missionary work.

Prior to 1978, while foreign-language missionaries were trained at the LTM in Provo, the Missionary Home in Salt Lake City continued to train the English-speaking missionaries. Beginning in 1978, however, all elders, sisters, and couples called from the United States or Canada reported directly to Provo for training, and the name of the facility was changed to Missionary Training Center (MTC) to reflect its more comprehensive program.

ORGANIZATION AND ADMINISTRATION. In the 1980s, the GENERAL AUTHORITIES became more involved in personal direction of missionary training. Although past MTC leaders had customarily handled policies and procedures through BYU, serve. They are grateful for those who “hear [the Lord’s] voice and harden not their hearts” (D&C 28:7).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bishop, Joseph. The Making of a Missionary. Salt Lake City, 1982.

SPENCER J. CONDIE

---

MISSIONARY TRAINING CENTERS

In 1832 a revelation given through the Prophet Joseph SMITH in KIRTLAND, OHIO, directed the elders to tarry and conduct a SOLEMN ASSEMBLY to study the “doctrines of the kingdom,” as well as a variety of secular subjects, so that they might “be prepared in all things” to go out and preach to the people (D&C 88:70–81). This initial assembly became the basis for the SCHOOL OF THE PROPHETS with similar purposes, which opened on January 24, 1833. When Church schools were founded in Utah during the latter part of the nineteenth century, they created programs for MISSIONARY training. In 1883 “missionary meetings” were added to the offerings of the Theological Department at Brigham Young Academy, the predecessor to BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY in Provo, Utah. Similar programs were inaugurated at Ricks College in Idaho and at the Latter-day Saints University in Salt Lake City.

As missionary training progressed, the FIRST PRESIDENCY approved a Church Missionary Home and Preparatory Training School. A Salt Lake City home was purchased, remodeled, and furnished to accommodate up to ninety-nine missionaries. Inaugurated in 1925, the week-long program for departing missionaries emphasized gospel topics, Church procedures, personal health, and proper manners. This home accommodated the outgoing missionaries until the 1960s, but as the number of missionaries increased, other facilities were needed.

PROGRAM AT BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY (BYU). For several years prior to 1960, Church and BYU officials considered the advisability of offering language instruction to missionaries. The occasion to launch this program came when missionaries assigned to Mexico and Argentina experienced lengthy delays in obtaining visas. On December 4, 1961, the Missionary Language Institute (MLI) opened with a class of twenty-nine elders in temporary quarters in a Provo hotel and various BYU buildings. Through classes, leadership meetings, and conferences, missionaries attending the MLI were able to develop facility in Spanish as well as in self-discipline and missionary spirit.

To enhance this program, in 1963 Church leaders gave its director the authority and stature of a MISSION PRESIDENT, and the MLI became known as the Language Training Mission (LTM). Portuguese and German were soon added to its curriculum.

In 1968 Church leaders decided to offer language instruction in all sixteen languages then being used by missionaries. To meet this major challenge, separate LTMs were established at Ricks College to teach Dutch and the Scandinavian languages and at the Church College of Hawaii to teach Polynesian and Oriental languages.

SCOPE BROADENED. The need for missionary training increased with the expansion of the Church. In 1971 over 2,500 missionaries received training at Brigham Young University in classrooms and housing that became increasingly inadequate. In 1973 the Church Missionary Committee approved plans to build a complex in Provo large enough to meet the needs of all language training for missionaries and decided to combine the three existing programs there. By 1976 the first phase was established. This multimillion-dollar complex demonstrated the Church’s resolute commitment to missionary work.

Prior to 1978, while foreign-language missionaries were trained at the LTM in Provo, the Missionary Home in Salt Lake City continued to train the English-speaking missionaries. Beginning in 1978, however, all elders, sisters, and couples called from the United States or Canada reported directly to Provo for training, and the name of the facility was changed to Missionary Training Center (MTC) to reflect its more comprehensive program.

ORGANIZATION AND ADMINISTRATION. In the 1980s, the GENERAL AUTHORITIES became more involved in personal direction of missionary training. Although past MTC leaders had customarily handled policies and procedures through BYU, from 1980 on they increasingly reported directly to the Missionary Committee in Salt Lake City.

The internal organization was also at this time restructured to separate ecclesiastical from professional responsibilities. Missionaries were organized into branches whose presidents, called as lay leaders from among Church members in the Provo area, provided needed ecclesiastical authority and service in counseling missionaries and in conducting Sunday meetings. In addition, full-time staff members supervised professional activities such as training and business affairs.

MTC REGIMEN. The MTC is regarded as a mission field. All costs are paid by the missionaries, including board and room, books, and study materials. Every missionary is assigned another new missionary as a companion, and they are together twenty-four hours a day.

The schedule is rigorous. Classes have ten to twelve students who meet in three-hour sessions, morning, afternoon, and evening. Studies include the scriptures, languages, and missionary methodology. Academic responsibilities are balanced by spiritual development and recreational opportunities. Temple attendance and weekly devotional addresses given by visiting General Authorities aid spiritual well-being. Exercise programs promote physical fitness.

The intensive methodology used in foreign-language instruction is based in part on a program developed by the U.S. Army: Trainees learn by listening and repeating. Classroom instructors are usually experienced former missionaries and foreign students from nearby campuses. Linguistic drills are related to the culture, customs, and characteristics of the assigned mission field. In one week basic grammar is learned, and after two weeks a missionary begins to converse, pray, and sing in a new language. In eight weeks, missionaries are reasonably adept in conversation and can teach gospel lessons in a foreign language.

INTERNATIONAL EXPANSION. The Church now operates Area Missionary Training Centers beyond Provo. Previously, missionaries called from outside the United States and Canada typically went directly to the mission field without orientation. Area centers have now been developed to give missionaries from other lands advantages similar to those provided in Provo. The first of these centers was established at São Paulo, Brazil, in 1977. By 1990, thirteen Area MTCs functioned in Latin America, Europe, Asia, and the Pacific. All are adjacent to Latter-day Saint temples.

The goal of the Missionary Training Centers is to provide initial training for full-time missionaries, preparing them to teach more efficiently the restored gospel of Jesus Christ. All programs are continuously evaluated in terms of this objective.

RICHARD O. COWAN

---

MISSION PRESIDENT

In 1990, some 257 mission presidents, along with their wives, and sometimes families, served in geographical mission areas in more than a hundred nations. The period of service for a mission president is usually three years. In the Church being a mission president is regarded as a challenging and exhilarating spiritual assignment, a link of fellowship with the Master. Calls are issued by the FIRST PRESIDENCY. Both husband and wife are set apart as missionaries by the LAYING ON OF HANDS by an assigned General Authority, often a member of the First Presidency or QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES, and receive BLESSINGS and counsel appropriate to their assignment.

The calling is not a regular remunerative position, but interrupts professional employment; whatever financial losses accrue are part of the expected sacrifice. The family involved gives of its time and energies without salary, though there is a modest allowance for living expenses. Men and women from all walks of life and all nationalities and backgrounds serve, called, as it were, "from everywhere to everywhere." Typically, the president is a high priest with extensive prior service in the Church. His wife is likewise experienced in Church leadership and teaching. Their competence in the language and culture of their designated country is enhanced by mission presidents' seminars and training sessions.

A strong legacy of mission presidents permeates Church autobiography and biography, oral tradition, fiction, and folklore. Narratives range from some of flagrant and even life-threatening opposition and martyrdom to sublime accounts of conversions to Christ. It is a common feeling that the Spirit attends missionary work as it does no other.

An important concern of the mission president and his wife is naturally the continued nur-

from 1980 on they increasingly reported directly to the Missionary Committee in Salt Lake City.

The internal organization was also at this time restructured to separate ecclesiastical from professional responsibilities. Missionaries were organized into branches whose presidents, called as lay leaders from among Church members in the Provo area, provided needed ecclesiastical authority and service in counseling missionaries and in conducting Sunday meetings. In addition, full-time staff members supervised professional activities such as training and business affairs.

MTC REGIMEN. The MTC is regarded as a mission field. All costs are paid by the missionaries, including board and room, books, and study materials. Every missionary is assigned another new missionary as a companion, and they are together twenty-four hours a day.

The schedule is rigorous. Classes have ten to twelve students who meet in three-hour sessions, morning, afternoon, and evening. Studies include the scriptures, languages, and missionary methodology. Academic responsibilities are balanced by spiritual development and recreational opportunities. Temple attendance and weekly devotional addresses given by visiting General Authorities aid spiritual well-being. Exercise programs promote physical fitness.

The intensive methodology used in foreign-language instruction is based in part on a program developed by the U.S. Army: Trainees learn by listening and repeating. Classroom instructors are usually experienced former missionaries and foreign students from nearby campuses. Linguistic drills are related to the culture, customs, and characteristics of the assigned mission field. In one week basic grammar is learned, and after two weeks a missionary begins to converse, pray, and sing in a new language. In eight weeks, missionaries are reasonably adept in conversation and can teach gospel lessons in a foreign language.

INTERNATIONAL EXPANSION. The Church now operates Area Missionary Training Centers beyond Provo. Previously, missionaries called from outside the United States and Canada typically went directly to the mission field without orientation. Area centers have now been developed to give missionaries from other lands advantages similar to those provided in Provo. The first of these centers was established at São Paulo, Brazil, in 1977. By 1990, thirteen Area MTCs functioned in Latin America, Europe, Asia, and the Pacific. All are adjacent to Latter-day Saint temples.

The goal of the Missionary Training Centers is to provide initial training for full-time missionaries, preparing them to teach more efficiently the restored gospel of Jesus Christ. All programs are continuously evaluated in terms of this objective.

RICHARD O. COWAN

---

MISSION PRESIDENT

In 1990, some 257 mission presidents, along with their wives, and sometimes families, served in geographical mission areas in more than a hundred nations. The period of service for a mission president is usually three years. In the Church being a mission president is regarded as a challenging and exhilarating spiritual assignment, a link of fellowship with the Master. Calls are issued by the FIRST PRESIDENCY. Both husband and wife are set apart as missionaries by the LAYING ON OF HANDS by an assigned General Authority, often a member of the First Presidency or QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES, and receive BLESSINGS and counsel appropriate to their assignment.

The calling is not a regular remunerative position, but interrupts professional employment; whatever financial losses accrue are part of the expected sacrifice. The family involved gives of its time and energies without salary, though there is a modest allowance for living expenses. Men and women from all walks of life and all nationalities and backgrounds serve, called, as it were, "from everywhere to everywhere." Typically, the president is a high priest with extensive prior service in the Church. His wife is likewise experienced in Church leadership and teaching. Their competence in the language and culture of their designated country is enhanced by mission presidents' seminars and training sessions.

A strong legacy of mission presidents permeates Church autobiography and biography, oral tradition, fiction, and folklore. Narratives range from some of flagrant and even life-threatening opposition and martyrdom to sublime accounts of conversions to Christ. It is a common feeling that the Spirit attends missionary work as it does no other.

An important concern of the mission president and his wife is naturally the continued nurture and care of their own children who have come with them. A second concern is the nurture and care of the missionaries, the majority of whom are young, uprooted, often struggling with a new language, and facing new stresses. The mission president trains, counsels, assigns, and gives spiritual support to each missionary, and his wife plays a vital role in training programs and the health, welfare, and safety of each missionary.

A mission is generally assigned from 120 to 250 full-time missionaries, with young men serving two years and young women serving eighteen months. In addition, there are some part-time missionaries and older couples. Older couples generally serve from one year to eighteen months. Single missionaries always labor in same-gender pairs; married couples labor together. Leadership roles are assigned to senior companions, district leaders, and zone leaders. Each mission has a rotating central missionary staff: typically a secretary, recorder-historian, supplies manager, and travel coordinator. Since new missionaries arrive and seasoned missionaries are released each month, training, retraining, and making new assignments and transfers are perpetual tasks.

The mission president, under supervision from Church headquarters, establishes mission rules, study patterns, goals, and discipline. His assignment requires constant travel to zone conferences, which are also testimony meetings, at least every six to eight weeks. The president and his wife have direct contact with the missionaries by phone, mail, and personal visits. They continually foster programs of goodwill, service, and understanding.

At the end of three years, the mission president and his family return home to resume their vocational and regular family lives.

GERALD J. DAY

MISSIONS

The mission of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is to invite everyone to come to Christ. This includes a mandate to proclaim the GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people (cf. Matt. 28:19; Mark 16:15; D&C 42:58). "Therefore, go ye into all the world; and unto whatsoever place ye cannot go ye shall send, that the testimony may go from you into all the world unto every creature" (D&C 84:62). From the earliest days of the Church, missionaries have been called to the nations of the earth to preach that message.

The ultimate destiny of missionary work was envisioned by the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1842:

Our missionaries are going forth to different nations. . . . The Standard of Truth has been erected; no unhallowed hand can stop the work from progressing; persecutions may rage, mobs may combine, armies may assemble, calumny may defame, but the truth of God will go forth boldly, nobly, and independent, till it has penetrated every continent, visited every clime, swept every country, and sounded in every ear, till the purposes of God shall be accomplished, and the Great Jehovah shall say the work is done [HC 4:540].

Two basic types of missions are organized to carry forward the missionary effort: full-time missions and stake missions.

The LDS Church has no paid ministry. The majority of missionaries in the LDS Church are young men between the ages of nineteen and twenty-one who serve on a voluntary basis for approximately two years.

ture and care of their own children who have come with them. A second concern is the nurture and care of the missionaries, the majority of whom are young, uprooted, often struggling with a new language, and facing new stresses. The mission president trains, counsels, assigns, and gives spiritual support to each missionary, and his wife plays a vital role in training programs and the health, welfare, and safety of each missionary.

A mission is generally assigned from 120 to 250 full-time missionaries, with young men serving two years and young women serving eighteen months. In addition, there are some part-time missionaries and older couples. Older couples generally serve from one year to eighteen months. Single missionaries always labor in same-gender pairs; married couples labor together. Leadership roles are assigned to senior companions, district leaders, and zone leaders. Each mission has a rotating central missionary staff: typically a secretary, recorder-historian, supplies manager, and travel coordinator. Since new missionaries arrive and seasoned missionaries are released each month, training, retraining, and making new assignments and transfers are perpetual tasks.

The mission president, under supervision from Church headquarters, establishes mission rules, study patterns, goals, and discipline. His assignment requires constant travel to zone conferences, which are also testimony meetings, at least every six to eight weeks. The president and his wife have direct contact with the missionaries by phone, mail, and personal visits. They continually foster programs of goodwill, service, and understanding.

At the end of three years, the mission president and his family return home to resume their vocational and regular family lives.

GERALD J. DAY

MISSIONS

The mission of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is to invite everyone to come to Christ. This includes a mandate to proclaim the GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people (cf. Matt. 28:19; Mark 16:15; D&C 42:58). "Therefore, go ye into all the world; and unto whatsoever place ye cannot go ye shall send, that the testimony may go from you into all the world unto every creature" (D&C 84:62). From the earliest days of the Church, missionaries have been called to the nations of the earth to preach that message.

The ultimate destiny of missionary work was envisioned by the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1842:

Our missionaries are going forth to different nations. . . . The Standard of Truth has been erected; no unhallowed hand can stop the work from progressing; persecutions may rage, mobs may combine, armies may assemble, calumny may defame, but the truth of God will go forth boldly, nobly, and independent, till it has penetrated every continent, visited every clime, swept every country, and sounded in every ear, till the purposes of God shall be accomplished, and the Great Jehovah shall say the work is done [HC 4:540].

Two basic types of missions are organized to carry forward the missionary effort: full-time missions and stake missions.

The LDS Church has no paid ministry. The majority of missionaries in the LDS Church are young men between the ages of nineteen and twenty-one who serve on a voluntary basis for approximately two years.

FULL-TIME MISSION. A full-time mission is an ecclesiastical unit of the Church in a designated geographical area. A MISSION PRESIDENT and his wife are called to preside over the mission and supervise from 120 to 250 full-time missionaries. Small missions in newly opened areas begin with fewer missionaries. In areas where STAKES have not yet been established, the mission president also bears ecclesiastical responsibility for all Church members who live within the boundaries of his mission. In areas where stakes have been established, the mission president does not carry this responsibility but is available as a resource to help members advance missionary work. Full-time missions have been organized in nations wherever the Church has official recognition.

STAKE MISSION. A stake mission is organized in each stake of the Church to supplement or extend the resources of the full-time mission in that area. A stake mission president and two counselors preside over the stake mission. Unlike full-time missionaries, stake missionaries serve part-time, mostly in the evenings, and continue to live in their own homes and to fulfill their normal family and occupational responsibilities. They are generally expected to spend ten or more hours a week doing missionary work.

President Spencer W. KIMBALL described missionary work as the lifeblood of the Church. He wrote,

If there were no converts, the Church would shrivel and die. But perhaps the greatest reason for missionary work is to give the world its chance to hear and accept the gospel. The scriptures are replete with commands and promises and calls and rewards for teaching the gospel. I use the word command advisedly, for it seems to be an insistent directive from which we, singly and collectively, cannot escape. Furthermore, the command is clear that not only must all members of His church give missionary service, but we must take the gospel to all the children of our Heavenly Father on this earth [p. 4].

HISTORY OF MISSIONARY WORK. In April 1830, immediately after the Church was organized, the first formal missionary activity began. Samuel H. Smith, a brother of the Prophet Joseph, filled his knapsack with copies of the Book of Mormon and traveled through neighboring towns in upstate New York to acquaint people with the newly published book of scripture. He sold a copy to Phineas H. Young, who read the book and later joined the Church. The same book came into the hands of Brigham YOUNG and, in conjunction with additional contacts, led to his conversion.

In the fall of 1830, four brethren, Oliver Cowdery, Peter Whitmer, Jr., Parley P. Pratt, and Ziba Peterson, were called to undertake a mission to the western frontier to preach to the Lamanites. They met with several Indian tribes, but their work was hampered by government Indian agents, and their principal success was among the white settlers in Ohio (see LAMANITE MISSION). By the end of December 1830, several hundred people had joined the infant Church, including such leaders as Sidney RIGDON and Frederick G. Williams, later named as counselors to Joseph Smith, and Edward Partridge, its first Presiding Bishop.

Through the efforts of several beginning in 1830, missionary work extended into Canada. John TAYLOR, who later became the third President of the Church, was an early convert there in the spring of 1836.

In 1837 Heber C. KIMBALL was called to open the first mission abroad. He and Orson HYDE were set apart to begin the work in the BRITISH ISLES. In that same year, Parley P. PRATT issued his pamphlet Voice of Warning, the first tract published for missionary use in the Church. In April 1839, in response to revelation (D&C 118), the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles and others departed for a mission to Great Britain (see MISSIONS OF THE TWELVE TO THE BRITISH ISLES). Thousands of converts joined the Church, and great numbers of them emigrated to America during the 1840s and strengthened the Church as it endured dissension within and persecution from without.

Many single women, such as these two in Tonga, 1986, fulfill missions. All single missionaries live and work with a companion of the same sex. Courtesy Floyd Holdman.

By the 1850s, missions had been opened in Chile, France, Germany, Gibraltar, Hawaii, India, Italy, Malta, Scandinavia, South Africa, the South Pacific, and Switzerland. Many of these were discontinued after only a few years; but in the final decades of the nineteenth century, a time when the Church was facing severe persecution and extreme financial difficulties, additional missions were founded in Mexico, Samoa, Tahiti, and Turkey.

In 1901, President Lorenzo SNOW renewed the emphasis on taking the gospel into all the world. Heber J. GRANT of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles dedicated Japan for the preaching of the gospel. Over the next two years, Francis M. Lyman, also of the Twelve, dedicated the lands of Africa, Finland, France, Greece, Italy, Palestine, Poland, and Russia for missionary work.

In 1920–1921, David O. MCKAY of the Twelve traveled some 56,000 miles in a world survey of Church missions for the FIRST PRESIDENCY. He made stops in the Pacific islands, New Zealand, Australia, Asia, India, Egypt, Palestine, and Europe. While in Asia, he dedicated China for the preaching of the gospel.

In December 1925, Melvin J. Ballard of the Twelve established a mission in South America, with headquarters in Buenos Aires, Argentina, predicting, “The work of the Lord will grow slowly for a time here just as an oak grows slowly from an acorn. It will not shoot up in a day as does the sunflower that grows quickly and then dies. But thousands will join the Church here. It will be divided into more than one mission and will be one of the strongest in the Church. The work here is the smallest that it will ever be. The day will come when the Lamanites in this land will be given a chance. The South American Mission will be a power in the Church” (quoted in Melvin J. Ballard: . . . Crusader for Righteousness [Salt Lake City, 1977], p. 84). By 1990, Central and South American converts had emerged as one of the largest segments of the Church.

During President McKay’s administration as President of the Church, he instituted a vigorous missionary effort that increased the number of full-time missionaries from 5,000 to 13,000 and soon transformed the Church from an American institution into an international one. Preparation and training for missionaries were formalized and intensified. The first seminar for mission presidents was held in June 1961. A new teaching plan of six lessons was introduced and his “every member a missionary” program coordinated missionary efforts of Church members. In November 1961 a language training institute was established at Brigham Young University in Provo for missionaries called to Spanish-speaking missions. This institute became the Language Training Mission in 1963 and the MISSIONARY TRAINING CENTER in 1978. During the 1960s and the 1970s, the Church built VISITORS CENTERS at many temple sites and other locations, including major pavilions for the New York World’s Fair in 1964–1965 and the expositions in San Antonio, Texas, in 1968; Japan in 1970; and Spokane, Washington, in 1974. A large visitors center was opened on TEMPLE SQUARE in August 1966.

Missionaries spend most of their time finding and teaching interested people about the restored gospel of Jesus Christ. As of March 1991, there were 44,000 full-time missionaries serving in 257 missions throughout the world. Courtesy Doug Martin.

In April 1974, in his first major address as President of the Church, Spencer W. Kimball emphasized that every able, worthy young man should serve a mission. Under his leadership, the missionary force more than doubled in twelve years, and new missions were established in many parts of the world. The June 1978 revelation extending the priesthood to all worthy male members of the Church opened up additional missionary opportunities (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: OFFICIAL DECLARATION—2).

Ezra Taft BENSON, who became the thirteenth President of the Church in November 1985, continued to emphasize proclaiming the gospel as an important and basic part of the mission of the Church, emphasizing the role of the Book of Mormon as a necessary and powerful tool.

Changing political conditions throughout the world in the final decades of the twentieth century opened nations previously inaccessible to missionaries—principally in Africa, Asia, and Central and Eastern Europe.

MISSIONARY ORGANIZATION. Under the direction of the First Presidency, the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles is the Missionary Committee of the Church. The members of the Twelve “are called to be the Twelve Apostles, or special witnesses of the name of Christ in all the world, . . . being sent out, holding the keys, to open the door by the proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ” (D&C 107:23, 35). The Twelve are assisted in their ministry by the SEVENTY, who “are also called to preach the gospel, and to be especial witnesses unto the Gentiles and in all the world” (D&C 107:25).

The Missionary Department is the staff organization at Church headquarters that assists the Missionary Committee of the Church in providing direction, training, programs, resources, and administrative support to the missions of the Church. Calls to full-time missionaries are processed through the Missionary Department.

A mission president is called by the First Presidency to preside over each mission of the Church, normally for three years (see MISSION PRESIDENT). He calls two full-time missionaries as his assistants, and they help him in training and supervising other missionaries. In his stewardship of Church units, the mission president is generally assisted by two local counselors. These counselors help the mission president in training and coordinating with local priesthood leaders and members who live within the stakes and WARDS within the mission area.

CALLS TO MISSIONARY SERVICE. In 1842, Joseph Smith summarized the procedure for calling a person to serve in the Church: “We believe that a man must be called of God, by prophecy, and by the laying on of hands by those who are in authority, to preach the Gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof” (A of F 5).

Among the full-time missionaries of the Church is a group of young women (approximately 270 in 1990) with health and teaching backgrounds who are assigned to teach disease prevention, nutrition, and home health care to Church members in developing countries in addition to fulfilling proselytizing responsibilities.

In the early days of the Church, missionaries were called individually during Church conferences. After the Saints moved to the Salt Lake Valley, the First Presidency announced mission calls at general conferences—often to the surprise of those called. Later, written calls were sent from the office of the President of the Church. The return address on these letters was simply Box B, Salt Lake City, Utah, and for generations of Latter-day Saints, “Box B” became a symbol of the call to serve a mission.

At first, mission calls were issued to anyone, and married men often left their wives and children to serve for an unspecified period of time, ranging from a few weeks to several years. During the latter half of the nineteenth century and the first quarter of the twentieth, wives occasionally accompanied their husbands on missions. The first calls to single women were issued near the end of the nineteenth century.

The ages and terms of service of full-time missionaries have varied over the years, and exceptions are made according to circumstance. In 1990, unmarried men ages nineteen through twenty-five, or occasionally older, were called to serve for twenty-four months. Unmarried women ages twenty-one through thirty-nine were called to serve for eighteen months, and those age forty through sixty-nine were called to serve for twelve months. Married couples normally served for either twelve or eighteen months.

In addition to the traditional tasks of missionaries, couples and sister missionaries may also be given assignments in such areas as leadership training, mission office staff, visitors center staff, public communications, temple work, family history research, health welfare services, education, and other full-time Church service.

MISSIONARY PREPARATION AND TRAINING. Informal missionary training often begins in the homes of Latter-day Saints and continues in the various Church priesthood and AUXILIARY ORGANIZATIONS at the local level. A specific purpose of bearing the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD, designated in the scriptures as the preparatory priesthood (D&C 84:26), is to prepare young men for the responsibilities of the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD, including missionary service. Some stakes sponsor missionary-preparation seminars or classes to assist young men and women and older couples in preparing for full-time missions. Brief formal missionary training for those already called is given at local missionary training centers located around the world. Missionaries assigned to missions where they will speak their native language remain at a training center for approximately three weeks. Missionaries who must learn a new language remain for approximately two months (see MISSIONARY TRAINING CENTERS).

On arrival in an assigned field of labor, each missionary receives on-the-job training from a senior companion and other mission leaders. Each missionary pair or married couple spends a portion of each day studying the scriptures, practicing the missionary discussions, and strengthening other missionary skills and attributes. Language study also continues for those who are learning a new language. District meetings held every week and zone conferences held every four to six weeks provide opportunities for missionaries to be instructed, motivated, and further trained by the mission leaders.

MISSIONARY APPROACHES. Historically, missionaries have endeavored to find those who are interested in listening to their message so they can teach them the gospel, baptize those who desire to join the Church, and fellowship new converts as they begin their membership in the Church.

During the first 150 years of the Church, missionary work centered on public meetings and contacting people in their homes: tracting (see below); street meetings; debates; exhibits at fairs, expositions, or shopping malls; FIRESIDES held in public buildings or Church meetinghouses; and “cottage meetings” held in private homes.

Door-to-door contacting is commonly called “tracting” because missionaries in the past often left printed tracts with people as they called on them. As the number and influence of Church members have grown, missionaries have come increasingly to rely on referrals from members to find people to teach. In the latter half of the twentieth century, missionaries have had the benefit of standardized lessons, usually referred to as missionary discussions, to assist them in teaching the gospel.

People who are being taught are invited to become actively involved by reading and studying

In recent years, more and more retired couples have chosen to serve missions together. As of 1991, approximately 1,500 couples were serving on a full-time voluntary basis. In addition to sharing the gospel with non-members, many missionary couples have assignments in leadership training, public relations, and family history. Some serve in Church visitors centers or in mission offices. Couples called to work in temples and in Church schools devote full time to these responsibilities and are not involved in proselytizing. Photograph, c. 1980, Deseret News.

on their own, praying about the message they are receiving, attending Church meetings, coming to know Church members, and living the principles of the gospel as they learn them. Full-time and stake missionaries are often assigned specific duties in shepherding new members and helping them become “fellowcitizens with the saints, and of the household of God” (Eph. 2:19).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. “It Becometh Every Man.” Ensign 7 (Oct. 1977):3–7.

DEAN B. CLEVERLY

MISSIONS OF THE TWELVE TO THE BRITISH ISLES

Between 1837 and 1841 there were two apostolic missions to the British Isles. In 1837–1838 Heber C. KIMBALL and Orson HYDE established the first mission, concentrating in the area of Preston and the Ribble Valley. Their efforts saw about 1,500 people baptized into the Church. From 1839 to 1841, nine members of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles labored in Britain and added another 4,000 converts to the Church. These missions were extremely important. In a relatively short time, the Twelve Apostles established the foundation for the most successful missionary program of the Church in the nineteenth century, organized an extensive emigration program, and established a major publication program. In these activities, they also shared experiences that welded them together as a quorum. The spiritual and administrative dimensions of these missionary experiences prepared the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles to assume their key role in the leadership of the Church following their return to Nauvoo, and especially after the death of the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1844. These missions were a manifestation of the early LDS recognition of the divine command to take the gospel “into all the world” (D&C 84:61–63; cf. Matt. 28:19) and to “gather” to Zion those who would accept the gospel message. Even as Jesus had commanded his apostles anciently, so had he done with his apostles in the nineteenth century.

THE 1837–1838 MISSION. The Church was barely seven years old when Elders Kimball and

Hyde departed for England in July 1837. The Prophet Joseph Smith had directed men to go on missions from the beginning, and the early missionaries had first concentrated in the smaller hamlets and villages of New England and nearby Canada. By 1836, LDS missionaries were venturing into larger cities. On April 3, 1836, the KEYS of the holy priesthood were bestowed by heavenly messengers upon the Prophet Joseph and Oliver Cowdery in the Kirtland (Ohio) Temple (D&C 110:11–16). These keys included the authority to gather Israel from the four parts of the earth, which is a missionary activity.

In April 1836, Parley P. PRATT, an apostle, was sent to Toronto with a prophetic promise that the fruits of missionary work there would lead to the introduction of the gospel into England (pp. 130–31). Elder Pratt helped to convert, among others, John TAYLOR, Isaac Russell, and Joseph Fielding, all of whom had family contacts in Britain and several of whom accompanied Elders Kimball and Hyde when the Prophet assigned them to go to the British Isles on the first mission.

Elders Kimball and Hyde were in England from July 1837 to April 1838. Landing at Liverpool, they traveled north to Preston, where relatives of the Canadian converts provided various assistance, including a place to preach. Finding ready acceptance of their message, they baptized more than 140 people by October 1837. They moved up the Ribble Valley, finding other audiences, particularly among the textile workers throughout Lancashire. By the time they returned home in April 1838, Church membership had grown to about 1,500 people in Britain, in spite of growing opposition, particularly from local clergy.

THE 1839–1841 MISSION. Dissension and apostasy had arisen among the leading brethren, reflecting the larger troubles of the Church in Ohio and Missouri. Seeking Joseph Smith’s counsel in 1837, the Twelve were instructed by revelation to be united (D&C 112), but by 1838, some of the original Quorum of the Twelve did not wholeheartedly support Joseph Smith, and quorum president Thomas B. Marsh weakened the quorum further by his personal apostasy. With the death of David W. PATTEN in 1838, Brigham Young became the senior member of a quorum greatly hampered by defection. The second apostolic mission was also on their own, praying about the message they are receiving, attending Church meetings, coming to know Church members, and living the principles of the gospel as they learn them. Full-time and stake missionaries are often assigned specific duties in shepherding new members and helping them become “fellowcitizens with the saints, and of the household of God” (Eph. 2:19).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. “It Becometh Every Man.” Ensign 7 (Oct. 1977):3–7.

DEAN B. CLEVERLY

MISSIONS OF THE TWELVE TO THE BRITISH ISLES

Between 1837 and 1841 there were two apostolic missions to the British Isles. In 1837–1838 Heber C. KIMBALL and Orson HYDE established the first mission, concentrating in the area of Preston and the Ribble Valley. Their efforts saw about 1,500 people baptized into the Church. From 1839 to 1841, nine members of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles labored in Britain and added another 4,000 converts to the Church. These missions were extremely important. In a relatively short time, the Twelve Apostles established the foundation for the most successful missionary program of the Church in the nineteenth century, organized an extensive emigration program, and established a major publication program. In these activities, they also shared experiences that welded them together as a quorum. The spiritual and administrative dimensions of these missionary experiences prepared the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles to assume their key role in the leadership of the Church following their return to Nauvoo, and especially after the death of the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1844. These missions were a manifestation of the early LDS recognition of the divine command to take the gospel “into all the world” (D&C 84:61–63; cf. Matt. 28:19) and to “gather” to Zion those who would accept the gospel message. Even as Jesus had commanded his apostles anciently, so had he done with his apostles in the nineteenth century.

THE 1837–1838 MISSION. The Church was barely seven years old when Elders Kimball and

Hyde departed for England in July 1837. The Prophet Joseph Smith had directed men to go on missions from the beginning, and the early missionaries had first concentrated in the smaller hamlets and villages of New England and nearby Canada. By 1836, LDS missionaries were venturing into larger cities. On April 3, 1836, the KEYS of the holy priesthood were bestowed by heavenly messengers upon the Prophet Joseph and Oliver Cowdery in the Kirtland (Ohio) Temple (D&C 110:11–16). These keys included the authority to gather Israel from the four parts of the earth, which is a missionary activity.

In April 1836, Parley P. PRATT, an apostle, was sent to Toronto with a prophetic promise that the fruits of missionary work there would lead to the introduction of the gospel into England (pp. 130–31). Elder Pratt helped to convert, among others, John TAYLOR, Isaac Russell, and Joseph Fielding, all of whom had family contacts in Britain and several of whom accompanied Elders Kimball and Hyde when the Prophet assigned them to go to the British Isles on the first mission.

Elders Kimball and Hyde were in England from July 1837 to April 1838. Landing at Liverpool, they traveled north to Preston, where relatives of the Canadian converts provided various assistance, including a place to preach. Finding ready acceptance of their message, they baptized more than 140 people by October 1837. They moved up the Ribble Valley, finding other audiences, particularly among the textile workers throughout Lancashire. By the time they returned home in April 1838, Church membership had grown to about 1,500 people in Britain, in spite of growing opposition, particularly from local clergy.

THE 1839–1841 MISSION. Dissension and apostasy had arisen among the leading brethren, reflecting the larger troubles of the Church in Ohio and Missouri. Seeking Joseph Smith’s counsel in 1837, the Twelve were instructed by revelation to be united (D&C 112), but by 1838, some of the original Quorum of the Twelve did not wholeheartedly support Joseph Smith, and quorum president Thomas B. Marsh weakened the quorum further by his personal apostasy. With the death of David W. PATTEN in 1838, Brigham Young became the senior member of a quorum greatly hampered by defection. The second apostolic mission was also initiated by divine revelation. On July 8, 1838, from the new headquarters at Far West, Missouri, the Prophet Joseph Smith inquired, "Show us thy will, O Lord, concerning the Twelve," and received a revelation that the Twelve Apostles were to leave Far West on April 26, 1839, on a mission "over the great waters" (D&C 118:4). The revelation promised success in their mission and care for their families.

This overseas mission was an opportunity for the Twelve to prove themselves and to take their rightful place next to the First Presidency in leading the Church. The July 8, 1838, revelation gave specific direction, including the naming of four new apostles—John Taylor, John E. Page, Wilford WOODRUFF, and Willard Richards—to fill existing vacancies (D&C 118:6).

Departing in conditions of poverty and illness and trusting in the promises of God that all would be well with them and their families, most of the members of the Twelve made their way in various groups to Liverpool. By April 1840, they were together for the first time as a quorum in a foreign land. On April 14, 1840, in Preston, they ordained Willard Richards an apostle and sustained Brigham Young as "standing president" of their quorum. They held a general conference the next day in which they conducted Church business and further organized the mission. On the 16th they met again as a quorum and further planned their work. On the next day, they separated to various assigned geographical areas: Brigham Young and Willard Richards were to assist Wilford Woodruff with the work he had already begun among the United Brethren in Herefordshire; Heber C. Kimball was to return to the areas of his 1837–1838 missionary successes; Parley P. Pratt was to establish a mission home and publishing concern in Manchester; Orson PRATT was assigned to Scotland, where the work had already begun; John Taylor was to go to Liverpool, Ireland, and the Isle of Man; and George A. Smith was assigned to the area of the Staffordshire potteries. In time, Wilford Woodruff and George A. Smith would extend their work to London.

Under Brigham Young's direction, these apostles diligently supported each other and showed their love for the British people. In their journals and letters to each other they shared the burdens and joy of the hard work they were assigned to do. Truly on their own for the first time, they were forced to depend on the Lord and upon each other for assistance in the challenges they faced. Although they sought the Prophet Joseph's counsel on a variety of items, the distance from him often forced them to make decisions before a response could be received. In all major decisions the Prophet Joseph seems to have approved of their course of action.

In addition to providing leadership to the expanding British Mission, which saw an additional 4,000 converts join the Church by 1841, their efforts had at least three other related consequences: (1) the establishment of a successful emigration program that saw the first converts gathered to Nauvoo, with at least 50,000 members emigrating from the British Isles to America (see PERPETUAL EMIGRATING FUND); (2) the use of Britain as a base for further LDS missionary activity into continental Europe and other countries, such as South Africa, India, and Australia; and (3) the laying of the foundation for extensive LDS publishing in the nineteenth century. The Millennial Star, begun in 1840, became one of the most important LDS periodicals. Later editions of the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants followed the text and format of those published by the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles in England. The same is true of the Manchester Hymnal. Also, various pamphlets defending and explaining Church doctrine were issued in regular editions in England. In fact, Liverpool became the LDS book supply depot for most of the nineteenth century.

A major consequence of the 1839–1841 mission was the impact it had on the quorum itself. Beginning in 1841, following the return of the Twelve to Nauvoo, Joseph Smith gave them more direct responsibility in administering the affairs of the Church. They were assigned management of the Church press in Nauvoo, were directed to supervise emigration, were placed on the Nauvoo City Council, and were given direct responsibility over Church finances. They were then brought into closer association with Joseph Smith and entrusted with greater responsibilities in many areas as they took their position as the quorum next to the First Presidency (D&C 107:23–24; 124:127–28).

Perhaps the greatest indication of their true calling as apostles was their vital role of leadership in the Church just before and following Joseph Smith's death in 1844. This mantle of authority, both spiritual and administrative, had been clearly established during the period of their British Mission experience.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B.; Ronald K. Esplin; and David J. Whittaker. Men with a Mission: The Quorum of the Twelve in Great Britain—1837–1841. Salt Lake City, 1991.
- Bloxham, V. Ben; James R. Moss; and Larry C. Porter, eds. Truth Will Prevail: The Rise of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the British Isles, 1837–1987. Solihull, England, 1987.
- Crawley, Peter, and David J. Whittaker. Mormon Imprints in Great Britain and the Empire, 1836–1857. Provo, Utah, 1987.
- Esplin, Ronald K. "Joseph, Brigham and the Twelve: A Succession of Continuity." BYU Studies 21 (Summer 1981):301–341.
- . "A Preparation for Ascendancy: Brigham Young and the Quorum Experience in England, 1840–41." In "The Emergence of Brigham Young and the Twelve to Mormon Leadership, 1830–1841," pp. 427–98. Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1981.
- . "A Great Work Done in That Land." Ensign 17 (July 1987):20–27.
- Evans, Richard L. A Century of "Mormonism" in Great Britain. Salt Lake City, 1937.
- Jensen, Richard L., and Malcolm R. Thorp, eds. Mormons in Early Victorian Britain. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Pratt, Parley P. The Autobiography of Parley Parker Pratt. New York, 1874.
- Taylor, P. A. M. Expectations Westward: The Mormons and the Emigration of their British Converts in the Nineteenth Century. Edinburgh and London, 1965; Ithaca, N.Y., 1966.
- Whittaker, David J. "Mormonism in Victorian Britain: A Bibliographic Essay." In Mormons in Early Victorian Britain, ed. R. Jensen and M. Thorp, pp. 258–71. Salt Lake City, 1989.

DAVID J. WHITTAKER
JAMES R. MOSS

MISSOURI

[This entry consists of two articles:

LDS Communities in Jackson and Clay Counties

LDS Communities in Caldwell and Daviess Counties

The first article identifies the importance of Jackson County, Missouri, in the teachings of the Church and traces LDS history there and in Clay County. The second article discusses how the Missouri State Legislature created Caldwell and Daviess counties especially for the Latter-day Saints to settle in. The Church was driven from Missouri in the winter of 1838–1839, when its lead- ers were arrested and held for trial and the state militia enforced Governor Boggs's Extermination Order.]

LDS COMMUNITIES IN JACKSON AND CLAY COUNTIES

LDS interest and settlement in Jackson County, Missouri, came as a direct result of a REVELATION designating it as the location for ZION and the NEW JERUSALEM. Both the Book of Mormon (Ether 13:2–3; 3 Ne. 20:22) and revelations to Joseph Smith (D&C 28:9; 29:7–9; 35:24; 42:9, 35–36, 62; 45:65–71) filled the Latter-day Saints with a zeal to know the time and place for the establishment. Elders from the LAMANITE MISSION had traveled to western Missouri in early 1831, knowing they were near the location of Zion (D&C 28:9). The day after a significant June 1831 conference in Ohio, a revelation directed Joseph SMITH and other Church leaders to go to Missouri, where the land of their inheritance would be revealed (D&C 52:3–5, 42–43).

Three new groups of Saints proceeded to western Missouri in the summer of 1831: Joseph Smith's party of leaders; an entire branch of the Church from COLESVILLE, NEW YORK, who were commanded to relocate in Missouri (D&C 54:8); and thirteen pairs of missionaries who were instructed to preach along the way (D&C 52:7–10, 22–33; 56:5–7). The Prophet's group, traveling by foot, investigated other counties near the western Missouri border before determining that Jackson County was to be their ultimate destination. Their observation of Missouri's frontier communities was in harmony with a general feeling even in the West that the society of western Missouri, composed as it was of recent arrivals who had sought out the frontier to escape society's constraints, was not a model of civilization. "Our reflections were many, coming as we had from a highly cultivated state of society in the east," reads Joseph Smith's official history, "to observe the degradation . . . of a people that were nearly a century behind the times" (HC 1:189).

In response to the question "When will Zion be built up in her glory, and where will Thy temple stand?" (HC 1:189), the Lord declared, "Wherefore, this is the land of promise, and the place for the city of Zion. . . . The place which is now called Independence is the center place; and the spot for the temple is lying westward, upon a lot which is not far from the court-house" (D&C 57:2–3).

both spiritual and administrative, had been clearly established during the period of their British Mission experience.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B.; Ronald K. Esplin; and David J. Whittaker. Men with a Mission: The Quorum of the Twelve in Great Britain—1837–1841. Salt Lake City, 1991.
- Bloxham, V. Ben; James R. Moss; and Larry C. Porter, eds. Truth Will Prevail: The Rise of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the British Isles, 1837–1987. Solihull, England, 1987.
- Crawley, Peter, and David J. Whittaker. Mormon Imprints in Great Britain and the Empire, 1836–1857. Provo, Utah, 1987.
- Esplin, Ronald K. "Joseph, Brigham and the Twelve: A Succession of Continuity." BYU Studies 21 (Summer 1981):301–341.
- . "A Preparation for Ascendancy: Brigham Young and the Quorum Experience in England, 1840–41." In "The Emergence of Brigham Young and the Twelve to Mormon Leadership, 1830–1841," pp. 427–98. Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1981.
- . "A Great Work Done in That Land." Ensign 17 (July 1987):20–27.
- Evans, Richard L. A Century of "Mormonism" in Great Britain. Salt Lake City, 1937.
- Jensen, Richard L., and Malcolm R. Thorp, eds. Mormons in Early Victorian Britain. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Pratt, Parley P. The Autobiography of Parley Parker Pratt. New York, 1874.
- Taylor, P. A. M. Expectations Westward: The Mormons and the Emigration of their British Converts in the Nineteenth Century. Edinburgh and London, 1965; Ithaca, N.Y., 1966.
- Whittaker, David J. "Mormonism in Victorian Britain: A Bibliographic Essay." In Mormons in Early Victorian Britain, ed. R. Jensen and M. Thorp, pp. 258–71. Salt Lake City, 1989.

DAVID J. WHITTAKER
JAMES R. MOSS

MISSOURI

[This entry consists of two articles:

LDS Communities in Jackson and Clay Counties

LDS Communities in Caldwell and Daviess Counties

The first article identifies the importance of Jackson County, Missouri, in the teachings of the Church and traces LDS history there and in Clay County. The second article discusses how the Missouri State Legislature created Caldwell and Daviess counties especially for the Latter-day Saints to settle in. The Church was driven from Missouri in the winter of 1838–1839, when its lead- ers were arrested and held for trial and the state militia enforced Governor Boggs's Extermination Order.]

LDS COMMUNITIES IN JACKSON AND CLAY COUNTIES

LDS interest and settlement in Jackson County, Missouri, came as a direct result of a REVELATION designating it as the location for ZION and the NEW JERUSALEM. Both the Book of Mormon (Ether 13:2–3; 3 Ne. 20:22) and revelations to Joseph Smith (D&C 28:9; 29:7–9; 35:24; 42:9, 35–36, 62; 45:65–71) filled the Latter-day Saints with a zeal to know the time and place for the establishment. Elders from the LAMANITE MISSION had traveled to western Missouri in early 1831, knowing they were near the location of Zion (D&C 28:9). The day after a significant June 1831 conference in Ohio, a revelation directed Joseph SMITH and other Church leaders to go to Missouri, where the land of their inheritance would be revealed (D&C 52:3–5, 42–43).

Three new groups of Saints proceeded to western Missouri in the summer of 1831: Joseph Smith's party of leaders; an entire branch of the Church from COLESVILLE, NEW YORK, who were commanded to relocate in Missouri (D&C 54:8); and thirteen pairs of missionaries who were instructed to preach along the way (D&C 52:7–10, 22–33; 56:5–7). The Prophet's group, traveling by foot, investigated other counties near the western Missouri border before determining that Jackson County was to be their ultimate destination. Their observation of Missouri's frontier communities was in harmony with a general feeling even in the West that the society of western Missouri, composed as it was of recent arrivals who had sought out the frontier to escape society's constraints, was not a model of civilization. "Our reflections were many, coming as we had from a highly cultivated state of society in the east," reads Joseph Smith's official history, "to observe the degradation . . . of a people that were nearly a century behind the times" (HC 1:189).

In response to the question "When will Zion be built up in her glory, and where will Thy temple stand?" (HC 1:189), the Lord declared, "Wherefore, this is the land of promise, and the place for the city of Zion. . . . The place which is now called Independence is the center place; and the spot for the temple is lying westward, upon a lot which is not far from the court-house" (D&C 57:2–3).

Church history sites in western Missouri, 1831–1839.

BYU Geography Department

In the summer of 1831, Church leaders explored the county, wrote a description of it for future Saints, established the first settlement in Kaw Township (now in Kansas City), dedicated the land for a gathering place, dedicated the temple lot, and conducted a conference for all Saints thus far gathered. The following men were assigned to prominent Church positions in Missouri: Edward Partridge, bishop; A. Sidney Gilbert, financial agent; W. W. Phelps, printer and editor; and Oliver COWDERY, assistant printer and editor. After Joseph Smith returned to Ohio, Bishop Partridge began buying land for the Saints' new inheritances.

LDS settlers who spent the winter of 1831–1832 in Jackson County struggled to cut timber; build ferries, bridges, mills, dams, homes, out-buildings, and fences; and prepare land for cultivation. Even though up to ten families lived in each log cabin, "there was a spirit of peace and union, and love and good will manifested in this little Church in the wilderness" (Pratt, p. 56). Plainly, it was not what Zion was but what it could become that buoyed up the Saints and lifted sagging spirits.

Early in 1832, Gilbert established a Church storehouse and Phelps the printing office. Proceeds from the store were used to buy and develop more land. Phelps began publishing a religious monthly, The Evening and the Morning Star, and a secular weekly, The Upper Missouri Advertiser; work also proceeded on the BOOK OF COMMANDMENTS, a compilation of revelations that had been received by Joseph Smith, and on a compilation of hymns. Establishing schools also became a high priority. By fall, schools were started in Kaw Township (called the Colesville School) and in Independence near the temple lot. Proper observance of the Lord's Day also received special emphasis (see D&C 59).

The subject that received the most attention was "gathering to Zion." Through the Star, Phelps reminded migrating Saints not to gather without adequate preparation, including carrying a recommendation from the bishop in Ohio or from three elders. Bishop Partridge assigned land "inheritances" to new arrivals. Some three to four hundred arrived in the spring and summer of 1832, and by November there were 810 Latter-day Saints in Missouri. Up to this time, five settlements had easily absorbed the immigrants: a community in Independence near the temple lot; a branch on the Blue River three miles to the west; the Whitmer Branch three miles farther west; the Colesville Branch in Kaw Township two miles south of the Whitmer Branch; and the Prairie Branch on the Missouri state border. Editorials in the Star reflected the Saints' optimism.

The year 1833 brought numerous new challenges to the Church in Jackson County. Some members circumvented appointed leaders and ignored their authority to preside. Others tried to obtain property through means other than the revealed laws. Joseph Smith and Sidney RIGDON had visited the area in the spring of 1832, but now there arose a general concern among Missouri Latter-day Saints that their Prophet should move permanently from Ohio to the new Zion. Additionally, there were petty jealousies, covetousness, and general neglect in keeping the commandments. None of this helped the newcomers to cope with the worst problem—increasing hostility with the "old settlers" of Jackson County. As the LDS population in the county reached twelve hundred by the summer of 1833, concerns of the local citizens reached fever pitch. It did not help that some members unwisely boasted that nonmembers would be driven from the county.

However, not everything was gloomy in the Jackson County settlements. Solemn assemblies in each branch had brought about a new spirit of humility, diligence, and order to the Church. A school for elders was established on the model of the SCHOOL OF THE PROPHETS in Kirtland, Ohio. Joseph Smith sent a plan for the building-up of the city of Zion and its accompanying temple (see CITY PLANNING). The Book of Commandments was nearing completion. But all of this seemed only to increase hostility.

Mob violence broke out against the Saints in late July 1833. The printing press was destroyed, the page sheets of the Book of Commandments were scattered, and Bishop Partridge was tarred and feathered. Under duress, Church leaders signed an agreement to vacate Jackson County (see MISSOURI CONFLICT). Church members sought redress from the government, but were granted only sympathy, not help. When the old settlers saw that the Saints intended not to depart immediately but to hold their ground and defend themselves, they resumed acts of violence. After small battles erupted and led to several fatalities, the local militia succeeded in disarming the Mormons and driving them from Jackson County in early November.

Although some Saints fled to Van Buren and Lafayette counties, most found refuge north across the Missouri River in Clay County. The citizens of Liberty, the seat of Clay County, charitably offered shelter, work, and provisions. The refugees moved into abandoned slave cabins, built crude huts, pitched tents, and lived on meager subsistence until spring. Most Clay County citizens were friendly but considered the settlement of the Saints in their midst as only temporary.

To help the Missouri Saints, Joseph Smith arrived in June 1834 at the head of ZION'S CAMP, a paramilitary body of Latter-day Saints from the East. All efforts to achieve either reentry into Jackson County or redress of grievances came to naught. Outright war between Missourians and Mormons seemed imminent. By revelation (D&C 105) Joseph Smith was told to disband the camp because Zion could not yet be redeemed; bloodshed was thereby averted.

Before returning to Ohio, the Prophet established a presidency and high council for the Missouri Saints with David WHITMER as president and W. W. Phelps and John Whitmer as his counselors. Church members began establishing more, permanent residences in Liberty and the surrounding Clay County countryside. They won a reputation for retrenchment and thrift and were generally able to live at peace with their neighbors.

Gradually, however, citizens of Clay became concerned about the permanence of LDS settlements. This concern became acute after the arrival of additional Church members in 1835 and 1836. In June 1836 a public meeting was held at the courthouse in Liberty to discuss objections to the Mormons remaining in the county. The citizens reminded the Saints of their original pledge to leave the county when they were no longer welcome, but promised to control any violence until they left.

Bishop Partridge and W. W. Phelps explored new gathering spots for the Saints in relatively uninhabited territory in northern Missouri, and by early 1837, Church members began moving out of Clay County into the newly created "Mormon county" of Caldwell (see MISSOURI: LDS COMMUNITIES IN CALDWELL AND DAVIESS COUNTIES).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Jennings, Warren A. "Zion Is Fled: The Expulsion of the Mormons from Jackson County, Missouri." Ph.D. diss., University of Florida, 1962.
- Parkin, Max H. "A History of the Latter-day Saints in Clay County, Missouri, from 1833 to 1837." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1976.
- Pratt, Parley P. Autobiography of Parley Parker Pratt. Salt Lake City, 1938.

CLARK V. JOHNSON

LDS COMMUNITIES IN CALDWELL AND DAVIESS COUNTIES

The Missouri legislature created Caldwell and Daviess counties in December 1836 in an attempt to resolve "the Mormon problem." After the Latter-day Saints were driven from Jackson County in 1833, they were given temporary refuge in Clay County (see MISSOURI: LDS COMMUNITIES IN JACKSON AND CLAY COUNTIES), but three years later, they still lacked a homeland. The small, newly created county of Caldwell in unsettled northern Missouri was to be their county; later, they also moved north into Daviess County.

When the Saints sought shelter in Clay County, both they and the local citizens expected their stay to be temporary. Consequently, in the spring of 1836, Bishop Edward Partridge and W. W. Phelps explored potential sites for LDS settlements in northern Ray County, an expansive region commonly known as the Far West, which stretched north to the Iowa border. Most of the territory was prairie covered by tall grass, with timber only along the streams and rivers. They identified suitable sites and the Saints began purchasing land along Shoal Creek in northern Ray County, about thirty miles northwest of Liberty. In the summer of 1836, when Clay County officially requested the Latter-day Saints to leave, Church leaders announced their intent to move to northern Ray.

Ray County residents opposed the plan, however, an opposition made firmer when approximately one hundred families of migrating Saints from Ohio camped on the Crooked River in lower Ray County. Although many of the Saints in the camp were ill and most without funds to purchase either provisions or lands, the local citizens threatened them with violence if they did not leave. Another hundred impoverished LDS families were already traveling toward Missouri. Only after Church leaders assured Ray County officials of their intent to settle uninhabited and generally unwanted prairies to the north and to apply for a new county did opposition wane. Both parties agreed to establish a six-mile buffer zone or a nonman's land where neither Mormons nor non-Mormons would settle.

Early in August 1836, W. W. Phelps and John Whitmer, members of the Missouri stake presidency, located a site for a city on Shoal Creek and called it Far West. It was twelve miles west of Haun's Mill, a small LDS settlement created by Jacob Haun a year earlier. The Saints began gathering near Far West in late summer and fall and soon built numerous smaller settlements.

Alexander W. Doniphan, state legislator and friend to the Saints, introduced a bill in December 1836 to create two new small counties from sparsely settled northern Ray County. Doniphan named the new counties Daviess and Caldwell after two famous Kentucky Indian fighters. Caldwell County, the location of the Far West and Shoal Creek settlements, would be exclusively for Mormons; they would have their own militia and their own representation in the state legislature. Since many considered this segregation of the Latter-day Saints an excellent solution to the Mormon problem, the bill passed and was signed into law December 29, 1836. By early 1837, Missouri Saints were pouring into Caldwell County and began constructing log houses and preparing the soil for spring planting. The standard government rate was $1.25 per acre for unimproved land, and within a year most of the land was claimed and much of it was under cultivation. Civil officers were selected, and as in other counties, a county militia was organized as an arm of the state militia.

Some of the land around Far West was purchased by W. W. Phelps and John Whitmer using nearly $1,500 that had been raised to aid the poverty-stricken incoming Saints. Without consulting other local leaders (see HIGH COUNCIL), they developed the land, sold it, and retained some of the profit for themselves, thus creating discord. Conflict festered in Far West throughout 1837 until Joseph SMITH, visiting from Ohio in November, temporarily resolved differences among the leaders. During his visit he also established commitments to identify additional settlement sites.

New tension arose among the Saints during the winter, however, when Oliver COWDERY and Frederick G. Williams arrived in Far West from KIRTLAND, OHIO. With Phelps and Whitmer, Cowdery sold Church land in Jackson County, violating a policy that the Saints should retain their claims in Zion (D&C 101:99). The local high council tried the three for disobedience and excommunicated them, along with Williams, who apparently sided with them. As prominent "dissenters," they stirred up trouble among the Saints through the first half of 1838.

In March 1838 Joseph Smith moved the headquarters of the Church to Far West. Other Ohio Saints planned to follow later in the year. That summer, the population in Caldwell County reached five thousand, a large percentage living in Far West, where the Saints had built hundreds of homes, four dry-goods stores, three family grocery stores, several blacksmith shops, two hotels, a printing shop, and a large schoolhouse that doubled as a church and courthouse.

The rapidly increasing LDS population required more new settlements. In mid-May, Joseph Smith led an exploring expedition northward into Daviess County, where a few members had previously settled under a gentleman's agreement with the old settlers. The explorers found a beautiful townsite on the Grand River. While there, the Prophet received a revelation that this was also the site of ADAM-ONDI-AHMAN, mentioned in a revelation three years earlier as the valley where Adam had gathered his righteous posterity "and there bestowed upon them his last blessing" (D&C 107:53; cf. 78:15–16). This news helped confirm the decision to create a stake there and designate the area as a gathering place for Ohio members traveling to Missouri. At a June 28, 1838, conference in the newly laid-out community, affectionately nicknamed Di-Ahman, Joseph Smith's uncle, John Smith, was called as stake president. Throughout the summer of 1838, Latter-day Saints poured into Daviess County, where a plentiful harvest helped provide for the impoverished members of the Kirtland Camp when they arrived in early October. That same spring, the Saints also began to settle in DeWitt, in nearby Carroll County near the confluence of the Grand and Missouri rivers, where they established a steamboat landing from which immigrants could move to the other LDS settlements.

The Saints in northern Missouri industriously planted crops and built log houses throughout the summer, and prospects for peace appeared good. They still hoped for eventual reconciliation with the citizens of Jackson County so that they could return to their center place, but in the meantime they intended to prosper where they were. By revelation, Far West was to become a temple city (D&C 115:7), and the following spring, the Quorum of the Twelve would dedicate the temple site before departing on a mission to Great Britain (D&C 118:4). Revelation in Far West also prescribed the formal name of the Church, "even The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints" (D&C 115:4), and established the tithing system, which continues to provide financial stability to the Church and to bless its members (D&C 119, 120).

But new difficulties arose. First, Sidney RIGDON publicly threatened dissenters in his June "Salt Sermon," intimating that they should leave Far West or harm would befall them. News of this threat reinforced anti-Mormon hostility throughout Missouri. Second, LDS militia officer Sampson Avard formed an underground group of vigilantes labeled DANITES. Avard convinced this oathbound group that they operated with the approval of Church leaders and that they were authorized to avenge themselves against the Church's enemies, even by robbery, lying, and violence if necessary. Third, in an inflammatory Independence Day speech, Sidney Rigdon thundered out a declaration of independence from further mob violence. He warned of a war of extermination between Mormons and their enemies if they were further threatened or harassed.

Finally, and perhaps most important, the new LDS settlements in Adam-ondi-Ahman and DeWitt angered other Missourians who thought that the Mormons had agreed to stay in Caldwell County. Church leaders countered that as American citizens they had the right to buy land and live wherever they chose. Soon, depredations occurred, and with mobilization of militias on both sides, the stage was set for war. After violence erupted in October 1838, Governor Lilburn W. Boggs issued his infamous EXTERMINATION ORDER, declaring that all Mormons should be driven from Missouri or be exterminated.

At first, Church members attempted to defend themselves in their respective settlements, but the outlying towns were not defensible. Before all the Saints could gather to safety in fortified Far West, lives were lost in several confrontations, including the HAUN'S MILL MASSACRE, where seventeen LDS men and boys died. The siege of Far West took place during the last three days of October. Joseph Smith and other Church leaders were arrested and incarcerated, several in LIBERTY JAIL, and the Saints were forced to abandon their improved lands to their enemies and leave Missouri (see MISSOURI CONFLICT). Brigham YOUNG and Heber C. KIMBALL, members of the Twelve Apostles who were not imprisoned, and John TAYLOR, who was ordained an apostle in December, led the heroic efforts to relocate the approximately 12,000 Missouri Saints across the Mississippi River into Illinois.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Gentry, Leland H. "A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri from 1836 to 1839." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1965.
- LeSueur, Stephen C. The 1838 Mormon War in Missouri. Columbia, Mo., 1987.

LELAND H. GENTRY

MISSOURI CONFLICT

Incidents of discord between Latter-day Saints and their neighbors in Missouri from 1831 to 1839 are sometimes known as the Missouri War. In 1838 the tensions that had intermittently produced violence escalated into large-scale conflict that ended with the forced expulsion of the Latter-day Saints from the state.

The first Latter-day Saints entered Missouri in January 1831 as part of the LAMANITE MISSION. These zealous missionaries soon drew the ire of both U.S. Indian agents and local clergy in Independence, the rough-hewn and sometimes disorderly seat of Jackson County and the head of the Santa Fe Trail. Joseph SMITH arrived in July 1831. In August he selected a site for a temple and designated Jackson County as the location of the millennial ZION or NEW JERUSALEM and as the gathering place for the Saints.

That summer more than one hundred Church members arrived in Jackson County from KIRTLAND, OHIO, and from other northern and eastern states; hundreds more soon followed. By the summer of 1833, more than a thousand were grouped into four settlements west of Independence, while others lived in the village itself.

Tension between the Latter-day Saints and their neighbors in frontier Jackson County mounted for several reasons. First, marked cultural differences set them apart. With New England roots, most Saints valued congregational Sabbath worship, education of their children, and refined personal decorum. In contrast, many Jackson County residents had come to the Missouri frontier from other states precisely to avoid such interference in their lives. Many held no schools for their children, and Sunday cockfights attracted more people than church services did. Often hard drinking intensified violent frontier ways. In the opinion of non-LDS county resident John C. McCoy in the Kansas City Journal (Apr. 24, 1881, p. 9), such extreme differences in customs made the two groups "completely unfitted to live together in peace and friendship."

Second, Missourians considered the Latter-day Saints strange and religiously unorthodox. Many LDS Church members aggressively articulated belief in revelation, prophets, the Book of Mormon, spiritual gifts, the Millennium, and the importance of gathering. Some went further and claimed Jackson County land as a sacred inheri-

group that they operated with the approval of Church leaders and that they were authorized to avenge themselves against the Church's enemies, even by robbery, lying, and violence if necessary. Third, in an inflammatory Independence Day speech, Sidney Rigdon thundered out a declaration of independence from further mob violence. He warned of a war of extermination between Mormons and their enemies if they were further threatened or harassed.

Finally, and perhaps most important, the new LDS settlements in Adam-ondi-Ahman and DeWitt angered other Missourians who thought that the Mormons had agreed to stay in Caldwell County. Church leaders countered that as American citizens they had the right to buy land and live wherever they chose. Soon, depredations occurred, and with mobilization of militias on both sides, the stage was set for war. After violence erupted in October 1838, Governor Lilburn W. Boggs issued his infamous EXTERMINATION ORDER, declaring that all Mormons should be driven from Missouri or be exterminated.

At first, Church members attempted to defend themselves in their respective settlements, but the outlying towns were not defensible. Before all the Saints could gather to safety in fortified Far West, lives were lost in several confrontations, including the HAUN'S MILL MASSACRE, where seventeen LDS men and boys died. The siege of Far West took place during the last three days of October. Joseph Smith and other Church leaders were arrested and incarcerated, several in LIBERTY JAIL, and the Saints were forced to abandon their improved lands to their enemies and leave Missouri (see MISSOURI CONFLICT). Brigham YOUNG and Heber C. KIMBALL, members of the Twelve Apostles who were not imprisoned, and John TAYLOR, who was ordained an apostle in December, led the heroic efforts to relocate the approximately 12,000 Missouri Saints across the Mississippi River into Illinois.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Gentry, Leland H. "A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri from 1836 to 1839." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1965.
- LeSueur, Stephen C. The 1838 Mormon War in Missouri. Columbia, Mo., 1987.

LELAND H. GENTRY

MISSOURI CONFLICT

Incidents of discord between Latter-day Saints and their neighbors in Missouri from 1831 to 1839 are sometimes known as the Missouri War. In 1838 the tensions that had intermittently produced violence escalated into large-scale conflict that ended with the forced expulsion of the Latter-day Saints from the state.

The first Latter-day Saints entered Missouri in January 1831 as part of the LAMANITE MISSION. These zealous missionaries soon drew the ire of both U.S. Indian agents and local clergy in Independence, the rough-hewn and sometimes disorderly seat of Jackson County and the head of the Santa Fe Trail. Joseph SMITH arrived in July 1831. In August he selected a site for a temple and designated Jackson County as the location of the millennial ZION or NEW JERUSALEM and as the gathering place for the Saints.

That summer more than one hundred Church members arrived in Jackson County from KIRTLAND, OHIO, and from other northern and eastern states; hundreds more soon followed. By the summer of 1833, more than a thousand were grouped into four settlements west of Independence, while others lived in the village itself.

Tension between the Latter-day Saints and their neighbors in frontier Jackson County mounted for several reasons. First, marked cultural differences set them apart. With New England roots, most Saints valued congregational Sabbath worship, education of their children, and refined personal decorum. In contrast, many Jackson County residents had come to the Missouri frontier from other states precisely to avoid such interference in their lives. Many held no schools for their children, and Sunday cockfights attracted more people than church services did. Often hard drinking intensified violent frontier ways. In the opinion of non-LDS county resident John C. McCoy in the Kansas City Journal (Apr. 24, 1881, p. 9), such extreme differences in customs made the two groups "completely unfitted to live together in peace and friendship."

Second, Missourians considered the Latter-day Saints strange and religiously unorthodox. Many LDS Church members aggressively articulated belief in revelation, prophets, the Book of Mormon, spiritual gifts, the Millennium, and the importance of gathering. Some went further and claimed Jackson County land as a sacred inheritance by divine appointment. Even David WHITMER, presiding elder of one branch, thought these boasts excited bitter jealousy. Articles on prophecy and doctrine published in the Church newspaper at Independence, the EVENING AND THE MORNING STAR, added to hard feelings. In addition, local Protestant clergy felt threatened by LDS missionary activity.

Third, because the Saints lived on Church lands and traded entirely with the Church store or blacksmith shops, some original settlers viewed them as economically exclusive, even un-American. Others accused LDS immigrants of pauperism when, because of diminished Church resources, they failed to obtain land.

A fourth volatile issue was the original settlers' fear that Latter-day Saints might provoke battles with either slaves or Indians. They accused the Saints of slave tampering. As transplanted Southerners who valued their right to hold slaves, the settlers erroneously feared that the Saints intended to convert blacks or incite them to revolt. They also correctly asserted that the Latter-day Saints desired to convert Indians and, perhaps, ally themselves with the Indians.

Finally, Missourians feared that continued LDS ingathering would lead to loss of political control. "It requires no gift of prophecy," stated a citizens' committee, "to tell that the day is not far distant when the civil government of the county will be in their hands; when the sheriff, the justices, and the county judges will be Mormons" (HC 1:397). These monumental differences between the Latter-day Saints and the Missourians eventually led to violence.

Vandalism against LDS settlers first occurred in the spring of 1832. Coordinated aggression commenced in July 1833, after the article "Free People of Color" appeared in the Evening and the Morning Star. Even though the article was written to curtail trouble, it so outraged local citizens that more than 400 met at the courthouse to demand that the Mormons leave. When the Latter-day Saints refused to negotiate away or abandon lands they legally owned, some citizens formed a mob and destroyed the press and printing house, ransacked the Mormon store, and violently accosted LDS leaders. Bishop Edward Partridge was beaten and tarred and feathered. Meeting three days later, the mob issued an ultimatum: One-half of the Mormons must leave by year's end and the rest by April (1834).

Local Church leaders sought counsel from Joseph Smith at Kirtland and assistance from Missouri Governor Daniel Dunklin. The Prophet urged them to hold their ground, and the governor advised them to seek redress through the courts. They did both. They employed lawyers from Clay County, including Alexander W. Doniphan and David R. Atchison.

Determined to settle the matter decisively, the old settlers mobilized to drive the Mormons out. Renewed violence began on October 31, 1833, with an attack on the Whitmer Branch a few miles west of the Big Blue River, near Independence. The mob demolished houses, whipped the men, and terrorized the women and children. For a week, attacks, beatings, and depredations against the Saints continued. On November 4 a mob again attacked the Whitmer settlement, making its streets a battleground. Two Missourians and one defender died.

The following day men led by Lyman Wight arrived from the Prairie Branch, twelve miles west, to protect members threatened at Independence. Colonel Thomas L. Pitcher then called out the county militia to quell the mob and negotiate a truce with Wight. According to John Correll, a Church officer at Independence, after the Saints surrendered their arms to the militia, the troops joined the mob in a general assault against them. Some county residents recoiled at this barbarism. John McCoy, whose father rode with the mob, later wrote in the Kansas City Journal (Jan. 18, 1885, p. 5) that the Mormons "were unjustly and outrageously maltreated." But neither Colonel Pitcher nor Lieutenant Governor Lilburn W. Boggs, a resident of the county, interfered.

The terrified Saints fled Jackson County in disarray. Most went north, across the Missouri River, and sought refuge in Clay County, whose citizens were generally sympathetic and hospitable. Even there, however, these refugees endured a miserable winter without sufficient shelter, clothing, or food—either in extemporized camps along the river or above the bluffs in abandoned summer slave quarters. By spring, though, industry, better weather, and the aid of Clay County citizens improved their desperate condition.

After the Missouri governor promised militia assistance, about 200 Saints marched from Ohio to Missouri to escort the exiles back to their homes. This paramilitary relief party was known as ZION'S CAMP. But reports of the camp's coming mobilized anti-Mormons throughout Missouri's western counties, and when it arrived in Missouri, it encountered hundreds of armed adversaries. The promised military assistance from the governor was not forthcoming, and the camp disbanded in June 1834 without crossing into Jackson County. The revelation disbanding Zion's Camp declared that, because the Saints had not been blameless and must yet learn much, their anticipated Zion would not be redeemed for "many days" (D&C 105:2–10, 37).

All parties considered the Saints' exile in Clay County to be temporary. Joseph Smith still hoped for the strength to return to Jackson County in the near future. But the Clay County old settlers, fearful of the flood of new LDS arrivals, grew impatient. On the night of June 28, 1836, a Clay County mob, determined to drive the Mormons from the county, commenced to harass and beat them. The following day a convention of leading citizens entreated the Saints to leave the county before the mob struck further. Grateful for the refuge provided by Clay County citizens at a time of deep crisis, Church leaders agreed to move.

An uninhabited area north of Richmond became the new gathering place. Friends of the Saints, including state legislator Alexander W. Doniphan, guided the formation of a new "Mormon county" called Caldwell. By late 1836, with the county seat of Far West surrounded by other settlements, Latter-day Saints streamed into Caldwell County. In early 1838, after experiencing difficulties in Ohio, Joseph Smith arrived at Far West, and the settlement became Church headquarters. Many of the Ohio Saints soon followed. As LDS settlement extended into nearby Daviess and Carroll counties, competition with the old settlers resumed, eventually erupting into conflict.

Internal dissent, the aftermath of problems in Kirtland, also plagued the Church at Far West. Oliver COWDERY, the Missouri stake presidency (David WHITMER, William W. Phelps, and John Whitmer), and three apostles (Luke S. Johnson, Lyman E. Johnson, and William E. McLellin) were all excommunicated. Trying to prevent them from damaging the Church, Sidney RIGDON, a counselor to Joseph Smith, demanded in his June 19 "salt sermon" that the dissenters leave or be punished. Soon after, in a vigorous July 4 address, Rigdon declared the Church's independence from "mobocracy." These two sermons further incensed the public against expanding LDS influence.

Persecutions in Jackson County, Missouri, 1833, by C. C. A. Christensen (1878–1879, tempera on canvas, 6'6" × 9'9"). Many factors, including cultural and religious differences and the feared loss of political control, led to the violent expulsion of Latter-day Saints from Jackson County, Missouri, in 1833. Homes and barns were demolished, crops destroyed, and families attacked. Courtesy Museum of Fine Arts, Brigham Young University.

Hostilities that began on August 8, 1838, election day, ended a few months later with the expulsion of the Latter-day Saints from the state. At Galatin, county seat of Daviess County, a fight ensued when Mormons were prevented from voting. Joseph Smith quickly took measures to protect his people in Daviess County, but matters worsened. As false rumors of his efforts and of the election day battle reached surrounding counties, hundreds of self-appointed regulators congregated in Daviess, Caldwell, and Carroll counties. State militia commanded by Major General David R. Atchison worked to keep an uneasy peace.

Fearing that Latter-day Saints, reinforced regularly by new arrivals, would soon control their counties, non-Mormons determined to attack. On October 2, 1838, a mob laid siege to the LDS settlement of DeWitt in Carroll County. The Saints petitioned recently elected Governor Lilburn W. Boggs for protection, only to be told that they must take care of themselves. Atchison's militia, weakened by mutiny and insubordination and lacking the firm support of the governor, failed to quell the mob. After ten days, the DeWitt Saints fled to Far West for safety; some in weakened condition died.

Faced with a heedless governor and an ineffective militia, Latter-day Saints reconsidered their long-standing position of passive defense. Concluding that without civil protection they had to protect themselves, in mid-October LDS leaders mobilized their own state-authorized militias in Caldwell and Daviess counties. These units actively confronted threatening mobs; there may also have been activity by units not strictly part of the militia (see DANITES).

Raiders from Gallatin and Millport in Daviess County harassed the LDS community of ADAM-ONDI-AIIMAN. Throughout October both sides engaged in burning, stealing, and intimidation. While clearly acting first in self-defense, some Latter-day Saints nevertheless felt that military measures were excessive. In late October, Thomas B. Marsh and Orson Hyde, both apostles, signed affidavits critical of Mormon actions.

Hostilities escalated into outright warfare. Far West Militia Captain David W. PATTEN, an apostle, pursued a renegade band of Missouri militia overnight to the Crooked River in northern Ray County where, at dawn on October 25, they clashed. Two died on the battlefield, one on each side, and two mortally wounded Saints died soon after, including Patten.

From the Battle of Crooked River, rumors of LDS aggression spread like wildfire. On the strength of these rumors, Governor Boggs issued his infamous EXTERMINATION ORDER on October 27, authorizing the state militia to drive all Mormons from Missouri or exterminate them. Three days later Colonel William O. Jennings launched an unprovoked attack on an LDS settlement at Haun's Mill, east of Far West, leaving seventeen men and boys dead (see HAUN'S MILL MASSACRE). Survivors joined other refugees fleeing to Far

This engraving (published by Samuel Brannan in New York, c. 1844–1845) shows the Missouri militia marching on the LDS settlement of Far West in the fall of 1838. Joseph Smith and other LDS leaders surrendered themselves to a court martial and the inhabitants of the settlement were disarmed. The Saints were then driven from the State.

BYU Geography Department

The Battle of Crooked River, Missouri, October 25, 1838.

West. On October 31, the militia under the command of Major General Samuel D. Lucas laid siege upon Far West.

To avoid bloodshed, Joseph Smith and others agreed to meet with militia leaders, who instead arrested them. A court-martial that evening summarily sentenced Joseph Smith and his associates to be shot, and Lucas ordered Brig. General Alexander Doniphan to execute them at dawn. Doniphan thought the order illegal and heroically refused to carry it out, declaring that he would bring to account anyone who tried to do it. After Far West defenders were disarmed, Missouri attackers committed numerous outrages against women and property; a number of men were shot and at least one was killed.

While Joseph Smith and some of the others were jailed at Independence, in RICHMOND JAIL, and finally in LIBERTY JAIL, the rest of the Latter-day Saints were forced from the state. That winter, under the leadership of Brigham YOUNG, approximately 12,000 suffering Saints fled Missouri, most crossing the Mississippi River into Illinois at Quincy.

Joseph Smith and several others spent five months in jail awaiting trial for alleged murder, treason, arson, and other charges growing out of the fall violence and attempts at defense. For the Prophet, this imprisonment evoked a legacy of strength and revelations from heaven (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTIONS 121–23). A trial was never held. On April 15, 1839, while being transported on a change of venue to Boone County, Joseph and his brother Hyrum were allowed to escape to join Saints and their families in Illinois.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Gentry, Leland H. "A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri from 1836 to 1839." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1965.
- Jennings, Warren A. "Zion Is Fled: The Expulsion of the Mormons from Jackson County, Missouri." Ph.D. diss., University of Florida, 1962.
- Johnson, Clark V. The Missouri Petitions: Documents from the Missouri Conflict, 1833–1838. Provo, Utah, 1991.
- LeSueur, Stephen C. The 1838 Mormon War in Missouri. Columbia, Missouri, 1987.
- Roberts, B. H. The Missouri Persecutions. Salt Lake City, 1900.

MAX H PARKIN

MODESTY

[A quality of mind, heart, and body, modesty is an attitude of humility, decency, and propriety that may be evidenced in thought, language, dress, and behavior. Modesty or immodesty is reflected in almost every aspect of human life. It will be manifest in the "example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity" (1 Tim. 4:12). Articles pertaining to this topic are Chastity; Humility; Lifestyle; Modesty in Dress; Profanity; Reverence; Righteousness.]

MODESTY IN DRESS

Latter-day Saints believe that modest dress reflects commitment to a Christlike life and shows respect for self, for fellow beings, and for God. In their homes and in the Church, they are taught that modest dress has a positive effect on both self-esteem and behavior.

According to LDS theology, the body is more than a biological entity; it is a temple that houses an eternal spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16–17). Physical intimacy is reserved for marriage (see CHASTITY). Modest dress serves as a physical and spiritual guard against immoral behavior and its inherent physical, emotional, and spiritual harm. Because modesty in dress cannot be reduced to a matter of particular styles, individuals are encouraged to use discretion to determine appropriate dress in varying situations.

Emphasizing the importance of modest dress, President Spencer W. KIMBALL stated, "I am positive that personal grooming and cleanliness, as well as the clothes we wear, can be tremendous factors in the standards we set and follow on the pathway to immortality and eternal life" (1979, p. 3).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W. Faith Precedes the Miracle, pp. 161–68. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- . "On My Honor." Ensign 9 (Apr. 1979):3.

MICHELE THOMPSON-HOLBROOK

MORMON

Mormon was a PROPHET, an author, and the last NEPHITE military commander (c. A.D. 310–385). The Book of Mormon bears his name because he was the major abridger–writer of the GOLD PLATES from which it was translated. He was prepared by the experiences of his youth to become a prophet: he was taught "the learning of [his] people," was a "sober child" and "quick to observe," and in his fifteenth year was "visited of the Lord" (Morm. 1:2, 15). At sixteen he became the general of all the Nephite armies and largely succeeded in preserving his people from destruction until A.D. 385, when virtually all of them but his son MORONI<sub>2</sub> were destroyed in battles with the LAMANITES (6:8–15; 8:1–3). As keeper of the Nephite records, Mormon abridged the large PLATES of Nephi, bound with them the small plates of Nephi, and added his own short history (W of M 1:1–5; Morm. 1:1). Before his death, he hid the records entrusted to him in the hill CUMORAH, "save it were these few plates which I gave unto my son Moroni" (Morm. 6:6). The Prophet Joseph SMITH received and translated Mormon's abridgment, the small plates of Nephi, and a few other documents, and published them in 1830 as the Book of Mormon.

First and foremost, Mormon was a prophet to his people, urging them to "repent, and be baptized in the name of Jesus, and lay hold upon the treason, arson, and other charges growing out of the fall violence and attempts at defense. For the Prophet, this imprisonment evoked a legacy of strength and revelations from heaven (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTIONS 121–23). A trial was never held. On April 15, 1839, while being transported on a change of venue to Boone County, Joseph and his brother Hyrum were allowed to escape to join Saints and their families in Illinois.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Gentry, Leland H. "A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri from 1836 to 1839." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1965.
- Jennings, Warren A. "Zion Is Fled: The Expulsion of the Mormons from Jackson County, Missouri." Ph.D. diss., University of Florida, 1962.
- Johnson, Clark V. The Missouri Petitions: Documents from the Missouri Conflict, 1833–1838. Provo, Utah, 1991.
- LeSueur, Stephen C. The 1838 Mormon War in Missouri. Columbia, Missouri, 1987.
- Roberts, B. H. The Missouri Persecutions. Salt Lake City, 1900.

MAX H PARKIN

MODESTY

[A quality of mind, heart, and body, modesty is an attitude of humility, decency, and propriety that may be evidenced in thought, language, dress, and behavior. Modesty or immodesty is reflected in almost every aspect of human life. It will be manifest in the "example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity" (1 Tim. 4:12). Articles pertaining to this topic are Chastity; Humility; Lifestyle; Modesty in Dress; Profanity; Reverence; Righteousness.]

MODESTY IN DRESS

Latter-day Saints believe that modest dress reflects commitment to a Christlike life and shows respect for self, for fellow beings, and for God. In their homes and in the Church, they are taught that modest dress has a positive effect on both self-esteem and behavior.

According to LDS theology, the body is more than a biological entity; it is a temple that houses an eternal spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16–17). Physical intimacy is reserved for marriage (see CHASTITY). Modest dress serves as a physical and spiritual guard against immoral behavior and its inherent physical, emotional, and spiritual harm. Because modesty in dress cannot be reduced to a matter of particular styles, individuals are encouraged to use discretion to determine appropriate dress in varying situations.

Emphasizing the importance of modest dress, President Spencer W. KIMBALL stated, "I am positive that personal grooming and cleanliness, as well as the clothes we wear, can be tremendous factors in the standards we set and follow on the pathway to immortality and eternal life" (1979, p. 3).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W. Faith Precedes the Miracle, pp. 161–68. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- . "On My Honor." Ensign 9 (Apr. 1979):3.

MICHELE THOMPSON-HOLBROOK

MORMON

Mormon was a PROPHET, an author, and the last NEPHITE military commander (c. A.D. 310–385). The Book of Mormon bears his name because he was the major abridger–writer of the GOLD PLATES from which it was translated. He was prepared by the experiences of his youth to become a prophet: he was taught "the learning of [his] people," was a "sober child" and "quick to observe," and in his fifteenth year was "visited of the Lord" (Morm. 1:2, 15). At sixteen he became the general of all the Nephite armies and largely succeeded in preserving his people from destruction until A.D. 385, when virtually all of them but his son MORONI<sub>2</sub> were destroyed in battles with the LAMANITES (6:8–15; 8:1–3). As keeper of the Nephite records, Mormon abridged the large PLATES of Nephi, bound with them the small plates of Nephi, and added his own short history (W of M 1:1–5; Morm. 1:1). Before his death, he hid the records entrusted to him in the hill CUMORAH, "save it were these few plates which I gave unto my son Moroni" (Morm. 6:6). The Prophet Joseph SMITH received and translated Mormon's abridgment, the small plates of Nephi, and a few other documents, and published them in 1830 as the Book of Mormon.

First and foremost, Mormon was a prophet to his people, urging them to "repent, and be baptized in the name of Jesus, and lay hold upon the treason, arson, and other charges growing out of the fall violence and attempts at defense. For the Prophet, this imprisonment evoked a legacy of strength and revelations from heaven (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTIONS 121–23). A trial was never held. On April 15, 1839, while being transported on a change of venue to Boone County, Joseph and his brother Hyrum were allowed to escape to join Saints and their families in Illinois.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Gentry, Leland H. "A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri from 1836 to 1839." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1965.
- Jennings, Warren A. "Zion Is Fled: The Expulsion of the Mormons from Jackson County, Missouri." Ph.D. diss., University of Florida, 1962.
- Johnson, Clark V. The Missouri Petitions: Documents from the Missouri Conflict, 1833–1838. Provo, Utah, 1991.
- LeSueur, Stephen C. The 1838 Mormon War in Missouri. Columbia, Missouri, 1987.
- Roberts, B. H. The Missouri Persecutions. Salt Lake City, 1900.

MAX H PARKIN

MODESTY

[A quality of mind, heart, and body, modesty is an attitude of humility, decency, and propriety that may be evidenced in thought, language, dress, and behavior. Modesty or immodesty is reflected in almost every aspect of human life. It will be manifest in the "example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity" (1 Tim. 4:12). Articles pertaining to this topic are Chastity; Humility; Lifestyle; Modesty in Dress; Profanity; Reverence; Righteousness.]

MODESTY IN DRESS

Latter-day Saints believe that modest dress reflects commitment to a Christlike life and shows respect for self, for fellow beings, and for God. In their homes and in the Church, they are taught that modest dress has a positive effect on both self-esteem and behavior.

According to LDS theology, the body is more than a biological entity; it is a temple that houses an eternal spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16–17). Physical intimacy is reserved for marriage (see CHASTITY). Modest dress serves as a physical and spiritual guard against immoral behavior and its inherent physical, emotional, and spiritual harm. Because modesty in dress cannot be reduced to a matter of particular styles, individuals are encouraged to use discretion to determine appropriate dress in varying situations.

Emphasizing the importance of modest dress, President Spencer W. KIMBALL stated, "I am positive that personal grooming and cleanliness, as well as the clothes we wear, can be tremendous factors in the standards we set and follow on the pathway to immortality and eternal life" (1979, p. 3).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W. Faith Precedes the Miracle, pp. 161–68. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- . "On My Honor." Ensign 9 (Apr. 1979):3.

MICHELE THOMPSON-HOLBROOK

MORMON

Mormon was a PROPHET, an author, and the last NEPHITE military commander (c. A.D. 310–385). The Book of Mormon bears his name because he was the major abridger–writer of the GOLD PLATES from which it was translated. He was prepared by the experiences of his youth to become a prophet: he was taught "the learning of [his] people," was a "sober child" and "quick to observe," and in his fifteenth year was "visited of the Lord" (Morm. 1:2, 15). At sixteen he became the general of all the Nephite armies and largely succeeded in preserving his people from destruction until A.D. 385, when virtually all of them but his son MORONI<sub>2</sub> were destroyed in battles with the LAMANITES (6:8–15; 8:1–3). As keeper of the Nephite records, Mormon abridged the large PLATES of Nephi, bound with them the small plates of Nephi, and added his own short history (W of M 1:1–5; Morm. 1:1). Before his death, he hid the records entrusted to him in the hill CUMORAH, "save it were these few plates which I gave unto my son Moroni" (Morm. 6:6). The Prophet Joseph SMITH received and translated Mormon's abridgment, the small plates of Nephi, and a few other documents, and published them in 1830 as the Book of Mormon.

First and foremost, Mormon was a prophet to his people, urging them to "repent, and be baptized in the name of Jesus, and lay hold upon the treason, arson, and other charges growing out of the fall violence and attempts at defense. For the Prophet, this imprisonment evoked a legacy of strength and revelations from heaven (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTIONS 121–23). A trial was never held. On April 15, 1839, while being transported on a change of venue to Boone County, Joseph and his brother Hyrum were allowed to escape to join Saints and their families in Illinois.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Gentry, Leland H. "A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri from 1836 to 1839." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1965.
- Jennings, Warren A. "Zion Is Fled: The Expulsion of the Mormons from Jackson County, Missouri." Ph.D. diss., University of Florida, 1962.
- Johnson, Clark V. The Missouri Petitions: Documents from the Missouri Conflict, 1833–1838. Provo, Utah, 1991.
- LeSueur, Stephen C. The 1838 Mormon War in Missouri. Columbia, Missouri, 1987.
- Roberts, B. H. The Missouri Persecutions. Salt Lake City, 1900.

MAX H PARKIN

MODESTY

[A quality of mind, heart, and body, modesty is an attitude of humility, decency, and propriety that may be evidenced in thought, language, dress, and behavior. Modesty or immodesty is reflected in almost every aspect of human life. It will be manifest in the "example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity" (1 Tim. 4:12). Articles pertaining to this topic are Chastity; Humility; Lifestyle; Modesty in Dress; Profanity; Reverence; Righteousness.]

MODESTY IN DRESS

Latter-day Saints believe that modest dress reflects commitment to a Christlike life and shows respect for self, for fellow beings, and for God. In their homes and in the Church, they are taught that modest dress has a positive effect on both self-esteem and behavior.

According to LDS theology, the body is more than a biological entity; it is a temple that houses an eternal spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16–17). Physical intimacy is reserved for marriage (see CHASTITY). Modest dress serves as a physical and spiritual guard against immoral behavior and its inherent physical, emotional, and spiritual harm. Because modesty in dress cannot be reduced to a matter of particular styles, individuals are encouraged to use discretion to determine appropriate dress in varying situations.

Emphasizing the importance of modest dress, President Spencer W. KIMBALL stated, "I am positive that personal grooming and cleanliness, as well as the clothes we wear, can be tremendous factors in the standards we set and follow on the pathway to immortality and eternal life" (1979, p. 3).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W. Faith Precedes the Miracle, pp. 161–68. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- . "On My Honor." Ensign 9 (Apr. 1979):3.

MICHELE THOMPSON-HOLBROOK

MORMON

Mormon was a PROPHET, an author, and the last NEPHITE military commander (c. A.D. 310–385). The Book of Mormon bears his name because he was the major abridger–writer of the GOLD PLATES from which it was translated. He was prepared by the experiences of his youth to become a prophet: he was taught "the learning of [his] people," was a "sober child" and "quick to observe," and in his fifteenth year was "visited of the Lord" (Morm. 1:2, 15). At sixteen he became the general of all the Nephite armies and largely succeeded in preserving his people from destruction until A.D. 385, when virtually all of them but his son MORONI<sub>2</sub> were destroyed in battles with the LAMANITES (6:8–15; 8:1–3). As keeper of the Nephite records, Mormon abridged the large PLATES of Nephi, bound with them the small plates of Nephi, and added his own short history (W of M 1:1–5; Morm. 1:1). Before his death, he hid the records entrusted to him in the hill CUMORAH, "save it were these few plates which I gave unto my son Moroni" (Morm. 6:6). The Prophet Joseph SMITH received and translated Mormon's abridgment, the small plates of Nephi, and a few other documents, and published them in 1830 as the Book of Mormon.

First and foremost, Mormon was a prophet to his people, urging them to "repent, and be baptized in the name of Jesus, and lay hold upon the gospel of Christ" (Morm. 7:8). He taught that they were "a remnant of the seed of Jacob" (7:10) and could have the blessings of ISRAEL if they would live for them. He also underscored the supporting relationship of the Bible and the Book of Mormon: "For behold, this [record, the Book of Mormon] is written for the intent that ye may believe that [record, the Bible]; and if ye believe that ye will believe this also" (7:9).

Mormon's son MORONI<sub>2</sub> finished the record, including one of Mormon's addresses and two of Mormon's epistles in his own book of Moroni. Mormon's talk on FAITH, HOPE, and CHARITY (Moro. 7) teaches that charity, the greatest of those three virtues, is "the pure LOVE of Christ, and it endureth forever; and whoso is found possessed of it at the last day, it shall be well with him" (7:47). One of Mormon's letters (Moro. 8) condemns INFANT BAPTISM as a practice that denies the ATONEMENT OF JESUS CHRIST, stating "it is solemn mockery before God, that ye should baptize little children" (8:9). Rather, little children need not repent, but "are alive in Christ, even from the foundation of the world" (8:12). In the other epistle (Moro. 9) Mormon notes that the destruction of the Nephites is just retribution for their wickedness, which is so bad that he "cannot recommend them unto God lest he should smite me" (9:21).

As abridger of Nephite records, Mormon had access to a veritable library of engraved documents and was commanded to make an abridgment of the large plates of Nephi so that Lamanites, Jews, and GENTILES of the latter days could know of the Lord's COVENANTS and what he had done for their ancestors and could thereby be convinced that Jesus is the Christ (see BOOK OF MORMON: TITLE PAGE). While making his abridgment, Mormon often noted that he could not include even a hundredth part of the source records (e.g., Hel. 3:14). He regularly sought opportunity to draw spiritual lessons from the course of events experienced by his people. The phrase "and thus we see" frequently introduces one of Mormon's interpretive observations (cf. Hel. 3:27–30). One of the most significant passages from his hand appears in Helaman 12 wherein he offers compelling views about the often vain and fickle character of human nature, especially in response to material prosperity.

As an author, Mormon expressed his feelings, sorrowing at living in a wicked society (Morm. 2:19), and confessing that he had loved and prayed for his people (3:12), but was at last without hope

(5:2). He measured civility by how women and children fared (4:14, 21), seeking to unite them with husbands and fathers even when facing certain doom (6:2, 7). When the last Nephites fell, he penned a poignant lament in their memory (6:16–22).

As general of the Nephite armies (Morm. 2–6), Mormon helped to preserve his people from destruction by the Lamanites for some fifty-eight years, but then began to lose them first to sin and then to death (Morm. 2:11–15). Even so, he taught survivors that they would be spared if they would repent and obey the GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST, "but it was in vain; and they did not realize that it was the Lord that had spared them, and granted unto them a chance for repentance" (3:3). At one time the Nephites became so vicious and hardened that Mormon refused to lead them into battle (3:11). But he could not bear to watch them perish, and although he had no hope that they could survive, he relented (5:1) and led them into their last battle from which only he, his son Moroni<sub>2</sub>, and a few others survived (8:2–3). Moroni<sub>2</sub> lived to complete his father's record (8:1).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Holland, Jeffrey R. "Mormon: The Man and the Book." Ensign 8 (Mar. 1978):15–18; (Apr. 1978):57–59.

PHYLLIS ANN ROUNDY

---

MORMON BATTALION

Though it never fought a battle, the Mormon Battalion, a volunteer unit in the 1846 U.S. campaign against Mexico, earned a place in the history of the West. Its men cleared a wagon road from Santa Fe to San Diego and helped secure California as United States territory. Members of the Battalion helped preserve a tenuous peace in southern California before the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo ended hostilities. A wagon road they established between the Gila and the Rio Grande influenced the U.S. government to make the Gadsden Purchase. They also opened wagon roads via Carson and Cajon passes that linked California with Salt Lake City. Some former members of the Battalion eventually participated in the gold discovery and helped stimulate economic development in the Great Basin (see CALIFORNIA, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN). These former LDS soldiers ultimately gospel of Christ" (Morm. 7:8). He taught that they were "a remnant of the seed of Jacob" (7:10) and could have the blessings of ISRAEL if they would live for them. He also underscored the supporting relationship of the Bible and the Book of Mormon: "For behold, this [record, the Book of Mormon] is written for the intent that ye may believe that [record, the Bible]; and if ye believe that ye will believe this also" (7:9).

Mormon's son MORONI<sub>2</sub> finished the record, including one of Mormon's addresses and two of Mormon's epistles in his own book of Moroni. Mormon's talk on FAITH, HOPE, and CHARITY (Moro. 7) teaches that charity, the greatest of those three virtues, is "the pure LOVE of Christ, and it endureth forever; and whoso is found possessed of it at the last day, it shall be well with him" (7:47). One of Mormon's letters (Moro. 8) condemns INFANT BAPTISM as a practice that denies the ATONEMENT OF JESUS CHRIST, stating "it is solemn mockery before God, that ye should baptize little children" (8:9). Rather, little children need not repent, but "are alive in Christ, even from the foundation of the world" (8:12). In the other epistle (Moro. 9) Mormon notes that the destruction of the Nephites is just retribution for their wickedness, which is so bad that he "cannot recommend them unto God lest he should smite me" (9:21).

As abridger of Nephite records, Mormon had access to a veritable library of engraved documents and was commanded to make an abridgment of the large plates of Nephi so that Lamanites, Jews, and GENTILES of the latter days could know of the Lord's COVENANTS and what he had done for their ancestors and could thereby be convinced that Jesus is the Christ (see BOOK OF MORMON: TITLE PAGE). While making his abridgment, Mormon often noted that he could not include even a hundredth part of the source records (e.g., Hel. 3:14). He regularly sought opportunity to draw spiritual lessons from the course of events experienced by his people. The phrase "and thus we see" frequently introduces one of Mormon's interpretive observations (cf. Hel. 3:27–30). One of the most significant passages from his hand appears in Helaman 12 wherein he offers compelling views about the often vain and fickle character of human nature, especially in response to material prosperity.

As an author, Mormon expressed his feelings, sorrowing at living in a wicked society (Morm. 2:19), and confessing that he had loved and prayed for his people (3:12), but was at last without hope

(5:2). He measured civility by how women and children fared (4:14, 21), seeking to unite them with husbands and fathers even when facing certain doom (6:2, 7). When the last Nephites fell, he penned a poignant lament in their memory (6:16–22).

As general of the Nephite armies (Morm. 2–6), Mormon helped to preserve his people from destruction by the Lamanites for some fifty-eight years, but then began to lose them first to sin and then to death (Morm. 2:11–15). Even so, he taught survivors that they would be spared if they would repent and obey the GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST, "but it was in vain; and they did not realize that it was the Lord that had spared them, and granted unto them a chance for repentance" (3:3). At one time the Nephites became so vicious and hardened that Mormon refused to lead them into battle (3:11). But he could not bear to watch them perish, and although he had no hope that they could survive, he relented (5:1) and led them into their last battle from which only he, his son Moroni<sub>2</sub>, and a few others survived (8:2–3). Moroni<sub>2</sub> lived to complete his father's record (8:1).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Holland, Jeffrey R. "Mormon: The Man and the Book." Ensign 8 (Mar. 1978):15–18; (Apr. 1978):57–59.

PHYLLIS ANN ROUNDY

---

MORMON BATTALION

Though it never fought a battle, the Mormon Battalion, a volunteer unit in the 1846 U.S. campaign against Mexico, earned a place in the history of the West. Its men cleared a wagon road from Santa Fe to San Diego and helped secure California as United States territory. Members of the Battalion helped preserve a tenuous peace in southern California before the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo ended hostilities. A wagon road they established between the Gila and the Rio Grande influenced the U.S. government to make the Gadsden Purchase. They also opened wagon roads via Carson and Cajon passes that linked California with Salt Lake City. Some former members of the Battalion eventually participated in the gold discovery and helped stimulate economic development in the Great Basin (see CALIFORNIA, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN). These former LDS soldiers ultimately received favorable recognition both from their military commanders and from other non-Mormons for their industriousness and loyalty.

After Brigham YOUNG had determined a timetable for moving west from Winter Quarters early in 1846 (see HISTORY OF THE CHURCH: C. 1844–1877; WESTWARD MIGRATION), he instructed Jesse C. Little, president of the Eastern States Mission, to seek government assistance. With the help of Thomas L. KANE, Little explored the matter with Amos Kendall, an influential political adviser, and later directly with U.S. President James K. Polk. After making a decision to send an overland army to California under the command of Stephen W. Kearny, Polk confided in his diary on June 2, 1846: “Col. Kearny was also authorized to receive into service as volunteers a few hundred of the Mormons who are now on their way to California, with a view to conciliate them, attach them to our country, & prevent them from taking part against us” (Polk, p. 109).

President Polk authorized this enlistment despite several concerns. One was the danger of internal conflict because Kearny’s fighting regiments were mainly Missouri recruits, and Mormons and Missourians had little respect for each other since the Saints had been forced from the state in 1838–1839 (see MISSOURI CONFLICT). Polk also wanted to avoid the possibility that Mormon troops could be the first and possibly only American troops to reach California overland in 1846. The President’s confidential orders therefore gave Colonel Kearny almost unlimited authority to deal with such matters.

Kearny dispatched Captain James Allen to raise five hundred volunteers from the LDS camps on the Missouri River. The initial reaction to Allen’s call was overwhelmingly negative. Some feared that this call was part of a government conspiracy designed to ascertain their strength and to obstruct or prevent their movement west. The five hundred enlistees would be drawn from the able-bodied men most needed for the trek west, and few saw any potential benefit.

However, by early June Brigham Young realized, after struggling through the rain-soaked quagmires of southern Iowa, that the Saints could not safely reach the Rocky Mountains that year as planned. The proposed enlistment, he recognized, could bring military pay that would be helpful for purchasing supplies; moreover, it would provide for transporting several hundred families to the West, allay fears about LDS loyalty to the United States, and secure the privilege of establishing temporary quarters on Indian land near the Missouri (see WINTER QUARTERS).

As a result, Church leaders began vigorously recruiting volunteers from COUNCIL BLUFFS to Mt. Pisgah. Heber C. KIMBALL called the enlistment a great blessing from Heaven, and Brigham Young explained that the soldiers would be mustered out in California, much closer to their new home in the West. Official rolls record an enlistment of 497 volunteers. In addition, as many as 80 women and children marched with the battalion, some of the women serving as paid laundresses.

Brigham Young selected LDS officers for the five companies, and the recruits voted to sustain his selection. The death of Colonel Allen en route to Santa Fe led to conflict: Should leadership fall to Captain Jefferson Hunt, senior Latter-day Saint officer, or to Lieutenant Andrew Jackson Smith of the regular army? Smith led the Battalion to Santa Fe, and the problem was solved when Kearny’s new appointee, Philip St. George Cooke, took command.

When it became apparent that some soldiers and most of the families lacked the stamina for the desert march to San Diego, three “sick” detachments, including nearly all the women and children, went to Fort Pueblo, Colorado. Pueblo was an ideal location, partly because it was the temporary home of more than forty Latter-day Saints from Mississippi who had proceeded farther west than the general exodus. Altogether about 275 Latter-day Saints spent an unusually mild winter at Fort Pueblo under the command of Mormon Battalion captain James Brown. The next spring they proceeded to the Salt Lake Valley, arriving July 29, 1847, just five days after Brigham Young’s party.

Commander Cooke, meantime, prepared the Battalion for the trek to San Diego. After sending the sick detachments to Pueblo, he reorganized the command staff and acquired provisions, including thirty-seven wagons. He left Santa Fe with 397 soldiers. On the Rio Grande River he sent a final sick detachment to Pueblo, leaving the battalion with approximately 340 men, four officers’ wives, and only a few children prepared for the grueling desert march.

---

← Routes traveled by members of the Mormon Battalion, 1846–1847.

After a strenuous desert march, the battalion reached the Pima villages scattered along the Gila River. From there it followed the previously established Gila Trail to the Colorado River, forded the Colorado, then struggled from water hole to water hole along the southern edge of the Imperial Sand Dunes and across the Imperial Valley. Finally, it followed the dry Valleeito Wash to the infamous Box Canyon. As the sidewalls of the wash became too narrow for wagons, the men hewed a route through the rock outcroppings and brought the five remaining wagons into southern California.

The Mormon Battalion's only engagement of the war, the Battle of the Bulls, occurred December 11, 1846, when several of the battalion's hunters opened fire on wild cattle that had stampeded into the rear companies. The toll was ten to fifteen bulls killed, two mules gored to death, three men wounded. When the battalion later neared Tucson, Mexican soldiers and residents chose to flee rather than fight.

After reaching San Diego in January 1847, LDS soldiers were given a variety of garrison responsibilities, with fifteen serving as Kearny's escort back to Fort Leavenworth. After more than 300 were discharged in Los Angeles on July 16, 1847, Captain Hunt led about fifty northward to Monterey. Some of the 300 worked near San Francisco before reuniting for the trip to Salt Lake City. The largest group, about 164 men, met Captain James Brown of the Pueblo detachments on the Truckee River in the Sierra Nevada Mountains on September 7, 1847. Brown was en route to collect his men's pay in San Francisco. Brown brought news of the safe arrival of the PIONEERS in the Salt Lake Valley, along with word that the men were free to work in California or to proceed to Salt Lake City, depending upon their financial circumstances and desire.

While a few went eastward, the majority of the destitute men scattered for odd jobs, including about forty who worked at Sutter's Fort and a few who were at Sutter's Mill when James Marshall discovered gold. Eighty-one men reenlisted as the California Volunteers and performed garrison duty at San Diego. After their discharge in the spring of 1848, these men opened a wagon road via Cajon Pass to Salt Lake City.

Though leaving their families behind was difficult and their desert march arduous, by their sacrifice the men of the Mormon Battalion facilitated the Saints' move to the Salt Lake Valley and helped develop the West.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Polk, James K. Polk, the Diary of a President 1845-1849, ed. Allan Nevins, pp. 108-109. London, 1929.
- Tyler, Daniel. A Concise History of the Mormon Battalion in the Mexican War 1846-1847. n. p., 1881; Chicago, 1964.
- Yurtinus, John F. "A Ram in the Thicket: A History of the Mormon Battalion in the Mexican War." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1975.
- . "The Mormon Volunteers: The Recruitment and Service of a Unique Military Company." Journal of San Diego History 25 (Summer 1979):242-61.

JOHN F. YURTINUS

---

MORMON HANDICRAFT

Mormon Handicraft, a consignment store for handwork, including quilts, rugs, dolls, baby clothes, and other handmade items, was founded in 1937 by Louise Y. ROBISON, then general president of the RELIEF SOCIETY. The store was organized as a means of allowing women to supplement their family income during the depression of the 1930s (History of Relief Society, p. 115). Mormon Handicraft followed the pattern of earlier women's co-op stores operated by Relief Societies from the mid-1870s to 1912 (A Centenary of Relief Society, pp. 83-84).

Operated as a nonprofit organization, the store was originally administered by the Relief Society leaders, who desired "to preserve the skills of our pioneer ancestors and the skills and crafts of the various countries" (History of Relief Society, p. 115). General Board member Nellie O. Parker declared, "For the world to beat a path to the door of Mormon Handicraft Shop is our aim; and if Emerson is right, we are confident it will be so when people know of the fineness and skill of the workmanship to be found here" (Parker, p. 417).

An advertising brochure proclaimed, "Rare skill in handicraft from every country has been perpetuated in Utah. . . . This cosmopolitan background, unique for thrift and versatility, has produced a handicraft guild not to be found in any other place in the world. . . . There is quality only hands can produce" (Parker, p. 417). The brochure was distributed in dining and lounge cars of trains coming into Salt Lake City and was placed in a display case in the Hotel Utah lobby. The earn-and only a few children prepared for the grueling desert march.

After a strenuous desert march, the battalion reached the Pima villages scattered along the Gila River. From there it followed the previously established Gila Trail to the Colorado River, forded the Colorado, then struggled from water hole to water hole along the southern edge of the Imperial Sand Dunes and across the Imperial Valley. Finally, it followed the dry Valleeito Wash to the infamous Box Canyon. As the sidewalls of the wash became too narrow for wagons, the men hewed a route through the rock outcroppings and brought the five remaining wagons into southern California.

The Mormon Battalion's only engagement of the war, the Battle of the Bulls, occurred December 11, 1846, when several of the battalion's hunters opened fire on wild cattle that had stampeded into the rear companies. The toll was ten to fifteen bulls killed, two mules gored to death, three men wounded. When the battalion later neared Tucson, Mexican soldiers and residents chose to flee rather than fight.

After reaching San Diego in January 1847, LDS soldiers were given a variety of garrison responsibilities, with fifteen serving as Kearny's escort back to Fort Leavenworth. After more than 300 were discharged in Los Angeles on July 16, 1847, Captain Hunt led about fifty northward to Monterey. Some of the 300 worked near San Francisco before reuniting for the trip to Salt Lake City. The largest group, about 164 men, met Captain James Brown of the Pueblo detachments on the Truckee River in the Sierra Nevada Mountains on September 7, 1847. Brown was en route to collect his men's pay in San Francisco. Brown brought news of the safe arrival of the PIONEERS in the Salt Lake Valley, along with word that the men were free to work in California or to proceed to Salt Lake City, depending upon their financial circumstances and desire.

While a few went eastward, the majority of the destitute men scattered for odd jobs, including about forty who worked at Sutter's Fort and a few who were at Sutter's Mill when James Marshall discovered gold. Eighty-one men reenlisted as the California Volunteers and performed garrison duty at San Diego. After their discharge in the spring of 1848, these men opened a wagon road via Cajon Pass to Salt Lake City.

Though leaving their families behind was difficult and their desert march arduous, by their sacrifice the men of the Mormon Battalion facilitated the Saints' move to the Salt Lake Valley and helped develop the West.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Polk, James K. Polk, the Diary of a President 1845-1849, ed. Allan Nevins, pp. 108-109. London, 1929.
- Tyler, Daniel. A Concise History of the Mormon Battalion in the Mexican War 1846-1847. n. p., 1881; Chicago, 1964.
- Yurtinus, John F. "A Ram in the Thicket: A History of the Mormon Battalion in the Mexican War." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1975.
- . "The Mormon Volunteers: The Recruitment and Service of a Unique Military Company." Journal of San Diego History 25 (Summer 1979):242-61.

JOHN F. YURTINUS

---

MORMON HANDICRAFT

Mormon Handicraft, a consignment store for handwork, including quilts, rugs, dolls, baby clothes, and other handmade items, was founded in 1937 by Louise Y. ROBISON, then general president of the RELIEF SOCIETY. The store was organized as a means of allowing women to supplement their family income during the depression of the 1930s (History of Relief Society, p. 115). Mormon Handicraft followed the pattern of earlier women's co-op stores operated by Relief Societies from the mid-1870s to 1912 (A Centenary of Relief Society, pp. 83-84).

Operated as a nonprofit organization, the store was originally administered by the Relief Society leaders, who desired "to preserve the skills of our pioneer ancestors and the skills and crafts of the various countries" (History of Relief Society, p. 115). General Board member Nellie O. Parker declared, "For the world to beat a path to the door of Mormon Handicraft Shop is our aim; and if Emerson is right, we are confident it will be so when people know of the fineness and skill of the workmanship to be found here" (Parker, p. 417).

An advertising brochure proclaimed, "Rare skill in handicraft from every country has been perpetuated in Utah. . . . This cosmopolitan background, unique for thrift and versatility, has produced a handicraft guild not to be found in any other place in the world. . . . There is quality only hands can produce" (Parker, p. 417). The brochure was distributed in dining and lounge cars of trains coming into Salt Lake City and was placed in a display case in the Hotel Utah lobby. The eam-paig was successful: On one occasion, Parker reported, after a visit to the store, a buyer for the Altman Company ordered "up-to-the-minute luncheon sets, copper work and oxen-yoke lamps" (Parker, p. 417).

Beginning in 1960, its scope was broadened and Mormon Handicraft became a distribution point for materials and ideas for the Relief Society's homemaking meetings, particularly quilting and other handwork supplies. Through the Homemaking Department of the Relief Society, women learned and practiced homemaking arts. The monthly compassionate service instruction given in Relief Society, where members were taught ways to assist less fortunate Church members, often included the production and distribution of quilts, clothing, and other necessities for the home. Availability of materials and classes was, therefore, welcomed by local Relief Society leaders. The sale of materials also helped maintain the economic viability of Mormon Handicraft.

As the Church grew, the need for a centralized distribution and education point diminished, and the shop as a separate unit was closed in January 1986 (Church News, Jan. 26, 1986, p. 12). The store then became a division of DESERET BOOK COMPANY in June 1986. At the time of transfer, Ronald A. Millett, Deseret Book president, affirmed the company's goal of preserving Mormon Handicraft's reputation in both consignment and retail supply operations (Church News, June 8, 1986, p. 14).

In 1987, Mormon Handicraft accepted over 9,000 different items made by 1,900 contributors, ages fourteen to ninety-two. Contributors varied from the widow in Salt Lake City who for forty-eight years produced dish towels, stuffed animals, aprons, bibs, and almost ten thousand crocheted heart sachets, to the women in the Philippines who sold elaborate lace-edged handkerchiefs as their sole income source (Church News, Mar. 28, 1987, p. 10; Mormon Handicraft: A Brief History, p. 5).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A Centenary of Relief Society, 1842-1942*. Salt Lake City, 1942.
History of Relief Society, 1842-1966. Salt Lake City, 1966.
Mormon Handicraft: A Brief History (pamphlet). Salt Lake City, 1987.
 Parker, Nellie O. "Mormon Handicraft." Relief Society Magazine 26 (June 1939):417.

MORMONISM, AN INDEPENDENT INTERPRETATION

One may take two basic approaches to the study of Mormonism as a religion. The first, which involves examination and careful consideration of the claims of Mormonism to be the truth, is a predominantly religious undertaking. Investigators search for answers to the fundamental question of whether The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (or the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, as the case may be) is, or is not, the only true Christian church and whether, in fact, the Saints have the only legitimate priesthoods of Jesus Christ (Melchizedek and Aaronic).

The other approach to the study of the Latter-day Saints has as its goal not truth so much as understanding. Scholars—both in and outside the academy—study LDS theology, doctrine, ritual, ecclesiology, organizational structure, and the Mormon experience across time in an effort to determine what sort of movement Mormonism is and where and how it fits into the grand mosaic of world religions.

In addition to all the individuals who became Mormon converts, large numbers of journalists and Gentile clerics mounted explorations of the first sort during the nineteenth and the early part of the twentieth century. Many of the journalists decided that Mormonism was not a religion at all, while most clerics concluded that it was a Christian heresy. As for academic approaches to the topic before the middle of the twentieth century, only a small number of scholars made serious efforts to comprehend where the Latter-day Saints stood among the world's religions.

Some scholarly studies of Mormonism were completed before that time. In an appendix to an article on "Scholarly Studies of Mormonism," Leonard J. Arrington listed thirty-two doctoral dissertations on Mormon history and culture that were completed by 1950 (p. 30). Additionally, almost as soon as professional associations of scholars started to publish articles and proceedings in journal form, articles about the Saints started to appear in professional journals. But despite the serious and systematic study represented in these dissertations and professional articles, only a small number of authors pulled back from their material to attempt a classification of Mormonism within a broad religious context.

This situation changed after World War II when Mormon and non-Mormon scholars alike

paig was successful: On one occasion, Parker reported, after a visit to the store, a buyer for the Altman Company ordered "up-to-the-minute luncheon sets, copper work and oxen-yoke lamps" (Parker, p. 417).

Beginning in 1960, its scope was broadened and Mormon Handicraft became a distribution point for materials and ideas for the Relief Society's homemaking meetings, particularly quilting and other handwork supplies. Through the Homemaking Department of the Relief Society, women learned and practiced homemaking arts. The monthly compassionate service instruction given in Relief Society, where members were taught ways to assist less fortunate Church members, often included the production and distribution of quilts, clothing, and other necessities for the home. Availability of materials and classes was, therefore, welcomed by local Relief Society leaders. The sale of materials also helped maintain the economic viability of Mormon Handicraft.

As the Church grew, the need for a centralized distribution and education point diminished, and the shop as a separate unit was closed in January 1986 (Church News, Jan. 26, 1986, p. 12). The store then became a division of DESERET BOOK COMPANY in June 1986. At the time of transfer, Ronald A. Millett, Deseret Book president, affirmed the company's goal of preserving Mormon Handicraft's reputation in both consignment and retail supply operations (Church News, June 8, 1986, p. 14).

In 1987, Mormon Handicraft accepted over 9,000 different items made by 1,900 contributors, ages fourteen to ninety-two. Contributors varied from the widow in Salt Lake City who for forty-eight years produced dish towels, stuffed animals, aprons, bibs, and almost ten thousand crocheted heart sachets, to the women in the Philippines who sold elaborate lace-edged handkerchiefs as their sole income source (Church News, Mar. 28, 1987, p. 10; Mormon Handicraft: A Brief History, p. 5).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A Centenary of Relief Society, 1842-1942*. Salt Lake City, 1942.
History of Relief Society, 1842-1966. Salt Lake City, 1966.
Mormon Handicraft: A Brief History (pamphlet). Salt Lake City, 1987.
 Parker, Nellie O. "Mormon Handicraft." Relief Society Magazine 26 (June 1939):417.

MORMONISM, AN INDEPENDENT INTERPRETATION

One may take two basic approaches to the study of Mormonism as a religion. The first, which involves examination and careful consideration of the claims of Mormonism to be the truth, is a predominantly religious undertaking. Investigators search for answers to the fundamental question of whether The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (or the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, as the case may be) is, or is not, the only true Christian church and whether, in fact, the Saints have the only legitimate priesthoods of Jesus Christ (Melchizedek and Aaronic).

The other approach to the study of the Latter-day Saints has as its goal not truth so much as understanding. Scholars—both in and outside the academy—study LDS theology, doctrine, ritual, ecclesiology, organizational structure, and the Mormon experience across time in an effort to determine what sort of movement Mormonism is and where and how it fits into the grand mosaic of world religions.

In addition to all the individuals who became Mormon converts, large numbers of journalists and Gentile clerics mounted explorations of the first sort during the nineteenth and the early part of the twentieth century. Many of the journalists decided that Mormonism was not a religion at all, while most clerics concluded that it was a Christian heresy. As for academic approaches to the topic before the middle of the twentieth century, only a small number of scholars made serious efforts to comprehend where the Latter-day Saints stood among the world's religions.

Some scholarly studies of Mormonism were completed before that time. In an appendix to an article on "Scholarly Studies of Mormonism," Leonard J. Arrington listed thirty-two doctoral dissertations on Mormon history and culture that were completed by 1950 (p. 30). Additionally, almost as soon as professional associations of scholars started to publish articles and proceedings in journal form, articles about the Saints started to appear in professional journals. But despite the serious and systematic study represented in these dissertations and professional articles, only a small number of authors pulled back from their material to attempt a classification of Mormonism within a broad religious context.

This situation changed after World War II when Mormon and non-Mormon scholars alike

went beyond intensive studies of such discrete aspects of Mormonism as land settlement patterns, migration, or church–state relations. The results of this new work generally emerged as analyses of Mormonism from the secular perspectives of sociology, and social, cultural, political, and economic history. Then in the 1950s, scholarly taxonomists, working from the viewpoint of the history and sociology of religion, proposed schemes of classification other than the old one of whether or not Mormonism was a Christian heresy.

There were precedents for this study, too. The Scottish historian Robert Baird, who published Religion in America (1844), the first systematic description of American Christianity, divided the nation's churches into evangelical and liturgical camps, and included Mormonism in the latter. While essentially correct as far as it went, this obviously superficial analysis reflected the author's concentration on worship forms and ecclesiastical organization and his neglect of essential doctrines. Other students of American religion pictured the LDS movement as an illegitimate hybrid, combining elements of Puritanism, congregationalism, evangelicalism, and the antidenominational Christians (Campbellites) into a deviant variety of Protestantism. In one or another form, this characterization of Mormonism as irregular or aberrant was the standard interpretation that found its way into surveys well past the 1960s (see Handy).

After World War II, religious history—or church history as it was then known—started to change. An increasing number of its practitioners began to approach the study of American religion outside a denominational context and without privileging Protestantism. Disparaging portrayals of Mormonism started to give way among students of American religion. At the same time, with the rise to prominence of social science on the academic scene and a virtual explosion in the number of graduate students pursuing degrees in history, a substantial new contingent of scholars turned their attention to the Latter-day Saints. Rather than debunking Mormonism, they treated the Latter-day Saint movement as a case study from which to generalize about religion and culture—or politics or economics.

Although sharing a similar basic attitude toward Mormonism, the new generation of scholars did not arrive at similar conclusions. The disciplinary approaches and research agendas of the historians and social scientists who worked on Mormonism were so different that their results were not only dissimilar but contradictory. Instead of clarification, they brought confusion. When the distinguished historian Sydney Ahlstrom prepared the text for his Religious History of the American People (New Haven, Conn., 1972), he was unable to decide how Mormonism ought to be categorized. "One cannot even be sure," he said, "whether [Mormonism] is a sect, a mystery cult, a new religion, a church, a people, a nation, or an American subculture; indeed, at different times and places it is all of these" (p. 508).

By the time Ahlstrom wrote, a general lack of agreement about Mormonism had replaced the earlier non-Mormon consensus that it was a Christian aberration. In attempting a synthesis, he had to confront a wide array of interpretations and classifications of the movement. Available to him were the works of the scholars who, concentrating on the relationships between the Mormon prophet, his successors, and the Mormon people, tended to argue that the Latter-day Saints are, finally, just one more group over whom a charismatic leader exercised undue control. However carefully written, scholarly treatments in this vein presented conclusions that ultimately coincided with Anthony Hockema's definition of Mormonism as a cult.

By contrast, the work of those who primarily concerned themselves with LDS beliefs came to agree with William A. Clebsch's classification. Clebsch did not accept the cultic designation. He held that belief in the Church of Jesus Christ as the only true church and in the "restored" LDS Aaronic and Melchizedek priesthoods as the only legitimate priesthoods turned Mormonism into one more "sect to end all sects." Timothy L. Smith described the movement as an idiosyncratic form of primitive Christianity, hence, sectarian.

Taking another tack, Mario De Pillis found in early LDS history a "Search for Authority," and from that reached a much broader conclusion. In 1956, sociologist Will Herberg, in the influential Protestant-Catholic-Jew, argued that these three forms of organized religion were the most satisfactory vehicles in America for establishing one's identity within the national culture. De Pillis added Mormonism to Herberg's triad, making it the "fourth major religion . . . generally accepted in American society."

Study of the movement's beginnings in New England and western New York, the celebrated Mormon trek, and the establishment of an LDS kingdom in the Intermountain West confused the issue further, for geographical circumstance generated the idea that Mormonism is an "American religion" (Thomas J. Yates, "Count Tolstoi and 'The American Religion,'" IE 42 [Jan. 1939]:94). This oft-repeated phrase, said to be Count Leo Tolstoi's, was a main idea behind Thomas F. O'Dea's influential sociological study of the Mormons (1957). It was also woven into Klaus Hansen's study of Mormonism and the American Experience (1981), and reappeared in R. Laurence Moore's study of Religious Outsiders and the Making of Americans (1986).

In the same quarter-century that saw the appearance of enormous numbers of historical and sociological studies of the LDS movement, a new discipline, religious studies, made its way into the American academy. Combining insights from history and sociology as well as anthropology, psychology, theology, and studies of comparative religion, religious studies methodology enabled scholars to study religions without asking about their truthfulness. Significantly, although religionists (the designation increasingly given to scholars in religious studies) address the question of how religion provides an avenue for accomplishing cultural tasks, they do not universally define religion as a product of culture. Central also to this method of studying religion is the distinction between the sacred and the profane (the ordinary, that which is not sacred) and separation of religion into its various dimensions: the mythological, doctrinal, ritual/liturgical, ethical, social/institutional, and experiential.

This new discipline provided students of Mormonism with an additional set of conceptual tools. Approaching Mormonism from this perspective made it possible to see, for instance, that R. Laurence Moore may be correct in his argument that the Mormons were religious outsiders who have moved a long way toward acceptance as insiders in America without concluding that Mormonism is an American religion. Geographical and social locations no more made Mormonism an American religion than the location of Christianity's beginnings in Palestine, Greece, and Rome made Christianity a Palestinian or Graeco-Roman religion.

American culture surely influenced Mormonism. But Fawn McKay Brodie, a biographer of the Prophet Joseph Smith who argued this way, said Mormonism was not simply an American cult or some sort of new subdivision of Christianity. Brodie understood Mormonism to be related to Christianity in much the same way that Christianity is related to Judaism. That insight foreshadowed a religious studies approach. She also saw Mormonism as a product of the creative genius of Joseph Smith, which, in sociological terms, placed Mormonism in the cultic category, one of the older ways of understanding the religion.

A religious studies approach permits an analysis that treats Mormonism as more than the sum of its parts. From this comprehensive viewpoint, any characterization of the movement as the creation of one or two powerful, charismatic figures is seen, at the very least, to be incomplete. The numerous definitions that label the movement as "a sect, a mystery cult, a new religion, a church, a people, a nation, or an American subculture" are also partial. All in all, Mormonism, from the religious studies perspective, is best understood as a new religious tradition. The movement rests on a foundational tripod composed of a prophetic figure, scripture, and experience—Joseph Smith, the Book of Mormon, and the corporate life of the early Saints. By grasping the interaction of these three, one can firmly place Mormonism in the overall sweep of religious history.

Although Smith's role as prophet was established among his first followers before the publication of the Book of Mormon, this mysterious work, claiming to be of ancient origin, supported his prophetic position. It contains statements showing that Joseph Smith's movement would fulfill Old Testament prophecy, making modern Mormonism an extension of ancient Israel. Following on this association, Joseph Smith's own revelations proclaimed the opening of a new dispensation of the fulness of times and the restoration of both the true Church of Jesus Christ and the Aaronic and Melchizedek priesthoods. Together the Book of Mormon and Smith's revelations provided a means for his followers to connect with Christianity's apostolic era and with ancient Israel, while at the same time stirring within them such intense millennial expectations that they came to believe that they were living on the edge of time, in the "winding-up scene."

The revelation for the Saints to gather heightened the power of Smith's message and his place at the head of the movement. It brought his followers together in a place where the Saints could hear the prophet's message with their own ears, see the construction of the House of the Lord, with their own eyes, and participate in the daily activities of a community entirely composed of Saints of the latter days. Whether in New York, Ohio, Missouri, or Illinois, the Mormons' association with their "living prophet" and the routine interaction that occurred among the company of Saints lent such transcendental significance to the events of their everyday lives that Smith and his adherents were collectively ushered into "sacred time." This experience, this conscious living-out of sacred history, was as crucial to the creation of this new tradition as was the initial appearance of the Book of Mormon and the revelations of the Prophet Joseph.

The importance of the revelations should not be underestimated. It was by means of revelation that the Saints came to perceive of their ecclesiastical institution as the Church of Jesus Christ, formed again in a new age, and their community as a communion of Christian Saints called together in a new dispensation. Revelation likewise added to the idea of reformation the much more radical conception of the "restoration of all things." Not only church, priesthood, and primitive ecclesia were restored, but also Hebrew patriarchy, a political kingdom developed on a Solomonic model, and "ancient ordinances" (the endowment, baptism for the dead, and marriage for time and eternity). These truly set the Saints apart. The incorporation of these ideas into the movement, first in the political organization of the kingdom of God and afterward in additions to Mormonism's temple ritual and cultural life (through plural marriage) forever separated Mormonism from Catholic and Protestant forms of Christianity.

From that point forward, Mormonism was not merely related to Christianity as Christianity had been related to Judaism, that is, as reformation and consummation; now there was a direct relationship with the Hebrew tradition. Gradually the Christian view of being connected to Israel through adoption, being grafted in, was replaced with a new understanding of the relationship between the Saints and Israel. Acceptance of the LDS gospel came to be regarded as evidence that the blood of Abraham flowed through Mormon veins—evidence that was confirmed through the ritual of the patriarchal blessing in which Saints are informed of their membership of adoption into the family of one of Jacob's sons. Although this belief is, ultimately, a rhetorical construction of blood descent, it gave the Saints an identity as a "chosen people" that had a powerful impact on their understanding of themselves.

Magnifying as it did the difference between the members of their re-formed Church of Jesus Christ and other Christians, the idea of the restoration of all things was not universally welcomed within the Mormon fellowship. Initially attracted to Mormonism by the emphasis on primitive Christianity, many of Smith's earliest followers felt ambivalent about innovations connecting the movement to ancient times. In Missouri and Illinois there was resistance by some to the creation of a Mormon political kingdom that involved physical as well as psychic separation from non-Mormons.

Growing out of this ambivalence, a rupture divided the movement into two branches after the murder of Joseph Smith in 1844. While the history of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, headquartered in Salt Lake City, Utah, can be fully comprehended only through the lens of LDS belief in the "restoration of all things," the same is not true of the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS, headquartered in Independence, Missouri. Organized again (reorganized) in 1860 when Joseph Smith III, the Mormon prophet's eldest son, accepted the position of president and prophet to the church, this division of Smith's followers rejected the political kingdom of God and many, if not all, the innovations that the first Mormon prophet had introduced under the rubric of the "restoration of all things." Emphasizing the reformation character of the movement, they placed themselves and their church in a much closer relationship to traditional forms of Christianity than did the Saints who followed Brigham Young to the Intermountain West.

In the history of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and in the distinctive temple beliefs and practices that separate it from the Saints who did not go west, Mormonism is found as a new religious tradition in its purest, most undiluted form. The Utah Latter-day Saints experienced a trek through "the wilderness" and an extended period of residence sequestered in a "land of promise" whose internal political organization and social system were dominated by restoration doctrines. Seclusion within their mountain fastness and a sense of being under siege accelerated the systematizing of their distinctive doctrines as well as the development of a temple-centered culture. These heightened and preserved the Saints' sense of separation and chosenness long after political, social, and economic isolation came to an end.

An advantage of considering Mormonism as a new tradition rather than a church, denomination, sect, or cult is that it clarifies the divisions within the movement. The break following the prophet's death between the Saints who went to the Intermountain West and those who remained in the Midwest cannot really be understood as an ordinary sectarian schism any more than the separation of Christianity into Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism or the division of Islam into Sunni and Shi'ite Muslims were sectarian schisms. Within the Mormon tradition, then, there are two divisions, two churches. Because schisms have occurred in both of these divisions, Mormon sects also exist. Mormon fundamentalists, Saints who maintain the practice of plural marriage, are the most visible of such sectarian groups.

Latter-day Saints of all varieties are as certain of their identity as Christians as any Roman Catholic or Evangelical Protestant. But they live in a dispensation all their own. Their particular history, their singular doctrines and ritual practices, and their perception of themselves as a peculiar people do not simply set them apart from other Christians as one more subdivision of that tradition. Mormonism will remain separate and be best understood as a new religious tradition as long as the Saints maintain their belief that their church organization is the original Church of Jesus Christ, restored to them alone in 1830, and as long as they maintain the complementary position that in Mormonism is found the restoration of all things.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. "Scholarly Studies of Mormonism." Dialogue 1 (Spring 1966):15-32.
- Clebsch, William A. "Each Sect the Sect to End All Sects." Dialogue 1 (Summer 1966):84-89.
- De Pillis, Mario. "The Development of Mormon Communitarianism, 1826-1846." Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 1961.
- Handy, Robert T. A History of the Churches in the United States and Canada, pp. 224-27. New York, 1976.
- Hockema, Anthony A. Four Major Cults. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1963. The section on Mormonism was "extensively updated" and published separately by the same press in 1974.
- Shipp, Jan. Mormonism: The Story of a New Religious Tradition. Urbana, Ill., 1985.
- Smith, Timothy L. "The Book of Mormon in a Biblical Culture." Journal of Mormon History 7 (1980):3-21.

JAN SHIPPS

MORMONISM, MORMONS

"Mormonism" is an unofficial but common term for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the doctrinal, institutional, cultural, and other elements forming its distinctive worldview and independent Christian tradition. "Mormons" is the equivalent term for members of the Church, with "Mormon" being both the singular noun and the adjective.

Over the years these terms and other, less common variants have been widely used (such as "Mormonite" in early decades of the Church), but members prefer the official name revealed by the Savior to the Prophet Joseph SMITH—The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints—in order to emphasize the central role of Jesus Christ in their doctrine and worship (D&C 115:3-4). The shortened name that most contemporary members use instead of "Mormonism" is "LDS Church," with "LDS" used in place of "Mormon" and "Latter-day Saints" or "Saints" used instead of "Mormons."

The term "Mormon" derives from the Book of Mormon, published in 1830 and recently subtitled Another Testament of Jesus Christ. This book is accepted by the Church as scripture along with the Bible (see BIBLE: LDS BELIEF IN THE BIBLE).

Mormonism refers to the divinely inspired doctrine taught by Joseph SMITH and the succeeding leaders of the Church. It views human life as a stage in the eternal progression of intelligent beings who, as God's spirit children, must choose, in thought and deed, whether to accept or reject Christ's gospel, teachings, and covenants (see PLAN OF SALVATION). Latter-day Saints see the Church's teachings as true Christianity, restored to earth in its original purity by Christ himself, and thus they frequently refer to the Church, its doctrines, and its priesthood as "restored" (see RESTORATION). Basic Church doctrines include belief in a personal God vitally concerned with his children, the divinity of the Savior Jesus Christ and his infinite atonement, the universal need for repentance and baptism by proper authority, continuing revelation through living prophets, the brotherhood and sisterhood of all human beings, the eternal sanctity of marriage and family, and the responsibility to be self-reliant and to help others. Many of the basic beliefs of the LDS Church are succinctly summarized in the thirteen ARTICLES OF FAITH, which serve, among other things, as an outline of the basic doctrines for members of the Church.

aration and chosenness long after political, social, and economic isolation came to an end.

An advantage of considering Mormonism as a new tradition rather than a church, denomination, sect, or cult is that it clarifies the divisions within the movement. The break following the prophet's death between the Saints who went to the Intermountain West and those who remained in the Midwest cannot really be understood as an ordinary sectarian schism any more than the separation of Christianity into Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism or the division of Islam into Sunni and Shi'ite Muslims were sectarian schisms. Within the Mormon tradition, then, there are two divisions, two churches. Because schisms have occurred in both of these divisions, Mormon sects also exist. Mormon fundamentalists, Saints who maintain the practice of plural marriage, are the most visible of such sectarian groups.

Latter-day Saints of all varieties are as certain of their identity as Christians as any Roman Catholic or Evangelical Protestant. But they live in a dispensation all their own. Their particular history, their singular doctrines and ritual practices, and their perception of themselves as a peculiar people do not simply set them apart from other Christians as one more subdivision of that tradition. Mormonism will remain separate and be best understood as a new religious tradition as long as the Saints maintain their belief that their church organization is the original Church of Jesus Christ, restored to them alone in 1830, and as long as they maintain the complementary position that in Mormonism is found the restoration of all things.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. "Scholarly Studies of Mormonism." Dialogue 1 (Spring 1966):15-32.
- Clebsch, William A. "Each Sect the Sect to End All Sects." Dialogue 1 (Summer 1966):84-89.
- De Pillis, Mario. "The Development of Mormon Communitarianism, 1826-1846." Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 1961.
- Handy, Robert T. A History of the Churches in the United States and Canada, pp. 224-27. New York, 1976.
- Hockema, Anthony A. Four Major Cults. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1963. The section on Mormonism was "extensively updated" and published separately by the same press in 1974.
- Shippis, Jan. Mormonism: The Story of a New Religious Tradition. Urbana, Ill., 1985.
- Smith, Timothy L. "The Book of Mormon in a Biblical Culture." Journal of Mormon History 7 (1980):3-21.

JAN SHIPPS

MORMONISM, MORMONS

"Mormonism" is an unofficial but common term for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the doctrinal, institutional, cultural, and other elements forming its distinctive worldview and independent Christian tradition. "Mormons" is the equivalent term for members of the Church, with "Mormon" being both the singular noun and the adjective.

Over the years these terms and other, less common variants have been widely used (such as "Mormonite" in early decades of the Church), but members prefer the official name revealed by the Savior to the Prophet Joseph SMITH—The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints—in order to emphasize the central role of Jesus Christ in their doctrine and worship (D&C 115:3-4). The shortened name that most contemporary members use instead of "Mormonism" is "LDS Church," with "LDS" used in place of "Mormon" and "Latter-day Saints" or "Saints" used instead of "Mormons."

The term "Mormon" derives from the Book of Mormon, published in 1830 and recently subtitled Another Testament of Jesus Christ. This book is accepted by the Church as scripture along with the Bible (see BIBLE: LDS BELIEF IN THE BIBLE).

Mormonism refers to the divinely inspired doctrine taught by Joseph SMITH and the succeeding leaders of the Church. It views human life as a stage in the eternal progression of intelligent beings who, as God's spirit children, must choose, in thought and deed, whether to accept or reject Christ's gospel, teachings, and covenants (see PLAN OF SALVATION). Latter-day Saints see the Church's teachings as true Christianity, restored to earth in its original purity by Christ himself, and thus they frequently refer to the Church, its doctrines, and its priesthood as "restored" (see RESTORATION). Basic Church doctrines include belief in a personal God vitally concerned with his children, the divinity of the Savior Jesus Christ and his infinite atonement, the universal need for repentance and baptism by proper authority, continuing revelation through living prophets, the brotherhood and sisterhood of all human beings, the eternal sanctity of marriage and family, and the responsibility to be self-reliant and to help others. Many of the basic beliefs of the LDS Church are succinctly summarized in the thirteen ARTICLES OF FAITH, which serve, among other things, as an outline of the basic doctrines for members of the Church.

A salient characteristic of Church practice is the delegation of specific ecclesiastical responsibilities to every active member of the Church (see LAY PARTICIPATION AND LEADERSHIP). This results in a high level of voluntary member activity, commitment, and sense of community. Only men belong to the priesthood; but both women and men share priesthood blessings, and both hold significant leadership and teaching positions, perform missionary and temple work, and participate prominently in most Church meetings. Other notable Church practices include the encouragement of education, thrift, community service, missionary work, genealogical record keeping, and temple worship.

While the Church is clearly conservative on many issues, its central reliance on continuing revelation provides a divinely guided flexibility, especially in areas of practice. Through the living Prophet, changes are effected as revelation is sought and received. Two main practices discontinued over the years are polygamy, officially ended in 1890 (see PLURAL MARRIAGE; MANIFESTO OF 1890), and gathering to a central geographical location, largely ended in the 1920s (Allen and Leonard, p. 496–97; see IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION). At the same time, other practices have been introduced: TITHING, revealed in the 1830s, has been normative since the 1890s; and the complete avoidance of drugs such as tobacco, alcohol, tea, and coffee has been formally required of all active members since the 1920s, nearly a century after first having been revealed (see WORD OF WISDOM). FAMILY HOME EVENINGS, introduced in 1915, were widely instituted as a weekly practice in the mid 1960s. Extension of priesthood authority to all worthy male members, regardless of race, was granted in 1978 (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: OFFICIAL DECLARATION—2). Latter-day Saints expect that further changes will be made by revelation as the needs of the Church unfold.

Mormonism is not a political ideology. The Church's policy regarding governments allows it to thrive in a wide variety of political contexts around the world. It supports separation of CHURCH AND STATE, respect for duly established law and government, and members' active participation in civic and charitable affairs (D&C 134; see POLITICS: POLITICAL TEACHINGS). War is generally condemned, but military service is not forbidden. Well before the 1950s, the Church frequently took positions on political issues, especially some affecting Utah. Since that time, Church leaders have increasingly urged members to decide such questions for themselves and have implemented a policy of Church neutrality toward government, except in instances where political developments clearly impinge on important moral issues or severely restrict members' freedom to practice their religion.

In common speech, the terms "Mormonism" and "Mormon" are not limited to the official teachings or practices of the Church, but often also refer to particular lifestyles, cultural viewpoints, historical events, philosophical outlooks, and artifacts that are characteristic of the broader Latter-day Saint tradition or culture. In most formal settings, however, the Church prefers to avoid the use of these substitute terms wherever possible, to direct attention to the true name of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B., and Glen M. Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City, 1976.
- Arrington, Leonard J., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience. New York, 1979.
- The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Gospel Principles. Salt Lake City, 1981.
- Richards, LeGrand. A Marvelous Work and a Wonder. Salt Lake City, 1988.
- Talmage, James E. AF. Salt Lake City, 1988.

DONALD K. JARVIS

---

MORMONISM AND WORLD RELIGIONS

See: World Religions and Mormonism

---

MORMON PIONEER TRAIL

The approximately 1,300-mile-long trail from NAUVOO, Illinois, to Salt Lake City, Utah, was certified by the National Trails Act of 1986 as a National Historic Trail—officially The Mormon Pioneer National Historic Trail. Contrary to popular belief, however, the famous trail was not a Mormon creation. The Latter-day Saints did very little trail-blazing. They followed territorial roads and Indian trails across Iowa; various segments of the Oregon Trail from the Missouri River to Fort

A salient characteristic of Church practice is the delegation of specific ecclesiastical responsibilities to every active member of the Church (see LAY PARTICIPATION AND LEADERSHIP). This results in a high level of voluntary member activity, commitment, and sense of community. Only men belong to the priesthood; but both women and men share priesthood blessings, and both hold significant leadership and teaching positions, perform missionary and temple work, and participate prominently in most Church meetings. Other notable Church practices include the encouragement of education, thrift, community service, missionary work, genealogical record keeping, and temple worship.

While the Church is clearly conservative on many issues, its central reliance on continuing revelation provides a divinely guided flexibility, especially in areas of practice. Through the living Prophet, changes are effected as revelation is sought and received. Two main practices discontinued over the years are polygamy, officially ended in 1890 (see PLURAL MARRIAGE; MANIFESTO OF 1890), and gathering to a central geographical location, largely ended in the 1920s (Allen and Leonard, p. 496–97; see IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION). At the same time, other practices have been introduced: TITHING, revealed in the 1830s, has been normative since the 1890s; and the complete avoidance of drugs such as tobacco, alcohol, tea, and coffee has been formally required of all active members since the 1920s, nearly a century after first having been revealed (see WORD OF WISDOM). FAMILY HOME EVENINGS, introduced in 1915, were widely instituted as a weekly practice in the mid 1960s. Extension of priesthood authority to all worthy male members, regardless of race, was granted in 1978 (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: OFFICIAL DECLARATION—2). Latter-day Saints expect that further changes will be made by revelation as the needs of the Church unfold.

Mormonism is not a political ideology. The Church's policy regarding governments allows it to thrive in a wide variety of political contexts around the world. It supports separation of CHURCH AND STATE, respect for duly established law and government, and members' active participation in civic and charitable affairs (D&C 134; see POLITICS: POLITICAL TEACHINGS). War is generally condemned, but military service is not forbidden. Well before the 1950s, the Church frequently took positions on political issues, especially some affecting Utah. Since that time, Church leaders have increasingly urged members to decide such questions for themselves and have implemented a policy of Church neutrality toward government, except in instances where political developments clearly impinge on important moral issues or severely restrict members' freedom to practice their religion.

In common speech, the terms "Mormonism" and "Mormon" are not limited to the official teachings or practices of the Church, but often also refer to particular lifestyles, cultural viewpoints, historical events, philosophical outlooks, and artifacts that are characteristic of the broader Latter-day Saint tradition or culture. In most formal settings, however, the Church prefers to avoid the use of these substitute terms wherever possible, to direct attention to the true name of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B., and Glen M. Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City, 1976.
- Arrington, Leonard J., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience. New York, 1979.
- The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Gospel Principles. Salt Lake City, 1981.
- Richards, LeGrand. A Marvelous Work and a Wonder. Salt Lake City, 1988.
- Talmage, James E. AF. Salt Lake City, 1988.

DONALD K. JARVIS

---

MORMONISM AND WORLD RELIGIONS

See: World Religions and Mormonism

---

MORMON PIONEER TRAIL

The approximately 1,300-mile-long trail from NAUVOO, Illinois, to Salt Lake City, Utah, was certified by the National Trails Act of 1986 as a National Historic Trail—officially The Mormon Pioneer National Historic Trail. Contrary to popular belief, however, the famous trail was not a Mormon creation. The Latter-day Saints did very little trail-blazing. They followed territorial roads and Indian trails across Iowa; various segments of the Oregon Trail from the Missouri River to Fort Bridger in present western Wyoming; and the year-old trail of the ill-fated California-bound Reed–Donner party from Fort Bridger into the valley of the Great Salt Lake.

Although the trail was not blazed by the Latter-day Saints, and parts of it have at times been known as the Council Bluffs Road, the Omaha Road, the Great Platte River Road, or even the North Branch of the Oregon Trail, the entire route is today almost universally known as “The Mormon Trail” because the Latter-day Saints used it for twenty-three years in such large numbers (at least seventy thousand; no one knows just how many), because of the high drama of their “Exodus,” and because they developed separate strands or trails and wove them into their great road (see IMMIGRATION-EMIGRATION).

The trail divides into two unequal sections:

1. The approximately 265-mile-long section from Nauvoo on the Mississippi across Iowa to present-day Council Bluffs on the Missouri. This part of the trail was used relatively little: mainly by Latter-day Saints fleeing Illinois in 1846, by some immigrants

These ruts in stone on the Mormon Trail and Oregon-California Trail are still visible today near Guernsey, Wyoming. Courtesy LaMar C. Berrett.

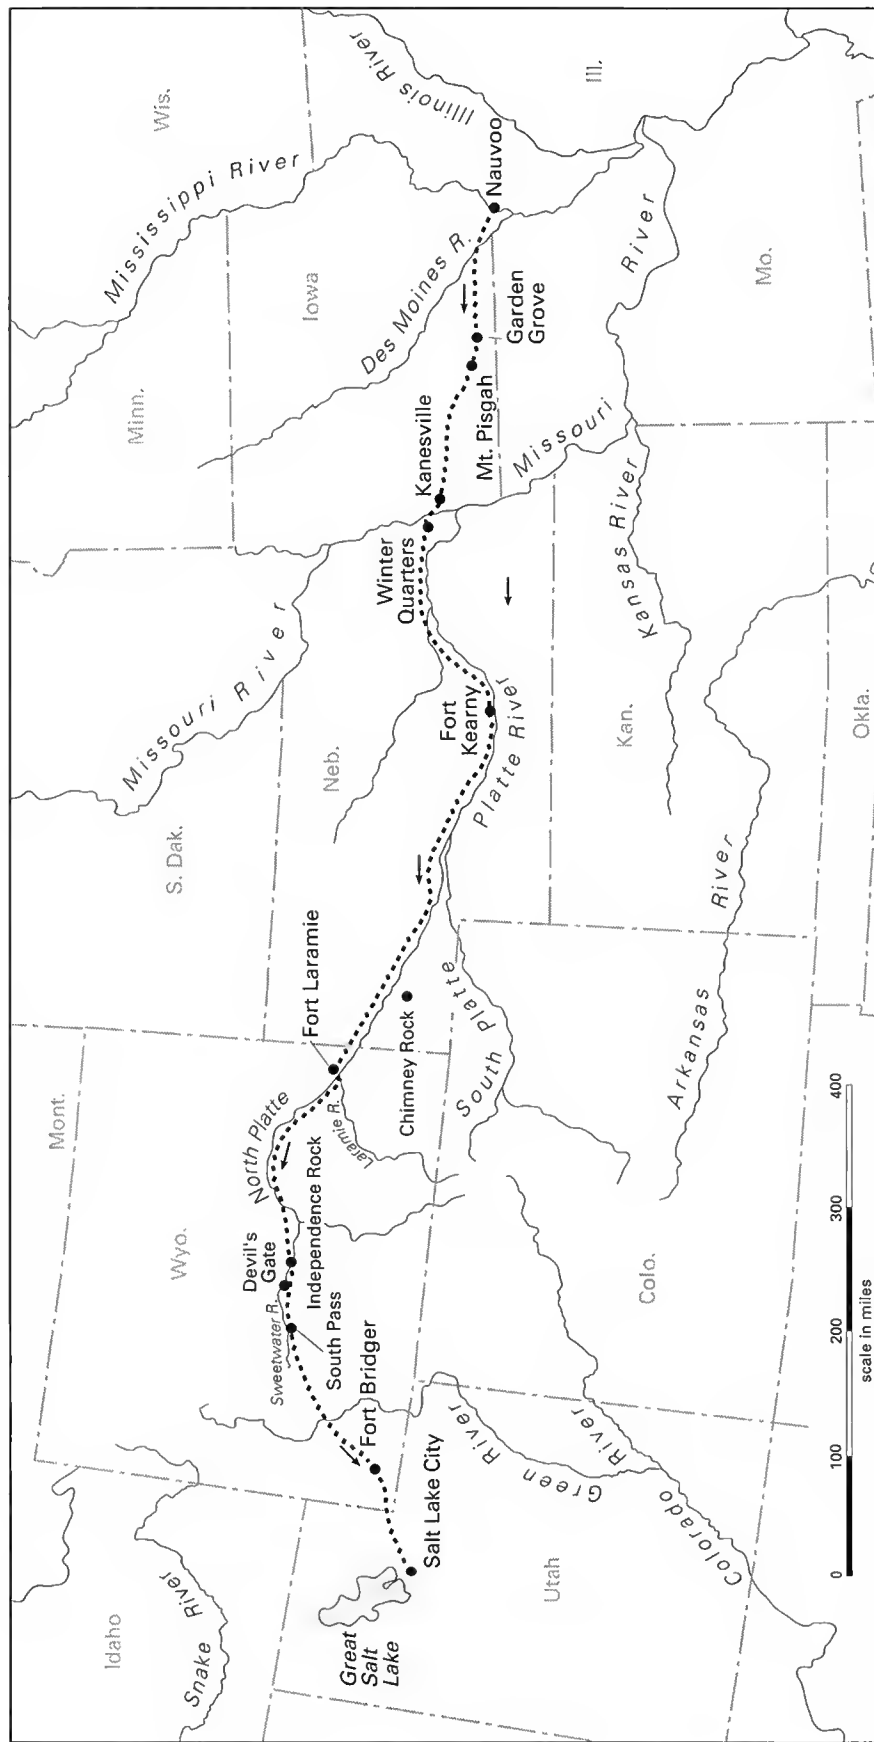

Trail marker, signed by Brigham Young, June 3, 1847. Artist: J. P. Harwood. Courtesy Utah State Historical Society.

“jumping off” from Keokuk, Iowa, in 1853, and in 1856–1857 by seven HANDCART COMPANIES from Iowa City who entered the Mormon Trail at present-day Lewis, Cass County, Iowa. Thousands of other Latter-day Saints crossed Iowa on variants of the 1846 route or on other trails, but all these intersected the trail of 1846 somewhere in western Iowa.

2. The approximately 1,032-mile-long trans-Missouri River segment from present North Omaha (one-time WINTER QUARTERS) and Florence, Nebraska, across Nebraska and Wyoming, into Utah. This part of the trail was used extensively from 1847 until completion of the transcontinental railroad in 1869. As in Iowa, variants evolved, but all LDS immigrants used all or parts of this trans-Missouri trail.

While the 1846–1847 trek from Nauvoo to Salt Lake City is by far the best-known part of the twenty-three-year-long Mormon overland migration, it is only part of the story. Between 1848 and 1868, LDS immigrants traveling west from the Missouri River developed or utilized at least a dozen other points of departure and followed many other trails, such as the Oxbow Trail (1849–1864), the Mormon Grove Trail (1855–1856), and the Nebraska City Cutoff (1864–1866). In one way or another, however, all these trails eventually intersected the Mormon Trail. Furthermore, with the Union Pacific Railroad moving west from Omaha beginning in 1865, during 1867–1868 Latter-day Saints took trains from Omaha to four different railheads (North Platte, Nebraska; Julesburg, Colorado; and Laramie and Benton, Wyoming), from which they eventually picked up the Mormon Trail.

Across the monotonous, undifferentiated, rolling central lowlands of Iowa, the Mormon Trail of 1846 generally followed primitive territorial roads as far as Bloomfield, Davis County, and then vague Pottawattamie Indian and trading trails along ridges from one water source to another, always within fifty miles of the present Missouri state line. Today this part of the Mormon Trail is difficult to follow, not because of the terrain but because modern roads seldom parallel it and because the plow has destroyed most vestiges of it.

West of the Missouri River the Saints passed along river valleys, across grasslands, plains, steppes, deserts, and mountains, and through western forests. Topographically, the trail led across the central lowlands and high plains of eastern and central Nebraska, then the upland trough of western Nebraska and eastern Wyoming, through the Wyoming basin and the middle Rocky Fort Bridger in western Wyoming was an important point on the Mormon Trail. Artist: W. H. Jackson. Courtesy Nelson Wadsworth.

Mountains, and into the desert valleys of the Great Basin.

From the Missouri River, Mormon companies followed the broad, flat valleys of the Loupe and Platte rivers for some six hundred miles to present-day Casper, Wyoming, then the Sweetwater River for about ninety-three miles to South Pass, thence along branches of the Sandy River and Blacks Fork to Fort Bridger, finally zigzagging through a series of canyons into the valley of the Great Salt Lake.

Pioneer wagon train at the mouth of Echo Canyon, Utah, 1867. Courtesy Utah State University.

This 1897 reenactment of a Mormon wagon train coming through Echo Canyon celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of the arrival of the first pioneer company in the Salt Lake Valley on July 24, 1847. Photographer: Charles W. Carter. Courtesy Nelson Wadsworth.

In Nebraska, as in Iowa, there is little left today of the Mormon Trail, but modern roads do parallel the old trail closely. In Wyoming, however, with proper maps much of this old trail can still be found because the harsh terrain has held the ruts better and agriculture has obliterated little. In Utah, although modern roads follow the trail closely, very few of the original ruts remain.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Stanley B. Historic Sites and Markers Along the Mormon and Other Great Western Trails. Urbana, Ill., 1988.

Kimball, Stanley B., and Hal Knight. 111 Days to Zion. Salt Lake City, 1978.

Stegner, Wallace. The Gathering of Zion: The Story of the Mormon Trail. New York, 1971.

STANLEY B. KIMBALL

MORMONS, IMAGE OF

[This entry consists of three articles giving a survey of the Mormon image as it has been and is reflected in the Visual Arts, in Film, and in Fiction from the earliest days of the Church to the present.]

THE VISUAL ARTS

The early history of the Church, especially the uniqueness of its beliefs and practices, influenced the creation of an LDS, or Mormon, image in art. Caricature and cartoon were particularly well suited to the mass market, and Latter-day Saints were a favorite subject. Although some early works conveyed the complexities of the LDS experience, most people developed their image of members of the Church from portrayals that were selective and caricatured. While stereotypical images linger, current depictions of Latter-day Saints, frequently employing works by LDS artists, more accurately reflect the diversity and richness of Mormon life.

By 1860, media depictions had firmly established national stereotypes of Mormonism. During the next decades, negative, stereotyped images of Latter-day Saints appeared regularly in newspapers and magazines such as Harper's Weekly, Van-

INCEPTION OF MORMONISM—JOSEPH SMITH'S FIRST VISION

A non-LDS artist's early graphic image of Mormonism. This etching of Joseph Smith's First Vision appeared in T.B.H. Stenhouse, The Rocky Mountain Saints (1873), opposite p. 1. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

This 1897 reenactment of a Mormon wagon train coming through Echo Canyon celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of the arrival of the first pioneer company in the Salt Lake Valley on July 24, 1847. Photographer: Charles W. Carter. Courtesy Nelson Wadsworth.

along branches of the Sandy River and Blacks Fork to Fort Bridger, finally zigzagging through a series of canyons into the valley of the Great Salt Lake.

In Nebraska, as in Iowa, there is little left today of the Mormon Trail, but modern roads do parallel the old trail closely. In Wyoming, however, with proper maps much of this old trail can still be found because the harsh terrain has held the ruts better and agriculture has obliterated little. In Utah, although modern roads follow the trail closely, very few of the original ruts remain.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Stanley B. Historic Sites and Markers Along the Mormon and Other Great Western Trails. Urbana, Ill., 1988.

Kimball, Stanley B., and Hal Knight. 111 Days to Zion. Salt Lake City, 1978.

Stegner, Wallace. The Gathering of Zion: The Story of the Mormon Trail. New York, 1971.

STANLEY B. KIMBALL

MORMONS, IMAGE OF

[This entry consists of three articles giving a survey of the Mormon image as it has been and is reflected in the Visual Arts, in Film, and in Fiction from the earliest days of the Church to the present.]

THE VISUAL ARTS

The early history of the Church, especially the uniqueness of its beliefs and practices, influenced the creation of an LDS, or Mormon, image in art. Caricature and cartoon were particularly well suited to the mass market, and Latter-day Saints were a favorite subject. Although some early works conveyed the complexities of the LDS experience, most people developed their image of members of the Church from portrayals that were selective and caricatured. While stereotypical images linger, current depictions of Latter-day Saints, frequently employing works by LDS artists, more accurately reflect the diversity and richness of Mormon life.

By 1860, media depictions had firmly established national stereotypes of Mormonism. During the next decades, negative, stereotyped images of Latter-day Saints appeared regularly in newspapers and magazines such as Harper's Weekly, Van- ity Fair, Cosmopolitan, and Collier's Weekly. Although some images were humorous, the effect was essentially harmful. Bunker and Bitton explain: "The simple fact is that most of the illustrations treating the Mormons were not low-key or objective; they were cartoons and caricatures with an obvious point of view. And that point of view was, with almost monotonous regularity, negative" (Bunker and Bitton, p. 148).

INCEPTION OF MORMONISM—JOSEPH SMITH'S FIRST VISION

A non-LDS artist's early graphic image of Mormonism. This etching of Joseph Smith's First Vision appeared in T.B.H. Stenhouse, The Rocky Mountain Saints (1873), opposite p. 1. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

This negative image developed when the social climate in the United States allowed open hostility toward unpopular religious and ethnic groups. Major themes about Latter-day Saints focused on the public disapproval of the practice of polygamy, the Utah War of 1857–1858, and clashes between U.S. officials and LDS leaders. Although artists created some fresh interpretations as new events transpired, they were usually only variations on established themes.

However, a few artists ignored the stereotypical image of the Latter-day Saints and produced work that conveyed the complexity of the religion and its people. Arthur Boyd Houghton, an artist for the Graphic, a British weekly pictorial journal, visited Salt Lake City in 1870 and created a series of drawings featuring the Saints. His scenes of LDS life are rendered with respect and dignity, and reveal his compassion for humble people. Two paintings attributed to Albert Bierstadt and one by Maynard Dixon show thriving LDS settlements, the result of Mormon cultivation of the desert. Enoch Wood Perry, Jr., painted excellent likenesses of Brigham Young and each member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles. Photographer William Henry Jackson's pictures and sketches of the West include images of Salt Lake City, Mormon wagon trains, and farm life.

The Latter-day Saints have never lacked for artists and illustrators of their own to tell their story. While graphic artists in the East were generally creating negative, stereotyped images, LDS artists in the West were producing a rich and authentic pictorial record of their experience. The early Mormon experience, including the migration west and pioneer life in Utah, was chronicled by British artist Frederiek Piercy and Danish artist C. C. A. Christensen, both converts to the Church (see ARTISTS).

In recent years, interest in the portrayal of Mormons as Mormons has diminished in non-LDS media and among non-LDS artists. At the same time, the number of LDS artists, the diversity of their styles, and their interest in conveying LDS themes have all increased. Like the early artists who saw beyond the stereotypical images of their day, these modern artists have succeeded in conveying, at least in some measure, the complexities and richness of the LDS experience, made even more diverse as the Church has grown to include a worldwide membership.

[See also Art.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bunker, Gary L., and D. Bitton. The Mormon Graphic Image, 1834–1914: Cartoons, Caricatures, and Illustrations. Salt Lake City, 1983.

Gerds, William H. "Utah." In Art Across America: Two Centuries of Regional Painting, Vol. 3, pp. 128–45. New York, 1990.

VIRGIE D. DAY

FILM

From the beginning of the twentieth century until the mid-1930s, the film portrayals of Latter-day Saints were generally negative. First publicly exhibited in the 1890s, commercial motion pictures continued the sensational characterizations depicted in the novels of the period. One of the earliest treatments was Thomas Edison's nickelodeon film A Trip to Salt Lake City (1905). More humorous than sinister, the film satirized the problems of a polygamous Mormon husband trying to give his many children a drink of water on a Pullman car bound for the city of the Saints.

More common were films such as A Mormon Maid (Lasky-Paramount, 1917), which portrayed the DANITES, stereotyped in earlier fiction as a posse of Missouri Mormon firebrands, as night-riding henchmen costumed like the Ku Klux Klan in D. W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation (1915). Inspired by anti-Mormon novelist Winifred Graham's The Love Story of a Mormon (London, 1911), Trapped by the Mormons (Pyramid, 1922) brought to the screen a portrayal of a marauding LDS missionary in England preying vampirelike on unwary women. This film capitalized on the unfounded fear that LDS missionaries exploited women left widowed by World War I. A film version of Zane Grey's Riders of the Purple Sage (Fox) was released in 1918 and rereleased in 1921 despite protests that its negative depictions of Latter-day Saints and Utah would hinder the state's business development. A sympathetic treatment of the Church was the feature-length historical drama One Hundred Years of Mormonism (Utah Moving Pictures Co., 1913).

An innocent young woman finds herself caught in the clutches of a Mormon missionary on a billboard advertising the film Trapped by the Mormons (England, c. 1922), typical of the sensational image that was given of Mormons in films during the 1920s.

From 1918 to 1945, approximately thirty anti-Mormon films were released worldwide. In the 1930s, however, the motion picture industry drafted a production code, which, among other things, forbade negative portrayals of religious organizations and their beliefs. In 1938, Twentieth Century Fox informed President Heber J. GRANT that it planned to produce a motion picture based on Vardis Fisher's historical novel Children of God. While he privately expressed fears of another negative screen image, partly because Fisher's novel was not fully understanding of the Church and its early leaders, President Grant nevertheless cooperated fully with the studio. The resulting film, Brigham Young, released in 1940, although not totally pleasing to Church leaders, was in most respects very positive and reversed almost four decades of negative stereotypes. Met with critical praise, it vividly portrayed the persecutions of Latter-day Saints in Nauvoo during the 1840s, the murder of Joseph SMITH, the trek west to the Great Basin, and the "miracle of the gulls" in 1848. The film showed Latter-day Saints not as the stereotyped wife stealers of earlier films but as industrious pioneers. In a fictional courtroom scene in which Brigham YOUNG defends Joseph Smith, the dialogue depicts the LDS cause as inextricably linked with that of America's founders seeking religious freedom. Produced at a time when Americans watched with concern the rising persecution of Jews in Hitler's Germany, the film defended the right of Latter-day Saints, or any other minority, to exist in a pluralist nation.

Since the 1940 release of Brigham Young, portrayals of Mormon history and culture in Hollywood films and television generally have been limited to humorous episodes dealing with polygamy as in Wagon Master (RKO, 1950), Paint Your Wagon (Paramount, 1969), They Call Me Trinity (West Film, 1971) and Trinity Is Still My Name (West Film, 1972), and The Duchess and the Dirtwater Fox (Fox, 1976). The only commercial feature-length treatment of Mormons between 1940 and 1990 was Brigham (Sunset Films, 1977), a low-budget film covering approximately the same period as Brigham Young but lacking the dramatic value of the earlier film.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D'Arc, James V. "Darryl F. Zanuck's Brigham Young: A Film in Context." BYU Studies 29 (Winter 1989):5-33.
- Nelson, Richard Alan. "A History of Latter-day Saint Screen Portrayals in the Anti-Mormon Film Era, 1905-1936." Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1975.
- . "From Antagonism to Acceptance: Mormons and the Silver Screen." Dialogue 10 (Spring 1977):58-69.

JAMES V. D'ARC

FICTION

For the first hundred years of LDS history, interest in Latter-day Saints as a subject for popular fiction was remarkably high. Taking its stereotypes from the pseudo-histories and travel narratives that circulated widely, fiction about Mormons emphasized melodramatic characters and fantastic plots full of violence and mystery. Similar patterns continued into the mid-twentieth century, but since then, Latter-day Saints have appeared less frequently and usually only casually in non-Mormon fiction.

Themes of violence and melodrama appeared as early as the 1840s. Typically a beautiful young heroine was said to have escaped or to have been rescued by a heroic "Gentile" and carried from the Mormons and the drunken and lecherous clutches of a polygamous elder or bishop. Frequently the fleeing protagonists were pursued across the continent, sometimes even around the world, by secretive "Danites" or "avenging angels." In these pieces LDS leaders were characterized as scheming, rough, and tyrannical, and the culture as crude and repressive at best, violent and destructive at worst.

By the 1850s, fiction about the Latter-day Saints was almost a genre in itself. Often written by women (especially the wives of ministers) and following the pattern of the more famous Uncle Tom's Cabin, these novels and short stories exploited popular ideas, fears, and societal concerns, as in Orvilla S. Belisle's The Prophets; or, Mormonism Unveiled (1855) and Metta Victoria Fuller, Mormon Wives (1856; published again in 1860 as Lives of Female Mormons and republished many times in Europe and translated into several languages).

Each succeeding decade added to the tide of new authors and titles. In the 1880s, for example, more than a score of book-length best sellers came from British and American presses. Even some of the best known writers of the nineteenth century found the topic of Mormonism appealing: Robert Louis Stevenson (The Dynamiter, 1885) and Arthur Conan Doyle (A Study in Scarlet, 1887) held Mormons up as objects of fear, and Charles Farrer Browne ("Artemus Ward Among the Mormons," 1866) and Mark Twain (Roughing It, 1872) treated them as objects of satire and laughter.

In the early twentieth century the same patterns generally continued. Zane Grey (The Heritage of the Desert, 1910, and Riders of the Purple Sage, 1912) used Latter-day Saints as central figures, and Jack London wrote of the MOUNTAIN MEADOWS MASSACRE in his novel The Star Rover (1915). How firmly entrenched the pattern remained even beyond mid-century is illustrated by the images in Irving Wallace's The Twenty-seventh Wife (1961) and J. C. Furnas's The Devil's Rainbow (1962), which paint Joseph Smith in terms of popular psychosis and caricature Mormon leaders in general. Even the works of more weighty novelists—Vardis Fisher's Children of God (1939), for example—follow the old patterns, with a sympathetic protagonist outside the Church struggling against unfavorable, repressive antagonists from within.

Latter-day Saints are not now as popular a subject as they once were for non-Mormon authors, and writers' interest in modern Mormons as Mormons is vastly different from what it was a hundred years ago. While Latter-day Saints may appear occasionally or casually in fiction (e.g., Alan

Mark Twain, who influenced public opinion of Mormons through his humorous accounts in Roughing It (1872), sent this postcard, taken in 1870, to Brigham Young in 1872 after Twain's return to New York from the West. Twain presented his kind compliments to "Pres. t Young" and inscribed across the lower border, "Hands off of Brigham!"

Drury's Advice and Consent, 1959), they have become both too conventional and too well-known as individuals to be placed easily into alien molds (see STEREOTYPING OF MORMONS). While some differences between LDS and non-Mormon culture still persist, these differences now seem to be less exotic or threatening and hence less accessible for exploitation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arrington, Leonard J., and Jon Haupt. "Intolerable Zion: The Image of Mormonism in Nineteenth-Century American Literature." Western Humanities Review 22 (Summer 1968):243–60.

———. "The Missouri and Illinois Mormons in Anti-Bellum [sic] Fiction." Dialogue 5 (Spring 1970):37–50.

Lambert, Neal E. "Saints, Sinners and Scribes: A Look at the Mormons in Fiction." Utah Historical Quarterly 36 (Winter 1968):63–76.

NEAL E. LAMBERT

MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR

The Mormon Tabernacle Choir originated in mid-nineteenth-century Salt Lake City. It consists of 300-plus voices carefully selected from many volunteers. Its members give of their time and talents freely in practices and performances, serving without pay. Probably best known for its weekly radio and TV program of inspirational music and messages, "Music and the Spoken Word," the choir has performed and recorded extensively. It performs regularly in the TABERNACLE on TEMPLE SQUARE and provides music at all general conferences of the Church.

The origins of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir may be found in the desire and commitment of early converts to include appropriate music in both sacred and secular events (see MUSIC). The process of collecting hymns for instruction and worship began only four months after the Church was organized in 1830 (see HYMNS AND HYMNODY), and a choir was organized as early as 1836 for the dedication of the Kirtland Temple.

As the Latter-day Saints moved west, President Brigham Young included musicians among members even of the advance parties. Consequently, a small choir first sang for a conference in the Salt Lake Valley on August 22, 1847, twenty-nine days after the first party arrived.

Early choirs in the Old Tabernacle (built in 1851) and in the present Tabernacle (completed in 1867) were small and undisciplined by later standards. With the appointment of George Careless as conductor in 1869, the Tabernacle Choir began to flourish. Careless assembled the first large choir, a total of 304 singers, by adding smaller groups from other areas to the eighty-five singers in the Salt Lake Tabernacle Choir for a general conference performance on October 8, 1873. The vision of a choral ensemble to match the size of the Tabernacle was thus born. Early conductors who had prepared the way for Careless included John

Parry (1849–1854), Stephen Goddard (1854–1856), James Smithies (1856–1862), Charles John Thomas (1862–1865), and Robert Sands (1865–1869).

Careless was followed by Ebenezer Beesley (1880–1889), with Thomas C. Griggs, assistant; Evan Stephens (1889–1916), with Horace S. Ensign, assistant; Anthony C. Lund (1916–1935), with B. Cecil Gates and Albert J. Southwick, assistants; J. Spencer Cornwall (1935–1957), with Albert J. Southwick, D. Sterling Wheelwright, John R. Halliday, and Richard P. Condie, assistants; Richard P. Condie (1957–1974), with Jay E. Welch, assistant; Jay E. Welch (1974), with Jerold D. Ottley, assistant; and Jerold D. Ottley (from 1975 onward), with Donald H. Ripplinger, associate conductor.

During his tenure, Evan Stephens increased the size of the choir from about 125 to more than 300, making it the leading musical organization of Salt Lake City. To accommodate this larger size, the choir area of the Tabernacle was redesigned to create the present semicircular tiered seating. Stephens also took the choir to Chicago in 1893 on its first tour out of the state, beginning its now traditional role of emissary for the Church and the region.

Anthony C. Lund brought solid vocal training and a European choral sound to the choir. He excelled in music that required control and subtlety. J. Spencer Cornwall labored to raise the standards of the choir, to improve its sound as an ensemble, and to increase its repertoire from little more than one hundred pieces to almost a thousand. Under his direction the choir was active as a concert organization and released its first long-playing recording, in 1949. Richard P. Condie accelerated the recording activities of the choir and greatly increased its touring schedule. He produced what has been described as "the Tabernacle Choir sound," a large, romantic choral tone, heavy with feeling. Jerold D. Ottley has refined and shaped the traditional tone of the choir into a more flexible, precise, and energetic sound, one capable of expressing the subtleties of the finest choral literature.

Beginning with the installation of the first pipe organ in the Tabernacle in 1867 (see TABERNACLE ORGAN), organists have been appointed to assist the choir. Among the finest musicians in the Church, they have also performed recitals, played for church and civic meetings, and composed music (see MUSICIANS).

ature." Western Humanities Review 22 (Summer 1968):243–60.

———. "The Missouri and Illinois Mormons in Anti-Bellum [sic] Fiction." Dialogue 5 (Spring 1970):37–50.

Lambert, Neal E. "Saints, Sinners and Scribes: A Look at the Mormons in Fiction." Utah Historical Quarterly 36 (Winter 1968):63–76.

NEAL E. LAMBERT

MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR

The Mormon Tabernacle Choir originated in mid-nineteenth-century Salt Lake City. It consists of 300-plus voices carefully selected from many volunteers. Its members give of their time and talents freely in practices and performances, serving without pay. Probably best known for its weekly radio and TV program of inspirational music and messages, "Music and the Spoken Word," the choir has performed and recorded extensively. It performs regularly in the TABERNACLE on TEMPLE SQUARE and provides music at all general conferences of the Church.

The origins of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir may be found in the desire and commitment of early converts to include appropriate music in both sacred and secular events (see MUSIC). The process of collecting hymns for instruction and worship began only four months after the Church was organized in 1830 (see HYMNS AND HYMNODY), and a choir was organized as early as 1836 for the dedication of the Kirtland Temple.

As the Latter-day Saints moved west, President Brigham Young included musicians among members even of the advance parties. Consequently, a small choir first sang for a conference in the Salt Lake Valley on August 22, 1847, twenty-nine days after the first party arrived.

Early choirs in the Old Tabernacle (built in 1851) and in the present Tabernacle (completed in 1867) were small and undisciplined by later standards. With the appointment of George Careless as conductor in 1869, the Tabernacle Choir began to flourish. Careless assembled the first large choir, a total of 304 singers, by adding smaller groups from other areas to the eighty-five singers in the Salt Lake Tabernacle Choir for a general conference performance on October 8, 1873. The vision of a choral ensemble to match the size of the Tabernacle was thus born. Early conductors who had prepared the way for Careless included John

Parry (1849–1854), Stephen Goddard (1854–1856), James Smithies (1856–1862), Charles John Thomas (1862–1865), and Robert Sands (1865–1869).

Careless was followed by Ebenezer Beesley (1880–1889), with Thomas C. Griggs, assistant; Evan Stephens (1889–1916), with Horace S. Ensign, assistant; Anthony C. Lund (1916–1935), with B. Cecil Gates and Albert J. Southwick, assistants; J. Spencer Cornwall (1935–1957), with Albert J. Southwick, D. Sterling Wheelwright, John R. Halliday, and Richard P. Condie, assistants; Richard P. Condie (1957–1974), with Jay E. Welch, assistant; Jay E. Welch (1974), with Jerold D. Ottley, assistant; and Jerold D. Ottley (from 1975 onward), with Donald H. Ripplinger, associate conductor.

During his tenure, Evan Stephens increased the size of the choir from about 125 to more than 300, making it the leading musical organization of Salt Lake City. To accommodate this larger size, the choir area of the Tabernacle was redesigned to create the present semicircular tiered seating. Stephens also took the choir to Chicago in 1893 on its first tour out of the state, beginning its now traditional role of emissary for the Church and the region.

Anthony C. Lund brought solid vocal training and a European choral sound to the choir. He excelled in music that required control and subtlety. J. Spencer Cornwall labored to raise the standards of the choir, to improve its sound as an ensemble, and to increase its repertoire from little more than one hundred pieces to almost a thousand. Under his direction the choir was active as a concert organization and released its first long-playing recording, in 1949. Richard P. Condie accelerated the recording activities of the choir and greatly increased its touring schedule. He produced what has been described as "the Tabernacle Choir sound," a large, romantic choral tone, heavy with feeling. Jerold D. Ottley has refined and shaped the traditional tone of the choir into a more flexible, precise, and energetic sound, one capable of expressing the subtleties of the finest choral literature.

Beginning with the installation of the first pipe organ in the Tabernacle in 1867 (see TABERNACLE ORGAN), organists have been appointed to assist the choir. Among the finest musicians in the Church, they have also performed recitals, played for church and civic meetings, and composed music (see MUSICIANS).

The Mormon Tabernacle Choir, in the Tabernacle on Temple Square.

The choir has profoundly affected music throughout the Church. Its consistently high artistic standard, frequent use of hymns and hymn arrangements, and exemplary service through music continue to inspire, instruct, and encourage Church musicians and the members they serve.

The choir rehearses for two hours every Thursday evening in preparation for its weekly broadcasts and uses Tuesday evenings as needed to prepare for recording sessions, concerts, tours, and general conferences of the Church. A number of choir members have university degrees in music, and many others are professionally trained. All are competent musicians. They include men and women from many walks of life.

The choir has released more than 130 recordings and several films and videotapes. Five of its recordings have achieved "gold record" status.

Most popular has been a 1959 release of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" with the Philadelphia Orchestra, for which the choir received a Grammy Award.

Many notable personalities, soloists, and conductors have appeared with the choir, including Eugene Ormandy, Jerome Hines, Sherrill Milnes, Marilyn Horne, and Maurice Abravanel.

The choir's first major concert tour culminated in a performance at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893. Subsequent domestic tours have included performances in thirty-two states and the District of Columbia. Tours outside the United States have included Canada, Australia, and sixteen nations in Europe, Asia, South and Central America, the South Pacific, and Scandinavia. The choir has appeared at thirteen world's fairs and expositions, performed at the inauguration of four U.S. presidents, and sung for numerous worldwide telecasts and special events. In his remarks during a broadcast marking the completion of sixty years of weekly broadcasts, U.S. President George Bush called the choir "one of America's greatest treasures." It has become an American institution.

[See also Mormon Tabernacle Choir Broadcast ("The Spoken Word").]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Calman, Charles Jeffrey, and William I. Kaufman. The Mormon Tabernacle Choir. New York, 1979.

Petersen, Gerald A. More Than Music: The Mormon Tabernacle Choir. Provo, Utah, 1979.

K. NEWELL DAYLEY

---

MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR BROADCAST ("THE SPOKEN WORD")

The Mormon Tabernacle Choir Broadcast is the traditional Sunday broadcast of the MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR. It originates in the SALT LAKE TABERNACLE and is open to the public. Begun in 1929, this weekly performance has become the longest continuously presented nationwide network broadcast in American radio history.

During World War II, the choir broadcasts were aired extensively over Armed Forces Radio Network in Europe and the Far East. Thereafter, local stations extended the broadcast into the Pacific Islands, Australia, and South America. The choir made its television debut in 1962, and the weekly broadcast was relayed to over eight hundred radio and television stations worldwide.

With the sacred hymns and choral works, backed by the TABERNACLE ORGAN, a brief message, the "Spoken Word," is given each Sunday. For forty-one years the voice and the message were those of Richard L. Evans, who during that period was called to be a seventy, then a member of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. His messages and delivery attempted to capsule—usually in less than two minutes—universal principles related to character, human relationships, and the conduct of life. In the spirit of bridge-building, he aimed at both timely and timeless insights. His undergirding message was that the differences that separate people are not nearly as great as the factors that unite them. Selected Spoken Word messages ran in a weekly syndicated newspaper column circulated nationally and were later published in a series of books. Over two thousand such messages were given before his death in 1971.

Elder Richard L. Evans, the voice of "Music and the Spoken Word" for forty-one years, reads one of the brief messages that accompany each Sunday's broadcast by the Mormon Tabernacle Choir, the longest continuous broadcast in radio history (c. 1953).

Through thousands of broadcasts the opening hymn has remained "Gently Raise the Sacred Strain," and the closing one, "As the Dew from Heaven Distilling," and the signoff phrase is "May peace be with you, this day and always."

[See also Mormon Tabernacle Choir; Tabernacle Organ.]

PAUL H. EVANS

---

MORMON YOUTH SYMPHONY AND CHORUS

The Mormon Youth Symphony and Chorus (often abbreviated MYSC) is an officially sponsored musical organization of the Church. It was organized in 1969 with a primary commission to promote a four U.S. presidents, and sung for numerous worldwide telecasts and special events. In his remarks during a broadcast marking the completion of sixty years of weekly broadcasts, U.S. President George Bush called the choir "one of America's greatest treasures." It has become an American institution.

[See also Mormon Tabernacle Choir Broadcast ("The Spoken Word").]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Calman, Charles Jeffrey, and William I. Kaufman. The Mormon Tabernacle Choir. New York, 1979.

Petersen, Gerald A. More Than Music: The Mormon Tabernacle Choir. Provo, Utah, 1979.

K. NEWELL DAYLEY

---

MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR BROADCAST ("THE SPOKEN WORD")

The Mormon Tabernacle Choir Broadcast is the traditional Sunday broadcast of the MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR. It originates in the SALT LAKE TABERNACLE and is open to the public. Begun in 1929, this weekly performance has become the longest continuously presented nationwide network broadcast in American radio history.

During World War II, the choir broadcasts were aired extensively over Armed Forces Radio Network in Europe and the Far East. Thereafter, local stations extended the broadcast into the Pacific Islands, Australia, and South America. The choir made its television debut in 1962, and the weekly broadcast was relayed to over eight hundred radio and television stations worldwide.

With the sacred hymns and choral works, backed by the TABERNACLE ORGAN, a brief message, the "Spoken Word," is given each Sunday. For forty-one years the voice and the message were those of Richard L. Evans, who during that period was called to be a seventy, then a member of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. His messages and delivery attempted to capsule—usually in less than two minutes—universal principles related to character, human relationships, and the conduct of life. In the spirit of bridge-building, he aimed at both timely and timeless insights. His undergirding message was that the differences that separate people are not nearly as great as the factors that unite them. Selected Spoken Word messages ran in a weekly syndicated newspaper column circulated nationally and were later published in a series of books. Over two thousand such messages were given before his death in 1971.

Elder Richard L. Evans, the voice of "Music and the Spoken Word" for forty-one years, reads one of the brief messages that accompany each Sunday's broadcast by the Mormon Tabernacle Choir, the longest continuous broadcast in radio history (c. 1953).

Through thousands of broadcasts the opening hymn has remained "Gently Raise the Sacred Strain," and the closing one, "As the Dew from Heaven Distilling," and the signoff phrase is "May peace be with you, this day and always."

[See also Mormon Tabernacle Choir; Tabernacle Organ.]

PAUL H. EVANS

---

MORMON YOUTH SYMPHONY AND CHORUS

The Mormon Youth Symphony and Chorus (often abbreviated MYSC) is an officially sponsored musical organization of the Church. It was organized in 1969 with a primary commission to promote a four U.S. presidents, and sung for numerous worldwide telecasts and special events. In his remarks during a broadcast marking the completion of sixty years of weekly broadcasts, U.S. President George Bush called the choir "one of America's greatest treasures." It has become an American institution.

[See also Mormon Tabernacle Choir Broadcast ("The Spoken Word").]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Calman, Charles Jeffrey, and William I. Kaufman. The Mormon Tabernacle Choir. New York, 1979.

Petersen, Gerald A. More Than Music: The Mormon Tabernacle Choir. Provo, Utah, 1979.

K. NEWELL DAYLEY

---

MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR BROADCAST ("THE SPOKEN WORD")

The Mormon Tabernacle Choir Broadcast is the traditional Sunday broadcast of the MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR. It originates in the SALT LAKE TABERNACLE and is open to the public. Begun in 1929, this weekly performance has become the longest continuously presented nationwide network broadcast in American radio history.

During World War II, the choir broadcasts were aired extensively over Armed Forces Radio Network in Europe and the Far East. Thereafter, local stations extended the broadcast into the Pacific Islands, Australia, and South America. The choir made its television debut in 1962, and the weekly broadcast was relayed to over eight hundred radio and television stations worldwide.

With the sacred hymns and choral works, backed by the TABERNACLE ORGAN, a brief message, the "Spoken Word," is given each Sunday. For forty-one years the voice and the message were those of Richard L. Evans, who during that period was called to be a seventy, then a member of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. His messages and delivery attempted to capsule—usually in less than two minutes—universal principles related to character, human relationships, and the conduct of life. In the spirit of bridge-building, he aimed at both timely and timeless insights. His undergirding message was that the differences that separate people are not nearly as great as the factors that unite them. Selected Spoken Word messages ran in a weekly syndicated newspaper column circulated nationally and were later published in a series of books. Over two thousand such messages were given before his death in 1971.

Elder Richard L. Evans, the voice of "Music and the Spoken Word" for forty-one years, reads one of the brief messages that accompany each Sunday's broadcast by the Mormon Tabernacle Choir, the longest continuous broadcast in radio history (c. 1953).

Through thousands of broadcasts the opening hymn has remained "Gently Raise the Sacred Strain," and the closing one, "As the Dew from Heaven Distilling," and the signoff phrase is "May peace be with you, this day and always."

[See also Mormon Tabernacle Choir; Tabernacle Organ.]

PAUL H. EVANS

---

MORMON YOUTH SYMPHONY AND CHORUS

The Mormon Youth Symphony and Chorus (often abbreviated MYSC) is an officially sponsored musical organization of the Church. It was organized in 1969 with a primary commission to promote a “greater understanding between all peoples and cultures.”

The group is composed of young musicians ages 18 to 33 who have participated in school or community orchestras and choruses. These musicians come from various communities in Utah and rehearse two hours each week.

The MYSC performs approximately thirty times each year, including formal concerts in the TABERNACLE, CONFERENCE appearances, FIRE-SIDES, tours, broadcasts, and recordings. The programming was changed to the “Boston Pops” format when Conductor Robert C. Bowden received the baton in 1974. Bowden conducts and also composes and arranges much of the music for the groups. Tours have covered the United States. During the Bicentennial celebration of the Constitution in Washington, D.C., the symphony and chorus performed in the Kennedy Center. Many nationally prominent visiting artists have performed with them.

The Mormon Youth Symphony and Chorus has won fourteen national awards for television specials, including two Emmys, two George Washington Awards from the Freedom Foundation, and the Angel Award from Religion in Media. It has also performed for several national and international groups; such presentations have included a television special for the Norwegian Broadcasting Company as well as specials for American Veterans of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam, and for the National League of American Pen Women. The MYSC has eighteen commercial recordings to its credit.

MERRILL BRADSHAW

MORONI, ANGEL

The angel Moroni is the heavenly messenger who first visited the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1823. As a mortal named MORONI<sub>2</sub>, he had completed the compilation and writing of the Book of Mormon. He ministered to Joseph Smith as a resurrected being, in keeping with his responsibility for the Book of Mormon, inasmuch as “the keys of the record of the stick of Ephraim” had been committed to him by the Lord (D&C 27:5). Pursuant to this responsibility he first appeared to Joseph Smith on the night of September 21–22, 1823 (JS—H 1:29–49; D&C 128:20), and thereafter counseled with him in several reappearances until the book was published in 1830. During that time, he instructed Joseph Smith, testified to the Three Witnesses of the Book of Mormon, and otherwise assisted in the work of restoring the gospel.

The Angel Moroni, by Cyrus Dallin (1891; cast bronze, gilded; 12'), on the Salt Lake Temple in Salt Lake City. Moroni, a Book of Mormon prophet, returned to earth as a resurrected being and prepared Joseph Smith to receive and translate the gold plates. A symbol of the restoration of the gospel through divine messengers, such statues stand on the top of several LDS temples.

Because of the angel Moroni's role in restoring the everlasting gospel to be preached to all the world (cf. Rev. 14:6–7; D&C 133:31–39), the Church placed a statue depicting him as a herald of the Restoration atop the Salt Lake Temple, and later on the hill CUMORAH near Palmyra, New York, where anciently he had buried the Book of Mormon plates. Copies of the statue have also been placed atop several other LDS temples.

[See also Angel Moroni Statue; Moroni, Visitations of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Peterson, H. Donl. Moroni: Ancient Prophet, Modern Messenger. Bountiful, Utah, 1983.

JOSEPH B. ROMNEY

“greater understanding between all peoples and cultures.”

The group is composed of young musicians ages 18 to 33 who have participated in school or community orchestras and choruses. These musicians come from various communities in Utah and rehearse two hours each week.

The MYSC performs approximately thirty times each year, including formal concerts in the TABERNACLE, CONFERENCE appearances, FIRE-SIDES, tours, broadcasts, and recordings. The programming was changed to the “Boston Pops” format when Conductor Robert C. Bowden received the baton in 1974. Bowden conducts and also composes and arranges much of the music for the groups. Tours have covered the United States. During the Bicentennial celebration of the Constitution in Washington, D.C., the symphony and chorus performed in the Kennedy Center. Many nationally prominent visiting artists have performed with them.

The Mormon Youth Symphony and Chorus has won fourteen national awards for television specials, including two Emmys, two George Washington Awards from the Freedom Foundation, and the Angel Award from Religion in Media. It has also performed for several national and international groups; such presentations have included a television special for the Norwegian Broadcasting Company as well as specials for American Veterans of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam, and for the National League of American Pen Women. The MYSC has eighteen commercial recordings to its credit.

MERRILL BRADSHAW

MORONI, ANGEL

The angel Moroni is the heavenly messenger who first visited the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1823. As a mortal named MORONI<sup>2</sup>, he had completed the compilation and writing of the Book of Mormon. He ministered to Joseph Smith as a resurrected being, in keeping with his responsibility for the Book of Mormon, inasmuch as “the keys of the record of the stick of Ephraim” had been committed to him by the Lord (D&C 27:5). Pursuant to this responsibility he first appeared to Joseph Smith on the night of September 21–22, 1823 (JS—H 1:29–49; D&C 128:20), and thereafter counseled with him in several reappearances until the book was published in 1830. During that time, he instructed Joseph Smith, testified to the Three Witnesses of the Book of Mormon, and otherwise assisted in the work of restoring the gospel.

The Angel Moroni, by Cyrus Dallin (1891; cast bronze, gilded; 12'), on the Salt Lake Temple in Salt Lake City. Moroni, a Book of Mormon prophet, returned to earth as a resurrected being and prepared Joseph Smith to receive and translate the gold plates. A symbol of the restoration of the gospel through divine messengers, such statues stand on the top of several LDS temples.

Because of the angel Moroni's role in restoring the everlasting gospel to be preached to all the world (cf. Rev. 14:6–7; D&C 133:31–39), the Church placed a statue depicting him as a herald of the Restoration atop the Salt Lake Temple, and later on the hill CUMORAH near Palmyra, New York, where anciently he had buried the Book of Mormon plates. Copies of the statue have also been placed atop several other LDS temples.

[See also Angel Moroni Statue; Moroni, Visitations of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Peterson, H. Donl. Moroni: Ancient Prophet, Modern Messenger. Bountiful, Utah, 1983.

JOSEPH B. ROMNEY

MORONI, VISITATIONS OF

From 1823 to 1829, the angel Moroni<sup>2</sup> appeared at least twenty times to Joseph SMITH and others. Those appearances opened the way for the translation and publication of the Book of Mormon and laid the foundation of many of the Church's most characteristic teachings. As a resurrected messenger of God, Moroni told Joseph Smith about the Nephite record on gold plates and taught him concerning the gathering of ISRAEL, the forthcoming visit of ELIJAH, the imminence of the SECOND COMING of Jesus Christ, and the judgments to be poured out on the world prior to that event.

Of Moroni's first appearance on the night of September 21, 1823, Joseph Smith recorded:

After I had retired to my bed for the night, I betook myself to prayer and supplication to Almighty God for forgiveness of all my sins and follies, and also for a manifestation to me, that I might know of my state and standing before him. . . . While I was thus in the act of calling upon God, I discovered a light appearing in my room, which continued to increase until the room was lighter than at noonday, when immediately a personage appeared at my bedside, standing in the air. . . . He had on a loose robe of most exquisite whiteness. It was a whiteness beyond anything earthly I had ever seen. . . . His hands were naked, and his arms also, a little above the wrist; so, also, were his feet naked, as were his legs, a little above the ankles. His head and neck were also bare. . . . His whole person was glorious beyond description, and his countenance truly like lightning [JS—H 1:29–32].

The angel introduced himself as Moroni, and as he told about the Nephite record, its contents, and the interpreters buried with it, Joseph saw in vision their location in the hill CUMORAH. Moroni warned Joseph not to show the plates or the interpreters to anyone except those whom the Lord designated. Moroni also quoted certain prophecies from the Bible, including Malachi 3–4, Isaiah 11, and Acts 3:22–23.

After the angel left, Joseph lay contemplating this experience, and Moroni returned a second time and repeated verbatim everything he had said in his first visit, adding more detail about the coming judgments, and then returned a third time to repeat his instructions and to warn Joseph that he must put all thoughts of worldly wealth aside and concentrate solely on the translation of the record and the establishment of the kingdom of God.

The Angel Moroni, by Millard F. Malin (1953, cast aluminum, gilded). This statue of Moroni, shown with sculptor, shows the angel carrying the gold plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated and, with trumpet in hand, proclaiming the gospel (see Rev. 14:6). It now stands on top of the Los Angeles Temple. Courtesy Special Collections Department, University of Utah Libraries.

As Moroni left the third time, Joseph said he heard the cock crow, the visitations having occupied the entire night. He arose and went into the fields with his father and his older brother Alvin, but felt tired and feeble. His father, noticing his son's condition, told him to return to the house. As Joseph was climbing over a fence, he fell to the ground unconscious.

The next thing he remembered seeing was Moroni standing over him, repeating his instructions of the night before, adding that Joseph should now tell his father about the visitations. Joseph did so, and his father, assured that the vision came from God, told Joseph to follow the angel's instructions (JS—H 1:46–50).

Joseph Smith then went to the hill and found the place shown him the night before in vision. He uncovered the plates and was about to remove them when Moroni appeared again, counseling Joseph that the time was not yet right. Instead, he instructed Joseph to return to this spot at the same time the following year and that he should continue to do so until the time had come for obtaining the plates (JS—H 1:51–54).

It is reported that during those years Joseph Smith also received visits from Mormon, Nephi, and other “angels of God unfolding the majesty and glory of the events that should transpire in the last days” (HC 4:537; cf. JD 17:374; Petersen, p. 131). Joseph shared with his family some of his experiences. His mother, Lucy Mack SMITH, recalled, “From this time forth, Joseph continued to receive instructions from the Lord, and we continued to get the children together every evening for the purpose of listening while he gave us a relation of the same. . . . He would describe the ancient inhabitants of this continent, their dress, mode of traveling, and the animals upon which they rode; their cities, their buildings, with every particular; their mode of warfare; and also their religious worship. This he would do with as much ease, seemingly, as if he had spent his whole life among them" (pp. 82–83).

The Fourth Appearance of Moroni to Joseph Smith, by Gary E. Smith (1980s, oil on canvas, 36" × 42"). After seeing the angel Moroni three times the night before in his bedroom, Joseph Smith was so exhausted that he fell while attempting to cross a fence. Again the angel appeared, commanding Joseph to tell his father about the vision. Courtesy Blaine T. Hudson.

Moroni temporarily reclaimed the plates and the interpreters after Martin HARRIS had lost the first 116 manuscript pages of the translation. Later, when Joseph Smith moved from Harmony, Pennsylvania, to Fayette, New York, in June 1829, Moroni returned them to him there (Smith, pp. 149–50). Still later, Moroni showed the plates to the Three Witnesses (HC 1:54–55), took them after the translation had been completed (JS—H 1:60), and once more returned them briefly to Joseph to show to the Eight Witnesses (see BOOK OF MORMON WITNESSES).

In addition to Joseph and the Three Witnesses, Mary Whitmer also saw the angel and talked with him. Mary Whitmer said she was shown the gold plates when she conversed with Moroni (Peterson, pp. 114, 116). Other sources indicate that Moroni appeared also to W. W. Phelps, Heber C. KIMBALL, John TAYLOR, and Oliver Granger (Peterson, pp. 151–52).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Backman, Milton V., Jr. Eyewitness Accounts of the Restoration, rev. ed. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Cheesman, Paul R. The Keystone of Mormonism, rev. ed. Provo, Utah, 1988.
- Peterson, H. Donl. Moroni: Ancient Prophet, Modern Messenger. Bountiful, Utah, 1983.
- Smith, Lucy Mack. History of Joseph Smith. Preston Nibley, ed. Salt Lake City, 1958.

ELDIN RICKS

---

MORONI<sub>1</sub>

The first Moroni mentioned in the Book of Mormon (died c. 56 B.C.) was twenty-five years old when he was appointed captain of the NEPHITE armies (Alma 43:16). He upheld the liberty of the Nephites against threats posed by invading armies and by “kingmen” who tried to reestablish a monarchy by force after failing to win popular support. Moroni rallied his people for a seven-year struggle by raising “the title of liberty,” a banner on which he wrote his reasons for defense, and by having his people covenant to defend their freedom and obey God’s commandments (Alma 46:12–13, 20).

instructed Joseph to return to this spot at the same time the following year and that he should continue to do so until the time had come for obtaining the plates (JS—H 1:51–54).

It is reported that during those years Joseph Smith also received visits from Mormon, Nephi, and other “angels of God unfolding the majesty and glory of the events that should transpire in the last days” (HC 4:537; cf. JD 17:374; Petersen, p. 131). Joseph shared with his family some of his experiences. His mother, Lucy Mack SMITH, recalled, “From this time forth, Joseph continued to receive instructions from the Lord, and we continued to get the children together every evening for the purpose of listening while he gave us a relation of the same. . . . He would describe the ancient inhabitants of this continent, their dress, mode of traveling, and the animals upon which they rode; their cities, their buildings, with every particular; their mode of warfare; and also their religious worship. This he would do with as much ease, seemingly, as if he had spent his whole life among them" (pp. 82–83).

The Fourth Appearance of Moroni to Joseph Smith, by Gary E. Smith (1980s, oil on canvas, 36" × 42"). After seeing the angel Moroni three times the night before in his bedroom, Joseph Smith was so exhausted that he fell while attempting to cross a fence. Again the angel appeared, commanding Joseph to tell his father about the vision. Courtesy Blaine T. Hudson.

Moroni temporarily reclaimed the plates and the interpreters after Martin HARRIS had lost the first 116 manuscript pages of the translation. Later, when Joseph Smith moved from Harmony, Pennsylvania, to Fayette, New York, in June 1829, Moroni returned them to him there (Smith, pp. 149–50). Still later, Moroni showed the plates to the Three Witnesses (HC 1:54–55), took them after the translation had been completed (JS—H 1:60), and once more returned them briefly to Joseph to show to the Eight Witnesses (see BOOK OF MORMON WITNESSES).

In addition to Joseph and the Three Witnesses, Mary Whitmer also saw the angel and talked with him. Mary Whitmer said she was shown the gold plates when she conversed with Moroni (Peterson, pp. 114, 116). Other sources indicate that Moroni appeared also to W. W. Phelps, Heber C. KIMBALL, John TAYLOR, and Oliver Granger (Peterson, pp. 151–52).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Backman, Milton V., Jr. Eyewitness Accounts of the Restoration, rev. ed. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Cheesman, Paul R. The Keystone of Mormonism, rev. ed. Provo, Utah, 1988.
- Peterson, H. Donl. Moroni: Ancient Prophet, Modern Messenger. Bountiful, Utah, 1983.
- Smith, Lucy Mack. History of Joseph Smith. Preston Nibley, ed. Salt Lake City, 1958.

ELDIN RICKS

---

MORONI<sub>1</sub>

The first Moroni mentioned in the Book of Mormon (died c. 56 B.C.) was twenty-five years old when he was appointed captain of the NEPHITE armies (Alma 43:16). He upheld the liberty of the Nephites against threats posed by invading armies and by “kingmen” who tried to reestablish a monarchy by force after failing to win popular support. Moroni rallied his people for a seven-year struggle by raising “the title of liberty,” a banner on which he wrote his reasons for defense, and by having his people covenant to defend their freedom and obey God’s commandments (Alma 46:12–13, 20).

The Title of Liberty, maker unknown, Cuna Indian from Panama (mola—cloth appliqué, reverse embroidery and embroidery, 13" × 15"). In rallying his people to defensive battle, Captain Moroni rent his coat and wrote upon it: "In memory of our God, our religion, and freedom, and our peace, our wives, and our children—and he fastened it upon the end of a pole . . . and he called it the title of liberty" (Alma 46:12–13). Church Museum of History and Art.

Despite many battles, Moroni did not become bloodthirsty. He operated within legal authority, and when he gained advantage over enemies, he offered them freedom if they would lay down their weapons and take an oath not to war again. He introduced new armor and fortifications and sought the direction of a prophet about what his armies should do (Alma 43:23; see also BOOK OF MORMON, HISTORY OF WARFARE IN). Five hundred years later, MORMON, the chief editor and compiler of the Book of Mormon, wrote, "If all men had been . . . like unto Moroni, behold, the very powers of hell would have been shaken forever" (Alma 48:17). Mormon even named his son, MORONI<sub>2</sub>, after him.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

England, Eugene. "Moroni and His Captains." Ensign 7 (Sept. 1977):29–36.

MELVIN J. THORNE

MORONI<sub>2</sub>

Moroni<sub>2</sub> is the last prophet and author of the last book in the Book of Mormon. His life spanned the latter part of the fourth century and the early fifth century. He led ten thousand troops in the last battle against the LAMANITES, serving under his father MORMON, who was commander in chief. Prior to the final war, Mormon had abridged the PLATES of Nephi that covered a thousand years of his people's history. He commanded Moroni to conclude the Nephite record by writing "the sad tale of the destruction of [their] people" (Morm. 8:3) and to preserve all the sacred writings (Moro. 9:24).

After Moroni wrote the required postscript to his father's record and prophesied its future discovery (Morm. 8–9), he added an abridgment of ancient Jaredite engravings, a record of a nation that had inhabited the Western Hemisphere for approximately 1,700 years prior to the Nephites' arrival, or perhaps overlapping their arrival (the Book of Ether). "According to the will of the Lord," he then added ten concluding chapters on ORDINANCES, principles, and church practices that he called the Book of Moroni.

Moroni spoke with prophetic assurance of conditions in the LAST DAYS because "Jesus Christ hath shown you unto me, and I know your doing" (Morm. 8:35). With fervor, he proclaimed Christ to be a God of miracles who is the same in all ages unless unbelief causes miracles to cease. He spoke with confidence of the divinity and teachings of Jesus Christ because "I have seen Jesus, and . . . he hath talked with me face to face, . . . even as a man telleth another in mine own language, concerning these things" (Ether 12:39).

Moroni also recorded prophecies of the BROTHER OF JARED, a Jaredite prophet, who helped lead his colony to the New World. These prophecies are "sealed" to come forth at a future day (Ether 4:1–7).

Moroni's last entry in the Book of Mormon was likely written about A.D. 421, thirty-six years after the final battle. He then finished writing the title page of the Book of Mormon and finally buried the Book of Mormon plates to preserve them for a future generation.

Fourteen hundred years later this same Moroni, then a resurrected being "sent from the presence of God," appeared to Joseph Smith, a seven-

The Title of Liberty, maker unknown, Cuna Indian from Panama (mola—cloth appliqué, reverse embroidery and embroidery, 13" × 15"). In rallying his people to defensive battle, Captain Moroni rent his coat and wrote upon it: "In memory of our God, our religion, and freedom, and our peace, our wives, and our children—and he fastened it upon the end of a pole . . . and he called it the title of liberty" (Alma 46:12–13). Church Museum of History and Art.

Despite many battles, Moroni did not become bloodthirsty. He operated within legal authority, and when he gained advantage over enemies, he offered them freedom if they would lay down their weapons and take an oath not to war again. He introduced new armor and fortifications and sought the direction of a prophet about what his armies should do (Alma 43:23; see also BOOK OF MORMON, HISTORY OF WARFARE IN). Five hundred years later, MORMON, the chief editor and compiler of the Book of Mormon, wrote, "If all men had been . . . like unto Moroni, behold, the very powers of hell would have been shaken forever" (Alma 48:17). Mormon even named his son, MORONI<sub>2</sub>, after him.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

England, Eugene. "Moroni and His Captains." Ensign 7 (Sept. 1977):29–36.

MELVIN J. THORNE

MORONI<sub>2</sub>

Moroni<sub>2</sub> is the last prophet and author of the last book in the Book of Mormon. His life spanned the latter part of the fourth century and the early fifth century. He led ten thousand troops in the last battle against the LAMANITES, serving under his father MORMON, who was commander in chief. Prior to the final war, Mormon had abridged the PLATES of Nephi that covered a thousand years of his people's history. He commanded Moroni to conclude the Nephite record by writing "the sad tale of the destruction of [their] people" (Morm. 8:3) and to preserve all the sacred writings (Moro. 9:24).

After Moroni wrote the required postscript to his father's record and prophesied its future discovery (Morm. 8–9), he added an abridgment of ancient Jaredite engravings, a record of a nation that had inhabited the Western Hemisphere for approximately 1,700 years prior to the Nephites' arrival, or perhaps overlapping their arrival (the Book of Ether). "According to the will of the Lord," he then added ten concluding chapters on ORDINANCES, principles, and church practices that he called the Book of Moroni.

Moroni spoke with prophetic assurance of conditions in the LAST DAYS because "Jesus Christ hath shown you unto me, and I know your doing" (Morm. 8:35). With fervor, he proclaimed Christ to be a God of miracles who is the same in all ages unless unbelief causes miracles to cease. He spoke with confidence of the divinity and teachings of Jesus Christ because "I have seen Jesus, and . . . he hath talked with me face to face, . . . even as a man telleth another in mine own language, concerning these things" (Ether 12:39).

Moroni also recorded prophecies of the BROTHER OF JARED, a Jaredite prophet, who helped lead his colony to the New World. These prophecies are "sealed" to come forth at a future day (Ether 4:1–7).

Moroni's last entry in the Book of Mormon was likely written about A.D. 421, thirty-six years after the final battle. He then finished writing the title page of the Book of Mormon and finally buried the Book of Mormon plates to preserve them for a future generation.

Fourteen hundred years later this same Moroni, then a resurrected being "sent from the presence of God," appeared to Joseph Smith, a seventeen-year-old youth, on the night of September 21, 1823, and told him of the sacred records deposited in a stone box in a nearby hill (the hill Cumorah) in what is now Ontario County, New York, within a few miles of Joseph's home in Manchester Township. Moroni appeared to Joseph more than twenty times during the next six years, tutoring him for his calling as a prophet and giving counsel and information concerning the acquisition, translation, and guardianship of the Book of Mormon plates (Joseph Smith—History 1:27–54).

Moroni is frequently identified with the Church because portrayals of him blowing a trumpet, handling the gold plates, or instructing Joseph Smith are commonly displayed—for instance on LDS temple spires, on covers of several printings of the Book of Mormon, and in paintings. A depiction of Moroni with a trumpet is the official emblem on grave markers of American Mormon servicemen.

Moroni is commonly portrayed with a trumpet because of an interpretation of a prophecy of John the Revelator wherein he saw an angel heralding the return of the everlasting gospel to the earth in the last days:

And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters [Rev. 14:6–7].

[See also Angel Moroni Statue.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Peterson, H. Donl. Moroni: Ancient Prophet, Modern Messenger. Bountiful, Utah, 1983.

H. DONL PETERSON

---

MORRILL ACT OF 1862

See: Antipolygamy Legislation

---

MORTALITY

Mortality is not viewed as a curse by Latter-day Saints, but as an opportunity and an essential stage in progress toward obtaining EXALTATION. The ultimate purpose of the period of mortality from birth to death is to prepare to meet God with a resurrected body of glory (John 5:25–29; Alma 12:24). Death is a temporary separation of the body and the spirit, and, for those who have striven to live in accordance with God's commandments, is not something to be feared: "Fear not even unto death; for in this world your joy is not full, but in me your joy is full" (D&C 101:36; cf. Mosiah 16:7; D&C 42:46).

Although mortality is a temporary stage of life, it is essential for an individual's ETERNAL PROGRESSION for two reasons. First, it is necessary to receive a PHYSICAL BODY. God the Father, in his perfected state, has a body of flesh and bone, as does the Son (Luke 24:36–39; D&C 130:22). Mortal men and women, as the spirit offspring of God, also gain physical bodies in mortality that are indispensable to their progress, and will rise in the RESURRECTION and be perfected (Job 19:25–26; Luke 24:39). Without a physical body one cannot have a fulness of joy.

The Rod and the Veil, by Franz Johansen (1975, cast bronze and resin, 84" × 99"). "The figure reaching through the veil suggests those in the spirit world concerned about our progress in mortality; the iron rod itself, reaching into both spheres, is the sure guide through mortality upon which all of us, like the slipping boy, must struggle to retain a firm grip" (artist's description). Church Museum of History and Art.

teen-year-old youth, on the night of September 21, 1823, and told him of the sacred records deposited in a stone box in a nearby hill (the hill Cumorah) in what is now Ontario County, New York, within a few miles of Joseph's home in Manchester Township. Moroni appeared to Joseph more than twenty times during the next six years, tutoring him for his calling as a prophet and giving counsel and information concerning the acquisition, translation, and guardianship of the Book of Mormon plates (Joseph Smith—History 1:27–54).

Moroni is frequently identified with the Church because portrayals of him blowing a trumpet, handling the gold plates, or instructing Joseph Smith are commonly displayed—for instance on LDS temple spires, on covers of several printings of the Book of Mormon, and in paintings. A depiction of Moroni with a trumpet is the official emblem on grave markers of American Mormon servicemen.

Moroni is commonly portrayed with a trumpet because of an interpretation of a prophecy of John the Revelator wherein he saw an angel heralding the return of the everlasting gospel to the earth in the last days:

And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters [Rev. 14:6–7].

[See also Angel Moroni Statue.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Peterson, H. Donl. Moroni: Ancient Prophet, Modern Messenger. Bountiful, Utah, 1983.

H. DONL PETERSON

---

MORRILL ACT OF 1862

See: Antipolygamy Legislation

---

MORTALITY

Mortality is not viewed as a curse by Latter-day Saints, but as an opportunity and an essential stage

in progress toward obtaining EXALTATION. The ultimate purpose of the period of mortality from birth to death is to prepare to meet God with a resurrected body of glory (John 5:25–29; Alma 12:24). Death is a temporary separation of the body and the spirit, and, for those who have striven to live in accordance with God's commandments, is not something to be feared: "Fear not even unto death; for in this world your joy is not full, but in me your joy is full" (D&C 101:36; cf. Mosiah 16:7; D&C 42:46).

Although mortality is a temporary stage of life, it is essential for an individual's ETERNAL PROGRESSION for two reasons. First, it is necessary to receive a PHYSICAL BODY. God the Father, in his perfected state, has a body of flesh and bone, as does the Son (Luke 24:36–39; D&C 130:22). Mortal men and women, as the spirit offspring of God, also gain physical bodies in mortality that are indispensable to their progress, and will rise in the RESURRECTION and be perfected (Job 19:25–26; Luke 24:39). Without a physical body one cannot have a fulness of joy.

The Rod and the Veil, by Franz Johansen (1975, cast bronze and resin, 84" × 99"). "The figure reaching through the veil suggests those in the spirit world concerned about our progress in mortality; the iron rod itself, reaching into both spheres, is the sure guide through mortality upon which all of us, like the slipping boy, must struggle to retain a firm grip" (artist's description). Church Museum of History and Art.

Second, this life is a period of development and probation, a time to overcome temptation or inclinations toward sin and corruption (Mosiah 3:19; see NATURAL MAN). Such inclinations can be given up through REPENTANCE, the ATONEMENT, and AGENCY (Mosiah 5:2). Mortals experience opposites—good and evil, happiness and bitterness, joy and misery—and have the opportunity to live true to the commandments and teachings of God. OPPOSITION is a fundamental feature of mortality, where human actions and choices are made within the possibility of doing wrong, where acceptance of the commandments and teachings of God is done in the face of opposition and temptation. While Latter-day Saints do not believe that perfection is possible in this life, they believe in working toward it in response to the injunction of Jesus Christ to “Be ye therefore perfect” (Matt. 5:48; cf. 3 Ne. 12:48). Through repentance and obedience they try to resist the temptations that beset them.

Inasmuch as mortal existence is a time of learning in order to make the greatest progress, each individual first must accept by faith the validity of God’s commandments and teachings, and then through experience gain a knowledge of their truth. People exercise agency in how they live their lives, even as they respond to the Spirit of Christ, which is given to all born into mortality. Thus all have the ability, when given proper instruction, including associations with those who are examples of the light and truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ, to recognize and understand the laws of God (D&C 84:45–46; Moro. 7:16).

To all who are willing and who make the effort, mortality provides a vast opportunity for learning, for overcoming weaknesses, for repenting of wrongdoing, for correcting mistakes, for increasing in wisdom, and for progressing toward God. EVE recognized this when she declared that were it not for her and ADAM’s transgression, the human race “never should have known good and evil, and the joy of our redemption, and the eternal life which God giveth unto all the obedient” (Moses 5:11).

[See also Birth; Death and Dying; Evil; Fall of Adam; Joy; Life and Death, Spiritual; Man; Premortal Life; Purpose of Earth Life.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS 1:56–71.

JAMES P. BELL

MOSES

Few PROPHETS are more revered in ancient and latter-day scripture than Moses, who serves as a model of prophetic leadership not only in the Bible but also in the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, and Pearl of Great Price (see Luke 16:29–31; 24:27; 2 Ne. 3:9; D&C 28:2; 103:16; 107:91; Moses 1:41). Modern REVELATION confirms and amplifies the biblical accounts of Moses’ intimate association with deity, his role as seer, liberator, lawgiver, and leader of ISRAEL, and his connection with the books of the Pentateuch.

God chose Moses for his earthly mission in PREMORTAL LIFE (TPJS, p. 365). JOSEPH OF EGYPT, son of Jacob, prophesied that the Lord would raise up Moses to deliver Jacob’s descendants from Egyptian bondage (2 Ne. 3:9–10; JST Gen. 50:29, 34–35). His preparation for his monumental task began in his youth. Raised in Pharaoh’s court, Moses “was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians” and became “mighty in words and in deeds” (Acts 7:22). After fleeing from Egypt to Midian (Ex. 2:15), he married Zipporah. His father-in-law, Jethro, ordained him to the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD that had come down through generations of prophets (D&C 84:6–17). Known as “priest of Midian” (Ex. 3:1), Jethro descended from Midian, son of ABRAHAM and Keturah (Petersen, pp. 49–50).

Moses not only received instructions directly from God, as the Bible records, but he was also given inspiring revelations concerning God’s many creations (Moses 1:4, 33–35) and the earth and its inhabitants (Moses 1:8, 27–28). An account of these VISIONS was revealed to the Prophet JOSEPH SMITH in June 1830 as part of the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST) and constitutes chapter one of the BOOK OF MOSES in the Pearl of Great Price. For Latter-day Saints, this stands as “the missing introduction not only to Genesis, but to the entire Bible” (Turner, p. 43).

The visions were given to Moses on a high mountain, “the name of which shall not be known among the children of men” (Moses 1:1, 42), after the event at the burning bush and before he led Israel from bondage (Moses 1:17, 26). Hence, they were received separately from the revelations of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 3–4; 19–20). The visions exhibit five themes: the greatness of God in comparison to humans (Moses 1:2–5, 8–11, 35–

Second, this life is a period of development and probation, a time to overcome temptation or inclinations toward sin and corruption (Mosiah 3:19; see NATURAL MAN). Such inclinations can be given up through REPENTANCE, the ATONEMENT, and AGENCY (Mosiah 5:2). Mortals experience opposites—good and evil, happiness and bitterness, joy and misery—and have the opportunity to live true to the commandments and teachings of God. OPPOSITION is a fundamental feature of mortality, where human actions and choices are made within the possibility of doing wrong, where acceptance of the commandments and teachings of God is done in the face of opposition and temptation. While Latter-day Saints do not believe that perfection is possible in this life, they believe in working toward it in response to the injunction of Jesus Christ to “Be ye therefore perfect” (Matt. 5:48; cf. 3 Ne. 12:48). Through repentance and obedience they try to resist the temptations that beset them.

Inasmuch as mortal existence is a time of learning in order to make the greatest progress, each individual first must accept by faith the validity of God’s commandments and teachings, and then through experience gain a knowledge of their truth. People exercise agency in how they live their lives, even as they respond to the Spirit of Christ, which is given to all born into mortality. Thus all have the ability, when given proper instruction, including associations with those who are examples of the light and truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ, to recognize and understand the laws of God (D&C 84:45–46; Moro. 7:16).

To all who are willing and who make the effort, mortality provides a vast opportunity for learning, for overcoming weaknesses, for repenting of wrongdoing, for correcting mistakes, for increasing in wisdom, and for progressing toward God. EVE recognized this when she declared that were it not for her and ADAM’s transgression, the human race “never should have known good and evil, and the joy of our redemption, and the eternal life which God giveth unto all the obedient” (Moses 5:11).

[See also Birth; Death and Dying; Evil; Fall of Adam; Joy; Life and Death, Spiritual; Man; Premortal Life; Purpose of Earth Life.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS 1:56–71.

JAMES P. BELL

MOSES

Few PROPHETS are more revered in ancient and latter-day scripture than Moses, who serves as a model of prophetic leadership not only in the Bible but also in the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, and Pearl of Great Price (see Luke 16:29–31; 24:27; 2 Ne. 3:9; D&C 28:2; 103:16; 107:91; Moses 1:41). Modern REVELATION confirms and amplifies the biblical accounts of Moses’ intimate association with deity, his role as seer, liberator, lawgiver, and leader of ISRAEL, and his connection with the books of the Pentateuch.

God chose Moses for his earthly mission in PREMORTAL LIFE (TPJS, p. 365). JOSEPH OF EGYPT, son of Jacob, prophesied that the Lord would raise up Moses to deliver Jacob’s descendants from Egyptian bondage (2 Ne. 3:9–10; JST Gen. 50:29, 34–35). His preparation for his monumental task began in his youth. Raised in Pharaoh’s court, Moses “was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians” and became “mighty in words and in deeds” (Acts 7:22). After fleeing from Egypt to Midian (Ex. 2:15), he married Zipporah. His father-in-law, Jethro, ordained him to the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD that had come down through generations of prophets (D&C 84:6–17). Known as “priest of Midian” (Ex. 3:1), Jethro descended from Midian, son of ABRAHAM and Keturah (Petersen, pp. 49–50).

Moses not only received instructions directly from God, as the Bible records, but he was also given inspiring revelations concerning God’s many creations (Moses 1:4, 33–35) and the earth and its inhabitants (Moses 1:8, 27–28). An account of these VISIONS was revealed to the Prophet JOSEPH SMITH in June 1830 as part of the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST) and constitutes chapter one of the BOOK OF MOSES in the Pearl of Great Price. For Latter-day Saints, this stands as “the missing introduction not only to Genesis, but to the entire Bible” (Turner, p. 43).

The visions were given to Moses on a high mountain, “the name of which shall not be known among the children of men” (Moses 1:1, 42), after the event at the burning bush and before he led Israel from bondage (Moses 1:17, 26). Hence, they were received separately from the revelations of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 3–4; 19–20). The visions exhibit five themes: the greatness of God in comparison to humans (Moses 1:2–5, 8–11, 35– 38); Jesus Christ as the Only Begotten Son and creator of “worlds without number” (1:32–34); Satan and his opposition to the divine plan (1:12–22); the spiritual stature of Moses (1:6, 25–28, 40–41); and God’s purposes (1:30, 31, 39). Moses was able to endure God’s presence because he was transfigured, meaning that during the visionary experience God’s own glory quickened him (Moses 1:2, 11). He learned that he was created in the similitude of God’s Only Begotten Son (Moses 1:6), and was told to write his revelations, even though much of what he recorded would be lost—due to wickedness—until another prophet, like himself, would bring forth his visions to believers of a later day (Moses 1:40–41).

Latter-day scripture attests to Moses’ hand in the composition of the Pentateuch (1 Ne. 5:11; 19:23). He had access to, and edited, prior prophetic records, including those of ADAM and ENOCH, which were once apparently included in the works composing the earliest form of the Pentateuch, now found in Moses 2–8 (cf. 1 Ne. 13:20–40).

While in the wilderness, Moses taught the Israelites about the sanctifying power of the Melchizedek Priesthood, “that they might behold the face of God” (D&C 84:23). Unfortunately, they rejected his efforts, and because of their hardened hearts, Moses and the Melchizedek Priesthood were taken from their midst. The lesser or AARONIC PRIESTHOOD remained (D&C 84:24–27).

Moses’ ministry extended beyond his mortal lifetime. Along with ELIJAH, he returned to the MOUNT OF TRANSFIGURATION, spoke with Christ, and bestowed certain KEYS of the PRIESTHOOD upon the chief APOSTLES (Matt. 17:1–4; D&C 138:45; HC 3:387). Because he needed a body of flesh and bones to perform this errand and because the RESURRECTION was yet forthcoming, Moses was translated and taken into heaven, like Enoch and Elijah, without experiencing the normal death portrayed in Deuteronomy 34:5–6 (cf. Alma 45:19).

Possessing the keys for gathering Israel (Petersen, p. 186), Moses appeared in the KIRTLAND TEMPLE on April 3, 1836, and conferred those keys on the Prophet Joseph Smith and Oliver COWDERY (D&C 110:11) so that the full authority of the priesthood could operate in this DISPENSATION. Latter-day scripture reminds all priesthood holders of Moses’ significance by declaring that those who honor and magnify the priesthood become the adopted sons of Moses (D&C 84:33–34). Moses is also revered by other Christians and by Jews and Moslems.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Jackson, Kent, and Robert Millet, eds. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 3, pp. 93–223. Salt Lake City, 1985.
- Petersen, Mark E. Moses: Man of Miracles. Salt Lake City, 1977.
- Sperry, Sidney B. “The Mission of Moses: Out of Bondage.” Ensign 3 (Oct. 1973):30–35.
- Turner, Rodney. “The Visions of Moses.” In Studies in Scripture, ed. R. Millet and K. Jackson, Vol. 2, pp. 43–61. Salt Lake City, 1985.

ANDREW C. SKINNER

---

MOSES, BOOK OF

See: Book of Moses

---

MOSIAH<sub>1</sub>

The first Mosiah mentioned in the Book of Mormon, a king, saved those NEPHITES who “would hearken unto the voice of the Lord” by leading them away from their ancestral home, the land of Nephi, where they were threatened by LAMANITES about 200 B.C. (Omni 1:12). After they had wandered for an unknown period, Mosiah and his group “discovered a people, who were called the people of Zarahemla” (Omni 1:13–14; see also BOOK OF MORMON PEOPLES; MULEK). He taught them his language—their language having deteriorated because they lacked written records—and was chosen ruler over both groups (Omni 1:17–19). “By the gift and power of God” he interpreted “engravings” on a stone that the people of Zarahemla had discovered, telling of yet another and earlier migration (Omni 1:20–22; see also JAREDITES). Mosiah ruled for about four decades and was succeeded as king by his son BENJAMIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ludlow, Victor L. “Scribes and Scriptures.” In Studies in Scripture, ed. K. Jackson, Vol. 7, pp. 196–204. Salt Lake City, 1987.

MELVIN J. THORNE

38); Jesus Christ as the Only Begotten Son and creator of “worlds without number” (1:32–34); Satan and his opposition to the divine plan (1:12–22); the spiritual stature of Moses (1:6, 25–28, 40–41); and God’s purposes (1:30, 31, 39). Moses was able to endure God’s presence because he was transfigured, meaning that during the visionary experience God’s own glory quickened him (Moses 1:2, 11). He learned that he was created in the similitude of God’s Only Begotten Son (Moses 1:6), and was told to write his revelations, even though much of what he recorded would be lost—due to wickedness—until another prophet, like himself, would bring forth his visions to believers of a later day (Moses 1:40–41).

Latter-day scripture attests to Moses’ hand in the composition of the Pentateuch (1 Ne. 5:11; 19:23). He had access to, and edited, prior prophetic records, including those of ADAM and ENOCH, which were once apparently included in the works composing the earliest form of the Pentateuch, now found in Moses 2–8 (cf. 1 Ne. 13:20–40).

While in the wilderness, Moses taught the Israelites about the sanctifying power of the Melchizedek Priesthood, “that they might behold the face of God” (D&C 84:23). Unfortunately, they rejected his efforts, and because of their hardened hearts, Moses and the Melchizedek Priesthood were taken from their midst. The lesser or AARONIC PRIESTHOOD remained (D&C 84:24–27).

Moses’ ministry extended beyond his mortal lifetime. Along with ELIJAH, he returned to the MOUNT OF TRANSFIGURATION, spoke with Christ, and bestowed certain KEYS of the PRIESTHOOD upon the chief APOSTLES (Matt. 17:1–4; D&C 138:45; HC 3:387). Because he needed a body of flesh and bones to perform this errand and because the RESURRECTION was yet forthcoming, Moses was translated and taken into heaven, like Enoch and Elijah, without experiencing the normal death portrayed in Deuteronomy 34:5–6 (cf. Alma 45:19).

Possessing the keys for gathering Israel (Petersen, p. 186), Moses appeared in the KIRTLAND TEMPLE on April 3, 1836, and conferred those keys on the Prophet Joseph Smith and Oliver COWDERY (D&C 110:11) so that the full authority of the priesthood could operate in this DISPENSATION. Latter-day scripture reminds all priesthood holders of Moses’ significance by declaring that those who honor and magnify the priesthood become the adopted sons of Moses (D&C 84:33–34). Moses is also revered by other Christians and by Jews and Moslems.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Jackson, Kent, and Robert Millet, eds. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 3, pp. 93–223. Salt Lake City, 1985.
- Petersen, Mark E. Moses: Man of Miracles. Salt Lake City, 1977.
- Sperry, Sidney B. “The Mission of Moses: Out of Bondage.” Ensign 3 (Oct. 1973):30–35.
- Turner, Rodney. “The Visions of Moses.” In Studies in Scripture, ed. R. Millet and K. Jackson, Vol. 2, pp. 43–61. Salt Lake City, 1985.

ANDREW C. SKINNER

---

MOSES, BOOK OF

See: Book of Moses

---

MOSIAH<sub>1</sub>

The first Mosiah mentioned in the Book of Mormon, a king, saved those NEPHITES who “would hearken unto the voice of the Lord” by leading them away from their ancestral home, the land of Nephi, where they were threatened by LAMANITES about 200 B.C. (Omni 1:12). After they had wandered for an unknown period, Mosiah and his group “discovered a people, who were called the people of Zarahemla” (Omni 1:13–14; see also BOOK OF MORMON PEOPLES; MULEK). He taught them his language—their language having deteriorated because they lacked written records—and was chosen ruler over both groups (Omni 1:17–19). “By the gift and power of God” he interpreted “engravings” on a stone that the people of Zarahemla had discovered, telling of yet another and earlier migration (Omni 1:20–22; see also JAREDITES). Mosiah ruled for about four decades and was succeeded as king by his son BENJAMIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ludlow, Victor L. “Scribes and Scriptures.” In Studies in Scripture, ed. K. Jackson, Vol. 7, pp. 196–204. Salt Lake City, 1987.

MELVIN J. THORNE

MOSIAH<sub>2</sub>

Mosiah<sub>2</sub> (c. 153–91 B.C.) ruled as a Nephite king during almost thirty-three years of Book of Mormon history. His reign was marked by an innovative separation of religious and civic functions and a popular political reform, reflecting the increased pluralism of Nephite society during this historical period.

Mosiah's people consisted of two groups, Nephites and Mulekites, who had voluntarily united under his grandfather, MOSIAH<sub>1</sub>. They appear, to some extent, to have retained their separate identities (Mosiah 25:4). The Mulekites were the more numerous group, but the Nephite leaders were able to rule effectively, relying on COVENANT and commitment rather than force. The people entered into a sacred covenant by which they were promised deliverance and prosperity if they would keep their king's commandments, "or the commandments of God," which he would give them (Mosiah 2:312)—a commitment they honored during all of Mosiah's reign.

Mosiah learned the languages and regard for the sacred records of his ancestors from his father, BENJAMIN, and was a wise and patient man who knew the laws and prophecies contained in the Nephite records (Mosiah 1:2–3). Mosiah became king (c. 124 B.C.) three years before his aged father's death. The coronation, described in detail in Mosiah 1–6, exhibits several features similar to ancient Near Eastern coronations. The account of the coronation also provides valuable information about the religious and political patterns of the time (see BENJAMIN). Mosiah was in his thirtieth year when he began to reign. He walked "in the ways of the Lord," and like his father, he provided for his own temporal needs so that he would not become a burden to his people (Mosiah 6:6–7).

Challenges soon arose for Mosiah. Limhi's people arrived in Zarahemla and had to be assimilated into Nephite society. They brought with them the twenty-four PLATES of Ether, which Mosiah, being a SEER, translated (Mosiah 28:10–19). This Jaredite record revealed an ominous lesson, for wickedness, oppression, and violence had led to the extinction of a people. In contrast, Mosiah promoted righteousness, equality, and harmony in his kingdom. When another group led by ALMA<sub>1</sub> arrived in Zarahemla, Mosiah authorized Alma to organize churches and gave him control over them, including the power to admit members to, or expel members from, that covenant community. The creation of this subgroup comprised of seven churches in Nephite society (Mosiah 25:23) allowed Alma's followers to live as they wished, but it also appears to have sowed seeds of civic tension.

At this time, an opposition group formed. Under a strident leader named Nehor, it rejected Alma's teachings and advocated the creation of a publicly supported priesthood. Mosiah's sons, Ammon, Aaron, Omner, and Himni, together with ALMA<sub>2</sub> and a rising generation that had been too young at the time of Mosiah's coronation to understand the words of King Benjamin (Mosiah 26:1), joined these dissenters. They engaged in systematic religious persecution of the church, wreaking havoc among the Nephite community and with Mosiah's family and reputation. Mosiah dealt with the problem by prohibiting acts of religious persecution (Mosiah 27:2). He also sought divine help through fervent prayer and fasting to reform his sons. Angelic intervention (Mosiah 27:10–32) led to the spiritual transformation of these rebellious souls. Deeming it better soon thereafter to proclaim the gospel than to rule over the kingdom, none of his four sons would accept the Nephite throne.

Under these circumstances and near the end of his life, Mosiah effected a political reform that abolished Nephite kingship. His final speech in 91 B.C. justified righteous monarchs such as his father and himself, but warned against the overriding threats posed by wicked rulers (Mosiah 29:13–21).

In place of kingship, Mosiah created a unique system of judges subject to the voice of the people. From what is known about this legal reform, it appears that each judge was chosen by popular voice, "that every man should have an equal chance"; higher judges judged the lower judges, and a selected body of lower judges judged the higher judges (Mosiah 29:25–29, 38). This law set new precedents by providing that judges should be paid; it also established an Egyptian-style system of measures for exchanging various grains and precious metals (Alma 11:1, 4–19), prohibited all forms of slavery (Alma 27:9), imposed a severe punishment on those who would not pay their debts (Alma 11:2), and granted liberty of belief (Mosiah 29:39; Alma 30:11). The people accepted the law of Mosiah and selected their judges, including Alma<sub>2</sub> as the first chief judge. The equity and justice of this prophet-king won for him the love of his people:

And they did wax strong in love towards Mosiah; yea, they did esteem him more than any other man; for they did not look upon him as a tyrant who was seeking for gain, . . . for he had not exacted riches of them, neither had he delighted in the shedding of blood; but he had established peace in the land, and he had granted unto his people that they should be delivered from all manner of bondage; therefore they did esteem him, yea, exceedingly, beyond measure [Mosiah 29:40].

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- "The Coronation of Kings." F.A.R.M.S. Update. Provo, Utah, July 1989.
 "The Law of Mosiah." F.A.R.M.S. Update. Provo, Utah, March 1987.

PAUL RYTTING

MOTHER IN HEAVEN

Latter-day Saints infer from authoritative sources of scripture and modern prophecy that there is a Heavenly Mother as well as a Heavenly Father.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints rejects the idea found in some religions that the spirits or souls of individual human beings are created ex nihilo. Rather it accepts literally the vital scriptural teaching as worded by Paul: "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." This and other scriptures underscore not only spiritual sibling relationships but heirship with God, and a destiny of joint heirship with Christ (Rom. 8:16–18; cf. Mal. 2:10).

Latter-day Saints believe that all the people of earth who lived or will live are actual spiritual offspring of God the Eternal Father (Num. 16:22; Heb. 12:9). In this perspective, parenthood requires both father and mother, whether for the creation of spirits in the PREMORTAL LIFE or of physical tabernacles on earth. A Heavenly Mother shares parenthood with the Heavenly Father. This concept leads Latter-day Saints to believe that she is like him in glory, perfection, compassion, wisdom, and holiness.

Elohim, the name-title for God, suggests the plural of the Caananite El or the Hebrew Eloah. It is used in various Hebrew combinations to describe the highest God. It is the majestic title of the ultimate deity. Genesis 1:27 reads, "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him, male and female created he them"

(emphasis added), which may be read to mean that "God" is plural.

For Latter-day Saints, the concept of eternal family is more than a firm belief; it governs their way of life. It is the eternal plan of life, stretching from life before through life beyond mortality.

As early as 1839 the Prophet Joseph SMITH taught the concept of an eternal mother, as reported in several accounts from that period. Out of his teaching came a hymn that Latter-day Saints learn, sing, quote, and cherish, "O My Father," by Eliza R. SNOW. President Wilford WOODRUFF called it a REVELATION (Woodruff, p. 62).

In the heav'ns are parents single?
 No, the thought makes reason stare!
 Truth is reason; truth eternal
 Tells me I've a mother there.
 When I leave this frail existence,
 When I lay this mortal by,
 Father, Mother, may I meet you
 In your royal courts on high? [Hymn no. 292]

In 1909 the FIRST PRESIDENCY, under Joseph F. SMITH, issued a statement on the origin of man that teaches that "man, as a spirit, was begotten and born of heavenly parents, and reared to maturity in the eternal mansions of the Father," as an "offspring of celestial parentage," and further teaches that "all men and women are in the similitude of the universal Father and Mother, and are literally the sons and daughters of Deity" (Smith, pp. 199–205).

Belief that there is a Mother in Heaven who is a partner with God in creation and procreation is not the same as the heavy emphasis on Mariology in the Roman tradition.

Today the belief in a living Mother in Heaven is implicit in Latter-day Saint thought. Though the scriptures contain only hints, statements from PRESIDENTS OF THE CHURCH over the years indicate that human beings have a Heavenly Mother as well as a Heavenly Father.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Wileox, Linda P. "The Mormon Concept of a Mother in Heaven." In Sisters in Spirit, ed. Maureen U. Beecher and Lavina F. Anderson. Urbana, Ill., 1987.
 Woodruff, Wilford. The Discourses of Wilford Woodruff, ed. G. Homer Durham. Salt Lake City, 1968.

ELAINE ANDERSON CANNON

And they did wax strong in love towards Mosiah; yea, they did esteem him more than any other man; for they did not look upon him as a tyrant who was seeking for gain, . . . for he had not exacted riches of them, neither had he delighted in the shedding of blood; but he had established peace in the land, and he had granted unto his people that they should be delivered from all manner of bondage; therefore they did esteem him, yea, exceedingly, beyond measure [Mosiah 29:40].

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- "The Coronation of Kings." F.A.R.M.S. Update. Provo, Utah, July 1989.
 "The Law of Mosiah." F.A.R.M.S. Update. Provo, Utah, March 1987.

PAUL RYTTING

MOTHER IN HEAVEN

Latter-day Saints infer from authoritative sources of scripture and modern prophecy that there is a Heavenly Mother as well as a Heavenly Father.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints rejects the idea found in some religions that the spirits or souls of individual human beings are created ex nihilo. Rather it accepts literally the vital scriptural teaching as worded by Paul: "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." This and other scriptures underscore not only spiritual sibling relationships but heirship with God, and a destiny of joint heirship with Christ (Rom. 8:16–18; cf. Mal. 2:10).

Latter-day Saints believe that all the people of earth who lived or will live are actual spiritual offspring of God the Eternal Father (Num. 16:22; Heb. 12:9). In this perspective, parenthood requires both father and mother, whether for the creation of spirits in the PREMORTAL LIFE or of physical tabernacles on earth. A Heavenly Mother shares parenthood with the Heavenly Father. This concept leads Latter-day Saints to believe that she is like him in glory, perfection, compassion, wisdom, and holiness.

Elohim, the name-title for God, suggests the plural of the Caananite El or the Hebrew Eloah. It is used in various Hebrew combinations to describe the highest God. It is the majestic title of the ultimate deity. Genesis 1:27 reads, "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him, male and female created he them"

(emphasis added), which may be read to mean that "God" is plural.

For Latter-day Saints, the concept of eternal family is more than a firm belief; it governs their way of life. It is the eternal plan of life, stretching from life before through life beyond mortality.

As early as 1839 the Prophet Joseph SMITH taught the concept of an eternal mother, as reported in several accounts from that period. Out of his teaching came a hymn that Latter-day Saints learn, sing, quote, and cherish, "O My Father," by Eliza R. SNOW. President Wilford WOODRUFF called it a REVELATION (Woodruff, p. 62).

In the heav'ns are parents single?
 No, the thought makes reason stare!
 Truth is reason; truth eternal
 Tells me I've a mother there.
 When I leave this frail existence,
 When I lay this mortal by,
 Father, Mother, may I meet you
 In your royal courts on high? [Hymn no. 292]

In 1909 the FIRST PRESIDENCY, under Joseph F. SMITH, issued a statement on the origin of man that teaches that "man, as a spirit, was begotten and born of heavenly parents, and reared to maturity in the eternal mansions of the Father," as an "offspring of celestial parentage," and further teaches that "all men and women are in the similitude of the universal Father and Mother, and are literally the sons and daughters of Deity" (Smith, pp. 199–205).

Belief that there is a Mother in Heaven who is a partner with God in creation and procreation is not the same as the heavy emphasis on Mariology in the Roman tradition.

Today the belief in a living Mother in Heaven is implicit in Latter-day Saint thought. Though the scriptures contain only hints, statements from PRESIDENTS OF THE CHURCH over the years indicate that human beings have a Heavenly Mother as well as a Heavenly Father.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Wileox, Linda P. "The Mormon Concept of a Mother in Heaven." In Sisters in Spirit, ed. Maureen U. Beecher and Lavina F. Anderson. Urbana, Ill., 1987.
 Woodruff, Wilford. The Discourses of Wilford Woodruff, ed. G. Homer Durham. Salt Lake City, 1968.

ELAINE ANDERSON CANNON

MOTHERHOOD

In an address on the blessings and responsibilities of motherhood, President Ezra Taft BENSON stated: "No more sacred word exists in secular or holy writ than that of mother" (Benson, p. 1). Latter-day Saints revere and respect motherhood, in part because of the mother's role in shaping the FAMILY unit and the individuals within it. President David O. MCKAY taught:

Motherhood is the greatest potential influence either for good or ill in human life. The mother's image is the first that stamps itself on the unwritten page of the young child's mind. It is her caress that first awakens a sense of security; her kiss, the first realization of affection; her sympathy and tenderness, the first assurance that there is love in the world. . . . This ability and willingness properly to rear children . . . make motherhood the noblest office or calling in the world. . . . She who rears successfully a family of healthy, beautiful sons and daughters . . . deserves the highest honor that man can give, and the choicest blessings of God [McKay, pp. 452-54].

Obviously, the sociological significance of the mother's role is immense: Her relationship with her children and her guidance in their growing years influence the formation of values and attitudes they will carry throughout their lives. But for Latter-day Saints, motherhood has meaning well beyond such sociological significance.

Church doctrine recognizes both a mothering and a fathering role in the spiritual birth and premortal development of each person. In a document issued in 1909, the First Presidency of the Church wrote that "man, as a spirit, was begotten and born of heavenly parents, and reared to maturity in the eternal mansions of the Father," and that "all men and women are in the similitude of the universal Father and Mother, and are literally the sons and daughters of Deity" (Smith, p. 884; see MOTHER IN HEAVEN).

Following development in the premortal existence, each of God's spirit children has the opportunity to come to earth and acquire a mortal body that, when resurrected, will be bound with the spirit to form an inseparable, eternal soul. Providing mortal bodies for God's spirit children is a work given to mortal beings, with the greater measure of responsibility falling to mothers, who conceive, sustain, carry, and give birth to children. President Spencer W. KIMBALL said, "Mothers have a sacred role. They are partners with God. . . . [He] has placed women at the very headwaters of the human stream" (pp. 326-27).

Hawaiian Motherhood, by Avard T. Fairbanks (1917, cast concrete), in front of the Hawaii Temple, Laie, Hawaii. The main figure in this relief sculpture is a Hawaiian mother, holding a giant clam shell and symbolically pouring the love, hope, and care of maternity over her children.

The significance of motherhood continues undiminished following the birth of a child. The long-term stability, security, and peace of a human soul are built in large measure upon the foundation of love, and any individual's ability to give and receive love is rooted strongly in that person's earliest relationships. For most people, that earliest influence is the mother.

She who gives the child life is first and foremost the one to give it a way of life, teaching the child what it should or should not do. She encourages strong character formation as she teaches the child to impose limitations on some of its natural instincts. By her words and actions she teaches her child the regard that should be shown other individuals if that child wishes to be included and loved as a member of the family circle, later as a member of society, and finally as a participating member of the KINGDOM OF GOD.

The ultimate responsibility of a mother, then, is to lead her child lovingly through its personal development and toward its divine destiny. Latter-day Saints believe that if a mother is prayerful and totally committed to such a weighty responsibility, she will receive divine intuitions and spiritual whisperings to aid her in her mothering. Living as a conduit for divine instruction to her child, a mother can greatly enhance its opportunity for joy and EXALTATION. The child who has been mothered in this profound way usually develops a moral conscience, a respect for society, a desire to contribute to the well-being of humankind, and, most important, a love of God and a love for self that will bring everlasting joy and inner peace.

Perhaps the most distinctive Latter-day Saint doctrine regarding motherhood emphasizes the role of a mother after death. The eternal nature of the family unit, when that unit is bound together by priesthood ORDINANCES and temple COVENANTS, guarantees to a faithful LDS mother the privileges, opportunities, and joys of motherhood with her children in a relationship that lasts eternally.

[See also Mother in Israel; Women, Roles of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Ezra Taft. "To the Mothers in Zion." Salt Lake City, 1987.
- Kimball, Spencer W. The Teachings of Spencer W. Kimball, pp. 324–51. Salt Lake City, 1982.
- McKay, David O. Gospel Ideals, pp. 452–57. Salt Lake City, 1953.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. "Mothers in Israel." The Relief Society Magazine 57 (Dec. 1970):883–87.

PATRICIA TERRY HOLLAND

MOTHER IN ISRAEL

Every worthy woman who lives a virtuous life and who promotes righteousness in her family and in the Church and her family is entitled both to the designation "mother in Israel" and to the promises given to Sarah and other biblical mothers in Israel (see ABRAHAM; ABRAHAMIC COVENANT; ISRAEL; SARAH). These promises are open to all faithful women who teach others to love the Lord and keep his commandments. The title designates intelligent and faithful support of the Church and its leaders, and historically it has been applied most frequently to leaders among women. It is often found in PATRIARCHAL BLESSINGS and is a title and a promise with more than earthly significance. Motherhood is a God-given role vital to the EXALTATION of a woman and her family.

"Mother in Israel" first appears in the song of Deborah that describes the travail of the people under Jabin, the king of Canaan, until Deborah, a mother in Israel, arose to lead them out of bondage (Judg. 5:2–31; cf. 2 Sam. 20:19).

In Old Testament times, a woman's strength and authority were found in her mothering of faithful children, especially sons. Besides Eve, other outstanding examples of mothers who influenced Old Testament history include Sarah, Rebekah, Leah, Rachel, Hannah, and Naomi. Sarah, of course, figures indispensably in the blessing given to Abraham, and the Lord promised her explicitly that she would be "a mother of nations" (Gen. 17:16). That such a blessing was culturally significant is apparent in the admonition given to Rebekah by her family as she left to marry Isaac: "Be thou the mother of thousands of millions" (Gen. 24:60). Barrenness in biblical culture was often seen as a reproach to a woman and to her family, a matter of sorrow for a woman, and often a matter for sincere prayer to God, but not rejection (e.g., 1 Sam 1:4–8).

In the Christian era, after the death of the apostles, a tradition developed that gave precedent honor to women who offered themselves celibate to religious service. However, as the Protestant reformation emerged, motherhood again became a crowning glory and "the home, not the convent, became the center of woman's highest religious vocation" (Madsen, p. 184).

The expression "mother in Israel" can be found in writings of post-Reformation England and more prominently in Puritan New England. Among Latter-day Saints, who consciously identify with biblical themes and ancient Israel, the appellation appeared early, but was applied infrequently and then only to such outstanding women as Lucy Mack SMITH and Eliza R. SNOW. At the October 1845 general conference of the Church, a year following the deaths of her sons Joseph, Hyrum, and Samuel, Lucy Mack Smith "wished to know of the congregation, whether they considered her a mother in Israel." President Brigham Young put her question to those assembled, who answered with a resounding, "Yes" (CHC, 2:538–39).

member of society, and finally as a participating member of the KINGDOM OF GOD.

The ultimate responsibility of a mother, then, is to lead her child lovingly through its personal development and toward its divine destiny. Latter-day Saints believe that if a mother is prayerful and totally committed to such a weighty responsibility, she will receive divine intuitions and spiritual whisperings to aid her in her mothering. Living as a conduit for divine instruction to her child, a mother can greatly enhance its opportunity for joy and EXALTATION. The child who has been mothered in this profound way usually develops a moral conscience, a respect for society, a desire to contribute to the well-being of humankind, and, most important, a love of God and a love for self that will bring everlasting joy and inner peace.

Perhaps the most distinctive Latter-day Saint doctrine regarding motherhood emphasizes the role of a mother after death. The eternal nature of the family unit, when that unit is bound together by priesthood ORDINANCES and temple COVENANTS, guarantees to a faithful LDS mother the privileges, opportunities, and joys of motherhood with her children in a relationship that lasts eternally.

[See also Mother in Israel; Women, Roles of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Ezra Taft. "To the Mothers in Zion." Salt Lake City, 1987.
- Kimball, Spencer W. The Teachings of Spencer W. Kimball, pp. 324–51. Salt Lake City, 1982.
- McKay, David O. Gospel Ideals, pp. 452–57. Salt Lake City, 1953.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. "Mothers in Israel." The Relief Society Magazine 57 (Dec. 1970):883–87.

PATRICIA TERRY HOLLAND

MOTHER IN ISRAEL

Every worthy woman who lives a virtuous life and who promotes righteousness in her family and in the Church and her family is entitled both to the designation "mother in Israel" and to the promises given to Sarah and other biblical mothers in Israel (see ABRAHAM; ABRAHAMIC COVENANT; ISRAEL; SARAH). These promises are open to all faithful women who teach others to love the Lord and keep his commandments. The title designates intelligent and faithful support of the Church and its leaders, and historically it has been applied most frequently to leaders among women. It is often found in PATRIARCHAL BLESSINGS and is a title and a promise with more than earthly significance. Motherhood is a God-given role vital to the EXALTATION of a woman and her family.

"Mother in Israel" first appears in the song of Deborah that describes the travail of the people under Jabin, the king of Canaan, until Deborah, a mother in Israel, arose to lead them out of bondage (Judg. 5:2–31; cf. 2 Sam. 20:19).

In Old Testament times, a woman's strength and authority were found in her mothering of faithful children, especially sons. Besides Eve, other outstanding examples of mothers who influenced Old Testament history include Sarah, Rebekah, Leah, Rachel, Hannah, and Naomi. Sarah, of course, figures indispensably in the blessing given to Abraham, and the Lord promised her explicitly that she would be "a mother of nations" (Gen. 17:16). That such a blessing was culturally significant is apparent in the admonition given to Rebekah by her family as she left to marry Isaac: "Be thou the mother of thousands of millions" (Gen. 24:60). Barrenness in biblical culture was often seen as a reproach to a woman and to her family, a matter of sorrow for a woman, and often a matter for sincere prayer to God, but not rejection (e.g., 1 Sam 1:4–8).

In the Christian era, after the death of the apostles, a tradition developed that gave precedent honor to women who offered themselves celibate to religious service. However, as the Protestant reformation emerged, motherhood again became a crowning glory and "the home, not the convent, became the center of woman's highest religious vocation" (Madsen, p. 184).

The expression "mother in Israel" can be found in writings of post-Reformation England and more prominently in Puritan New England. Among Latter-day Saints, who consciously identify with biblical themes and ancient Israel, the appellation appeared early, but was applied infrequently and then only to such outstanding women as Lucy Mack SMITH and Eliza R. SNOW. At the October 1845 general conference of the Church, a year following the deaths of her sons Joseph, Hyrum, and Samuel, Lucy Mack Smith "wished to know of the congregation, whether they considered her a mother in Israel." President Brigham Young put her question to those assembled, who answered with a resounding, "Yes" (CHC, 2:538–39).

In 1916 the Relief Society Magazine published a series of articles entitled "Mothers in Israel." One prominent woman honored was Eliza R. Snow. Though childless, she was called a "mother of mothers in Israel" and praised for her leadership among women, for her intelligence, and for her faithful support of the Church and its leaders (Gates, pp. 183–90).

As in New England, the phrase "mother in Israel" appeared in early Utah history in the obituaries of many faithful women who succored the Church and their families. Sometimes they were older women with large families and sometimes notable women in other circumstances. For example, Mary Fielding SMITH had only two children of her own, both young enough when she died that no claim could be made of their future significance, yet at her death, evidently in recognition of her character and commitment, she was called a mother in Israel. A son and a grandson later became Presidents of the Church.

Currently the term is most often found in patriarchal blessings when a woman is promised in substance that she will stand "as a mother in Israel." President Joseph Fielding SMITH said, "To be a mother in Israel in the full gospel sense is the highest reward that can come into the life of a woman" (p. 883). It is a promise open to all faithful sisters who love and serve the Lord and keep his commandments, including those who do not have the opportunity to bear children in this life.

The Book of Mormon recounts the history of 2,000 righteous stripling warriors who were able to accomplish great things and receive great blessings because they believed in what they had "been taught by their mothers" (Alma 56:47–48; 57:21). Modern mothers in Israel also have a responsibility to teach their children—and others whom they are in a position to influence—to love the Lord and keep his commandments. The prophets of this DISPENSATION have consistently stressed the importance of committed motherhood both by those who bear and those who care and have counseled that this is a divinely given role important to the salvation and exaltation of God's children.

[See also Motherhood; Women, Roles of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Ezra Taft. To the Mothers in Zion. Salt Lake City, 1987.
- Gates, Susa Young. "Mothers in Israel." Relief Society Magazine 3 (Jan. 1916):538–39.

———. "The Mothers of Mothers in Israel." Relief Society Magazine 3 (Apr. 1916):183–90.

Madsen, Carol Cornwall. "Mothers in Israel: Sarah's Legacy." In Women of Wisdom and Knowledge, ed. M. Cornwall and S. Howe, pp. 179–201. Salt Lake City, 1990.

Reynolds, Sydney Smith. "Wife and Mother: A Valid Career Option for the College-Educated Woman." Ensign 9 (Oct. 1979):67–70.

Smith, Joseph Fielding. "Mothers in Israel." Relief Society Magazine 57 (Dec. 1970):883–86.

SYDNEY SMITH REYNOLDS

---

MOTION PICTURES, LDS PRODUCTIONS

As early as 1913, when the motion picture industry was in its early stages, leaders of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints expressed an interest in using the film medium: "The moving picture together with all the other modern inventions is to help us carry the Mission of Christ to all the world, and to bring humanity home to the true principles of salvation" (Young, p. 80). With the sanction of President Joseph F. SMITH, Shirley "Shirl" Young Clawson and his brother Chester filmed many Church events and leaders from 1916 to 1929 in black and white and without sound. This era of film production for the Church ended tragically, however, when a fire killed Shirl Clawson and destroyed the studio and many of the films. The Church's next major move into film production began in the 1950s and has resulted in many award-winning items among the programs produced for home, classroom, and missionary use.

In 1946 Wetzell O. "Judge" Whitaker, chief of animation for Walt Disney Studios, invited three members of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES—Elders Harold B. LEE, Mark E. Petersen, and Matthew Cowley—to tour the Disney Studios in Burbank, California. They were impressed with the potential of motion pictures to teach principles of the gospel. In that same year, wards, stakes, and missions began to be provided with motion picture projectors. Whitaker produced the first two films for the Church on a volunteer basis: Church Welfare in Action and The Lord's Way.

In January 1953 BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY in Provo, Utah, created a department of motion picture production to produce films to be used by

In 1916 the Relief Society Magazine published a series of articles entitled "Mothers in Israel." One prominent woman honored was Eliza R. Snow. Though childless, she was called a "mother of mothers in Israel" and praised for her leadership among women, for her intelligence, and for her faithful support of the Church and its leaders (Gates, pp. 183–90).

As in New England, the phrase "mother in Israel" appeared in early Utah history in the obituaries of many faithful women who succored the Church and their families. Sometimes they were older women with large families and sometimes notable women in other circumstances. For example, Mary Fielding SMITH had only two children of her own, both young enough when she died that no claim could be made of their future significance, yet at her death, evidently in recognition of her character and commitment, she was called a mother in Israel. A son and a grandson later became Presidents of the Church.

Currently the term is most often found in patriarchal blessings when a woman is promised in substance that she will stand "as a mother in Israel." President Joseph Fielding SMITH said, "To be a mother in Israel in the full gospel sense is the highest reward that can come into the life of a woman" (p. 883). It is a promise open to all faithful sisters who love and serve the Lord and keep his commandments, including those who do not have the opportunity to bear children in this life.

The Book of Mormon recounts the history of 2,000 righteous stripling warriors who were able to accomplish great things and receive great blessings because they believed in what they had "been taught by their mothers" (Alma 56:47–48; 57:21). Modern mothers in Israel also have a responsibility to teach their children—and others whom they are in a position to influence—to love the Lord and keep his commandments. The prophets of this DISPENSATION have consistently stressed the importance of committed motherhood both by those who bear and those who care and have counseled that this is a divinely given role important to the salvation and exaltation of God's children.

[See also Motherhood; Women, Roles of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Ezra Taft. To the Mothers in Zion. Salt Lake City, 1987.
- Gates, Susa Young. "Mothers in Israel." Relief Society Magazine 3 (Jan. 1916):538–39.

———. "The Mothers of Mothers in Israel." Relief Society Magazine 3 (Apr. 1916):183–90.

Madsen, Carol Cornwall. "Mothers in Israel: Sarah's Legacy." In Women of Wisdom and Knowledge, ed. M. Cornwall and S. Howe, pp. 179–201. Salt Lake City, 1990.

Reynolds, Sydney Smith. "Wife and Mother: A Valid Career Option for the College-Educated Woman." Ensign 9 (Oct. 1979):67–70.

Smith, Joseph Fielding. "Mothers in Israel." Relief Society Magazine 57 (Dec. 1970):883–86.

SYDNEY SMITH REYNOLDS

---

MOTION PICTURES, LDS PRODUCTIONS

As early as 1913, when the motion picture industry was in its early stages, leaders of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints expressed an interest in using the film medium: "The moving picture together with all the other modern inventions is to help us carry the Mission of Christ to all the world, and to bring humanity home to the true principles of salvation" (Young, p. 80). With the sanction of President Joseph F. SMITH, Shirley "Shirl" Young Clawson and his brother Chester filmed many Church events and leaders from 1916 to 1929 in black and white and without sound. This era of film production for the Church ended tragically, however, when a fire killed Shirl Clawson and destroyed the studio and many of the films. The Church's next major move into film production began in the 1950s and has resulted in many award-winning items among the programs produced for home, classroom, and missionary use.

In 1946 Wetzell O. "Judge" Whitaker, chief of animation for Walt Disney Studios, invited three members of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES—Elders Harold B. LEE, Mark E. Petersen, and Matthew Cowley—to tour the Disney Studios in Burbank, California. They were impressed with the potential of motion pictures to teach principles of the gospel. In that same year, wards, stakes, and missions began to be provided with motion picture projectors. Whitaker produced the first two films for the Church on a volunteer basis: Church Welfare in Action and The Lord's Way.

In January 1953 BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY in Provo, Utah, created a department of motion picture production to produce films to be used by the Church and appointed Judge Whitaker as its founding director. The department produced poignant and appealing films such as Come Back My Son based on a story from the IMPROVEMENT ERA about reactivating an adult member of the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD. How Near to the Angels, the most ambitious LDS film project at that time, was a significant milestone because of its dramatic nature though it was only fifty minutes long. The film had as its theme temple marriage. A Time for Sowing showed the effect parents have on the behavior of their children. Time Pulls the Trigger looked at the connection between smoking and premature death. With All Your Heart showed a relationship between a spiritually sensitive bishop and reverence in Church meetings. My Brother's Keeper and Shannon dramatized the reclaiming of less active members of the Church. The Search for Truth presented the rational observations and testimonies of scientists on the reconciliation of science and religion. Worth Waiting For taught that happy marriages are worth preparing for. The most challenging film produced in this first decade of Church film production, and an enduring favorite, was Windows of Heaven, a film on blessings through the law of tithing.

MAN'S SEARCH FOR HAPPINESS, the first film written for a non-Mormon audience about the purpose of life, premiered at the 1964 World's Fair in New York City, where it was viewed by five million people. This film was subsequently translated into more languages than any previous Church film, including Afrikaans, Cantonese, Creole, Czech, Danish, Dutch, Esperanto, Finnish, French, French-Canadian, German, Hmong, Italian, Japanese, Korean, Mandarin, Navajo, Norwegian, Portuguese, Quechua, Quiche, Samoan, Serbo-Croatian, Spanish, Swedish, Tagalog, Taiwanese, Thai, Tongan, and Vietnamese. A Japanese version was filmed in Japan and premiered at the 1970 World's Fair Expo there.

No More a Stranger demonstrated the importance of fellowshipping new members in a WARD. And Should We Die taught the principle of fasting and prayer. The Three Witnesses, a dramatic reenactment of the story of the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon, was used widely throughout the Church in teaching this aspect of early Church history. Meet the Mormons featured many on-camera, spontaneous interviews and testimonies, and showed the international nature of the Church. It was also translated into many languages. Where Jesus Walked is about the life of Christ and was filmed in the Holy Land.

In addition to the BYU motion picture studio, KSL television has preserved on film many speeches by GENERAL AUTHORITIES and selected specials, such as Nauvoo, and Cumorah, Hill of History. In 1967 Bonneville Media Communications was organized as a broadcast production facility to help develop a positive media image for the Church and to convey its doctrines and beliefs. Bonneville's direct gospel messages have included Our Heavenly Father's Plan; Together Forever; What is Real; and Labor of Love. Seasonal gospel films included Mr. Krueger's Christmas, Nora's Christmas Gift; an animated version of Henry Van Dyke's The Other Wise Man; O. Henry's Easter story The Last Leaf; and Easter Dream. Radio and television public service announcements broadcast regularly by over 14,000 stations worldwide, called the Homefront Series, are intended to promote family solidarity and to raise awareness of some basic teachings of the Church.

On September 1, 1974, Jesse E. Stay replaced Whitaker as head of the BYU motion picture studio. During Stay's tenure, Go Ye Into All the World; The First Vision; Restoration of the Priesthood; and Morality for Youth were completed.

On September 1, 1983, Peter N. Johnson replaced Stay and oversaw the production of Teaching, A Renewed Dedication; Five-Year Retrospective of the Church in Action; Cameos on General Authorities; Teacher, Do You Love Me?; Lamp Unto My Feet; Things of My Soul, a remake of Man's Search for Happiness; How Rare a Possession: The Book of Mormon; and Called to Serve—the major Church productions of the 1980s.

In 1991, control of the motion picture studio was transferred from BYU to the Audiovisual Department of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Jacobs, David Kent. "The History of Motion Pictures Produced by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1967.
- Whitaker, Wetzel O. Pioneering with Film: A Brief History of Church and Brigham Young University Films. Provo, Utah, n.d.
- Young, Levi Edgar. "'Mormonism' in Picture." Young Woman's Journal 24 (Feb. 1913):80.

PETER N. JOHNSON

MOUNTAIN MEADOWS MASSACRE

In September 1890, some two thousand persons gathered in Cedar City, Utah, to effect a reconciliation among those whose ancestors died or participated in what may be considered the most unfortunate incident in the history of the LDS Church, the Mountain Meadows massacre. The massacre occurred between September 7 and 11, 1857, when a group of Mormon settlers in southern Utah joined with nearby Indians in killing all but some of the youngest members of a group of non-Mormon emigrants en route to California.

After years of painstaking research, Juanita Brooks, author of an oft-cited book on the tragedy, concluded, "The complete—the absolute—truth of the affair can probably never be evaluated by any human being; attempts to understand the forces which culminated in it and those which were set into motion by it are all very inadequate at best" (Brooks, p. 223). Yet, as Brooks makes clear, a few elements that helped contribute to the tragedy are evident.

Among these is the fact that a large contingent of United States troops was marching westward toward Utah Territory in the summer of 1857 (see UTAH EXPEDITION). Despite having been the federally appointed territorial governor, Brigham Young was not informed by Washington of the army's purpose and interpreted the move as a renewal of the persecution the Latter-day Saints had experienced before their westward heira. "We are invaded by a hostile force who are evidently assailing us to accomplish our overthrow and destruction," he proclaimed on August 5, 1857. Anticipating an attack, he declared the territory to be under martial law and ordered "[t]hat all the forces in said Territory hold themselves in readiness to march, at a moment's notice, to repel any and all such threatened invasion" (Arrington, p. 254).

Part of Brigham Young's strategy in repelling the approaching army was to enlist local Indian tribes as allies. In an August 4 letter to southern Utah, for example, he urged one Latter-day Saint to "[c]ontinue the conciliatory policy towards the Indians, which I have ever recommended, and seek by works of righteousness to obtain their love and confidence, for they must learn that they have either got to help us or the United States will kill us both" (Brooks, p. 34).

Meanwhile, owing to the lateness of the season, a party of emigrants bound for California elected to take the southern route that passed through Cedar City and thirty-five miles beyond to the Mountain Meadows, which was then an area of springs, bogs, and plentiful grass where travelers frequently stopped to rejuvenate themselves and their stock before braving the harsh desert landscape to the west. Led by John T. Baker and Alexander Fancher, the diverse party consisted of perhaps 120 persons, most of whom left from Arkansas but others of whom joined the company along their journey.

As the Baker-Fancher party traveled from Salt Lake City to the Mountain Meadows, tensions developed between some of the emigrants, on the one hand, and Mormon settlers and their Native American allies, on the other. Spurred by rumors, their own observations, and memories of atrocities some of them had endured in Missouri and Illinois, Mormon residents in and around Cedar City felt compelled to take some action against the emigrant train but ultimately decided to dispatch a rider to Brigham Young seeking his counsel. Leaving September 7, 1857, the messenger made the nearly 300-mile journey in just a little more than three days.

Approximately one hour after his arrival, the messenger was on his way back with a letter from Brigham Young, who said he did not expect the federal soldiers to arrive that fall because of their poor stock. "They cannot get here this season without we help them," he explained. "So you see that the Lord has answered our prayers and again averted the blow designed for our heads." Responding to the plea for counsel, he added, "In regard to the emigration trains passing through our settlements, we must not interfere with them until they are first notified to keep away. You must not meddle with them. The Indians we expect will do as they please but you should try and preserve good feelings with them" (Brooks, p. 63). The messenger arrived back in Cedar City on September 13.

John D. Lee seated next to his coffin prior to his execution twenty years after his involvement in the Mountain Meadows Massacre, Utah. From the George Kelly collection, University of Utah. Courtesy Nelson Wadsworth.

Monument above the site of the Mountain Meadows Massacre, erected September 1990. The monument lists the names of the Arkansas immigrants killed here in 1857 and the names of the children who survived and were returned to relatives in 1859. Courtesy Deseret News.

By that time, however, it was too late, and nearly all the men, women, and children of the Baker-Fancher party lay dead. Besides a few persons who left the party before the attack, only about eighteen small children were spared. Two years later, seventeen of the children were returned to family members in northwestern Arkansas. Two decades after the tragedy, one of the Mormon settlers who were present at the massacre, John D. Lee, was executed by a firing squad at the Mountain Meadows, symbolically carrying to the grave the responsibility for those who "were led to do what none singly would have done under normal conditions, and for which none singly can be held responsible" (Brooks, p. 218).

Yet for more than another century after Lee's death, the community guilt of those who participated in the massacre continued to fester alongside the collective pain of both the children who survived it and the relatives of those who did not. Then in the late 1980s, the descendants of those affected by the tragedy began meeting to bind the wounds and achieve a reconciliation. On September 15, 1990, many of them gathered to dedicate a memorial marker to those who died at the Mountain Meadows.

One speaker at the marker dedication was Judge Roger V. Logan, Jr., of Harrison, Arkansas, a man related to twenty-one of the massacre victims listed on the marker, as well as to five of the children who survived. "I am happy to say that thanks to the work, cooperation and gifts of many of you," he said, "there is now an appropriate monument standing in the place of the emigrants' demise; a monument containing the names of eighty-two persons who died and seventeen who survived and [that] also contains reference to many others who may have been a part of the caravan." As he read the victims' names, he asked all related to them to stand in their honor.

Brigham Young University President Rex E. Lee, a descendant of John D. Lee, also spoke at the memorial service, saying he found little solace in recognizing that similar tragedies had occurred across time and space. "Any attempt to recreate the human dynamics that were at work in southern Utah in the fall of 1857 can only leave us bewildered as to how rational human beings at any time, in any place, under any circumstances could have permitted such a tragedy to occur."

"Fortunately," he added, "full comprehension of the reasons is as unnecessary as it would be impossible. Our task for today is not to look backward, nor to rationalize, nor to engage in any kind of retroactive analysis nor apology. Our focus is not on 1857. It is on 1990. It is on our generation, and on those that are yet to come. And whatever drove the actions of those who came before, ours must be driven by something higher and more noble."

Gordon B. Hinckley, First Counselor in the LDS Church First Presidency, offered the prayer dedicating the new monument. In a talk delivered before the prayer, President Hinckley said he came "not as a descendant of any of the parties involved at Mountain Meadows" but "as a representative of an entire people who have suffered much over what occurred there."

"In our time," he said, "we can read such history as is available, but we really cannot understand nor comprehend that which occurred those tragic and terrible September days in 1857. Rather, we are grateful for the ameliorating influence that has brought us together in a spirit of reconciliation as new generations gather with respect and appreciation one for another. A bridge has been built across a chasm of rankling bitterness. We walk across that bridge and greet one another with a spirit of love, forgiveness, and with hope that there will never be a repetition of anything of the kind." (Excerpts from the talks are all taken from unpublished manuscripts found in the Mountain Meadows Memorial collection, LDS Church Historical Department, Salt Lake City, Utah.)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. Brigham Young, American Moses. New York, 1985.
- Brooks, Juanita. The Mountain Meadows Massacre. Revised ed., Norman, Okla., 1991.
- CHC* 4:139-80.

RONALD K. ESPLIN
RICHARD E. TURLEY, JR.

MOUNT OF TRANSFIGURATION

The Mount of Transfiguration was the scene of a transcendent New Testament event. It has been set in perspective by REVELATIONS to the Prophet Joseph SMITH and portrayed with several related components. First, Jesus conversed with Moses and Elijah, who were then translated beings (Matt. 17:3-4). Second, a transfiguration of Jesus Christ himself occurred there, confirming his divine nature and calling to his three chief apostles: Peter, James, and John (Matt. 17:1-2). Third, those apostles were also temporarily transfigured during that experience (TPJS, p. 158). Fourth, in vision those apostles saw the earth in its future transfigured state as the inheritance of the faithful (D&C 63:20-21). Fifth, those same apostles received certain priesthood keys of the kingdom of God, which they utilized during their mortal ministries (HC 3:387). Sixth, Moses and Elijah, who were also on the Mount of Transfiguration, also conferred priesthood keys to Joseph Smith and Oliver COWDERY in the Kirtland Temple on April 3, 1836 (D&C 110:11-16).

The experience on the mount no doubt strengthened the Savior as he approached the last months before his atoning sacrifice. Moses and Elijah visited him as he prepared for the infinite sufferings in Gethsemane and the agonies of Golgotha (Luke 9:30-31; JC, p. 373).

Jesus' transfiguration before Peter, James, and John made them "eyewitnesses of his majesty" (2 Pet. 1:16). During their visit, the voice of the Father bore record of the Savior's mission, giving assurance to Peter, James, and John of the Father's love and his approval of Jesus (Matt. 17:5-8). Because these apostles would soon constitute the FIRST PRESIDENCY of the early church (MD, pp. 571-572), the event was an unforgettable personal witness of the Father's acknowledgment of Jesus' redemptive mission. John later testified, "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father" (John 1:14).

The temporary transfiguration of Peter, James, and John allowed them to hear the voice of the Father and see the transfigured Son (cf. Moses 1:9-11). This extraordinary experience helped prepare them for the coming burden of Church leadership following Jesus' departure from his earthly ministry. Well did Peter declare, "Lord, it is good for us to be here" (Matt. 17:4).

the memorial service, saying he found little solace in recognizing that similar tragedies had occurred across time and space. "Any attempt to recreate the human dynamics that were at work in southern Utah in the fall of 1857 can only leave us bewildered as to how rational human beings at any time, in any place, under any circumstances could have permitted such a tragedy to occur."

"Fortunately," he added, "full comprehension of the reasons is as unnecessary as it would be impossible. Our task for today is not to look backward, nor to rationalize, nor to engage in any kind of retroactive analysis nor apology. Our focus is not on 1857. It is on 1990. It is on our generation, and on those that are yet to come. And whatever drove the actions of those who came before, ours must be driven by something higher and more noble."

Gordon B. Hinckley, First Counselor in the LDS Church First Presidency, offered the prayer dedicating the new monument. In a talk delivered before the prayer, President Hinckley said he came "not as a descendant of any of the parties involved at Mountain Meadows" but "as a representative of an entire people who have suffered much over what occurred there."

"In our time," he said, "we can read such history as is available, but we really cannot understand nor comprehend that which occurred those tragic and terrible September days in 1857. Rather, we are grateful for the ameliorating influence that has brought us together in a spirit of reconciliation as new generations gather with respect and appreciation one for another. A bridge has been built across a chasm of rankling bitterness. We walk across that bridge and greet one another with a spirit of love, forgiveness, and with hope that there will never be a repetition of anything of the kind." (Excerpts from the talks are all taken from unpublished manuscripts found in the Mountain Meadows Memorial collection, LDS Church Historical Department, Salt Lake City, Utah.)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. Brigham Young, American Moses. New York, 1985.
- Brooks, Juanita. The Mountain Meadows Massacre. Revised ed., Norman, Okla., 1991.
- CHC* 4:139-80.

RONALD K. ESPLIN
RICHARD E. TURLEY, JR.

MOUNT OF TRANSFIGURATION

The Mount of Transfiguration was the scene of a transcendent New Testament event. It has been set in perspective by REVELATIONS to the Prophet Joseph SMITH and portrayed with several related components. First, Jesus conversed with Moses and Elijah, who were then translated beings (Matt. 17:3-4). Second, a transfiguration of Jesus Christ himself occurred there, confirming his divine nature and calling to his three chief apostles: Peter, James, and John (Matt. 17:1-2). Third, those apostles were also temporarily transfigured during that experience (TPJS, p. 158). Fourth, in vision those apostles saw the earth in its future transfigured state as the inheritance of the faithful (D&C 63:20-21). Fifth, those same apostles received certain priesthood keys of the kingdom of God, which they utilized during their mortal ministries (HC 3:387). Sixth, Moses and Elijah, who were also on the Mount of Transfiguration, also conferred priesthood keys to Joseph Smith and Oliver COWDERY in the Kirtland Temple on April 3, 1836 (D&C 110:11-16).

The experience on the mount no doubt strengthened the Savior as he approached the last months before his atoning sacrifice. Moses and Elijah visited him as he prepared for the infinite sufferings in Gethsemane and the agonies of Golgotha (Luke 9:30-31; JC, p. 373).

Jesus' transfiguration before Peter, James, and John made them "eyewitnesses of his majesty" (2 Pet. 1:16). During their visit, the voice of the Father bore record of the Savior's mission, giving assurance to Peter, James, and John of the Father's love and his approval of Jesus (Matt. 17:5-8). Because these apostles would soon constitute the FIRST PRESIDENCY of the early church (MD, pp. 571-572), the event was an unforgettable personal witness of the Father's acknowledgment of Jesus' redemptive mission. John later testified, "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father" (John 1:14).

The temporary transfiguration of Peter, James, and John allowed them to hear the voice of the Father and see the transfigured Son (cf. Moses 1:9-11). This extraordinary experience helped prepare them for the coming burden of Church leadership following Jesus' departure from his earthly ministry. Well did Peter declare, "Lord, it is good for us to be here" (Matt. 17:4).

Peter, James, and John also saw the millennial day when the earth will be transfigured, returning it to its condition prior to the FALL OF ADAM (TPJS, pp. 12–13; cf. A of F 10). The earth's transfiguration will take place at the time of Christ's second coming (MD, pp. 795–96).

The bestowal of priesthood keys on the presiding apostles formed a fifth purpose of the transfiguration. During his ministry, Jesus conferred the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD on the twelve, authorizing them to act under his direction (Mark 3:14–15; John 15:16; cf. JD 25:207). But with the prospect of his departure, the twelve needed independent authority to direct Church affairs. Fulfilling his promise that Peter would receive the keys of the kingdom (Matt. 16:13–20), Jesus took the chief apostles to the mount, where they received those keys.

After beholding the transfigured Jesus and undergoing transfiguration themselves, the apostles saw Moses and Elijah (and perhaps others; cf. McConkie, p. 400), who had been translated so that they could appear with physical bodies to bestow priesthood keys by the LAYING ON OF HANDS, which made possible, among other things, the preaching of the gospel throughout the world (Matt. 18:19–20) and performing saving ORDINANCES for the living and the dead (cf. 1 Cor. 15:29).

The latter-day fulfillment of some of these events occurred in the Kirtland Temple. The Melchizedek Priesthood and the office and keys of apostleship had been conferred on Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery probably in late May or early June 1829 (cf. D&C 27:12), embracing the authority to establish the Church (D&C 128:20). On April 3, 1836, additional keys were given to Joseph and Oliver in the Kirtland Temple by Moses and Elijah—the same ancient ministrants who appeared on the mount—and an additional messenger named ELIAS, who conferred the “dispensation of the gospel of Abraham” (D&C 110:12). The restoration of these keys set in motion the latter-day mission of the Church, including missionary work and all ordinances for the living, as well as redemption of the dead through vicarious ordinance work in temples.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Haight, David B. “We Beheld His Glory.” Ensign 7 (May 1977):7–10.

Matthews, Robert J. “Tradition, Testimony, Transfiguration, and Keys.” In Studies in Scripture, ed. K. Jackson and R. Millet, Vol. 5, pp. 296–311. Salt Lake City, 1986.

McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, Vol. 1, pp. 397–404. Salt Lake City, 1965.

DALE C. MOURITSEN

---

MULEK

Mulek, a Book of Mormon character, son of Zedekiah, escaped the sack of Jerusalem (587 B.C.) and went with others to a place in the Western Hemisphere that they called the land of Mulek (Hel. 6:10). Later a region was named for Zarahemla, a descendant of Mulek (Mosiah 25:2). These people were eventually discovered by Nephite refugees from LAMANITE predations in the south. Mulek is important because he established one of the BOOK OF MORMON PEOPLES and because Bible students have assumed that Nebuchadnezzar executed all of Zedekiah's sons, an observation unsupported by ancient evidence and refuted by the Book of Mormon account of Mulek's survival.

According to the Book of Mormon, the Nephites and “Mulekites” formed a coalition, making Mosiah<sub>2</sub> king over both groups. The Nephites discovered in Mulek's descendants an additional witness concerning the destruction of Jerusalem. The Mulekites were elated to have access to Nephite records, since their own language and traditions had been distorted in the absence of historical documents. The Mulekites lived thenceforth among the Nephites, enjoying separate-but-equal status and ultimately outnumbering the descendants of Nephi (Mosiah 25:1–4, 13).

Ancient Near Eastern sources affirm that during the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem, Mulek's father, Zedekiah, who was deserted by all who escaped, was captured with members of his family and a few courtiers. Nebuchadnezzar slew Zedekiah's sons and courtiers, put his eyes out, and deported him to Babylon (Josephus, Antiquities, 10.8.2). But his daughters, and presumably his wives, stayed at Mizpah until Gedeliah, a former minister with Babylonizing tendencies in Zedekiah's cabinet, was murdered by Ishmael, who then tried to deport the Mizpah colony. When pursued, Ishmael abandoned his captives and fled with eight men to Ammon. The people of Mizpah, Peter, James, and John also saw the millennial day when the earth will be transfigured, returning it to its condition prior to the FALL OF ADAM (TPJS, pp. 12–13; cf. A of F 10). The earth's transfiguration will take place at the time of Christ's second coming (MD, pp. 795–96).

The bestowal of priesthood keys on the presiding apostles formed a fifth purpose of the transfiguration. During his ministry, Jesus conferred the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD on the twelve, authorizing them to act under his direction (Mark 3:14–15; John 15:16; cf. JD 25:207). But with the prospect of his departure, the twelve needed independent authority to direct Church affairs. Fulfilling his promise that Peter would receive the keys of the kingdom (Matt. 16:13–20), Jesus took the chief apostles to the mount, where they received those keys.

After beholding the transfigured Jesus and undergoing transfiguration themselves, the apostles saw Moses and Elijah (and perhaps others; cf. McConkie, p. 400), who had been translated so that they could appear with physical bodies to bestow priesthood keys by the LAYING ON OF HANDS, which made possible, among other things, the preaching of the gospel throughout the world (Matt. 18:19–20) and performing saving ORDINANCES for the living and the dead (cf. 1 Cor. 15:29).

The latter-day fulfillment of some of these events occurred in the Kirtland Temple. The Melchizedek Priesthood and the office and keys of apostleship had been conferred on Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery probably in late May or early June 1829 (cf. D&C 27:12), embracing the authority to establish the Church (D&C 128:20). On April 3, 1836, additional keys were given to Joseph and Oliver in the Kirtland Temple by Moses and Elijah—the same ancient ministrants who appeared on the mount—and an additional messenger named ELIAS, who conferred the “dispensation of the gospel of Abraham” (D&C 110:12). The restoration of these keys set in motion the latter-day mission of the Church, including missionary work and all ordinances for the living, as well as redemption of the dead through vicarious ordinance work in temples.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Haight, David B. “We Beheld His Glory.” Ensign 7 (May 1977):7–10.

Matthews, Robert J. “Tradition, Testimony, Transfiguration, and Keys.” In Studies in Scripture, ed. K. Jackson and R. Millet, Vol. 5, pp. 296–311. Salt Lake City, 1986.

McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, Vol. 1, pp. 397–404. Salt Lake City, 1965.

DALE C. MOURITSEN

---

MULEK

Mulek, a Book of Mormon character, son of Zedekiah, escaped the sack of Jerusalem (587 B.C.) and went with others to a place in the Western Hemisphere that they called the land of Mulek (Hel. 6:10). Later a region was named for Zarahemla, a descendant of Mulek (Mosiah 25:2). These people were eventually discovered by Nephite refugees from LAMANITE predations in the south. Mulek is important because he established one of the BOOK OF MORMON PEOPLES and because Bible students have assumed that Nebuchadnezzar executed all of Zedekiah's sons, an observation unsupported by ancient evidence and refuted by the Book of Mormon account of Mulek's survival.

According to the Book of Mormon, the Nephites and “Mulekites” formed a coalition, making Mosiah<sub>2</sub> king over both groups. The Nephites discovered in Mulek's descendants an additional witness concerning the destruction of Jerusalem. The Mulekites were elated to have access to Nephite records, since their own language and traditions had been distorted in the absence of historical documents. The Mulekites lived thenceforth among the Nephites, enjoying separate-but-equal status and ultimately outnumbering the descendants of Nephi (Mosiah 25:1–4, 13).

Ancient Near Eastern sources affirm that during the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem, Mulek's father, Zedekiah, who was deserted by all who escaped, was captured with members of his family and a few courtiers. Nebuchadnezzar slew Zedekiah's sons and courtiers, put his eyes out, and deported him to Babylon (Josephus, Antiquities, 10.8.2). But his daughters, and presumably his wives, stayed at Mizpah until Gedeliah, a former minister with Babylonizing tendencies in Zedekiah's cabinet, was murdered by Ishmael, who then tried to deport the Mizpah colony. When pursued, Ishmael abandoned his captives and fled with eight men to Ammon. The people of Mizpah, including Zedekiah's women, headed for Egypt, fearful of Chaldean reprisals (2 Kgs. 25; Jer. 41–43).

Mulek might have been away when the city fell; perhaps he eluded his captors at Jericho; the women could have hidden him (as Jehoshiba hid her nephew Joash of the royal line earlier [see 2 Kgs. 11:2–4]); he may even have been unborn, although he probably avoided captivity some other way. But nothing in the Bible or other known sources precludes the possibility of his escape from Jerusalem.

Concerning Mulek's existence, the Bible offers important evidence. Mulek is a nickname derived from melek (Hebrew, king), a diminutive term of endearment meaning "little king." Its longer form occurs in the Bible as Malkiyahu (in English, Malchiah), meaning "Jehovah is king." Malchiah is identified as "the son of Hammelech" in Jeremiah 38:6. But Hammelech is a translator's error, since ben-hammelech means "son of the king" and is not a proper name—a fact confirmed by the Septuagint (LXX Jer. 45:6). A fictive paternity thus obscures the lineage of Malchiah as the actual son of Zedekiah. It is also known that names ending in -yahu (in English, -iah) were common during the late First Temple period, that Zedekiah indeed had a son named Malkiyahu (Aharoni, p. 22), and that the familial forms of yahu-names were shorter than their "full" forms. The study of a seal owned by Jeremiah's scribe shows that his full name was Berekyahu (in English, Berechiah), although the biblical text uses only the shorter Baruch (Avigad). This is consistent with viewing the hypocoristic Mulek as the diminutive of Malkiyahu, since a is often assimilated to o or u in the vocalic structure of most Semitic languages. It is therefore possible that the Mulek of the Book of Mormon is "Malchiah, son of the king" mentioned in Jeremiah 38:6.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Aharoni, Yohanan. "Three Hebrew Ostraca from Arad." Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 197 (Feb. 1970):16–42.
- Avigad, Nahman. "Jerahmeel & Baruch." Biblical Archeologist 42:2 (Spring 1979):114–18.
- "New Information About Mulek, Son of the King." F.A.R.M.S. Update. Provo, Utah, 1984.
- Rainey, Anson. "The Prince and the Pauper." Ugarit-Forschungen 7 (1975):427–32.

H. CURTIS WRIGHT

MURDER

Murder is condemned in latter-day scripture just as it is in the TEN COMMANDMENTS and numerous other passages in both the Old and the New Testament. The Doctrine and Covenants declares that "thou shalt not kill" (D&C 42:18). The murderer "shall not have forgiveness in this world, nor in the world to come" (D&C 42:18).

In LDS doctrine, murder is second in seriousness only to the UNPARDONABLE SIN of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. And even that sin involves a kind of murderous treachery in that one who previously had obtained an absolute witness of Jesus' divinity (TPJS, p. 358) in effect "crucifies [Christ]" afresh or "assent[s] unto [his] death" (D&C 76:35; 132:27). Thus, murder can be thought of as the archetypal sin, as in the sin of Cain (Gen. 4:6–11, and esp. Moses 5:18–26, 31).

Murder violates the sanctity of life and cuts off the ability of its victims to "work out their destiny" (Benson, p. 355). Moreover, because "man cannot restore life," and restoration or restitution is a necessary step for REPENTANCE, obtaining forgiveness for murder is impossible (Kimball, 1969, p. 129; D&C 42:18–19). Murder wrenches all lives connected to the victim, and ultimately the perpetrator of this crime suffers even more than the victims. "For Cain suffered far more than did Abel, and murder is far more serious to him who commits it than to him who suffers from it" (Kimball, 1982, p. 188).

Secular punishment for killing is to be proved and "dealt with according to the laws of the land" (D&C 42:79). Those who have been convicted of, or have confessed to, homicide cannot be baptized without clearance from the FIRST PRESIDENCY, and excommunication of members guilty of murder is mandatory. Joseph Fielding SMITH, as an apostle, indicated that vicarious temple work should not be done for deceased murderers (DS 2:192).

The Church defines "murder" as the deliberate and unjustified taking of human life. If death is caused by carelessness or by defense of self or others, or if overriding mitigating circumstances prevail (such as deficient mental capacity or state of war), the taking of a human life may be regarded as something other than murder. In making the assessment of a member's guilt or innocence of murder, Church leaders are encouraged to be responsive to inspiration and to submit the facts of the

including Zedekiah's women, headed for Egypt, fearful of Chaldean reprisals (2 Kgs. 25; Jer. 41–43).

Mulek might have been away when the city fell; perhaps he eluded his captors at Jericho; the women could have hidden him (as Jehoshiba hid her nephew Joash of the royal line earlier [see 2 Kgs. 11:2–4]); he may even have been unborn, although he probably avoided captivity some other way. But nothing in the Bible or other known sources precludes the possibility of his escape from Jerusalem.

Concerning Mulek's existence, the Bible offers important evidence. Mulek is a nickname derived from melek (Hebrew, king), a diminutive term of endearment meaning "little king." Its longer form occurs in the Bible as Malkiyahu (in English, Malchiah), meaning "Jehovah is king." Malchiah is identified as "the son of Hammelech" in Jeremiah 38:6. But Hammelech is a translator's error, since ben-hammelech means "son of the king" and is not a proper name—a fact confirmed by the Septuagint (LXX Jer. 45:6). A fictive paternity thus obscures the lineage of Malchiah as the actual son of Zedekiah. It is also known that names ending in -yahu (in English, -iah) were common during the late First Temple period, that Zedekiah indeed had a son named Malkiyahu (Aharoni, p. 22), and that the familial forms of yahu-names were shorter than their "full" forms. The study of a seal owned by Jeremiah's scribe shows that his full name was Berekyahu (in English, Berechiah), although the biblical text uses only the shorter Baruch (Avigad). This is consistent with viewing the hypocoristic Mulek as the diminutive of Malkiyahu, since a is often assimilated to o or u in the vocalic structure of most Semitic languages. It is therefore possible that the Mulek of the Book of Mormon is "Malchiah, son of the king" mentioned in Jeremiah 38:6.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Aharoni, Yohanan. "Three Hebrew Ostraca from Arad." Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 197 (Feb. 1970):16–42.
- Avigad, Nahman. "Jerahmeel & Baruch." Biblical Archeologist 42:2 (Spring 1979):114–18.
- "New Information About Mulek, Son of the King." F.A.R.M.S. Update. Provo, Utah, 1984.
- Rainey, Anson. "The Prince and the Pauper." Ugarit-Forschungen 7 (1975):427–32.

H. CURTIS WRIGHT

MURDER

Murder is condemned in latter-day scripture just as it is in the TEN COMMANDMENTS and numerous other passages in both the Old and the New Testament. The Doctrine and Covenants declares that "thou shalt not kill" (D&C 42:18). The murderer "shall not have forgiveness in this world, nor in the world to come" (D&C 42:18).

In LDS doctrine, murder is second in seriousness only to the UNPARDONABLE SIN of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. And even that sin involves a kind of murderous treachery in that one who previously had obtained an absolute witness of Jesus' divinity (TPJS, p. 358) in effect "crucifies [Christ]" afresh or "assent[s] unto [his] death" (D&C 76:35; 132:27). Thus, murder can be thought of as the archetypal sin, as in the sin of Cain (Gen. 4:6–11, and esp. Moses 5:18–26, 31).

Murder violates the sanctity of life and cuts off the ability of its victims to "work out their destiny" (Benson, p. 355). Moreover, because "man cannot restore life," and restoration or restitution is a necessary step for REPENTANCE, obtaining forgiveness for murder is impossible (Kimball, 1969, p. 129; D&C 42:18–19). Murder wrenches all lives connected to the victim, and ultimately the perpetrator of this crime suffers even more than the victims. "For Cain suffered far more than did Abel, and murder is far more serious to him who commits it than to him who suffers from it" (Kimball, 1982, p. 188).

Secular punishment for killing is to be proved and "dealt with according to the laws of the land" (D&C 42:79). Those who have been convicted of, or have confessed to, homicide cannot be baptized without clearance from the FIRST PRESIDENCY, and excommunication of members guilty of murder is mandatory. Joseph Fielding SMITH, as an apostle, indicated that vicarious temple work should not be done for deceased murderers (DS 2:192).

The Church defines "murder" as the deliberate and unjustified taking of human life. If death is caused by carelessness or by defense of self or others, or if overriding mitigating circumstances prevail (such as deficient mental capacity or state of war), the taking of a human life may be regarded as something other than murder. In making the assessment of a member's guilt or innocence of murder, Church leaders are encouraged to be responsive to inspiration and to submit the facts of the ease to the office of the First Presidency for review. In the final analysis, only God, who can discern the thoughts of the heart, can judge whether a particular killing is an unforgivable murder or not.

The Church's concern about murder is both more fundamental and broader than that found in legal definitions. Legal categories of homicide, such as manslaughter or negligent homicide (which typically involve carelessness or mitigating factors), are not necessarily murder, whereas killings involving extremely reckless conduct or "felony murder" may be.

The Church also leaves open the possibility that under some unusual circumstances, standard justifications for killing that would normally relieve the individual from responsibility for murder, such as self-defense or defense of others, may not apply automatically. Wartime military service is considered a mitigating factor, not a justification for indiscriminate killing, thus suggesting that even in warfare one's conduct is measured and weighed by God and is not a matter of license (MFP 6:157–61). Only the Lord has the power to give life or to authorize it to be taken. Both the Bible and the Book of Mormon depict situations in which God has commanded the taking of life to accomplish his purposes. Goliath (1 Sam. 17:46–51), the king of Bashan (Deut. 3:3), and Laban (1 Ne. 4:10–18) were slain by servants of God after having been delivered into their hands by the Lord.

A person convicted of murder by a lawful government may be subject to the death penalty. The Church generally has not objected to CAPITAL PUNISHMENT legally and justly administered. Indeed, scriptural records both ancient and modern endorse such punishment (Gen. 9:5–6; Ex. 21:12, 23; 2 Ne. 9:35; Alma 1:13–14; D&C 42:19).

With respect to related offenses, the Church distinguishes ABORTION from murder but holds it an extremely grave action, not to be done except in extremely limited circumstances that might include incest or rape, perils to the life or health of the mother, or severe birth defects. As far as has currently been revealed, a person may repent and be forgiven for the sin of abortion.

SUICIDE is regarded as self-murder and a grievous sin if committed by someone in full possession of his or her mental faculties. Because it is possible that a person who takes his or her own life may not be responsible for that action, only God can judge such a matter.

A person who participates in euthanasia—the deliberate, intentional putting to death of a person suffering from incurable conditions or diseases—violates the commandments of God. There is a difference between allowing a terminally ill person to die of natural causes and the initiating of action that causes someone's death. The application or denial of life-support systems must be decided reverently, usually by competent and responsible family members through prayer and the consultation of competent medical authorities. It is not wrong to ask the Lord, if it be his will, to shorten the physical suffering of a person whose afflictions are terminal and irreversible.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Ezra Taft. Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson. Salt Lake City, 1988.
- Gardiner, Martin R. "Mormonism and Capital Punishment: A Doctrinal Perspective, Past and Present." Dialogue 12 (Spring 1979):9–25.
- Kimball, Spencer W. The Miracle of Forgiveness. Salt Lake City, 1969.
- . Teachings of Spencer W. Kimball, ed. Edward L. Kimball. Salt Lake City, 1982.

W. COLE DURHAM, JR.

---

MUSEUMS, LDS

On April 4, 1984, the Museum of Church History and Art in SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, was dedicated, culminating over 140 years of effort to erect a building specifically to house LDS Church museum exhibits. Collections of art, artifacts, sculpture, photographs, documents, furniture, tools, clothing, handwork, architectural elements, and portraits represent past and present LDS cultures from around the world unified by a common theology.

One of the first museum references in Church history is from Addison Pratt, who on May 24, 1843, donated "the tooth of a whale, coral, and other curiosities" he had obtained in Polynesia as a young sailor, "as the beginning for a museum in Nauvoo" (HC 5:406). On April 7, 1848, paintings by Philo Dibble depicting the MARTYRDOM of Joseph and Hyrum SMITH and Joseph's last address to the NAUVOO LEGION were exhibited to the Brethren in the log tabernacle, Pottawattamie County, Iowa. Dibble was asked to paint scenes from this time in the history of the Church and ease to the office of the First Presidency for review. In the final analysis, only God, who can discern the thoughts of the heart, can judge whether a particular killing is an unforgivable murder or not.

The Church's concern about murder is both more fundamental and broader than that found in legal definitions. Legal categories of homicide, such as manslaughter or negligent homicide (which typically involve carelessness or mitigating factors), are not necessarily murder, whereas killings involving extremely reckless conduct or "felony murder" may be.

The Church also leaves open the possibility that under some unusual circumstances, standard justifications for killing that would normally relieve the individual from responsibility for murder, such as self-defense or defense of others, may not apply automatically. Wartime military service is considered a mitigating factor, not a justification for indiscriminate killing, thus suggesting that even in warfare one's conduct is measured and weighed by God and is not a matter of license (MFP 6:157–61). Only the Lord has the power to give life or to authorize it to be taken. Both the Bible and the Book of Mormon depict situations in which God has commanded the taking of life to accomplish his purposes. Goliath (1 Sam. 17:46–51), the king of Bashan (Deut. 3:3), and Laban (1 Ne. 4:10–18) were slain by servants of God after having been delivered into their hands by the Lord.

A person convicted of murder by a lawful government may be subject to the death penalty. The Church generally has not objected to CAPITAL PUNISHMENT legally and justly administered. Indeed, scriptural records both ancient and modern endorse such punishment (Gen. 9:5–6; Ex. 21:12, 23; 2 Ne. 9:35; Alma 1:13–14; D&C 42:19).

With respect to related offenses, the Church distinguishes ABORTION from murder but holds it an extremely grave action, not to be done except in extremely limited circumstances that might include incest or rape, perils to the life or health of the mother, or severe birth defects. As far as has currently been revealed, a person may repent and be forgiven for the sin of abortion.

SUICIDE is regarded as self-murder and a grievous sin if committed by someone in full possession of his or her mental faculties. Because it is possible that a person who takes his or her own life may not be responsible for that action, only God can judge such a matter.

A person who participates in euthanasia—the deliberate, intentional putting to death of a person suffering from incurable conditions or diseases—violates the commandments of God. There is a difference between allowing a terminally ill person to die of natural causes and the initiating of action that causes someone's death. The application or denial of life-support systems must be decided reverently, usually by competent and responsible family members through prayer and the consultation of competent medical authorities. It is not wrong to ask the Lord, if it be his will, to shorten the physical suffering of a person whose afflictions are terminal and irreversible.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Ezra Taft. Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson. Salt Lake City, 1988.
- Gardiner, Martin R. "Mormonism and Capital Punishment: A Doctrinal Perspective, Past and Present." Dialogue 12 (Spring 1979):9–25.
- Kimball, Spencer W. The Miracle of Forgiveness. Salt Lake City, 1969.
- . Teachings of Spencer W. Kimball, ed. Edward L. Kimball. Salt Lake City, 1982.

W. COLE DURHAM, JR.

---

MUSEUMS, LDS

On April 4, 1984, the Museum of Church History and Art in SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, was dedicated, culminating over 140 years of effort to erect a building specifically to house LDS Church museum exhibits. Collections of art, artifacts, sculpture, photographs, documents, furniture, tools, clothing, handwork, architectural elements, and portraits represent past and present LDS cultures from around the world unified by a common theology.

One of the first museum references in Church history is from Addison Pratt, who on May 24, 1843, donated "the tooth of a whale, coral, and other curiosities" he had obtained in Polynesia as a young sailor, "as the beginning for a museum in Nauvoo" (HC 5:406). On April 7, 1848, paintings by Philo Dibble depicting the MARTYRDOM of Joseph and Hyrum SMITH and Joseph's last address to the NAUVOO LEGION were exhibited to the Brethren in the log tabernacle, Pottawattamie County, Iowa. Dibble was asked to paint scenes from this time in the history of the Church and display them in “a gallery in Zion” (Wilford Woodruff Journal, 3:340).

The Museum of Church History and Art, west of Temple Square, Salt Lake City (c. 1985). Opened in April 1984, the museum exhibits art, historical artifacts, and other items of Church history from around the world. Photographer: Eldon Linsehoten.

A letter from Dibble pleaded for immigrating Saints to bring “glass, nails, oils, paints, etc., to the valley . . . that a museum may be established . . . of the works of nature and art” (MS 11 [1849]:11–12). A general epistle to the Church signed by Brigham Young and Willard Richards stated, “We also want all kinds of . . . rare specimens of natural curiosities and works of art that can be gathered and brought to the valley . . . from which, the rising generation can receive instruction; and if the Saints will be diligent . . . we will soon have the best, the most useful and attractive museum on earth” (MS 10 [1848]:85).

The first museum in the SALT LAKE VALLEY, established in 1869, was owned by John W. Young, son of Brigham Young. It displayed a variety of curiosities, including geological and live natural specimens indigenous to the region. This Salt Lake City Museum and Menagerie was located in a two-room adobe house behind the west wall of the Lion House. The curator was Guglielmo Giosue Rossetti Sangiovanni, a native of London called “Sangio.” In 1871 the Deseret Telegraph needed the property, and, shorn of its “zoo” character, the museum was moved to a top floor of a building opposite the south gate of the temple block. On September 18, 1878, ownership was transferred to the Church.

Joseph Barfoot, a devoted naturalist, became the second curator, and under his supervision the museum matured scientifically until his death in 1882. Under temporary caretakers and suffering from a lack of funds, the museum then went into decline. To save it, citizens formed the Salt Lake Literary and Scientific Association in 1885 and acquired the property from the Church, renaming it the “Deseret Museum.” The association sold the building in which the artifacts were housed in 1890 and moved the collection to the Templeton Building with a new curator, James E. Talmage, appointed in 1891. Twelve years later the association built a three-story building, and again in 1903 the Deseret Museum was moved. J. Reuben Clark, Jr., assisted Dr. Talmage with the exhibits from 1891 to 1903.

In 1903, again being discommoded, the collection was boxed and stored and supervision again transferred to the LDS Church. In 1910 the collection was installed in the new Vermont Building opposite the temple block. William Forsberg assisted Dr. Talmage in creating a number of well-known displays, including the famous selenite crystals taken from a colossal geode found in southern Utah. Specimens taken from these crystals are now found in many prominent museums in the United States and Europe. Due to these farsighted gifts of Dr. Talmage, the Deseret Museum gained membership in the prestigious Museum Association, headquartered in London.

The collection grew as a result of museum exchanges and gifts from MISSIONARIES returning from many lands. Over fourteen thousand items were exhibited; one section brought together by the Daughters of the Utah Pioneers (DUP) told the story of the struggle, survival, and unique life of the LDS COLONIZATION past and present. The DUP established a unit in every community to collect, preserve, and display historical memorabilia to acquaint posterity with the past. A library of two thousand volumes, some rare, was housed in the museum. The Deseret Evening News, July 22, 1911, stated: “This museum is one of the most valuable assets the state has among educational institutions.” When Dr. Talmage was called to the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES, December 8, 1911, his son, Sterling B. Talmage, was appointed museum curator. To provide a more convenient location for visitors, the Church enlarged the Bureau of Information on TEMPLE SQUARE to hold several exhibits. At this time the collections were divided into categories. Some were transferred to the LDS University Museum and later to BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY. The DUP collection was returned to that organization and is now housed in a museum near the state capitol. Many specimens were transferred to the Museum of Natural History at the University of Utah. Items of interest to LDS Church members and visitors were placed on exhibit in the Bureau of Information on Temple Square. In 1976 the museum collection on Temple Square was again boxed and stored, making way for a new VISITORS CENTER and in preparation for the new Church Museum of History and Art.

Many of the original exhibits from the early museums form the nucleus of collections in several prestigious museums. The Museum of Church History and Art, opposite the west gates of Temple Square, maintains exhibits of LDS history and art, from the bas-relief over the entrance of the granite building to the restored 1847 log home of the Duel brothers. The galleries cover 160 years of Church history, spiritual events, art, and artifacts of a people who came west under difficult circumstances and successfully achieved their goal of preserving and promoting their theology in the beautiful, educational, and cultural environment of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Johnson, B. F. "Philo Dibble Narrative." In Faith Promoting Classics. Salt Lake City, 1880; reprinted, 1968.
- Rollins, Kerril Sue. "LDS Artifacts and Art Portray Church History: The New Church Museum." Ensign 14 (Apr. 1984):44–53.
- Talmage, James E. "The Deseret Museum." IE 14 (Sept. 1911):953–82.
- Wells, Junius F. "Joseph L. Barfoot." Contributor 3 (May 1882):250–52.

FLORENCE SMITH JACOBSEN

---

MUSIC

Throughout the Church's history, music has permeated the assemblies of the Saints and has energized their pursuit of spiritual and cultural betterment. The diversity of styles in the Church is echoed in the diversity of roles that music plays in LDS life.

As in many churches, congregational hymns open and close most ecclesiastical gatherings. In many LDS meetings instrumental music (most often organ) provides preludes, interludes, and postludes. Choral music is produced by many WARD and STAKE choirs, and the Church's well-known MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR is heard internationally on the weekly "Music and the Spoken Word" broadcast. Music also brightens most ward and stake social activities, such as cultural nights, parties, pageants, roadshows, dances and dance festivals, as well as family reunions and FAMILY HOME EVENINGS. Music of various styles regularly enhances Church productions designed to educate and proselytize through mass media, including audio and video tapes, films, filmstrips, commercials and programs for radio and television. Amid this diversity of musical endeavors, composers and performers usually follow the cooperative principles of early Mormonism, giving of their talents in anticipation of spiritual rewards—and also for their own enjoyment.

Although American Christian churches historically have held conflicting views on music, a revelation to the Prophet Joseph SMITH in July 1830 (D&C 25) likened "the song of the righteous" to prayer, confirming the propriety of vocal music for worship. With this foundation, the Prophet formed a Church "singing department" in 1835 to teach note reading and vocal technique. In Nauvoo, and later in Utah, musical standards rose as several well-trained British musicians were converted to the Church and immigrated to the United States. These converts helped establish the propriety of instrumental music for worship, a matter not addressed in the 1830 revelation. Although congregational and choral singing clearly prevailed in the Church, instrumental music soon came to accompany it. Wind, brass, and string bands also proliferated in LDS culture, accompanying the military, recreational, and civic exercises of the Saints.

In pioneer Utah several relatively short-lived associations, including the Deseret Musical Association and the Deseret Philharmonic Society, collected musical scores, created a territorial roster of musicians, and disseminated new pedagogical techniques. At the same time, the Saints founded a number of musical businesses that imported instruments and sheet music into the Great Basin in Utah. Meanwhile, Brigham YOUNG sent some of the Church's most skilled musicians, notably C. J.

reau of Information on TEMPLE SQUARE to hold several exhibits. At this time the collections were divided into categories. Some were transferred to the LDS University Museum and later to BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY. The DUP collection was returned to that organization and is now housed in a museum near the state capitol. Many specimens were transferred to the Museum of Natural History at the University of Utah. Items of interest to LDS Church members and visitors were placed on exhibit in the Bureau of Information on Temple Square. In 1976 the museum collection on Temple Square was again boxed and stored, making way for a new VISITORS CENTER and in preparation for the new Church Museum of History and Art.

Many of the original exhibits from the early museums form the nucleus of collections in several prestigious museums. The Museum of Church History and Art, opposite the west gates of Temple Square, maintains exhibits of LDS history and art, from the bas-relief over the entrance of the granite building to the restored 1847 log home of the Duel brothers. The galleries cover 160 years of Church history, spiritual events, art, and artifacts of a people who came west under difficult circumstances and successfully achieved their goal of preserving and promoting their theology in the beautiful, educational, and cultural environment of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Johnson, B. F. "Philo Dibble Narrative." In Faith Promoting Classics. Salt Lake City, 1880; reprinted, 1968.
- Rollins, Kerril Sue. "LDS Artifacts and Art Portray Church History: The New Church Museum." Ensign 14 (Apr. 1984):44–53.
- Talmage, James E. "The Deseret Museum." IE 14 (Sept. 1911):953–82.
- Wells, Junius F. "Joseph L. Barfoot." Contributor 3 (May 1882):250–52.

FLORENCE SMITH JACOBSEN

---

MUSIC

Throughout the Church's history, music has permeated the assemblies of the Saints and has energized their pursuit of spiritual and cultural betterment. The diversity of styles in the Church is echoed in the diversity of roles that music plays in LDS life.

As in many churches, congregational hymns open and close most ecclesiastical gatherings. In many LDS meetings instrumental music (most often organ) provides preludes, interludes, and postludes. Choral music is produced by many WARD and STAKE choirs, and the Church's well-known MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR is heard internationally on the weekly "Music and the Spoken Word" broadcast. Music also brightens most ward and stake social activities, such as cultural nights, parties, pageants, roadshows, dances and dance festivals, as well as family reunions and FAMILY HOME EVENINGS. Music of various styles regularly enhances Church productions designed to educate and proselytize through mass media, including audio and video tapes, films, filmstrips, commercials and programs for radio and television. Amid this diversity of musical endeavors, composers and performers usually follow the cooperative principles of early Mormonism, giving of their talents in anticipation of spiritual rewards—and also for their own enjoyment.

Although American Christian churches historically have held conflicting views on music, a revelation to the Prophet Joseph SMITH in July 1830 (D&C 25) likened "the song of the righteous" to prayer, confirming the propriety of vocal music for worship. With this foundation, the Prophet formed a Church "singing department" in 1835 to teach note reading and vocal technique. In Nauvoo, and later in Utah, musical standards rose as several well-trained British musicians were converted to the Church and immigrated to the United States. These converts helped establish the propriety of instrumental music for worship, a matter not addressed in the 1830 revelation. Although congregational and choral singing clearly prevailed in the Church, instrumental music soon came to accompany it. Wind, brass, and string bands also proliferated in LDS culture, accompanying the military, recreational, and civic exercises of the Saints.

In pioneer Utah several relatively short-lived associations, including the Deseret Musical Association and the Deseret Philharmonic Society, collected musical scores, created a territorial roster of musicians, and disseminated new pedagogical techniques. At the same time, the Saints founded a number of musical businesses that imported instruments and sheet music into the Great Basin in Utah. Meanwhile, Brigham YOUNG sent some of the Church's most skilled musicians, notably C. J.

The Mormon choir, Nottingham, England (1912).

Thomas, on colonizing missions in the 1860s to ensure that the art would flourish even in outlying LDS settlements. From the 1870s through 1920, the Sunday School and other Church auxiliaries gradually assumed leadership in musical training, providing singing lessons and band memberships for young Latter-day Saints as well as publishing a large amount of newly composed music.

Little attempt was made to correlate or standardize LDS musical affairs until 1920, when President Heber J. GRANT appointed a General Music Committee for the Church. Primarily consisting of musicians connected with the Salt Lake Tabernacle, the committee assumed the tasks of evaluating styles of music appropriate to worship, recommending what types of instruments (predominantly the organ) should be played in Church meetings, overseeing the production of hymnals, and fostering musical education. In this last regard, the committee endeavored to train Church musicians in several ways, including hiring professionals to teach in wards and stakes, publishing manuals of choral conducting and organ technique, and issuing music newsletters. Throughout its history, much of the committee's effort went into directing the work of stake and ward music committees. In the 1970s the committee was succeeded by the Music Department (later Music Division) of the Church.

President Brigham Young set the tone for official LDS statements on music, defining it as a "magic power" that could "fill the air with harmony, and cheer and comfort the hearts of men, and so wonderfully affect the brute creation" (JD 1:48). Since his time, General Authorities of the Church have continued to praise music as a soothing influence, a purifier of thought, and a uniter of hearts. The type of music most consistently endorsed has been sacred vocal music prepared especially for LDS worship. LDS composers have written hundreds of hymns and anthems and have created many large-scale, sometimes modernistic sacred works, such as Evan Stephens's "dramatic cantatas" of the 1920s and the numerous oratorios composed since, which usually treat specifically LDS themes, for example, the Restoration oratorios of B. Cecil Gates and Merrill Bradshaw, Gates's Salvation for the Dead, and Leroy Robertson's Oratorio from the Book of Mormon. Moreover, beginning in Brigham Young's day, a strong tradition of theater music has developed among the Saints, one that has fostered the composition of musical scores both for commemorative pageants (e.g., those at Palmyra, New York; Nauvoo, Illinois; and Manti, Utah) and lighter stage works such as the pioneer centennial production Promised Valley, and also a host of youth-oriented musicals in the 1970s and 1980s.

A few stylistic issues have surfaced in the twentieth century. Some Church authorities have advised against certain popular styles of music, citing their loudness, their rhythmic intensity, and the indecency of some of their lyrics; members are counseled to be wise in selecting their recreational music. Questions also have been raised over the propriety of using styles of music found outside the hymnal in worship services. Nevertheless, in non-liturgical settings, ethnic religious music thrives and some LDS songwriters have adapted soft rock music for informal religious use. Much of this music has found its way into Church-sponsored songbooks and cassettes and into privately produced recordings for young Latter-day Saints.

The enduring value of much music indigenous to the Church is difficult to predict. On the one hand, the vernacular music often echoes the more ephemeral styles of denominational Christian music. On the other hand, some impressive settings have emerged from the hymnody of the Music often plays an important role in LDS family life and in family home evenings.

Children singing in East Berlin (1990). Even though they were substantially cut off from the rest of the Church for many years, members in East Germany maintained one of the highest activity rates in the Church. Courtesy Peggy Jellinghausen.

Church, and some of the larger works manifest a continuing increase in sophistication. Furthermore, the extensive use of worship music borrowed from other Christian traditions unites the Saints to a larger fellowship of believers. Above all, the sheer abundance of music in the Church reveals how untiring are the aesthetic impulses of its members. Whether or not a distinctively LDS style emerges, music of many styles undoubtedly will continue to inspire the Saints.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hicks, Michael. Mormonism and Music: A History. Urbana, Ill., 1989.
- Purdy, William Earl. "Music in Mormon Culture, 1830–1876." Ph.D. diss., Northwestern University, 1960.
- Slaughter, Jay L. "The Role of Music in the Mormon Church, School, and Life." Ph.D. diss., Indiana University, 1964.
- Some General Recommendations Concerning Music in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints*. Salt Lake City, 1950; 2nd ed., 1962.

MICHAEL D. HICKS

MUSICIANS

From the early decades of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, LDS composers, conductors, vocalists, and instrumentalists have nois; and Manti, Utah) and lighter stage works such as the pioneer centennial production Promised Valley, and also a host of youth-oriented musicals in the 1970s and 1980s.

A few stylistic issues have surfaced in the twentieth century. Some Church authorities have advised against certain popular styles of music, citing their loudness, their rhythmic intensity, and the indecency of some of their lyrics; members are counseled to be wise in selecting their recreational music. Questions also have been raised over the propriety of using styles of music found outside the hymnal in worship services. Nevertheless, in non-liturgical settings, ethnic religious music thrives and some LDS songwriters have adapted soft rock music for informal religious use. Much of this music has found its way into Church-sponsored songbooks and cassettes and into privately produced recordings for young Latter-day Saints.

The enduring value of much music indigenous to the Church is difficult to predict. On the one hand, the vernacular music often echoes the more ephemeral styles of denominational Christian music. On the other hand, some impressive settings have emerged from the hymnody of the Music often plays an important role in LDS family life and in family home evenings.

Children singing in East Berlin (1990). Even though they were substantially cut off from the rest of the Church for many years, members in East Germany maintained one of the highest activity rates in the Church. Courtesy Peggy Jellinghausen.

Church, and some of the larger works manifest a continuing increase in sophistication. Furthermore, the extensive use of worship music borrowed from other Christian traditions unites the Saints to a larger fellowship of believers. Above all, the sheer abundance of music in the Church reveals how untiring are the aesthetic impulses of its members. Whether or not a distinctively LDS style emerges, music of many styles undoubtedly will continue to inspire the Saints.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Hicks, Michael. Mormonism and Music: A History. Urbana, Ill., 1989.
- Purdy, William Earl. "Music in Mormon Culture, 1830–1876." Ph.D. diss., Northwestern University, 1960.
- Slaughter, Jay L. "The Role of Music in the Mormon Church, School, and Life." Ph.D. diss., Indiana University, 1964.
- Some General Recommendations Concerning Music in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints*. Salt Lake City, 1950; 2nd ed., 1962.

MICHAEL D. HICKS

MUSICIANS

From the early decades of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, LDS composers, conductors, vocalists, and instrumentalists have helped to shape the Church's distinctive musical heritage. Some of these musicians have made their mark on the larger musical scene, while numerous others have focused their talents for the direct benefit of the Church.

Volunteer musicians—music chairmen, organists, pianists, music directors, choir directors, and Primary music leaders—serve in the Church's weekly worship services. These musicians are called by priesthood leaders and serve without pay in the particular ward or stake in which they live. Contributing time and talents is an expected and rewarding part of Church membership, and both the highly trained musician and the beginner offer

Alexander Schreiner (1901–1987), Salt Lake Tabernacle Organist. Born in Germany, Schreiner came with his family to Utah in 1912. He studied with Tabernacle Organist John J. McClellan and was appointed to the Tabernacle staff in 1924. In 1925 he studied with Charles-Marie Widor and Louis Vierne in Paris, France. From 1930 to 1939 he served as University Organist at UCLA, returning to Salt Lake City during the summers. Until his retirement in 1977 he accompanied the Mormon Tabernacle Choir, toured internationally, and composed music. He was primarily responsible for the present design of the Tabernacle Organ. Courtesy Utah State Historical Society.

their talents as called upon. Wards require from fifteen to twenty-three musicians to fill outlined music positions, with twelve to twenty-four or more needed to sing in the ward choir.

Each ward and stake is responsible for providing the needed training for its own musicians with regard to their Church callings. In addition, since 1978 Brigham Young University has presented an annual Church Music Workshop, where many receive training in music skills.

Converts from the British Isles had a strong influence on MUSIC in the early Church. John Tullidge, an accomplished church musician from Weymouth, England, arrived in Salt Lake Valley in 1863. A singer, composer, arranger, teacher, and music critic, he edited the first Latter-day Saint hymnbook that included both words and music. Other musically trained English converts included C. J. Thomas, David Calder, Ebenezer Beesley, and George Careless. John Parry, born in North Wales, led a choir in Salt Lake City that was the precursor of the MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR. Evan Stephens, from South Wales, brought the latter choir to wide recognition during his twenty-seven years as conductor (1889–1916).

Many influential Church musicians have been associated with the Tabernacle Choir. Almost half of the musical settings of the hymns in the 1889 Psalmody were composed by directors George Careless, Ebenezer Beesley, and Evan Stephens, or by Joseph J. Daynes, the first Tabernacle organist (from 1867 to 1900). Alexander Schreiner, who served for fifty-three years (1924–1977) as Tabernacle organist, was highly involved with musical affairs of the Church and endeared himself to audiences throughout the world. Other Tabernacle organists to 1989 have included John J. McClellan, Edward P. Kimball, Tracy Y. Cannon, Frank Asper, Wade N. Stephens, Roy M. Darley, Robert Cundick, John Longhurst, Clay Christiansen, and Richard Elliott, with Bonnie Goodliffe and Linda Margetts as associate organists.

During the late nineteenth century many musical performing groups and societies were organized among the Saints (see MUSIC). Behind every such effort was at least one motivated musician and often a supportive Church leader. President Brigham YOUNG often sent such a musician to a particular settlement to promote the instruction and performance of music to enhance pioneer life.

Through the years, many Latter-day Saints have excelled in musical creativity and performance attested by the names in the next three paragraphs. For example, Emma Lucy Gates Bowen, a coloratura soprano, performed widely throughout the United States and Europe. Her brother, B. Cecil Gates, organized the McCune School of Music and Art in Salt Lake City in 1919. Together they formed the Emma Lucy Gates Opera Company in the 1920s.

Currently many accomplished Latter-day Saint musicians are affiliated with institutions of higher learning as composers, conductors, performers, historians, and theorists. Historically these have been concentrated in the music faculties at the University of Utah and, more recently, at Brigham Young University.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Davidson, Karen Lynn. Our Latter-day Hymns: The Stories and the Messages. Salt Lake City, 1988.
- Durham, Lowell M. "On Mormon Music and Musicians." Dialogue 3 (Summer 1968):19-40.

MICHAEL F. MOODY

MYSTERIES OF GOD

"Mysteries of God" is a scriptural phrase in which the word "mysteries" refers to knowledge about God that is often hidden from mortal understanding. It does not refer to something incomprehensible in principle. Like many people of other religions, Latter-day Saints deem a knowledge of some mysteries to be necessary (D&C 76:5-10), and acquire such knowledge in part through ORDINANCES and in part through REVELATION (cf. TPJS, p. 324).

As found both in the Bible and in latter-day scripture, the term "mystery" describes a doctrine revealed only to the faithful but not given to the "world" or to the uninitiated. (Matt. 13:11; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:1-7; 1 Ne. 10:11; D&C 42:61, 65).

The terms "mystery," "mysteries," "mystery of God," and "mysteries of Godliness" appear more than a dozen times in the New Testament, always with the sense of something known to God but unknown to humans who have not yet been divinely instructed. Although none of these terms appears in the Old Testament, the word "secrets" in Daniel 2:28 ("But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets") and the term "secret" in Amos 3:7 ("Surely the Lord God . . . revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets") are equivalent to "mysteries," especially because they are associated with divine revelation (cf. D&C 76:10).

The BOOK OF MORMON prophet NEPHI<sup>1</sup> (c. 570 B.C.) equated the plain and precious truths of the gospel with the mysteries of God, noting that those who were stiff-necked and hard of heart, including some members of his own family, found them difficult to believe. But the faithful accepted such truths willingly, under the heart-softening influence of the HOLY GHOST (1 Ne. 2:11-16; 10:17-22; 15:1-11). Nephi and his followers believed that Jesus Christ would come, that men and women should be baptized and receive the Holy Ghost, and that God speaks to those who inquire, answering their prayers. In fact, Nephi cites his knowledge of these mysteries in the opening statement of his record as part of his qualification to write it (1 Ne. 1:1).

In latter-day scripture the word "mysteries" typically has three interrelated meanings. First, the mysteries consist of significant truths about God and his works. Second, faithful, obedient members of the Church will be given this sacred knowledge through revelation. Finally, those who are not made partakers of this special understanding will not attain the same glory as those who are. Understanding the mysteries of God is a gospel privilege for the reverent who serve God faithfully (D&C 76:1-10; cf. 1 Ne. 10:17-19; Moscs 1:5).

The Prophet Joseph SMITH was given the "keys of the mysteries and the revelations" (D&C 28:7; 35:18) in connection with the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD (D&C 84:19; 107:18-19). Thus, obtaining the hidden truths is bound up with the power of the Melchizedek Priesthood, "which priesthood administereth the gospel and holdeth the key of the mysteries of the kingdom, even the key of the knowledge of God" (D&C 84:19).

Paradoxically, the term "mystery" encapsulates a dual meaning, both to reveal and to conceal. For the initiated, it designates something believable and understandable. For the nonbeliever its significance is obscure. In other words, the belief and faith of the potential knower determine in great part whether the knowledge is comprehensible or not (Alma 12:9-11).

The knowledge alluded to in the phrases "mysteries of God" or "mysteries of Godliness" may be received in ways other than exclusively verbal. Throughout history, divine knowledge also has been communicated in ceremonies, rites, mance attested by the names in the next three paragraphs. For example, Emma Lucy Gates Bowen, a coloratura soprano, performed widely throughout the United States and Europe. Her brother, B. Cecil Gates, organized the McCune School of Music and Art in Salt Lake City in 1919. Together they formed the Emma Lucy Gates Opera Company in the 1920s.

Currently many accomplished Latter-day Saint musicians are affiliated with institutions of higher learning as composers, conductors, performers, historians, and theorists. Historically these have been concentrated in the music faculties at the University of Utah and, more recently, at Brigham Young University.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Davidson, Karen Lynn. Our Latter-day Hymns: The Stories and the Messages. Salt Lake City, 1988.

Durham, Lowell M. "On Mormon Music and Musicians." Dialogue 3 (Summer 1968):19–40.

MICHAEL F. MOODY

MYSTERIES OF GOD

"Mysteries of God" is a scriptural phrase in which the word "mysteries" refers to knowledge about God that is often hidden from mortal understanding. It does not refer to something incomprehensible in principle. Like many people of other religions, Latter-day Saints deem a knowledge of some mysteries to be necessary (D&C 76:5–10), and acquire such knowledge in part through ORDINANCES and in part through REVELATION (cf. TPJS, p. 324).

As found both in the Bible and in latter-day scripture, the term "mystery" describes a doctrine revealed only to the faithful but not given to the "world" or to the uninitiated. (Matt. 13:11; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:1–7; 1 Ne. 10:11; D&C 42:61, 65).

The terms "mystery," "mysteries," "mystery of God," and "mysteries of Godliness" appear more than a dozen times in the New Testament, always with the sense of something known to God but unknown to humans who have not yet been divinely instructed. Although none of these terms appears in the Old Testament, the word "secrets" in Daniel 2:28 ("But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets") and the term "secret" in Amos 3:7 ("Surely the Lord God . . . revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets") are equivalent to "mysteries," especially because they are associated with divine revelation (cf. D&C 76:10).

The BOOK OF MORMON prophet NEPHI<sup>1</sup> (c. 570 B.C.) equated the plain and precious truths of the gospel with the mysteries of God, noting that those who were stiff-necked and hard of heart, including some members of his own family, found them difficult to believe. But the faithful accepted such truths willingly, under the heart-softening influence of the HOLY GHOST (1 Ne. 2:11–16; 10:17–22; 15:1–11). Nephi and his followers believed that Jesus Christ would come, that men and women should be baptized and receive the Holy Ghost, and that God speaks to those who inquire, answering their prayers. In fact, Nephi cites his knowledge of these mysteries in the opening statement of his record as part of his qualification to write it (1 Ne. 1:1).

In latter-day scripture the word "mysteries" typically has three interrelated meanings. First, the mysteries consist of significant truths about God and his works. Second, faithful, obedient members of the Church will be given this sacred knowledge through revelation. Finally, those who are not made partakers of this special understanding will not attain the same glory as those who are. Understanding the mysteries of God is a gospel privilege for the reverent who serve God faithfully (D&C 76:1–10; cf. 1 Ne. 10:17–19; Moscs 1:5).

The Prophet Joseph SMITH was given the "keys of the mysteries and the revelations" (D&C 28:7; 35:18) in connection with the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD (D&C 84:19; 107:18–19). Thus, obtaining the hidden truths is bound up with the power of the Melchizedek Priesthood, "which priesthood administereth the gospel and holdeth the key of the mysteries of the kingdom, even the key of the knowledge of God" (D&C 84:19).

Paradoxically, the term "mystery" encapsulates a dual meaning, both to reveal and to conceal. For the initiated, it designates something believable and understandable. For the nonbeliever its significance is obscure. In other words, the belief and faith of the potential knower determine in great part whether the knowledge is comprehensible or not (Alma 12:9–11).

The knowledge alluded to in the phrases "mysteries of God" or "mysteries of Godliness" may be received in ways other than exclusively verbal. Throughout history, divine knowledge also has been communicated in ceremonies, rites, purifications, and so on. Such is the case in the TEMPLES of the Latter-day Saints, where faithful members of the Church gain knowledge and understanding of heavenly truths as they receive ordinances by COVENANT.

The broad meaning of “Godliness” embraces the state of being like God, of approximating God’s nature or qualities. The possibility is suggested in the so-called Law of the Harvest. Just as apple seeds produce apple trees, so the offspring of deity, human beings, when they are fully mature—that is, holy, knowledgeable and virtuous—are like their divine parents.

Jesus’ statement in John 17:3, uttered as he petitioned his Father, takes on a more profound meaning in light of the scriptural references to the mysteries of God: “And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.” The “knowing” to which the Savior refers is that higher knowledge often designated “the mysteries of God” or “the mysteries of Godliness.”

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Brown, Raymond E. The Semitic Background of the Term “Mystery” in the New Testament. Facet Books Biblical Series 21. Philadelphia, 1968.

Welch, John W. “The Calling of a Prophet.” In The Book of Mormon: The Keystone Scripture, ed. P. Cheesman. Provo, Utah, 1988.

CLARK D. WEBB

---

N

---

---

NAME OF THE CHURCH

The name The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was given by the Lord in revelation to Joseph SMITH on April 26, 1838 (D&C 115:4). The Church had been known as The Church of Christ from 1830 to 1834 (D&C 20:1); The Church of the Latter Day Saints in 1834; and The Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints from 1836 to 1838. The Church is commonly, but unofficially, referred to today as the Mormon Church and its members as Mormons because of their belief in the Book of Mormon. But the use of the term “Mormon” to refer to the Church is unsatisfactory from the point of view of Church members because it does not convey the conviction that Jesus Christ is the head of the Church and that members strive to live Christian lives. In the Book of Mormon, Christ’s disciples asked him, “Tell us the name whereby we shall call this church” (3 Ne. 27:3). He answered, “How be it my church save it be called in my name? For if a church be called in Moses’ name then it be Moses’ church, or if it be called in the name of a man then it be the church of a man; but if it be called in my name then it is my church, if it so be that they are built upon my gospel” (3 Ne. 27:8). By implication, calling the Church by the name Mormon would make it Mormon’s Church. While most Church members are not offended by the title Mormon, they prefer the name that properly underscores their relationship to Christ.

Members of the Church are often referred to as SAINTS, meaning men and women who are committed to live in accordance with the gospel. The New Testament similarly refers to followers of Christ as saints. The term “Latter-day” comes from the belief that the world is passing through the last days prior to the second coming of Christ.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard Lloyd. “I Have a Question.” Ensign 9 (Jan. 1979):13–14.
- Nelson, Russel M. ““Thus Shall My Church Be Called.”” Ensign 20 (May 1990):16–18.

SUSAN EASTON BLACK

---

NAME EXTRACTION PROGRAM

Name extraction programs sponsored by the LDS Church are based upon the doctrine of SALVATION OF THE DEAD. Names, dates, and places are the key elements in precisely identifying individual ancestors. Name extraction consists of systematically transcribing this information from original vital records. Church members perform TEMPLE ORDINANCES for those whose names have been thus identified.

---

N

---

---

NAME OF THE CHURCH

The name The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was given by the Lord in revelation to Joseph SMITH on April 26, 1838 (D&C 115:4). The Church had been known as The Church of Christ from 1830 to 1834 (D&C 20:1); The Church of the Latter Day Saints in 1834; and The Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints from 1836 to 1838. The Church is commonly, but unofficially, referred to today as the Mormon Church and its members as Mormons because of their belief in the Book of Mormon. But the use of the term “Mormon” to refer to the Church is unsatisfactory from the point of view of Church members because it does not convey the conviction that Jesus Christ is the head of the Church and that members strive to live Christian lives. In the Book of Mormon, Christ’s disciples asked him, “Tell us the name whereby we shall call this church” (3 Ne. 27:3). He answered, “How be it my church save it be called in my name? For if a church be called in Moses’ name then it be Moses’ church, or if it be called in the name of a man then it be the church of a man; but if it be called in my name then it is my church, if it so be that they are built upon my gospel” (3 Ne. 27:8). By implication, calling the Church by the name Mormon would make it Mormon’s Church. While most Church members are not offended by the title Mormon, they prefer the name that properly underscores their relationship to Christ.

Members of the Church are often referred to as SAINTS, meaning men and women who are committed to live in accordance with the gospel. The New Testament similarly refers to followers of Christ as saints. The term “Latter-day” comes from the belief that the world is passing through the last days prior to the second coming of Christ.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard Lloyd. “I Have a Question.” Ensign 9 (Jan. 1979):13–14.
- Nelson, Russel M. ““Thus Shall My Church Be Called.”” Ensign 20 (May 1990):16–18.

SUSAN EASTON BLACK

---

NAME EXTRACTION PROGRAM

Name extraction programs sponsored by the LDS Church are based upon the doctrine of SALVATION OF THE DEAD. Names, dates, and places are the key elements in precisely identifying individual ancestors. Name extraction consists of systematically transcribing this information from original vital records. Church members perform TEMPLE ORDINANCES for those whose names have been thus identified.

The FAMILY HISTORY DEPARTMENT of the Church (formerly the Genealogy Department) initiated the first name extraction program, called Records Tabulation, in 1961. Department employees extracted data primarily from filmed copies of English parish registers. In 1978 the Church deployed name extraction to stake centers, the new program being called Stake Record Extraction. Since that date, name extraction is done by local Church members. Besides records of England, those of Mexico, Germany, Scotland, Finland, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark have been heavily extracted. From 1961 to 1989, over 100 million names were thus copied.

The department begins the extraction process by sending a microfilm to a stake. Extractors transcribe the desired information onto cards. Data entry workers at regional centers input information onto computer diskettes. To ensure accuracy, two transcriptions of each entry are made and compared to find and resolve discrepancies.

Names derived from the name extraction program are listed in the Church's INTERNATIONAL GENEALOGICAL INDEX. The sources from which the names have been extracted are listed by locality in the Parish and Vital Records Listing. Alphabetized printouts of the names extracted from each source are also prepared and made available for research through the Church's main FAMILY HISTORY LIBRARY in Salt Lake City and branch family history centers around the world.

The department increased its name extraction efforts in 1986 with the introduction of the Family Record Extraction Program. This differs from the older program in that a paper photocopy of the original record is given to extractors and they transcribe the information in their homes at their convenience. The extracted information is "data entered" at the stake center by means of a personal computer and submitted on diskettes to a central data base in Salt Lake City.

KAHLILE MEHR

---

NAME OF GOD

Latter-day Saints invoke the name of God in prayers, in ordinances such as baptism, in testimony bearing, and in sermons. In certain ceremonies, they take upon themselves God's sacred name in covenantal pledges to keep his commandments. They also employ the various names of God to distinguish between members of the Godhead. Consequently, the names of God are considered very sacred and are not to be taken in a vain way or spoken in profanity.

The word from the Hebrew Bible most commonly translated "God" or "gods" is 'elohim, the plural of 'eloah or 'el which means "lofty one" or "exalted one." The plural ending -im may indicate royal loftiness as well as plurality (see ELOHIM).

The formal name of God in the Old Testament is "Jehovah" or "YHWH" (Hebrew yhwh), which comes from a root suggesting "I was, am, and will be forever." Some consider yhwh to be a name too sacred to be spoken; consequently, in many Bible versions, yhwh is translated "LORD" (see JEHOVAH, JESUS CHRIST).

Joseph Smith's FIRST VISION and later revelations confirmed the separate identity of the Father and the Son. To distinguish them individually in some scriptures, however, is very difficult. For instance, Jesus Christ has spoken the words of the Father by divine investiture as if he were the person of the Father (cf. MFP 5:26–34; John 14:24). Jesus continually emphasized the "oneness" or unity of mind and purpose of the Godhead and set it forth as an example to disciples. The term "God," therefore, may apply equally to the Father and the Son. The prayer of Jesus to his Father after the Last Supper was that followers might be "one, even as we are" (John 17:1–26; cf. 3 Ne. 11:27, 32–36; D&C 132:12).

The principal name of the Eternal Father is not clearly stated in scripture although several names and titles appear (see GOD THE FATHER: NAMES AND TITLES OF GOD). Where identification is appropriate, Latter-day Saints have designated the Father by the exalted name-title Elohim (MFP 5:26).

The use of sacred names plays an important part in LDS WORSHIP. For example, Latter-day Saints have been instructed to address God in prayer with the title "Our Father" and to offer prayers in the name of Jesus Christ (Matt. 6:9; 3 Ne. 13:9; see PRAYER). In baptismal prayers and sacrament prayers, faithful members covenant to take upon themselves the name of Christ. The participants commit themselves to remember Christ, which means to be an example of him to the world, to love him, to have faith in him, and to walk in his way (cf. 2 Ne. 31:19–20; Mosiah 5:7–12).

Jesus Christ has specifically commanded that his Church should bear his name. He said, further,

The FAMILY HISTORY DEPARTMENT of the Church (formerly the Genealogy Department) initiated the first name extraction program, called Records Tabulation, in 1961. Department employees extracted data primarily from filmed copies of English parish registers. In 1978 the Church deployed name extraction to stake centers, the new program being called Stake Record Extraction. Since that date, name extraction is done by local Church members. Besides records of England, those of Mexico, Germany, Scotland, Finland, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark have been heavily extracted. From 1961 to 1989, over 100 million names were thus copied.

The department begins the extraction process by sending a microfilm to a stake. Extractors transcribe the desired information onto cards. Data entry workers at regional centers input information onto computer diskettes. To ensure accuracy, two transcriptions of each entry are made and compared to find and resolve discrepancies.

Names derived from the name extraction program are listed in the Church's INTERNATIONAL GENEALOGICAL INDEX. The sources from which the names have been extracted are listed by locality in the Parish and Vital Records Listing. Alphabetized printouts of the names extracted from each source are also prepared and made available for research through the Church's main FAMILY HISTORY LIBRARY in Salt Lake City and branch family history centers around the world.

The department increased its name extraction efforts in 1986 with the introduction of the Family Record Extraction Program. This differs from the older program in that a paper photocopy of the original record is given to extractors and they transcribe the information in their homes at their convenience. The extracted information is "data entered" at the stake center by means of a personal computer and submitted on diskettes to a central data base in Salt Lake City.

KAHLILE MEHR

---

NAME OF GOD

Latter-day Saints invoke the name of God in prayers, in ordinances such as baptism, in testimony bearing, and in sermons. In certain ceremonies, they take upon themselves God's sacred name in covenantal pledges to keep his commandments. They also employ the various names of God to distinguish between members of the Godhead. Consequently, the names of God are considered very sacred and are not to be taken in a vain way or spoken in profanity.

The word from the Hebrew Bible most commonly translated "God" or "gods" is 'elohim, the plural of 'eloah or 'el which means "lofty one" or "exalted one." The plural ending -im may indicate royal loftiness as well as plurality (see ELOHIM).

The formal name of God in the Old Testament is "Jehovah" or "YHWH" (Hebrew yhwh), which comes from a root suggesting "I was, am, and will be forever." Some consider yhwh to be a name too sacred to be spoken; consequently, in many Bible versions, yhwh is translated "LORD" (see JEHOVAH, JESUS CHRIST).

Joseph Smith's FIRST VISION and later revelations confirmed the separate identity of the Father and the Son. To distinguish them individually in some scriptures, however, is very difficult. For instance, Jesus Christ has spoken the words of the Father by divine investiture as if he were the person of the Father (cf. MFP 5:26–34; John 14:24). Jesus continually emphasized the "oneness" or unity of mind and purpose of the Godhead and set it forth as an example to disciples. The term "God," therefore, may apply equally to the Father and the Son. The prayer of Jesus to his Father after the Last Supper was that followers might be "one, even as we are" (John 17:1–26; cf. 3 Ne. 11:27, 32–36; D&C 132:12).

The principal name of the Eternal Father is not clearly stated in scripture although several names and titles appear (see GOD THE FATHER: NAMES AND TITLES OF GOD). Where identification is appropriate, Latter-day Saints have designated the Father by the exalted name-title Elohim (MFP 5:26).

The use of sacred names plays an important part in LDS WORSHIP. For example, Latter-day Saints have been instructed to address God in prayer with the title "Our Father" and to offer prayers in the name of Jesus Christ (Matt. 6:9; 3 Ne. 13:9; see PRAYER). In baptismal prayers and sacrament prayers, faithful members covenant to take upon themselves the name of Christ. The participants commit themselves to remember Christ, which means to be an example of him to the world, to love him, to have faith in him, and to walk in his way (cf. 2 Ne. 31:19–20; Mosiah 5:7–12).

Jesus Christ has specifically commanded that his Church should bear his name. He said, further, that his people will be called by that name at the last day (3 Ne. 27:1–12; Mosiah 5:7–14; D&C 115:4).

The Lord has also revealed that ordinances and blessings performed in his name by his authorized servants are binding in heaven as well as on earth (D&C 132:45–46; 128:9). Ordinances, such as baptism, marriage, and vicarious work in temples, are performed in the “name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.”

In modern times, as in the past, the Lord has cautioned men and women not to utter his name in vain speech (Ex. 20:7; D&C 63:60–64) nor to defile it through improper conduct (see BLASPHEMY; PROFANITY). He has directed his people to keep pledges and “keep yourselves from evil to take the name of the Lord in vain, for I am the Lord your God, even the God of your fathers” (D&C 136:21).

[See also Jesus Christ, Names and Titles of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Madsen, Truman G. “Putting on the Names’: A Jewish-Christian Legacy.” In By Study and Also by Faith, ed. J. Lundquist and S. Ricks, Vol. 1, pp. 458–81. Salt Lake City, 1990.

Talmage, James E. AF. Salt Lake City, 1915.

GLADE L. BURGON

---

NATIVE AMERICANS

LDS BELIEFS. The Book of Mormon, published in 1830, addresses a major message to Native Americans. Its title page states that one reason it was written was so that Native Americans today might know “what great things the Lord hath done for their fathers.”

The Book of Mormon tells that a small band of Israelites under LEHI migrated from Jerusalem to the Western Hemisphere about 600 B.C. Upon Lehi’s death his family divided into two opposing factions, one under Lehi’s oldest son, LAMAN (see LAMANITES), and the other under a younger son, NEPHI (see NEPHITES).

During the thousand-year history narrated in the Book of Mormon, Lehi’s descendants went through several phases of splitting, warring, accommodating, merging, and splitting again. At first, just as God had prohibited the Israelites from intermarrying with the Canaanites in the ancient promised land (Ex. 34:16; Deut. 7:3), the Nephites were forbidden to marry the Lamanites with their dark skin (2 Ne. 5:23; Alma 3:8–9). But as large Lamanite populations accepted the gospel of Jesus Christ and were numbered among the Nephites in the first century B.C., skin color ceased to be a distinguishing characteristic. After the visitations of the resurrected Christ, there were no distinctions among any kind of “ites” for some two hundred years. But then unbelievers arose and called themselves Lamanites to distinguish themselves from the Nephites or believers (4 Ne. 1:20).

The concluding chapters of the Book of Mormon describe a calamitous war. About A.D. 231, old enmities reemerged and two hostile populations formed (4 Ne. 1:35–39), eventually resulting in the annihilation of the Nephites. The Lamanites, from whom many present-day Native Americans descend, remained to inhabit the American continent. Peoples of other extractions also migrated there.

The Book of Mormon contains many promises and prophecies about the future directed to these survivors. For example, Lehi’s grandson Enos prayed earnestly to God on behalf of his kinsmen, the Lamanites. He was promised by the Lord that Nephite records would be kept so that they could be “brought forth at some future day unto the Lamanites, that, perhaps, they might be brought unto salvation” (Enos 1:13).

The role of Native Americans in the events of the last days is noted by several Book of Mormon prophets. Nephi<sub>1</sub> prophesied that in the last days the Lamanites would accept the gospel and become a “pure and delightsome people” (2 Ne. 30:6). Likewise, it was revealed to the Prophet Joseph SMITH that the Lamanites will at some future time “blossom as the rose” (D&C 49:24).

After Jesus’ resurrection in Jerusalem, he appeared to the more righteous Lamanites and Nephites left after massive destruction and prophesied that their seed eventually “shall dwindle in unbelief because of iniquity” (3 Ne. 21:5). He also stated that if any people “will repent and hearken unto my words, and harden not their hearts, I will establish my church among them, and they shall come in unto the covenant and be numbered among this the remnant of Jacob [the descendants of the Book of Mormon peoples], unto whom I have given this land for their inheritance”; together with others of the house of Israel, they will build the NEW JERUSALEM (3 Ne. 21:22–23). The Book of Mormon teaches that the descendants of that his people will be called by that name at the last day (3 Ne. 27:1–12; Mosiah 5:7–14; D&C 115:4).

The Lord has also revealed that ordinances and blessings performed in his name by his authorized servants are binding in heaven as well as on earth (D&C 132:45–46; 128:9). Ordinances, such as baptism, marriage, and vicarious work in temples, are performed in the “name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.”

In modern times, as in the past, the Lord has cautioned men and women not to utter his name in vain speech (Ex. 20:7; D&C 63:60–64) nor to defile it through improper conduct (see BLASPHEMY; PROFANITY). He has directed his people to keep pledges and “keep yourselves from evil to take the name of the Lord in vain, for I am the Lord your God, even the God of your fathers” (D&C 136:21).

[See also Jesus Christ, Names and Titles of.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Madsen, Truman G. “Putting on the Names’: A Jewish-Christian Legacy.” In By Study and Also by Faith, ed. J. Lundquist and S. Ricks, Vol. 1, pp. 458–81. Salt Lake City, 1990.

Talmage, James E. AF. Salt Lake City, 1915.

GLADE L. BURGON

---

NATIVE AMERICANS

LDS BELIEFS. The Book of Mormon, published in 1830, addresses a major message to Native Americans. Its title page states that one reason it was written was so that Native Americans today might know “what great things the Lord hath done for their fathers.”

The Book of Mormon tells that a small band of Israelites under LEHI migrated from Jerusalem to the Western Hemisphere about 600 B.C. Upon Lehi’s death his family divided into two opposing factions, one under Lehi’s oldest son, LAMAN (see LAMANITES), and the other under a younger son, NEPHI (see NEPHITES).

During the thousand-year history narrated in the Book of Mormon, Lehi’s descendants went through several phases of splitting, warring, accommodating, merging, and splitting again. At first, just as God had prohibited the Israelites from intermarrying with the Canaanites in the ancient promised land (Ex. 34:16; Deut. 7:3), the Nephites were forbidden to marry the Lamanites with their dark skin (2 Ne. 5:23; Alma 3:8–9). But as large Lamanite populations accepted the gospel of Jesus Christ and were numbered among the Nephites in the first century B.C., skin color ceased to be a distinguishing characteristic. After the visitations of the resurrected Christ, there were no distinctions among any kind of “ites” for some two hundred years. But then unbelievers arose and called themselves Lamanites to distinguish themselves from the Nephites or believers (4 Ne. 1:20).

The concluding chapters of the Book of Mormon describe a calamitous war. About A.D. 231, old enmities reemerged and two hostile populations formed (4 Ne. 1:35–39), eventually resulting in the annihilation of the Nephites. The Lamanites, from whom many present-day Native Americans descend, remained to inhabit the American continent. Peoples of other extractions also migrated there.

The Book of Mormon contains many promises and prophecies about the future directed to these survivors. For example, Lehi’s grandson Enos prayed earnestly to God on behalf of his kinsmen, the Lamanites. He was promised by the Lord that Nephite records would be kept so that they could be “brought forth at some future day unto the Lamanites, that, perhaps, they might be brought unto salvation” (Enos 1:13).

The role of Native Americans in the events of the last days is noted by several Book of Mormon prophets. Nephi<sub>1</sub> prophesied that in the last days the Lamanites would accept the gospel and become a “pure and delightsome people” (2 Ne. 30:6). Likewise, it was revealed to the Prophet Joseph SMITH that the Lamanites will at some future time “blossom as the rose” (D&C 49:24).

After Jesus’ resurrection in Jerusalem, he appeared to the more righteous Lamanites and Nephites left after massive destruction and prophesied that their seed eventually “shall dwindle in unbelief because of iniquity” (3 Ne. 21:5). He also stated that if any people “will repent and hearken unto my words, and harden not their hearts, I will establish my church among them, and they shall come in unto the covenant and be numbered among this the remnant of Jacob [the descendants of the Book of Mormon peoples], unto whom I have given this land for their inheritance”; together with others of the house of Israel, they will build the NEW JERUSALEM (3 Ne. 21:22–23). The Book of Mormon teaches that the descendants of Chief Washakie and his Shoshone braves. Washakie was friendly to the white settlers in Wyoming and many of his people were baptized by LDS missionaries who preached among them.

Lehi are heirs to the blessings of Abraham (see ABRAHAMIC COVENANT) and will receive the blessings promised to the house of Israel.

THE LAMANITE MISSION (1830–1831). Doctrine and a commandment from the Lord motivated the Latter-day Saints to introduce the Book of Mormon to the Native Americans and teach them of their heritage and the gospel of Jesus Christ. Just a few months after the organization of the Church, four elders were called to preach to Native Americans living on the frontier west of the Missouri River (see LAMANITE MISSION).

The missionaries visited the Cattaraugus in New York, the Wyandots in Ohio, and the Shawnees and Delawares in the unorganized territories (now Kansas). Members of these tribes were receptive to the story of the Restoration. Unfortunately, federal Indian agents worrying about Indian unrest feared that the missionaries were inciting the tribes to resist the government and ordered the missionaries to leave, alleging that they were “disturbers of the peace” (Arrington and Bitton, p. 146). LDS pro-Native American beliefs continued to be a factor in the tensions between Latter-day Saints and their neighbors in Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois, which eventually led to persecution and expulsion of the Latter-day Saints from Missouri in 1838–1839 and from Illinois in 1846 (see MISSOURI CONFLICT).

RELATIONS IN THE GREAT BASIN. When the Latter-day Saints arrived in the Great Salt Lake Valley in 1847, they found several Native American tribal groups there and in adjacent valleys. The Church members soon had to weigh their need to put the limited arable land into production for the establishment of Zion against their obligation to accommodate their Native American neighbors and bring them the unique message in the Book of Mormon.

Brigham YOUNG taught that kindness and fairness were the best means to coexist with Native Americans and, like many other white Americans at the time, he hoped eventually to assimilate the Indians entirely into the mainstream culture. He admonished settlers to extend friendship, trade fairly, teach white man’s ways, and generously share what they had. Individuals and Church groups gave, where possible, from their limited supplies of food, clothing, and livestock. But the rapid expansion of LDS settlers along the Wasatch Range, their preoccupation with building Zion, and the spread of European diseases unfortunately contravened many of these conciliatory efforts.

A dominating factor leading to resentment and hostility was the extremely limited availability of life-sustaining resources in the Great Basin, which in the main was marginal desert and mountain terrain dotted with small valley oases of green. Although Native Americans had learned to survive, it was an extremely delicate balance that was destroyed by the arrival of the Latter-day Saints in 1847. The tribal chiefs who initially welcomed the Mormons soon found themselves and their people being dispossessed by what appeared to them to be a never-ending horde, and in time they responded by raiding LDS-owned stock and fields, which resources were all that remained in the oases which once supported plants and wildlife that were the staples of the Native American diet. The Latter-day Saints, like others invading the western frontier, concerned with survival in the wilderness, responded at times with force.

An important factor in the conflict was the vast cultural gap between the two peoples. Native Americans in the Great Basin concentrated on scratching for survival in a barren land. Their uncanny survival skills could have been used by the Mormons in 1848, when drought and pestilence nearly destroyed the pioneers' first crops and famine seriously threatened their survival.

The Utes, Shoshones, and other tribal groups in the basin had little interest in being farmers or cowherders, or living in stuffy sod or log houses. They preferred their hunter-gatherer way of life under the open sky and often resisted, sometimes even scoffed at, the acculturation proffered them. Nor did they have a concept of land ownership or the accumulation of property. They shared both the land and its bounty—a phenomenon that European Americans have never fully understood. The culture gap all but precluded any significant acculturation or accommodation.

Within a few years, LDS settlers inhabited most of the arable land in Utah. Native Americans, therefore, had few options: They could leave, they could give up their own culture and assimilate with the Mormons, they could beg, they could take what bounty they could get and pay the consequences, or they could fight. Conflict was inevitable. Conflict mixed with accommodation prevailed in Utah for many years. Violent clashes occurred between Mormons and Native Americans in 1849, 1850 (Chief Soviet), 1853 (Chief Walkara), 1860, and 1865–1868 (Chief Black Hawk)—all for the same primary reasons and along similar lines. Conflict subsided, and finally disappeared, only when most of the surviving Native Americans were forced onto reservations by the United States government.

Still, the LDS hand of fellowship was continually extended. Leonard Arrington accurately comments that “the most prominent theme in Brigham’s Indian policy in the 1850s was patience and forbearance. . . . He continued to emphasize always being ready, using all possible means to conciliate the Indians, and acting only on the defensive” (Arrington, p. 217). Farms for the Native Americans were established as early as 1851, both to raise crops for their use and to teach them how to farm; but most of the “Indian farms” failed owing to a lack of commitment on both sides as well as to insufficient funding. LDS emissaries (such as Jacob Hamblin, Dudley Leavitt, and Dimmick Huntington) continued, however, to serve Native American needs, and missionaries continued to approach them in Utah and in bordering states. Small numbers of Utes, Shoshones, Paiutes, Gosiutes, and Navajos assimilated into the mainstream culture, and some of that number became Latter-day Saints. But overall, reciprocal contact and accommodation were minimal. By the turn of the century, contact was almost nil because most Native Americans lived on reservations far removed from LDS communities. Their contact with whites was mainly limited to government soldiers and agency officials and to non-Mormon Christian missionaries.

Native American members of the Church participate in a ward sacrament meeting (1985). Photographer: Marty Mayo.

RELATIONS IN RECENT TIMES. Beginning in the 1940s, the Church reemphasized reaching out to Native Americans. The Navajo-Zuni Mission, later named the Southwest Indian Mission, was created in 1943. It was followed by the Northern Indian Mission, headquartered in South Dakota. Eventually, missionaries were placed on many Indian reservations. The missionaries not only proselytize, but also assist Native Americans with their farming, ranching, and community development. Other Lamanite missions, including several in Central and South America and in Polynesia, have also been opened. Large numbers of North American Indians have migrated off reservations, and today over half of all Indians live in cities. In response, some formerly all-Indian missions have merged with those serving members of all racial and ethnic groups living in a given geographical area.

An Indian seminary program was initiated to teach the gospel to Native American children on reservations, in their own languages if necessary (see SEMINARY). Initially, Native American children of all ages were taught the principles of the gospel in schools adjacent to federal public schools on reservations and in remote Indian communities. The Indian seminary program has now been integrated within the regular seminary system, and Indian children in the ninth through twelfth grades attend seminary, just as non-Indian children do.

The INDIAN STUDENT PLACEMENT SERVICES (ISPS) seeks to improve the educational attainment of Native American children by placing member Indian children with LDS families during the school year. Foster families, selected because of their emotional, financial, and spiritual stability, pay all expenses of the Indian child, who lives with a foster family during the nine-month school year and spends the summer on the reservation with his or her natural family. Generally, the children enter the program at a fairly young age and return year after year to the same foster family until they graduate from high school.

From a small beginning in 1954, the program peaked in 1970 with an enrollment of nearly 5,000 students. The development of more adequate schools on reservations has since then reduced the need for the program and the number of participants has declined. In 1990, about 500 students participated. More than 70,000 Native American youngsters have participated in ISPS, and evaluations have shown that participation significantly increased their educational attainment.

In the 1950s, Elder Spencer W. KIMBALL, then an apostle, encouraged BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY to take an active interest in Native American education and to help solve economic and social problems. Scholarships were established, and a program to help Indian students adjust to university life was inaugurated. During the 1970s more than 500 Indian students, representing seventy-one tribes, were enrolled each year. But enrollment has declined, so a new program for Indian students is being developed that will increase the recruiting of Native American students to BYU and raise the percentage who receive a college degree. The Native American Educational Outreach Program at BYU presents educational seminars to tribal leaders and Indian youth across North America. It also offers scholarships. American Indian Services, another outreach program originally affiliated with BYU, provides adult education and technical and financial assistance to Indian communities. In 1989, American Indian Services was transferred from BYU to the Lehi Foundation, which continues this activity.

A Native American meets with President George Albert Smith. Courtesy Special Collections Department, University of Utah Libraries.

President Spencer W. Kimball escorts Milli Cody [Garrett], "Miss Indian BYU" for 1974–1975 to a campus reception. Courtesy Doug Martin.

In 1975, George P. Lee, a full-blooded Navajo and an early ISPS participant, was appointed as a General Authority. He was the first Indian to achieve this status and served faithfully for more than ten years. Elder Lee became convinced that the Church was neglecting its mission to the Lamanites, and when he voiced strong disapproval of Church leaders, he was excommunicated in 1989.

The Church has always had a strong commitment to preaching the gospel to Native Americans and assisting individuals, families, communities, and tribes to improve their education, health, and religious well-being. Programs vary from time to time as conditions and needs change, but the underlying beliefs and goodwill of Latter-day Saints toward these people remain firm and vibrant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. Brigham Young: American Moses. New York, 1985.
- , and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience: A History of the Latter-day Saints. New York, 1979.
- Chadwick, Bruce A., Stan L. Albrecht, and Howard M. Bahr. "Evaluation of an Indian Student Placement Program." Social Casework 67, no. 9 (1986):515–24.
- Walker, Ronald W. "Toward a Reconstruction of Mormon and Indian Relations, 1847–1877." BYU Studies 29 (Fall 1989):23–42.

BRUCE A. CHADWICK
THOMAS GARROW

NATURAL MAN

The phrase "natural man" is understood by Latter-day Saints to be an unrepentant person; it does not imply that mortals are by nature depraved or evil, but only that they are in a fallen condition. Natural man describes persons who are "without God in the world, and they have gone contrary to the nature of God" (Alma 41:11). The Lord declared to Joseph SMITH: "Every spirit of man was innocent in the beginning; and God having redeemed man from the fall, men became again, in their infant state, innocent before God" (D&C 93:38).

The ATONEMENT of Christ does not automatically free mankind from a fallen condition, although it does guarantee all a physical resurrection. Rather, it makes possible for men and women to escape the condition of natural man by accepting the Atonement and nurturing the LIGHT OF CHRIST within them. King BENJAMIN was told by an angel that "the natural man is an enemy to God, and has been from the fall of Adam." But a person can "put off the natural man" by yielding to "the enticings of the Holy Spirit," and can become "a saint through the atonement of Christ the Lord, . . . [by becoming] as a child, submissive, meek, humble, patient, full of love" (Mosiah 3:19). The phrase natural man, therefore, does not describe a condition that causes sin but a consequence of sin, of going against the commandments of God. As the prophet ABINADI taught, "he that persists in his dian communities. In 1989, American Indian Services was transferred from BYU to the Lehi Foundation, which continues this activity.

President Spencer W. Kimball escorts Milli Cody [Garrett], "Miss Indian BYU" for 1974–1975 to a campus reception. Courtesy Doug Martin.

In 1975, George P. Lee, a full-blooded Navajo and an early ISPS participant, was appointed as a General Authority. He was the first Indian to achieve this status and served faithfully for more than ten years. Elder Lee became convinced that the Church was neglecting its mission to the Lamanites, and when he voiced strong disapproval of Church leaders, he was excommunicated in 1989.

The Church has always had a strong commitment to preaching the gospel to Native Americans and assisting individuals, families, communities, and tribes to improve their education, health, and religious well-being. Programs vary from time to time as conditions and needs change, but the underlying beliefs and goodwill of Latter-day Saints toward these people remain firm and vibrant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. Brigham Young: American Moses. New York, 1985.
- , and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience: A History of the Latter-day Saints. New York, 1979.
- Chadwick, Bruce A., Stan L. Albrecht, and Howard M. Bahr. "Evaluation of an Indian Student Placement Program." Social Casework 67, no. 9 (1986):515–24.
- Walker, Ronald W. "Toward a Reconstruction of Mormon and Indian Relations, 1847–1877." BYU Studies 29 (Fall 1989):23–42.

BRUCE A. CHADWICK
THOMAS GARROW

---

NATURAL MAN

The phrase "natural man" is understood by Latter-day Saints to be an unrepentant person; it does not imply that mortals are by nature depraved or evil, but only that they are in a fallen condition. Natural man describes persons who are "without God in the world, and they have gone contrary to the nature of God" (Alma 41:11). The Lord declared to Joseph SMITH: "Every spirit of man was innocent in the beginning; and God having redeemed man from the fall, men became again, in their infant state, innocent before God" (D&C 93:38).

The ATONEMENT of Christ does not automatically free mankind from a fallen condition, although it does guarantee all a physical resurrection. Rather, it makes possible for men and women to escape the condition of natural man by accepting the Atonement and nurturing the LIGHT OF CHRIST within them. King BENJAMIN was told by an angel that "the natural man is an enemy to God, and has been from the fall of Adam." But a person can "put off the natural man" by yielding to "the enticings of the Holy Spirit," and can become "a saint through the atonement of Christ the Lord, . . . [by becoming] as a child, submissive, meek, humble, patient, full of love" (Mosiah 3:19). The phrase natural man, therefore, does not describe a condition that causes sin but a consequence of sin, of going against the commandments of God. As the prophet ABINADI taught, "he that persists in his own carnal nature, and goes on in the ways of sin and rebellion against God, remaineth in his fallen state" (Mosiah 16:5). In such rebellion, one is left without excuse. As explained by SAMUEL THE LAMANITE:

Whosoever doeth iniquity, doeth it unto himself; for behold, ye are free; ye are permitted to act for yourselves; for behold, God hath given unto you a knowledge and he hath made you free. He hath given unto you that ye might know good from evil, and he hath given unto you that ye might choose life or death [Hel. 14:30–31; see also AGENCY].

The apostle PAUL speaks of the natural man as being in a state incapable of understanding spiritual truth. "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14). Moreover, the natural man "walk[s] according to the course of this world, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind" (Eph. 2:2–3).

Because the natural man is unrepentant and indulgent, one must overcome this condition through repentance and submission to the Spirit of God. President Brigham YOUNG stated that God "has placed us on the earth to prove ourselves, to govern, control, educate and sanctify ourselves, body and spirit" (JD 10:2, in Discourses of Brigham Young, ed. J. Widtsoe, p. 57, Salt Lake City, 1971). Parley P. Pratt, an apostle, explains how the Holy Ghost aids in the process:

[It] increases, enlarges, expands and purifies all the natural passions and affections; and adapts them, by the gift of wisdom, to their lawful use. It inspires, develops, cultivates and matures all the fine-toned sympathies, joys, tastes, kindred feelings and affections of our nature [Key to the Science of Theology, 10th ed., p. 101, Salt Lake City, 1973].

Repentance is manifested as "[yielding] to the enticings of the Holy Spirit, . . . [being] willing to submit to all things which the Lord seeth fit to inflict upon him, even as a child doth submit to his father" (Mosiah 3:19). Neal A. Maxwell of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles has pointed out that humility and selflessness develop a capacity for discipline and a control of natural appetites. This is a difficult process, which requires that "men and women of Christ magnify their callings without magnifying themselves" (p. 16).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Maxwell, Neal A. "Put Off the Natural Man, and Come Off Conqueror." Ensign 20 (Nov. 1990):14–16.
- Millet, Robert L. Life in Christ, pp. 23–35. Salt Lake City, 1990.

R. J. SNOW

---

NATURE, LAW OF

Rational inquiry into nature (physis) was for Greek philosophers the way to know reality. The natural was originally radically distinguished from law (nomos), which identified merely human conventions. Thus, for example, it is natural for humans to speak, but it is not natural to speak Greek. Hence, law was not initially thought of by such philosophers as natural, though it was natural for humans to be governed by such conventions. Later the terms "nature" and "law" began to be linked to describe a prepolitical golden age without rules, contracts, property, or marriage. Understood in this way, "natural law," after the decline from the golden age, did not provide the model for civil law, but instead identified a realm accessible to reason that transcends the world. Roman Catholic theologians eventually borrowed the expression "natural law" from pagan philosophy to ground a structured social ethic. Thomas Aquinas, in his Aristotelian restructuring of Christianity, distinguished four levels of law: eternal, divine, natural, and human. Eternal law, the mind of God and structure of reality, he held, is known both through revelation as divine law and through reason as natural law, and human law should strive to reflect the natural law.

Though Latter-day Saints sometimes speculate about the reasons for the positive law given through divine REVELATION and also about the moral sense of mankind (see ETHICS), a moral natural law is not clearly delineated in the LDS canon. Some suggest that rough equivalents for a moral natural law might be elicited from scripture. But theology, grounded in philosophical speculation, is typically seen as a competitor to divine revelation. Such speculation remains tentative and problematic. Hence, there is little talk of a moral natural law among Latter-day Saints.

LDS scriptures, rather than relying upon notions of a moral natural law, speak of God's commandments, statutes, and ordinances, of God's will own carnal nature, and goes on in the ways of sin and rebellion against God, remaineth in his fallen state" (Mosiah 16:5). In such rebellion, one is left without excuse. As explained by SAMUEL THE LAMANITE:

Whosoever doeth iniquity, doeth it unto himself; for behold, ye are free; ye are permitted to act for yourselves; for behold, God hath given unto you a knowledge and he hath made you free. He hath given unto you that ye might know good from evil, and he hath given unto you that ye might choose life or death [Hel. 14:30–31; see also AGENCY].

The apostle PAUL speaks of the natural man as being in a state incapable of understanding spiritual truth. "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14). Moreover, the natural man "walk[s] according to the course of this world, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind" (Eph. 2:2–3).

Because the natural man is unrepentant and indulgent, one must overcome this condition through repentance and submission to the Spirit of God. President Brigham YOUNG stated that God "has placed us on the earth to prove ourselves, to govern, control, educate and sanctify ourselves, body and spirit" (JD 10:2, in Discourses of Brigham Young, ed. J. Widtsoe, p. 57, Salt Lake City, 1971). Parley P. Pratt, an apostle, explains how the Holy Ghost aids in the process:

[It] increases, enlarges, expands and purifies all the natural passions and affections; and adapts them, by the gift of wisdom, to their lawful use. It inspires, develops, cultivates and matures all the fine-toned sympathies, joys, tastes, kindred feelings and affections of our nature [Key to the Science of Theology, 10th ed., p. 101, Salt Lake City, 1973].

Repentance is manifested as "[yielding] to the enticings of the Holy Spirit, . . . [being] willing to submit to all things which the Lord seeth fit to inflict upon him, even as a child doth submit to his father" (Mosiah 3:19). Neal A. Maxwell of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles has pointed out that humility and selflessness develop a capacity for discipline and a control of natural appetites. This is a difficult process, which requires that "men and women of Christ magnify their callings without magnifying themselves" (p. 16).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Maxwell, Neal A. "Put Off the Natural Man, and Come Off Conqueror." Ensign 20 (Nov. 1990):14–16.
- Millet, Robert L. Life in Christ, pp. 23–35. Salt Lake City, 1990.

R. J. SNOW

---

NATURE, LAW OF

Rational inquiry into nature (physis) was for Greek philosophers the way to know reality. The natural was originally radically distinguished from law (nomos), which identified merely human conventions. Thus, for example, it is natural for humans to speak, but it is not natural to speak Greek. Hence, law was not initially thought of by such philosophers as natural, though it was natural for humans to be governed by such conventions. Later the terms "nature" and "law" began to be linked to describe a prepolitical golden age without rules, contracts, property, or marriage. Understood in this way, "natural law," after the decline from the golden age, did not provide the model for civil law, but instead identified a realm accessible to reason that transcends the world. Roman Catholic theologians eventually borrowed the expression "natural law" from pagan philosophy to ground a structured social ethic. Thomas Aquinas, in his Aristotelian restructuring of Christianity, distinguished four levels of law: eternal, divine, natural, and human. Eternal law, the mind of God and structure of reality, he held, is known both through revelation as divine law and through reason as natural law, and human law should strive to reflect the natural law.

Though Latter-day Saints sometimes speculate about the reasons for the positive law given through divine REVELATION and also about the moral sense of mankind (see ETHICS), a moral natural law is not clearly delineated in the LDS canon. Some suggest that rough equivalents for a moral natural law might be elicited from scripture. But theology, grounded in philosophical speculation, is typically seen as a competitor to divine revelation. Such speculation remains tentative and problematic. Hence, there is little talk of a moral natural law among Latter-day Saints.

LDS scriptures, rather than relying upon notions of a moral natural law, speak of God's commandments, statutes, and ordinances, of God's will

and plans and purposes, of the ordering of the world (including its metes and bounds) of law given by God, and so forth. The laws mentioned in the scriptures seem, instead, to be instances of divine positive law, though they are not arbitrary, since as moral prescriptions they form the terms of the COVENANT entered into in the hope that blessings will flow from obedience to God. It is assumed that God's commandments rest on reasons not fully accessible to human inquiry or explication.

There is, however, another strand of thought among Latter-day Saints, one that affirms what might be called the "laws of nature," where that term identifies the regularities found by the sciences. These laws are seen as descriptive, not prescriptive or normative. They are thought either to be set in place by God or to exist independently of God's will and hence function as conditions that must be managed as plans are worked out by man in cooperation with God. Such views are entertained by many Latter-day Saints, especially those trained in the natural sciences, but they have not been systematically set forth or integrated with the teachings in the scriptures.

It is the prophetic gift that makes available the terms of the covenant with God, and such covenants are accompanied by blessings and cursings. Latter-day Saints thus emphasize obedience to what amounts to divine positive law and not to the dictates of nature as known by human reason.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

d'Entreves, A. P. Natural Law. London, 1951.

Madsen, Truman G. "Joseph Smith and the Problems of Ethics." In Perspectives in Mormon Ethics, ed. Donald E. Hill, pp. 29–48. Salt Lake City, 1983.

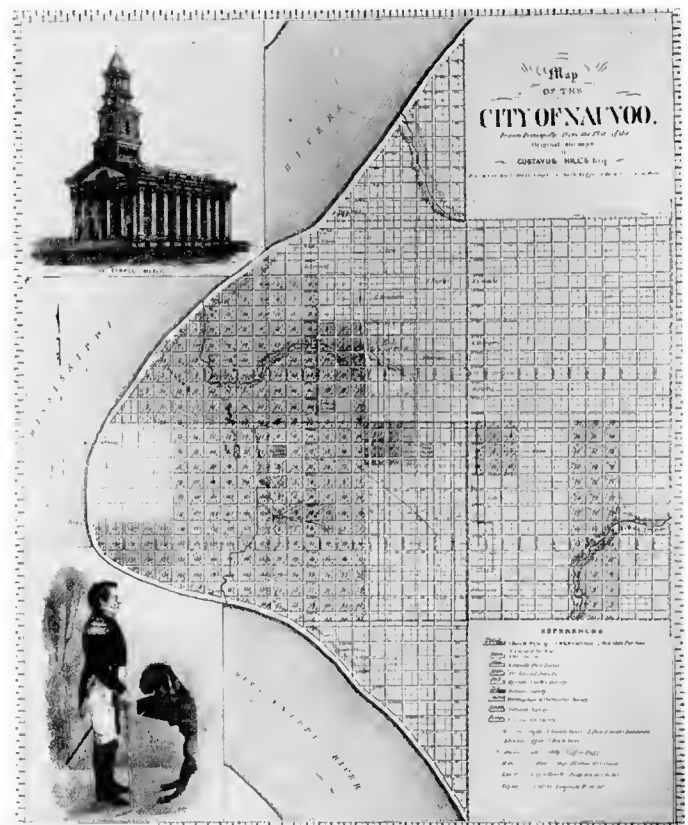

LOUIS C. MIDGLEY

NAUVOO

Nauvoo, Illinois, headquarters of the Church and home for many of its members from 1839 to 1846, began and ended as a community in exile. In 1838–1839 Latter-day Saints fled from Missouri seeking religious refuge from mob persecution. They found shelter in eastern Iowa and western Illinois, where they established new communities. Joseph Smith named the principal city Nauvoo, meaning, he said, "a beautiful location, a place of rest." When the Saints left Nauvoo for the Rocky Mountains seven years later, they were again religious exiles in search of a home.

The community at Nauvoo grew rapidly on land purchased from settlers and speculators willing to sell on contract. Joseph Smith, acting as agent for the Church, bought the Illinois farms of Hugh and William White and investment tracts from Isaac Galland and Horace Hotchkiss—in all, 660 acres. He resold one-acre Nauvoo lots surveyed on the flats along the river, in competition with other LDS developers who platted land on nearby bluffs. A survey established streets three rods wide within city boundaries overlaying existing "paper" towns of Commerce and Commerce City. In December 1840, Nauvoo became a legal entity under the NAUVOO CHARTER, issued by the Illinois legislature and providing the Saints better legal protection than they had ever known. Nauvoo was now home.

Map of the City of Nauvoo, Illinois, on the Mississippi River, c. 1842.

and plans and purposes, of the ordering of the world (including its metes and bounds) of law given by God, and so forth. The laws mentioned in the scriptures seem, instead, to be instances of divine positive law, though they are not arbitrary, since as moral prescriptions they form the terms of the COVENANT entered into in the hope that blessings will flow from obedience to God. It is assumed that God's commandments rest on reasons not fully accessible to human inquiry or explication.

There is, however, another strand of thought among Latter-day Saints, one that affirms what might be called the "laws of nature," where that term identifies the regularities found by the sciences. These laws are seen as descriptive, not prescriptive or normative. They are thought either to be set in place by God or to exist independently of God's will and hence function as conditions that must be managed as plans are worked out by man in cooperation with God. Such views are entertained by many Latter-day Saints, especially those trained in the natural sciences, but they have not been systematically set forth or integrated with the teachings in the scriptures.

It is the prophetic gift that makes available the terms of the covenant with God, and such covenants are accompanied by blessings and cursings. Latter-day Saints thus emphasize obedience to what amounts to divine positive law and not to the dictates of nature as known by human reason.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

d'Entreves, A. P. Natural Law. London, 1951.

Madsen, Truman G. "Joseph Smith and the Problems of Ethics." In Perspectives in Mormon Ethics, ed. Donald E. Hill, pp. 29–48. Salt Lake City, 1983.

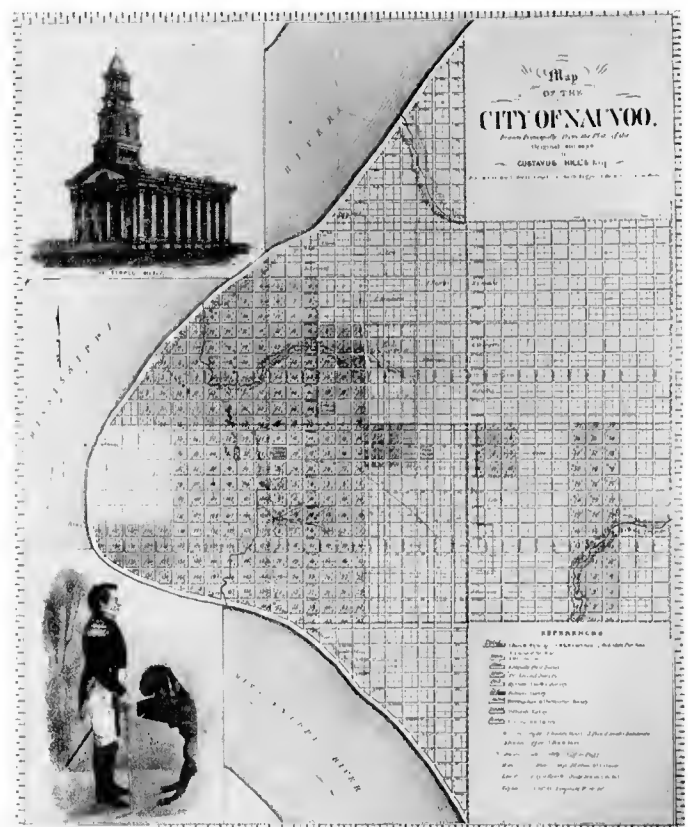

LOUIS C. MIDGLEY

NAUVOO

Nauvoo, Illinois, headquarters of the Church and home for many of its members from 1839 to 1846, began and ended as a community in exile. In 1838–1839 Latter-day Saints fled from Missouri seeking religious refuge from mob persecution. They found shelter in eastern Iowa and western Illinois, where they established new communities. Joseph Smith named the principal city Nauvoo, meaning, he said, "a beautiful location, a place of rest." When the Saints left Nauvoo for the Rocky Mountains seven years later, they were again religious exiles in search of a home.

The community at Nauvoo grew rapidly on land purchased from settlers and speculators willing to sell on contract. Joseph Smith, acting as agent for the Church, bought the Illinois farms of Hugh and William White and investment tracts from Isaac Galland and Horace Hotchkiss—in all, 660 acres. He resold one-acre Nauvoo lots surveyed on the flats along the river, in competition with other LDS developers who platted land on nearby bluffs. A survey established streets three rods wide within city boundaries overlaying existing "paper" towns of Commerce and Commerce City. In December 1840, Nauvoo became a legal entity under the NAUVOO CHARTER, issued by the Illinois legislature and providing the Saints better legal protection than they had ever known. Nauvoo was now home.

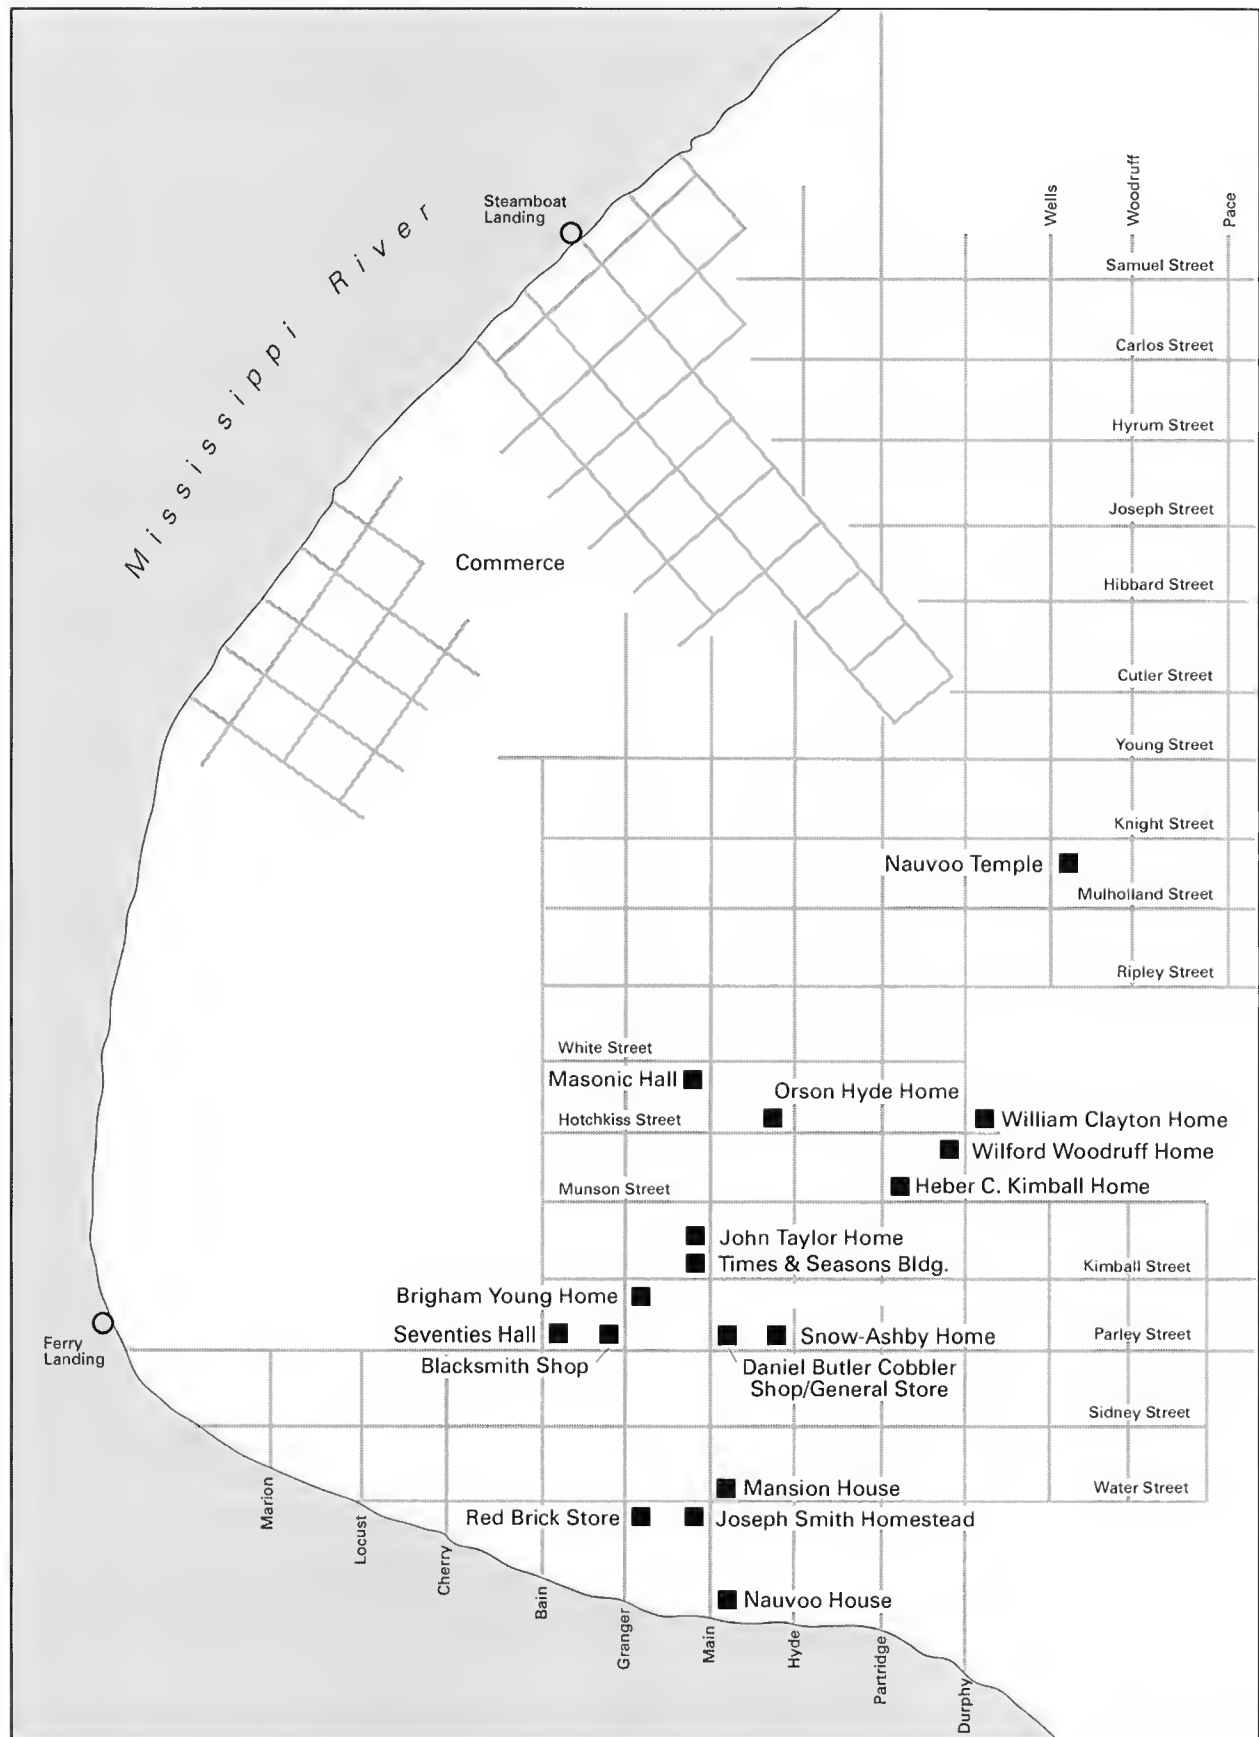

Map of the City of Nauvoo, Illinois, on the Mississippi River, c. 1842.

BYU Geography Department
Church history sites near Nauvoo, Illinois, 1839-1846.

Nauvoo, Illinois. Streets and buildings, 1846. —→

BYU Geography Department

As exiled Latter-day Saints from Missouri and Ohio gathered to their new stake of ZION, missionaries in the United States and Great Britain baptized many new converts (see MISSIONS OF THE TWELVE TO THE BRITISH ISLES). Encouraged by Joseph Smith, American and Canadian converts moved westward to Nauvoo. Some used canal boats and lake steamers, others covered wagons and horseback, and a few simply walked. Beginning in 1840, thousands sailed the Atlantic from Liverpool, England, and took steamboats up the Mississippi from New Orleans. This was a religious migration, an individual and family response to religious beliefs, aided by Church emigration agents in Liverpool, who organized companies and appointed shepherds for those fleeing to Zion (see IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION).

Newcomers were welcomed in Nauvoo by friends, relatives, missionaries, and the Prophet Joseph Smith himself. Renting a room or finding other temporary quarters became increasingly difficult during the boom years 1841–1843. As quickly as possible, new settlers hired searce contractors and craftsmen to build houses. Lumber, harvested from nearby virgin forests or shipped in, and, later, bricks made in Nauvoo, went into hundreds of comfortable but small, new homes. Nauvoo became a boom town.

Gardens on the city lots furnished vegetables, herbs, fruits, and berries. Meat and potatoes, when available, and corn—ground into meal for boiling, baking, and frying—were staples in everyone's diet. On nearby prairies, farmers plowed, cooperatively enclosed, and then planted hundreds of acres in corn, wheat, and potatoes. LDS tradesmen found ready work in Nauvoo, as did merchants eager to import manufactured goods from St. Louis, Cincinnati, and the East Coast.

Nauvoo boosters and their political opponents in neighboring towns exaggerated their estimates of Nauvoo's population for differing purposes. Illinois census takers in 1845 counted 11,057 residents. Adding growth through late 1845 and including the city's environs boosted the estimate to 15,000 at Nauvoo's peak, almost equal to a faster-growing Chicago.

To meet public needs, civic groups built a music hall and cultural hall, and PRIESTHOOD QUORUMS planned their own meeting halls. Church-sponsored construction of the NAUVOO HOUSE, a grand hotel, and the Nauvoo temple gave Nauvoo's growth religious meaning.

Though all members contributed as means and faith allowed toward erection of the temple, they did not all live in Nauvoo. Some remained in their hometowns because of economic or family pressures. Others joined the march to Nauvoo but found homesites and land away from headquarters. On a 13,000-acre, Church-purchased site in Lee County, Iowa, just across the river from Nauvoo, the Saints founded a town called Zarahemla and nine other smaller settlements. Joseph Smith organized an Iowa stake and approved settlement there and in several new towns in western Illinois. Besides Nauvoo, Church members in Hancock County lived at Ramus (now Webster); in Adams County at Lima, Quincy, Mount Hope (now Columbus), and Freedom (near Payson); in Morgan County at Geneva; in Sangamon County at Springfield; and in Pike County at Pleasant Vale (now Canton). Additionally, presiding elders organized Church branches wherever clusters of members lived in North America and the British Isles.

Wherever they lived, Latter-day Saints looked to the Prophet Joseph Smith for religious leadership. His revelations and sermons published in Nauvoo achieved Churchwide distribution. For residents, the Prophet offered firsthand preaching, Joseph Smith and his family moved into the Mansion House in August 1843. Later a wing was added to the east side of the main structure for a total of twenty-two rooms. Beginning in January 1844, Ebenezer Robinson managed the Mansion House as a hotel, and the Prophet maintained six rooms for himself and his family. Emma Smith lived here until 1871, when she moved into the Nauvoo House, where she died in 1879.

teaching, and counseling. Besides these, his influence in Nauvoo was enlarged through his roles as land agent, mayor, militia leader, magistrate, and merchant. No wonder that after his death and the repeal of its charter, the city was renamed the City of Joseph.

During his last years at Nauvoo, the Prophet unfolded additional aspects of the restored gospel. He responded to questions about basic LDS beliefs with thirteen ARTICLES OF FAITH, which described fundamental doctrines. He published another revealed scriptural record, the BOOK OF ABRAHAM. He taught new insights into the common origins of all mankind and their eternal destiny, particularly in a eulogy for a member, King Follett (see KING FOLLETT DISCOURSE). Many of the new teachings pointed toward the temple, and looked toward a collective effort to perform ordinances for the salvation of deceased ancestors and the exaltation of faithful Saints. The first BAPTISMS FOR THE DEAD were done in the Mississippi River, but by late November 1841, proxy baptisms commenced in the temple font. Meanwhile, with the temple not yet complete, several men, including two of the Twelve, received the first temple ENDOWMENTS on May 4, 1842, in an upstairs room at the President's office-store. The following year their wives and other men and women received the same ordinances, providing a corps of initiates to administer temple ordinances to thousands of others in the Nauvoo Temple beginning in December 1845.

The temple was a central focus of Nauvoo religious life. The Saints supported its construction with tithes of time and means, and they longed to receive anticipated temple blessings. For those privileged to live in Nauvoo, the temple and its associated theology gave new and eternal meaning to birth, marriage, life, and death.

Though Joseph Smith's personal leadership dominated Nauvoo's religious life, an institutional structure supported his efforts and carried on after his death in 1844 (see MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH). During the Nauvoo years, the Quorum of the Twelve accepted an increased role. First organized in 1835, members gained experience first as mission leaders in England and then as administrators in Nauvoo. With the FIRST PRESIDENCY and other authorities, they shared opportunities to preach scriptural commentaries on Sunday from the stand in the grove near the temple, and to address the Saints at general conferences. Among the most significant meetings in Nauvoo, these April and October conferences brought together thousands of the Saints for business and instruction. Similar gatherings convened elsewhere for scattered branches. Minutes published in the British Millennial Star and Nauvoo Times and Seasons helped keep members elsewhere informed of Church business, membership growth, and preachings. Church periodicals issued the first installments of Joseph Smith's HISTORY OF THE CHURCH, a project he pursued diligently with his clerks from 1838 until his death in 1844.

Seventies Hall, Nauvoo, was a meeting place for various priesthood quorums. Built in 1844, it housed a training school for missionaries, a small library, and a museum of artifacts from around the world. It was reconstructed on its original foundation in 1971–1972.

The women's RELIEF SOCIETY, organized in 1842, administered to the needs of the poor and taught principles of sexual purity. In this, they assisted the bishops of Nauvoo's fledgling WARDS—new administrative units for tending to temporal needs and monitoring religious worthiness. After Brigham YOUNG and the Twelve succeeded the Prophet as leaders, the SEVENTY and other Melchizedek Priesthood quorums grew rapidly in numbers and importance. The Seventy built a hall, sponsored a library, and prepared themselves for missions and for temple blessings.

While Latter-day Saints in Nauvoo gave primary allegiance to their religious affiliation, their lives reflected experiences typical of others in Jacksonian America. Non-Mormons living in and around Nauvoo joined with them in the celebration of Independence Day. Military processions, band music, patriotic speeches, and other festivities attracted citizens who arrived on horseback and in carriages and riverboats. Christmas observances were highlights for family and friends, with progressive dinners, singing, and dancing. Membership in Mormon Freemasonry lodges, organized in 1841–1842, affirmed group loyalty within the Church and encouraged fraternal ties with others. Contrary to expectations, however, the rapid growth of the lodges created controversy that strained relationships with other masons (see FREEMASONRY IN NAUVOO).

Brigham Young's residence in Nauvoo, as it appeared around 1900.

Mormon-American society in Nauvoo, leavened increasingly by a British and Scandinavian immigrant influence, included typical nineteenth-century entertainment and recreational opportunities. Brass bands played at dances and patriotic gatherings, accompanied Church choirs, and performed for temple capstone ceremonies. Adult and youth choirs, instrumentalists, and vocalists entertained and edified at social and religious gatherings. The music performed came out of the host society, though some hymns were newly written for LDS services. Mormon poets regularly memorialized events and people and set significant religious messages to rhyme for biweekly periodicals. Thespians in Nauvoo presented popular theatricals or sponsored traveling performing troupes in the Nauvoo cultural hall. Other occasional attractions included art exhibits, the circus, and riverboat excursions (see SOCIAL AND CULTURAL HISTORY).

Children had few toys, mostly homemade wagons, tops, and dolls. They enjoyed games such as fox and geese or leapfrog. Youths engaged in pastimes such as playing with marbles, wrestling, foot racing, hunting, fishing, stick-pulling, bowling, and baseball. Adults joined in many of these recreational activities and sometimes passed the time with card games, carriage rides, or parlor so-cials. When not providing necessities, Nauvooans also pursued education and learning. To get basic training in reading, writing, and arithmetic for their families, parents hired tutors or enrolled children in one of dozens of classes offered by Nauvoo's part-time teachers. Tuition was paid through providing teachers board and room and scarce cash. The University of Nauvoo existed only in a few scattered classes. Male adults and younger men organized lyceums and debating societies to develop rhetorical skills. They argued religious as well as political topics to prepare participants for missionary and civic service. Books were scarce in private homes, but a membership lending library offered two hundred donated volumes on science, world religion, history, and literature. Nauvoo's religious and secular newspapers, the Times and Seasons and Nauvoo Neighbor (originally The Wasp), edited by prominent LDS citizens, circulated to Latter-day Saints on two continents. In an "Age of the Common Man," Nauvoo's social and educational life was one of broad enjoyment and participation.

As elsewhere in American society, the family was the focus of everyday life. Women met domestic needs through a combination of their own labor and income from their husbands' work. The family produced and prepared food, though Nauvoo merchants imported or traded many foodstuffs. Women often made everyday clothing, bed coverings, rugs, and such things as towels and curtains from purchased cloth. Furniture, kitchen utensils, and tools for trades were imported or brought along by immigrants. Home remedies, supplemented by priesthood blessings, were administered in faith for healing. Infant mortality was high, and death for all a constant possibility from malarialike diseases, untreatable illnesses, and accidents.

For Latter-day Saints in Nauvoo, the family took on new religious meaning. Conversion unfortunately often divided families, though letters from Nauvoo nurtured bonds and encouraged reunion. Proxy temple ordinances offered opportunity for uniting families across generations and beyond the grave. Select associates accepted the Prophet's private challenge to make covenants of marriage with plural wives (see PLURAL MARRIAGE), though the doctrine was not preached publicly until 1852 in Utah. In preparation for the temple, teaching of the doctrine of eternal families added a unique touch to LDS family life. SEALING ordinances for husbands and wives gave marriage and the family in Nauvoo an eternal perspective.

Just when life appeared to be back to normal after the martyrdom, the loss of Nauvoo's charter and mob harassment in 1845 threatened the peace of Joseph Smith's City Beautiful. Political and schismatic opponents predicted "the end of 'Mormonism.'" Disaffected Latter-day Saints threatened religious unity and offered guardianship and new prophetic leadership in opposition to the Twelve. The Church survived, but Nauvoo's position as the Church center ended. The governing Quorum of the Twelve announced plans at the October 1845 conference to evacuate by the following spring.

Throughout the winter, residents organized for the exodus even as they rushed to complete their temple and receive its ordinances (see WESTERN MIGRATION: PLANNING AND PROPHECY). They purchased oxen, made wagons, sold properties, and outfitted themselves for the long trek into the western wilderness as they also prepared temple clothing and did finishing work inside the temple on the hill. Brigham Young and the Twelve appointed agents to dispose of unsold property and organized emigration companies as they oversaw construction details on the temple. By December, just before departure began, thousands of the Nauvoo faithful began to receive their long-awaited temple endowments. Before winter's end more than 6,000 received temple ordinances and thus were willing to leave. After seven eventful years, the Latter-day Saints moved on again, transplanting their covenant society to a new promised land.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Flanders, Robert B. "To Transform History: Early Mormon Culture and the Concept of Time and Space." Church History 40 (1971):108–17.
- Codfrey, Kenneth W. "Some Thoughts Regarding an Unwritten History of Nauvoo." BYU Studies 15 (1975):417–24.
- . "The Nauvoo Neighborhood: A Little Philadelphia or a Unique City Set Upon a Hill?" Journal of Mormon History 11 (1984):78–97.

Looking northeast toward the Nauvoo Temple, 1846, at the time of the Latter-day Saint exodus (daguerreotype). Nauvoo grew rapidly between 1839 and 1846. Dugouts and simple log structures were soon replaced by traditional frame or brick homes. Charles W. Carter collection.

- Hill, Marvin S. "Mormon Religion in Nauvoo: Some Reflections." Utah Historical Quarterly 44 (1976):170–80.
- Kimball, Stanley B. "Nauvoo West: The Mormons of the Iowa Shore." BYU Studies 18 (1978):132–42.
- Miller, David E., and Della S. Miller. Nauvoo: The City of Joseph. Salt Lake City, 1974.

GLEN M. LEONARD

NAUVOO CHARTER

By legislation signed into law on December 16, 1840, the Illinois General Assembly granted corporate city status to Nauvoo. Among literally hundreds of Illinois settlements, only Alton, Chicago, Galena, Quincy, and Springfield shared such distinctive legal status. Expectations of what would uniting families across generations and beyond the grave. Select associates accepted the Prophet's private challenge to make covenants of marriage with plural wives (see PLURAL MARRIAGE), though the doctrine was not preached publicly until 1852 in Utah. In preparation for the temple, teaching of the doctrine of eternal families added a unique touch to LDS family life. SEALING ordinances for husbands and wives gave marriage and the family in Nauvoo an eternal perspective.

Just when life appeared to be back to normal after the martyrdom, the loss of Nauvoo's charter and mob harassment in 1845 threatened the peace of Joseph Smith's City Beautiful. Political and schismatic opponents predicted "the end of 'Mormonism.'" Disaffected Latter-day Saints threatened religious unity and offered guardianship and new prophetic leadership in opposition to the Twelve. The Church survived, but Nauvoo's position as the Church center ended. The governing Quorum of the Twelve announced plans at the October 1845 conference to evacuate by the following spring.

Throughout the winter, residents organized for the exodus even as they rushed to complete their temple and receive its ordinances (see WESTERN MIGRATION: PLANNING AND PROPHECY). They purchased oxen, made wagons, sold properties, and outfitted themselves for the long trek into the western wilderness as they also prepared temple clothing and did finishing work inside the temple on the hill. Brigham Young and the Twelve appointed agents to dispose of unsold property and organized emigration companies as they oversaw construction details on the temple. By December, just before departure began, thousands of the Nauvoo faithful began to receive their long-awaited temple endowments. Before winter's end more than 6,000 received temple ordinances and thus were willing to leave. After seven eventful years, the Latter-day Saints moved on again, transplanting their covenant society to a new promised land.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Flanders, Robert B. "To Transform History: Early Mormon Culture and the Concept of Time and Space." Church History 40 (1971):108–17.
- Codfrey, Kenneth W. "Some Thoughts Regarding an Unwritten History of Nauvoo." BYU Studies 15 (1975):417–24.
- . "The Nauvoo Neighborhood: A Little Philadelphia or a Unique City Set Upon a Hill?" Journal of Mormon History 11 (1984):78–97.

Looking northeast toward the Nauvoo Temple, 1846, at the time of the Latter-day Saint exodus (daguerreotype). Nauvoo grew rapidly between 1839 and 1846. Dug-outs and simple log structures were soon replaced by traditional frame or brick homes. Charles W. Carter collection.

- Hill, Marvin S. "Mormon Religion in Nauvoo: Some Reflections." Utah Historical Quarterly 44 (1976):170–80.
- Kimball, Stanley B. "Nauvoo West: The Mormons of the Iowa Shore." BYU Studies 18 (1978):132–42.
- Miller, David E., and Della S. Miller. Nauvoo: The City of Joseph. Salt Lake City, 1974.

GLEN M. LEONARD

NAUVOO CHARTER

By legislation signed into law on December 16, 1840, the Illinois General Assembly granted corporate city status to Nauvoo. Among literally hundreds of Illinois settlements, only Alton, Chicago, Galena, Quincy, and Springfield shared such distinctive legal status. Expectations of what would result ran high for both Latter-day Saints and their neighbors.

Many Illinoisans, shocked at the harsh treatment given the Latter-day Saints by the Missouri-ans (see MISSOURI CONFLICT), sought to succor the beleaguered followers of Joseph SMITH by helping them politically and providing legal safeguards. Moreover, the economic fabric of the state suffered from the deepening effects of the panics of 1837 and 1839, and many legislators saw an economic boon in the future immigration of several thousand new settlers. Encouraged by state political leaders, the Saints believed that a city charter would guarantee them a kind of security they had never yet enjoyed. Even State Supreme Court Justice Stephen A. Douglas, despite prior judicial decisions to the contrary, opined that a corporate charter was irrevocable and perpetual.

The Nauvoo document, neither the longest nor the shortest city charter, was much like the charters of other Illinois cities. More than half the sections were modeled on the Springfield charter. City status allowed governance by a council chosen by an electorate; unlike other city councils in Illinois, the Nauvoo Council contained aldermen, councillors, and a mayor. The Nauvoo instrument also differed from others in being not one but three charters, granting corporate status the city, a university, and a city militia. Previous practice was to establish schools and also militia units by separate acts. The University of the City of Nauvoo, governed by the city council, was the only city-operated university in the state.

One important provision stated that the Nauvoo Council could pass any ordinances not repugnant to the constitutions of the United States or that of Illinois. This, in effect, empowered the Nauvoo body to stand in a federated position with the Illinois General Assembly. Ordinances passed by the Nauvoo Council could be in direct violation or disregard of state law and still be valid in Nauvoo, provided they did not conflict with specific powers granted by the federal and state constitutions. Leaders of the city militia, known as the NAUVOO LEGION, and the university trustees could also pass laws, limited only by state and federal constitutions.

Almost at once this power became a focal point of misunderstanding and controversy, though the same delegation of authority was also in three of the other five city charters. Since this provision was not unique, adverse reaction to it clearly had a good deal to do with how others viewed Latter-day Saints and the implementation of the provision by Nauvoo and its leaders. The Nauvoo Municipal Court, the third such court provided for by the Illinois General Assembly, also became a point of contention. While the city courts of Chicago and Alton convened under one judge, the principal Nauvoo judge was the mayor of the city, sitting as chief justice, with the aldermen as associate justices. Adversaries argued that the way Joseph Smith, as mayor of Nauvoo, used the legislative and judicial powers granted by law resulted in "anti-republican" abuses.

In granting the charter, some legislators may have hoped to protect Latter-day Saints from PERSECUTION, but it proved to be a two-edged sword. When the Illinois majority turned against Nauvoo but lacked legal tools to curb the city's power and influence, it turned to extralegal means. Later, after violence, it also succeeded in getting Nauvoo's charter repealed. Although based solidly on precedents not termed "anti-republican" until Latter-day Saints obtained and used them, the Nauvoo Charter nevertheless ultimately fell short of providing the Saints the peace and protection they desired.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, James L., Jr. "The Nauvoo Charter: A Reinterpretation." Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 54 (Spring 1971):66-78.

JAMES L. KIMBALL, JR.

---

NAUVOO ECONOMY

Nauvoo, for seven years the headquarters of the Church, was a river city with an agricultural hinterland set amid a preestablished, second-generation frontier society of non-Mormons. Founded in 1839 by LDS refugees from the MISSOURI CONFLICT, it existed as an LDS community only until 1846. Additions to its fast-growing population came mostly through new converts, many from England, who almost always brought skills and sometimes wealth. Though commerce in goods and services was brisk, Nauvoo's primary import was converts (see IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION), and its primary export, MISSIONARIES.

Nauvoo was neither communal nor communitarian. Still, the influences of the corporation of the result ran high for both Latter-day Saints and their neighbors.

Many Illinoisans, shocked at the harsh treatment given the Latter-day Saints by the Missouri-ans (see MISSOURI CONFLICT), sought to succor the beleaguered followers of Joseph SMITH by helping them politically and providing legal safeguards. Moreover, the economic fabric of the state suffered from the deepening effects of the panics of 1837 and 1839, and many legislators saw an economic boon in the future immigration of several thousand new settlers. Encouraged by state political leaders, the Saints believed that a city charter would guarantee them a kind of security they had never yet enjoyed. Even State Supreme Court Justice Stephen A. Douglas, despite prior judicial decisions to the contrary, opined that a corporate charter was irrevocable and perpetual.

The Nauvoo document, neither the longest nor the shortest city charter, was much like the charters of other Illinois cities. More than half the sections were modeled on the Springfield charter. City status allowed governance by a council chosen by an electorate; unlike other city councils in Illinois, the Nauvoo Council contained aldermen, councillors, and a mayor. The Nauvoo instrument also differed from others in being not one but three charters, granting corporate status the city, a university, and a city militia. Previous practice was to establish schools and also militia units by separate acts. The University of the City of Nauvoo, governed by the city council, was the only city-operated university in the state.

One important provision stated that the Nauvoo Council could pass any ordinances not repugnant to the constitutions of the United States or that of Illinois. This, in effect, empowered the Nauvoo body to stand in a federated position with the Illinois General Assembly. Ordinances passed by the Nauvoo Council could be in direct violation or disregard of state law and still be valid in Nauvoo, provided they did not conflict with specific powers granted by the federal and state constitutions. Leaders of the city militia, known as the NAUVOO LEGION, and the university trustees could also pass laws, limited only by state and federal constitutions.

Almost at once this power became a focal point of misunderstanding and controversy, though the same delegation of authority was also in three of the other five city charters. Since this provision was not unique, adverse reaction to it clearly had a good deal to do with how others viewed Latter-day Saints and the implementation of the provision by Nauvoo and its leaders. The Nauvoo Municipal Court, the third such court provided for by the Illinois General Assembly, also became a point of contention. While the city courts of Chicago and Alton convened under one judge, the principal Nauvoo judge was the mayor of the city, sitting as chief justice, with the aldermen as associate justices. Adversaries argued that the way Joseph Smith, as mayor of Nauvoo, used the legislative and judicial powers granted by law resulted in "anti-republican" abuses.

In granting the charter, some legislators may have hoped to protect Latter-day Saints from PERSECUTION, but it proved to be a two-edged sword. When the Illinois majority turned against Nauvoo but lacked legal tools to curb the city's power and influence, it turned to extralegal means. Later, after violence, it also succeeded in getting Nauvoo's charter repealed. Although based solidly on precedents not termed "anti-republican" until Latter-day Saints obtained and used them, the Nauvoo Charter nevertheless ultimately fell short of providing the Saints the peace and protection they desired.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, James L., Jr. "The Nauvoo Charter: A Reinterpretation." Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 54 (Spring 1971):66-78.

JAMES L. KIMBALL, JR.

---

NAUVOO ECONOMY

Nauvoo, for seven years the headquarters of the Church, was a river city with an agricultural hinterland set amid a preestablished, second-generation frontier society of non-Mormons. Founded in 1839 by LDS refugees from the MISSOURI CONFLICT, it existed as an LDS community only until 1846. Additions to its fast-growing population came mostly through new converts, many from England, who almost always brought skills and sometimes wealth. Though commerce in goods and services was brisk, Nauvoo's primary import was converts (see IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION), and its primary export, MISSIONARIES.

Nauvoo was neither communal nor communitarian. Still, the influences of the corporation of the Nauvoo, Illinois, 1859, by Johannes Schroeder (1859, oil on metal, 10" × 13"). Nauvoo was a Mississippi boom town, competing with several other communities for business. Through industry and organization, the Mormons and others in Nauvoo established successful businesses as printers, gunsmiths, coopers, farmers, and merchants.

Church pervaded society and economy. In Nauvoo, Joseph SMITH voiced a prophetic, hurrying urgency to build the city and its TEMPLE, an urgency that loomed over all. Nauvoo was the first full-scale model of the kingdom of God on earth as envisioned by Joseph Smith. The Nauvoo Saints thus directed great energy toward "building up the Kingdom," which, in economic terms, meant building the city and establishing its economic infrastructure.

Like other communities of its day, Nauvoo had blacksmiths, coopers, potters, gunsmiths, and tinsmiths, but most in demand were the sawyers, brick makers, and carpenters. Construction was the principal industry. The hamlet of Commerce, Illinois, whose site Nauvoo overran, had few buildings, so the demand for housing was great. The Saints did not envision group housing in the fashion of Moravians, Shakers, and other communitarian societies, but they wanted detached single-family dwellings of Anglo-American rural tradition. The same was true for commercial and industrial buildings. With numerous small buildings reared upon large lots in more or less orderly rows, organized in a grid of wide streets with open land between for outbuildings, gardens, orchards, and grazing plots, Nauvoo became the prototypical Mormon city (see CITY PLANNING).

Public works made up a major part of Nauvoo construction. Work never started on an ambitious plan to dam the Mississippi to facilitate industrial development, but work did begin on a canal across the town peninsula. The plan was to bypass the Des Moines Rapids of the Mississippi, an obstacle that made the site a river portage much of the year; but the project was abandoned when the workers encountered limestone bedrock. The stone was subsequently quarried for the NAUVOO TEMPLE.

The Nauvoo Temple, a focal point of Nauvoo religious and economic life, was essential for Nauvoo to be a literal manifestation of the kingdom. Temple building tested the religious zeal and the economic resources of all the Saints, both in Nauvoo and elsewhere. Residents were expected to "tithe for the temple" in time, goods, or money. Saints not yet gathered to Nauvoo were urged to do so quickly so that they could be part of the enterprise. Those who could not do so were to support temple construction with cash. The Twelve Apostles wrote the English Saints in 1841, "The first great object before us, and the Saints generally, is to [complete] the Temple . . . to secure the salvation of the Church" (HC 4:449). For Joseph Smith, completion of the temple was the first priority. The 1841 revelation authorizing the temple also threatened rejection of the Church unless the building was completed in "a sufficient time" (D&C 124:30–32). Even so, when Joseph Smith was killed in 1844, the walls were only half built.

Though building the temple was a labor of love, its economic cost put a severe drain on the city's resources. Capital was diverted from enterprises needed to provide goods and employment. Even Joseph Smith, though enthusiastic about the temple, recognized the problem. "I prophesy," he said in 1843, that "as soon as we get the Temple built, so that we shall not be obliged to exhaust our means thereon, we will have means to gather the Saints by thousands and tens of thousands" (HC 5:255).

Nauvoo's economy developed during the national depression of 1839–1843. The refugee founders were virtually destitute, but few Americans of any station had sound money during that period. The banks had failed, and specie had fled. The Saints fashioned an ingenious but shaky exchange system based on barter, letters of credit, informal IOUs, and "bonds-for-deed"—bonds given in land sales in lieu of deeds, a necessity because the whole Nauvoo tract was purchased on a long-term contract without deed until full payment. The system worked because the economy was generally expanding and the Saints trusted each other and were bound by common purpose.

The land purchase, the temple, the NAUVOO HOUSE (a large hotel), and the whole kingdom-building project upon which the Saints believed their salvation depended were headed by Joseph Smith and his ecclesiastical organization. Because Nauvoo represented an intermingling of the sacred and the secular under a prophet-leader, when he was killed in 1844, the survival of the project depended upon how and by whom he was succeeded (see SUCCESSION IN THE PRESIDENCY). Those who accepted the leadership of Brigham YOUNG and the Quorum of the Twelve transplanted the system of political economy fashioned in Nauvoo to the West (see PIONEER ECONOMY; WESTWARD MIGRATION, PLANNING AND PROPHECY). Some who did not and who chose to move away from the model of Nauvoo

later joined the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Flanders, Robert. Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi. Urbana, Ill., 1965.
- Miller, David, and Della Miller. Nauvoo: The City of Joseph. Santa Barbara and Salt Lake City, 1974.
- Rowley, Dennis. "Nauvoo: A River Town." BYU Studies 18 (Winter 1978):255–72.

ROBERT B. FLANDERS

---

NAUVOO EXPOSITOR

The Nauvoo Expositor was the newspaper voice of APOSTATES determined to destroy the Prophet Joseph SMITH and The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the spring of 1844. During the last few months of Joseph Smith's life, an opposition party of disgruntled members, apostates, and excommunicants coalesced into a dissenting church. The principals claimed to believe in the Book of Mormon and the RESTORATION OF THE GOSPEL, but rejected what they termed Nauvoo innovations, notably PLURAL MARRIAGE. Claiming that Joseph was a fallen PROPHET, the dissenters set out, through the Expositor, to expose the Prophet's supposed false teachings and abominations. They held secret meetings, made plans, and took oaths to topple the Church and kill Joseph Smith. The publication of the newspaper was crucial to their stratagem.

When the press for the Expositor arrived in Nauvoo on May 7, 1844, it stirred great excitement among Mormons and non-Mormons alike, but there was no immediate interference. Within three days the owners, all leaders of the opposition movement, issued a broadside prospectus for their newspaper. One month later, on June 7, the first and only issue of the Nauvoo Expositor appeared and caused an immediate furor in the community. Nauvoo residents were incensed at what they saw as its sensational, yellow-journalistic claims about Nauvoo religion, politics, and morality. They were also struck with sharp foreboding. Francis Higbee, one of the proprietors of the newspaper, set an ominous tone when he described Joseph Smith as "the biggest villain that goes unhung."

The literary quality of the paper was inferior. A contemporary non-Mormon critic described it as port temple construction with cash. The Twelve Apostles wrote the English Saints in 1841, "The first great object before us, and the Saints generally, is to [complete] the Temple . . . to secure the salvation of the Church" (HC 4:449). For Joseph Smith, completion of the temple was the first priority. The 1841 revelation authorizing the temple also threatened rejection of the Church unless the building was completed in "a sufficient time" (D&C 124:30–32). Even so, when Joseph Smith was killed in 1844, the walls were only half built.

Though building the temple was a labor of love, its economic cost put a severe drain on the city's resources. Capital was diverted from enterprises needed to provide goods and employment. Even Joseph Smith, though enthusiastic about the temple, recognized the problem. "I prophesy," he said in 1843, that "as soon as we get the Temple built, so that we shall not be obliged to exhaust our means thereon, we will have means to gather the Saints by thousands and tens of thousands" (HC 5:255).

Nauvoo's economy developed during the national depression of 1839–1843. The refugee founders were virtually destitute, but few Americans of any station had sound money during that period. The banks had failed, and specie had fled. The Saints fashioned an ingenious but shaky exchange system based on barter, letters of credit, informal IOUs, and "bonds-for-deed"—bonds given in land sales in lieu of deeds, a necessity because the whole Nauvoo tract was purchased on a long-term contract without deed until full payment. The system worked because the economy was generally expanding and the Saints trusted each other and were bound by common purpose.

The land purchase, the temple, the NAUVOO HOUSE (a large hotel), and the whole kingdom-building project upon which the Saints believed their salvation depended were headed by Joseph Smith and his ecclesiastical organization. Because Nauvoo represented an intermingling of the sacred and the secular under a prophet-leader, when he was killed in 1844, the survival of the project depended upon how and by whom he was succeeded (see SUCCESSION IN THE PRESIDENCY). Those who accepted the leadership of Brigham YOUNG and the Quorum of the Twelve transplanted the system of political economy fashioned in Nauvoo to the West (see PIONEER ECONOMY; WESTWARD MIGRATION, PLANNING AND PROPHECY). Some who did not and who chose to move away from the model of Nauvoo

later joined the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Flanders, Robert. Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi. Urbana, Ill., 1965.
- Miller, David, and Della Miller. Nauvoo: The City of Joseph. Santa Barbara and Salt Lake City, 1974.
- Rowley, Dennis. "Nauvoo: A River Town." BYU Studies 18 (Winter 1978):255–72.

ROBERT B. FLANDERS

---

NAUVOO EXPOSITOR

The Nauvoo Expositor was the newspaper voice of APOSTATES determined to destroy the Prophet Joseph SMITH and The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the spring of 1844. During the last few months of Joseph Smith's life, an opposition party of disgruntled members, apostates, and excommunicants coalesced into a dissenting church. The principals claimed to believe in the Book of Mormon and the RESTORATION OF THE GOSPEL, but rejected what they termed Nauvoo innovations, notably PLURAL MARRIAGE. Claiming that Joseph was a fallen PROPHET, the dissenters set out, through the Expositor, to expose the Prophet's supposed false teachings and abominations. They held secret meetings, made plans, and took oaths to topple the Church and kill Joseph Smith. The publication of the newspaper was crucial to their stratagem.

When the press for the Expositor arrived in Nauvoo on May 7, 1844, it stirred great excitement among Mormons and non-Mormons alike, but there was no immediate interference. Within three days the owners, all leaders of the opposition movement, issued a broadside prospectus for their newspaper. One month later, on June 7, the first and only issue of the Nauvoo Expositor appeared and caused an immediate furor in the community. Nauvoo residents were incensed at what they saw as its sensational, yellow-journalistic claims about Nauvoo religion, politics, and morality. They were also struck with sharp foreboding. Francis Higbee, one of the proprietors of the newspaper, set an ominous tone when he described Joseph Smith as "the biggest villain that goes unhung."

The literary quality of the paper was inferior. A contemporary non-Mormon critic described it as “dull or laughable,” with “lame grammar and turgid rhetoric” (Oaks, p. 868). But the Expositor’s polemics against the Church and Joseph Smith were threatening and polarizing. The anti-Mormons were exultant about the Expositor, but Church members demanded that something be done.

As mayor of Nauvoo, Joseph Smith summoned the city council. Following fourteen hours of deliberation in three different sessions, the council resolved on Monday, June 10, about 6:30 P.M., that the newspaper and its printing office were “a public nuisance” and instructed the mayor “to remove it . . . without delay.” Joseph Smith promptly ordered the city marshal to destroy the press and burn all copies of the paper. At 8:00 P.M. the marshal carried out the mayor’s orders (HC 6:432–49). That action, justified or not, played into the hands of the opposition. It riled anti-Mormon sentiment throughout Hancock County and provided substance for the charges used by the opposition to hold Joseph Smith in CARTHAGE JAIL, where he was murdered on June 27, 1844 (see MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Godfrey, Kenneth W. “Causes of Mormon/Non-Mormon Conflict in Hancock County, Illinois, 1839–1846.” Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1967.
- Oaks, Dallin H. “The Suppression of the Nauvoo Expositor.” Utah Law Review 9 (Winter 1965):862–903.
- Oaks, Dallin H., and Marvin S. Hill. Carthage Conspiracy: The Trial of the Accused Assassins of Joseph Smith. Urbana, Ill., 1979.

REED C. DURHAM, JR.

NAUVOO HOUSE

A revelation to Joseph Smith in January 1841 commanded the Saints to build both the NAUVOO TEMPLE and the Nauvoo House, a hotel that would be “a delightful habitation for man, and a resting place for the weary traveler” (D&C 124:60). The Saints were not to isolate themselves from the world, but to provide attractive accommodations for strangers and tourists while they “contemplate the word of the Lord; and the corner-stone I have appointed for Zion” (D&C 124:23).

Joseph Smith donated the land for the Nauvoo House, and many Latter-day Saints purchased

One of the first projects of the Church in Nauvoo was to build a hotel called the Nauvoo House. This uniface stock certificate was issued by the Nauvoo House Association, an Illinois corporation. In D&C 124, many Church members were called upon by name to invest capital in this project. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

stock. The design of architects Lucien Woodworth and William Weeks called for an L-shaped brick building forty feet deep and three stories high. Construction began in the spring of 1841 and progressed (with interruptions) into 1845. Eventually, the work was discontinued in an effort to complete the Nauvoo Temple.

When the Saints left Nauvoo in 1846, the Nauvoo House walls were up above the windows of the second story. The large unfinished building on the south end of Main Street facing the Mississippi River became the property of Joseph Smith’s widow, Emma SMITH. Subsequently, Emma’s second husband, Lewis C. Bidamon, tore down the extremities of the L-shaped structure and used their bricks to complete the central portion as a smaller hotel, variously known as the Bidamon House and the Riverside Mansion. He and Emma lived there from 1871 until they died. After Bidamon’s death, the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS purchased the Nauvoo House and still owns it.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Flanders, Robert Bruce. Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi, pp. 179–90. Urbana, Ill., 1965.
- Holzappel, Richard N., and T. Jeffery Cottle. Old Mormon Nauvoo, 1839–1846. Provo, Utah, 1990.

HELENE HOLT

NAUVOO LEGION

The Illinois legislative act of December 1840 that incorporated the city of Nauvoo also authorized creation of a military body or militia that came to “dull or laughable,” with “lame grammar and turgid rhetoric” (Oaks, p. 868). But the Expositor’s polemics against the Church and Joseph Smith were threatening and polarizing. The anti-Mormons were exultant about the Expositor, but Church members demanded that something be done.

As mayor of Nauvoo, Joseph Smith summoned the city council. Following fourteen hours of deliberation in three different sessions, the council resolved on Monday, June 10, about 6:30 P.M., that the newspaper and its printing office were “a public nuisance” and instructed the mayor “to remove it . . . without delay.” Joseph Smith promptly ordered the city marshal to destroy the press and burn all copies of the paper. At 8:00 P.M. the marshal carried out the mayor’s orders (HC 6:432–49). That action, justified or not, played into the hands of the opposition. It riled anti-Mormon sentiment throughout Hancock County and provided substance for the charges used by the opposition to hold Joseph Smith in CARTHAGE JAIL, where he was murdered on June 27, 1844 (see MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Godfrey, Kenneth W. “Causes of Mormon/Non-Mormon Conflict in Hancock County, Illinois, 1839–1846.” Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1967.
- Oaks, Dallin H. “The Suppression of the Nauvoo Expositor.” Utah Law Review 9 (Winter 1965):862–903.
- Oaks, Dallin H., and Marvin S. Hill. Carthage Conspiracy: The Trial of the Accused Assassins of Joseph Smith. Urbana, Ill., 1979.

REED C. DURHAM, JR.

NAUVOO HOUSE

A revelation to Joseph Smith in January 1841 commanded the Saints to build both the NAUVOO TEMPLE and the Nauvoo House, a hotel that would be “a delightful habitation for man, and a resting place for the weary traveler” (D&C 124:60). The Saints were not to isolate themselves from the world, but to provide attractive accommodations for strangers and tourists while they “contemplate the word of the Lord; and the corner-stone I have appointed for Zion” (D&C 124:23).

Joseph Smith donated the land for the Nauvoo House, and many Latter-day Saints purchased

One of the first projects of the Church in Nauvoo was to build a hotel called the Nauvoo House. This uniface stock certificate was issued by the Nauvoo House Association, an Illinois corporation. In D&C 124, many Church members were called upon by name to invest capital in this project. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

stock. The design of architects Lucien Woodworth and William Weeks called for an L-shaped brick building forty feet deep and three stories high. Construction began in the spring of 1841 and progressed (with interruptions) into 1845. Eventually, the work was discontinued in an effort to complete the Nauvoo Temple.

When the Saints left Nauvoo in 1846, the Nauvoo House walls were up above the windows of the second story. The large unfinished building on the south end of Main Street facing the Mississippi River became the property of Joseph Smith’s widow, Emma SMITH. Subsequently, Emma’s second husband, Lewis C. Bidamon, tore down the extremities of the L-shaped structure and used their bricks to complete the central portion as a smaller hotel, variously known as the Bidamon House and the Riverside Mansion. He and Emma lived there from 1871 until they died. After Bidamon’s death, the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS purchased the Nauvoo House and still owns it.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Flanders, Robert Bruce. Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi, pp. 179–90. Urbana, Ill., 1965.
- Holzappel, Richard N., and T. Jeffery Cottle. Old Mormon Nauvoo, 1839–1846. Provo, Utah, 1990.

HELENE HOLT

NAUVOO LEGION

The Illinois legislative act of December 1840 that incorporated the city of Nauvoo also authorized creation of a military body or militia that came to “dull or laughable,” with “lame grammar and turgid rhetoric” (Oaks, p. 868). But the Expositor’s polemics against the Church and Joseph Smith were threatening and polarizing. The anti-Mormons were exultant about the Expositor, but Church members demanded that something be done.

As mayor of Nauvoo, Joseph Smith summoned the city council. Following fourteen hours of deliberation in three different sessions, the council resolved on Monday, June 10, about 6:30 P.M., that the newspaper and its printing office were “a public nuisance” and instructed the mayor “to remove it . . . without delay.” Joseph Smith promptly ordered the city marshal to destroy the press and burn all copies of the paper. At 8:00 P.M. the marshal carried out the mayor’s orders (HC 6:432–49). That action, justified or not, played into the hands of the opposition. It riled anti-Mormon sentiment throughout Hancock County and provided substance for the charges used by the opposition to hold Joseph Smith in CARTHAGE JAIL, where he was murdered on June 27, 1844 (see MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Godfrey, Kenneth W. “Causes of Mormon/Non-Mormon Conflict in Hancock County, Illinois, 1839–1846.” Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1967.
- Oaks, Dallin H. “The Suppression of the Nauvoo Expositor.” Utah Law Review 9 (Winter 1965):862–903.
- Oaks, Dallin H., and Marvin S. Hill. Carthage Conspiracy: The Trial of the Accused Assassins of Joseph Smith. Urbana, Ill., 1979.

REED C. DURHAM, JR.

NAUVOO HOUSE

A revelation to Joseph Smith in January 1841 commanded the Saints to build both the NAUVOO TEMPLE and the Nauvoo House, a hotel that would be “a delightful habitation for man, and a resting place for the weary traveler” (D&C 124:60). The Saints were not to isolate themselves from the world, but to provide attractive accommodations for strangers and tourists while they “contemplate the word of the Lord; and the corner-stone I have appointed for Zion” (D&C 124:23).

Joseph Smith donated the land for the Nauvoo House, and many Latter-day Saints purchased

One of the first projects of the Church in Nauvoo was to build a hotel called the Nauvoo House. This uniface stock certificate was issued by the Nauvoo House Association, an Illinois corporation. In D&C 124, many Church members were called upon by name to invest capital in this project. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

stock. The design of architects Lucien Woodworth and William Weeks called for an L-shaped brick building forty feet deep and three stories high. Construction began in the spring of 1841 and progressed (with interruptions) into 1845. Eventually, the work was discontinued in an effort to complete the Nauvoo Temple.

When the Saints left Nauvoo in 1846, the Nauvoo House walls were up above the windows of the second story. The large unfinished building on the south end of Main Street facing the Mississippi River became the property of Joseph Smith’s widow, Emma SMITH. Subsequently, Emma’s second husband, Lewis C. Bidamon, tore down the extremities of the L-shaped structure and used their bricks to complete the central portion as a smaller hotel, variously known as the Bidamon House and the Riverside Mansion. He and Emma lived there from 1871 until they died. After Bidamon’s death, the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS purchased the Nauvoo House and still owns it.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Flanders, Robert Bruce. Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi, pp. 179–90. Urbana, Ill., 1965.
- Holzappel, Richard N., and T. Jeffery Cottle. Old Mormon Nauvoo, 1839–1846. Provo, Utah, 1990.

HELENE HOLT

NAUVOO LEGION

The Illinois legislative act of December 1840 that incorporated the city of Nauvoo also authorized creation of a military body or militia that came to be known as the Nauvoo Legion. Perhaps influenced by genuine disgust with the way the Latter-day Saints had been treated in Missouri, the Illinois legislature acted liberally. Under the NAUVOO CHARTER, Latter-day Saints could manage their own affairs, provided they did not violate the state or federal constitutions.

The organization of a militia unit was customary in settlements with sufficient population, a practice as old as the Republic. Nauvoo residents were particularly anxious to have their own military protection after having been victims of mob violence and having suffered expulsion from Missouri (see HAUN'S MILL MASSACRE; MISSOURI

Lieut. Gen. Joseph Smith, by Sutcliffe Maudsley (1842, egg tempera on paper, 9" × 5"). On June 25, 1842, Joseph Smith sat for this portrait in uniform as leader of the citizen-militia Nauvoo Legion. Militia units like this were common in the area and were helpful in protecting citizens' rights and property. This artist is the only known painter who created portraits of Joseph Smith from life (discussed in detail, Ensign 11 [Mar. 1981]:62–73). Courtesy Buddy Youngreen.

CONFLICT). By 1840, they realized that they could not always rely on federal or state authorities for protection from such violence.

The Nauvoo Court Martial, consisting of the legion's commissioned officers, was given extensive authority. Among other things, it could "make, ordain, establish, and execute all such laws and ordinances as may be considered necessary for the benefit, government, and regulation of said Legion; provided [that] said Court Martial shall pass no law or act, repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the Constitution of the United States, or of this State [Illinois]" (HC 4:244).

As part of the state militia, the Nauvoo Legion was at the disposal of the governor of Illinois "for the public defense, and the execution of the laws of the State or of the United States." Significantly, it was also at the disposal of the mayor of Nauvoo for "executing the laws and ordinances of the city corporation" (HC 4:244).

The city council ordinance that created the Nauvoo Legion authorized the rank of lieutenant general for its commanding officer, an extraordinary authorization, since no other militia officer in the United States held rank above that of major general. The court martial elected Joseph Smith, commander of the legion.

The parades and other activities of the legion—which included mock battles—attracted visitors from near and far. Indeed, the legion became so popular that many non-Mormons joined the ranks. At its peak, it is said to have numbered 5,000 men, the largest such body in Illinois. But there were problems. According to historian B. H. Roberts:

[The Nauvoo Legion] excited the jealousy and envy of the rest of the militia in surrounding counties, and all the laudable efforts of the legion to become an efficient body with a view of assisting in the execution of the state and national laws, if occasion should require, were construed by their enemies to mean a preparation for rebellion. . . . Hence that which was to be a bulwark to the city, and a protection to the saints, was transformed by their enemies into an occasion of offense, and an excuse for distrusting them [CHC 2:59–60].

Joseph SMITH mobilized the Nauvoo Legion to defend the city and declared martial law in June 1844 as tensions mounted between the Latter-day Saints, dissenters, and hostile neighbors. Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum were among those arrested by another Illinois militia and placed in CARTHAGE JAIL, where they were killed by members of yet another militia (see MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH). Six months later, the Illinois legislature revoked the Nauvoo Charter. At that point, the Nauvoo Legion ceased to exist as a state militia, although as an unofficial body it continued to provide some protection to the beleaguered Latter-day Saints.

During the exodus westward later, some former members of the Nauvoo Legion served in the MORMON BATTALION. This 500-man body, authorized by the U.S. government in 1846 as part of the campaign against Mexico, marched from Council Bluffs to San Diego.

The name Nauvoo Legion was revived in Utah and applied to the organized militia of the state of DESERET and later of UTAH TERRITORY. This legion was called upon in 1849 to subdue marauding Indians, and its members served in the so-called Walker War of 1853–1854, named after Wakara, a Ute chieftain. With the approach of the UTAH EXPEDITION in 1857–1858, the Utah militia harassed and burned U.S. Army supply trains and prepared, if necessary, to prevent the entry of U.S. troops into Salt Lake City. In 1862, during the American Civil War, two units of the Nauvoo Legion protected overland mail and telegraph lines. Later, with a force of some 2,500 men, it fought against Indians in Utah's Black Hawk War (1865–1868).

Always more responsive to Mormon leadership than to the federal appointees who succeeded Brigham Young as governor of Utah, the legion was rendered inactive by an 1870 proclamation of Acting Governor J. Wilson Shaffer, who forbade gatherings of the militia except on his express orders. The Nauvoo Legion was finally disbanded as a result of the Edmunds-Tucker Act of 1887. In 1894 the National Guard of Utah was organized as Utah's militia.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gardner, Hamilton. "The Nauvoo Legion, 1840–1845—A Unique Military Organization." Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 54 (Summer 1961):181–97.

PHILIP M. FLAMMER

NAUVOO NEIGHBOR

The Nauvoo Neighbor was a weekly newspaper published and edited by John TAYLOR in NAUVOO, Illinois, from May 3, 1843, through October 29, 1845. It replaced The Wasp (begun April 16, 1842, with William Smith as editor). Funded by subscriptions and advertising, the Neighbor regularly featured literature, science, religion, agriculture, manufacturing, commerce, and local, national, and international news. It reported actions of the state legislature, the Nauvoo City Council, and local courts.

As an advocate of truth, the Neighbor detailed conflicts involving the members of the Church, their neighbors, their enemies, and state and federal governments. It also carried correspondence between the Prophet Joseph SMITH and Henry Clay (both U.S. presidential candidates) as well as the letters between Emma SMITH and Governor Thomas Carlin concerning Joseph Smith's harassment by Missouri officials. It detailed the Nauvoo Expositor case and the events of the assassinations of Joseph and Hyrum SMITH in CARTHAGE JAIL, including other newspaper accounts and correspondence. The Nauvoo Neighbor is a valuable record of the events and attitudes in and around Nauvoo from 1843 to 1845.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Nauvoo Neighbor. Microfilm, Lee Library, Brigham Young University.

DARWIN L. HAYES

NAUVOO POLITICS

Political power played an important role both in the development of the LDS community in Illinois and in its demise. The political situation was complex, inviting rivalry and controversy.

On the eve of the arrival of the Latter-day Saints, Commerce (NAUVOO), in Hancock County, Illinois, was situated in a pro-Whig enclave in a state where Democrats dominated all political offices except the supreme court. In Hancock County, however, the two parties were so evenly matched that a few hundred votes could be decisive. But in the state legislature, even voting as a unit, a community the size of that of the Latter-day Saints could have only moderate influence. County offices were more vulnerable; the number of votes needed for election to such offices as sheriff, county commissioner, and probate judge was under one thousand. A liberal provision in the Illinois constitution enfranchised all adult immigrants

bers of yet another militia (see MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH). Six months later, the Illinois legislature revoked the Nauvoo Charter. At that point, the Nauvoo Legion ceased to exist as a state militia, although as an unofficial body it continued to provide some protection to the beleaguered Latter-day Saints.

During the exodus westward later, some former members of the Nauvoo Legion served in the MORMON BATTALION. This 500-man body, authorized by the U.S. government in 1846 as part of the campaign against Mexico, marched from Council Bluffs to San Diego.

The name Nauvoo Legion was revived in Utah and applied to the organized militia of the state of DESERET and later of UTAH TERRITORY. This legion was called upon in 1849 to subdue marauding Indians, and its members served in the so-called Walker War of 1853–1854, named after Wakara, a Ute chieftain. With the approach of the UTAH EXPEDITION in 1857–1858, the Utah militia harassed and burned U.S. Army supply trains and prepared, if necessary, to prevent the entry of U.S. troops into Salt Lake City. In 1862, during the American Civil War, two units of the Nauvoo Legion protected overland mail and telegraph lines. Later, with a force of some 2,500 men, it fought against Indians in Utah's Black Hawk War (1865–1868).

Always more responsive to Mormon leadership than to the federal appointees who succeeded Brigham Young as governor of Utah, the legion was rendered inactive by an 1870 proclamation of Acting Governor J. Wilson Shaffer, who forbade gatherings of the militia except on his express orders. The Nauvoo Legion was finally disbanded as a result of the Edmunds-Tucker Act of 1887. In 1894 the National Guard of Utah was organized as Utah's militia.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gardner, Hamilton. "The Nauvoo Legion, 1840–1845—A Unique Military Organization." Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 54 (Summer 1961):181–97.

PHILIP M. FLAMMER

NAUVOO NEIGHBOR

The Nauvoo Neighbor was a weekly newspaper published and edited by John TAYLOR in NAUVOO, Illinois, from May 3, 1843, through October 29, 1845. It replaced The Wasp (begun April 16, 1842, with William Smith as editor). Funded by subscriptions and advertising, the Neighbor regularly featured literature, science, religion, agriculture, manufacturing, commerce, and local, national, and international news. It reported actions of the state legislature, the Nauvoo City Council, and local courts.

As an advocate of truth, the Neighbor detailed conflicts involving the members of the Church, their neighbors, their enemies, and state and federal governments. It also carried correspondence between the Prophet Joseph SMITH and Henry Clay (both U.S. presidential candidates) as well as the letters between Emma SMITH and Governor Thomas Carlin concerning Joseph Smith's harassment by Missouri officials. It detailed the Nauvoo Expositor case and the events of the assassinations of Joseph and Hyrum SMITH in CARTHAGE JAIL, including other newspaper accounts and correspondence. The Nauvoo Neighbor is a valuable record of the events and attitudes in and around Nauvoo from 1843 to 1845.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Nauvoo Neighbor. Microfilm, Lee Library, Brigham Young University.

DARWIN L. HAYES

NAUVOO POLITICS

Political power played an important role both in the development of the LDS community in Illinois and in its demise. The political situation was complex, inviting rivalry and controversy.

On the eve of the arrival of the Latter-day Saints, Commerce (NAUVOO), in Hancock County, Illinois, was situated in a pro-Whig enclave in a state where Democrats dominated all political offices except the supreme court. In Hancock County, however, the two parties were so evenly matched that a few hundred votes could be decisive. But in the state legislature, even voting as a unit, a community the size of that of the Latter-day Saints could have only moderate influence. County offices were more vulnerable; the number of votes needed for election to such offices as sheriff, county commissioner, and probate judge was under one thousand. A liberal provision in the Illinois constitution enfranchised all adult immigrants

bers of yet another militia (see MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH). Six months later, the Illinois legislature revoked the Nauvoo Charter. At that point, the Nauvoo Legion ceased to exist as a state militia, although as an unofficial body it continued to provide some protection to the beleaguered Latter-day Saints.

During the exodus westward later, some former members of the Nauvoo Legion served in the MORMON BATTALION. This 500-man body, authorized by the U.S. government in 1846 as part of the campaign against Mexico, marched from Council Bluffs to San Diego.

The name Nauvoo Legion was revived in Utah and applied to the organized militia of the state of DESERET and later of UTAH TERRITORY. This legion was called upon in 1849 to subdue marauding Indians, and its members served in the so-called Walker War of 1853–1854, named after Wakara, a Ute chieftain. With the approach of the UTAH EXPEDITION in 1857–1858, the Utah militia harassed and burned U.S. Army supply trains and prepared, if necessary, to prevent the entry of U.S. troops into Salt Lake City. In 1862, during the American Civil War, two units of the Nauvoo Legion protected overland mail and telegraph lines. Later, with a force of some 2,500 men, it fought against Indians in Utah's Black Hawk War (1865–1868).

Always more responsive to Mormon leadership than to the federal appointees who succeeded Brigham Young as governor of Utah, the legion was rendered inactive by an 1870 proclamation of Acting Governor J. Wilson Shaffer, who forbade gatherings of the militia except on his express orders. The Nauvoo Legion was finally disbanded as a result of the Edmunds-Tucker Act of 1887. In 1894 the National Guard of Utah was organized as Utah's militia.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gardner, Hamilton. "The Nauvoo Legion, 1840–1845—A Unique Military Organization." Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 54 (Summer 1961):181–97.

PHILIP M. FLAMMER

NAUVOO NEIGHBOR

The Nauvoo Neighbor was a weekly newspaper published and edited by John TAYLOR in NAUVOO, Illinois, from May 3, 1843, through October 29, 1845. It replaced The Wasp (begun April 16, 1842, with William Smith as editor). Funded by subscriptions and advertising, the Neighbor regularly featured literature, science, religion, agriculture, manufacturing, commerce, and local, national, and international news. It reported actions of the state legislature, the Nauvoo City Council, and local courts.

As an advocate of truth, the Neighbor detailed conflicts involving the members of the Church, their neighbors, their enemies, and state and federal governments. It also carried correspondence between the Prophet Joseph SMITH and Henry Clay (both U.S. presidential candidates) as well as the letters between Emma SMITH and Governor Thomas Carlin concerning Joseph Smith's harassment by Missouri officials. It detailed the Nauvoo Expositor case and the events of the assassinations of Joseph and Hyrum SMITH in CARTHAGE JAIL, including other newspaper accounts and correspondence. The Nauvoo Neighbor is a valuable record of the events and attitudes in and around Nauvoo from 1843 to 1845.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Nauvoo Neighbor. Microfilm, Lee Library, Brigham Young University.

DARWIN L. HAYES

NAUVOO POLITICS

Political power played an important role both in the development of the LDS community in Illinois and in its demise. The political situation was complex, inviting rivalry and controversy.

On the eve of the arrival of the Latter-day Saints, Commerce (NAUVOO), in Hancock County, Illinois, was situated in a pro-Whig enclave in a state where Democrats dominated all political offices except the supreme court. In Hancock County, however, the two parties were so evenly matched that a few hundred votes could be decisive. But in the state legislature, even voting as a unit, a community the size of that of the Latter-day Saints could have only moderate influence. County offices were more vulnerable; the number of votes needed for election to such offices as sheriff, county commissioner, and probate judge was under one thousand. A liberal provision in the Illinois constitution enfranchised all adult immigrants after only six months' residence—a contentious issue in a state where party lines were sharply drawn, especially with the regular arrival of new British immigrants in Nauvoo (see IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION).

Joseph Smith's decision to use LDS voting strength sprang from a desire for security from PERSECUTION and for self-government. Conscience of the divine imperative to gather the Saints and build the physical KINGDOM OF GOD on earth, he came to see politics as one means of enlarging and protecting his community. At first, the Saints were politically neutral. But in 1840–1841 they voted solidly Whig in Illinois, though they had voted Democrat in Missouri. This alienated some Democrats, but most politicians courted the LDS bloc vote in Illinois, just as others courted the Roman Catholic vote in New York.

The first example of possible “vote trading” by Latter-day Saints was the legislative vote in favor of the NAUVOO CHARTER in December 1840, promoted by Democrats but also voted for by the Whig Abraham Lincoln. The resulting Nauvoo Municipal Court, NAUVOO LEGION, and Agricultural and Manufacturing Association formed the backbone of a self-governing theocracy, which was anathema to frontier Illinoisans.

The prevalence of lawyer-politicians and the frequency of Missouri arrest warrants enmeshed Joseph Smith in vote trading. One clear example was LDS support for the Whig John T. Stuart in the congressional election of 1841, a direct result of assistance rendered to Joseph Smith by the Whigs Orville H. Browning and Cyrus Walker when Smith was arrested following a Missouri extradition order. Joseph Smith was technically a fugitive, having fled Missouri after six months in LIBERTY JAIL awaiting trial (see SMITH, JOSEPH: TRIALS OF JOSEPH SMITH). However, not all lawyers were Whigs. The judge in the 1841 case was Stephen A. Douglas, an ambitious Democrat determined to win the LDS vote. His efforts were successful in December 1841 when Joseph Smith declared for the Democrats; Hancock County subsequently lost its Whig identity.

Seeing Nauvoo as a political threat, non-Mormons in Hancock County organized politically on an anti-Mormon platform. Successful in the county elections in 1841 (they were unopposed in many contests), they were singularly unsuccessful in 1842 with nominations for the state legislature. Existing partisan affiliations were too strong for the emergence of a third party, and the Whigs had usurped the anti-Mormon cause in the 1842 gubernatorial elections. The Democratic candidate for governor, Thomas Ford, an opponent of the Nauvoo Charter, won the election.

Governor Ford advised Joseph Smith to stay out of politics. Smith seemed inclined to do that until Ford, in June 1843, issued another writ for the Prophet's arrest on a Missouri requisition. After the Whig Cyrus Walker, a prominent criminal lawyer, using the controversial habeas corpus provisions of the Nauvoo Charter, effected Joseph Smith's release from custody, the Prophet pledged his vote to Walker. But his brother Hyrum SMITH, a Democrat, announced that he believed the Saints should vote for Walker's opponent, Joseph P. Hoge. The Latter-day Saints in Nauvoo, part of the Sixth Congressional District, voted for Hoge, but those in the Fifth Congressional District voted for the Whig O. H. Browning, running against Douglas.

This marked the beginning of disillusionment with the LDS vote by both parties. In particular the Whigs, who had retreated from anti-Mormonism in 1842–1843 in the hope of finding favor, now openly opposed LDS political and judicial power. In 1843, even within Nauvoo, Joseph Smith found politics problematic. There was internal dissent over city elections in February, and in August, Mayor Smith complained of being roughly treated by pro-Democrats in city elections. Also, the prominent Church leader William Law publicly challenged Hyrum's “Hoge testimony.”

In January 1844, after canvassing U.S. presidential hopefuls for support in obtaining redress for Missouri depredations and finding none, Joseph Smith announced his own candidacy. Some saw this as a bid for political power, consistent with the goal of furthering the political kingdom of God; others felt that because Joseph Smith was not likely to win national election, he simply wanted a platform for presenting his message. The leading anti-Mormon newspaper in Illinois, the Warsaw Signal, greeted the move with customary derision but nonetheless viewed it as an audacious and threatening development.

All Joseph Smith's attempts to gain political influence were objectionable to the apostate group that launched the NAUVOO EXPOSITOR newspaper, the destruction of which set in motion the events leading to Smith's death in June 1844 (see MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH). In this volatile atmosphere, anti-Mormons gained strength by accusing Governor Ford of pursuing pro-Mormon policies in order to secure Democratic votes. The Latter-day Saints gradually lost support until, in January 1845, their charter was repealed, disincorporating Nauvoo. Unauthorized municipal elections continued in Nauvoo, however, and Latter-day Saints voted in county and state elections, still favoring the Democrats. From then until the Saints left in 1846 (see WESTWARD MIGRATION, PLANNING AND PROPHECY), this persistent involvement of Mormons in politics continued to inflame non-Mormons and rally them to press for Mormon expulsion.

Politics and political power were indispensable to the rise and strength of Nauvoo and to the protection of the Prophet Joseph Smith. But mismanagement of political power may also have contributed to the city's downfall.

[See also Politics: Political History.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Flanders, Robert B. Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi. Urbana, Ill., 1965.
- Gayler, George R. "The Mormons and Politics in Illinois: 1839–1844." Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 49 (1956):48–66.
- Hampshire, Annette P. Mormonism in Conflict: The Nauvoo Years. New York, 1985.

ANNETTE P. HAMPSHIRE

---

NAUVOO TEMPLE

The Nauvoo Temple, its tower and spire visible from a distance of twenty miles, was the principal structure in the city of NAUVOO. Facing west, it stood on the summit of a gently sloping bluff overlooking the lower part of the city and the Mississippi River.

Built from a high-quality grayish-white to tan limestone, its imposing walls were erected and finished with great skill. The walls were three feet thick at ground level, with some individual stones weighing as much as 4,000 pounds. The building measured 128 feet long and 88 feet wide. The top of the tower stood 158 feet above ground level and was graced by a golden statue of an angel flying in a horizontal position (doubtless inspired by the prophecy in Rev. 14:6–7).

Prominent features of the stone walls were thirty tall, heavily ornamented pilasters, nine on each side and six on each end. Each pilaster was embellished by a large moonstone at the base and a sunstone at the top. The moon- and sunstones were bas-relief features, hand-chiseled in solid stone. A stone star also graced each pilaster. These cosmic symbols typified the three DEGREES OF GLORY in the life to come (1 Cor. 15:41; D&C 76).

Construction of the building began in the fall of 1840. Cornerstones were set with impressive ceremonies during a general CONFERENCE on April 6, 1841. Financial setbacks and persecution continually interfered with the construction, even up to the days of its completion and dedication.

William Weeks became the official architect and supervised most of the construction. The building was a complexity of architectural styles, yet much of it was also original, inspired by what the Prophet Joseph SMITH had seen in VISION. He closely guided Weeks in the design of the temple as he had seen it, requiring, for example, that it have round windows on the second level (HC 6:196–97).

The call to build so large a structure taxed the resources of a destitute people. The final cost exceeded $1,000,000. Funds came largely from tithes and offerings of Church members, some donating their life savings. Many gave months of physical labor with little or no remuneration, working from early morning until sundown, even during harsh weather.

Stone for the building was quarried near the city. Wood was brought in from Wisconsin in the form of huge rafts of sawed lumber, which were floated down the Mississippi to Nauvoo. Some British converts contributed a large bell weighing over 1,500 pounds. As the Saints left Nauvoo, the bell was removed and taken west as part of the migration, where it was later mounted on a tower on Temple Square, Salt Lake City.

The main feature at the basement level was a large white limestone laver resting on the backs and shoulders of twelve life-sized stone oxen. This was the baptismal font to be used particularly for the ORDINANCE OF BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD. The basement floor was paved with brick. The first story contained a large room in the center, which served as an auditorium. At each end of this large hall were elaborate pulpits, each graded into four tiers of seats to accommodate the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD and MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD

this volatile atmosphere, anti-Mormons gained strength by accusing Governor Ford of pursuing pro-Mormon policies in order to secure Democratic votes. The Latter-day Saints gradually lost support until, in January 1845, their charter was repealed, disincorporating Nauvoo. Unauthorized municipal elections continued in Nauvoo, however, and Latter-day Saints voted in county and state elections, still favoring the Democrats. From then until the Saints left in 1846 (see WESTWARD MIGRATION, PLANNING AND PROPHECY), this persistent involvement of Mormons in politics continued to inflame non-Mormons and rally them to press for Mormon expulsion.

Politics and political power were indispensable to the rise and strength of Nauvoo and to the protection of the Prophet Joseph Smith. But mismanagement of political power may also have contributed to the city's downfall.

[See also Politics: Political History.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Flanders, Robert B. Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi. Urbana, Ill., 1965.
- Gayler, George R. "The Mormons and Politics in Illinois: 1839–1844." Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society 49 (1956):48–66.
- Hampshire, Annette P. Mormonism in Conflict: The Nauvoo Years. New York, 1985.

ANNETTE P. HAMPSHIRE

---

NAUVOO TEMPLE

The Nauvoo Temple, its tower and spire visible from a distance of twenty miles, was the principal structure in the city of NAUVOO. Facing west, it stood on the summit of a gently sloping bluff overlooking the lower part of the city and the Mississippi River.

Built from a high-quality grayish-white to tan limestone, its imposing walls were erected and finished with great skill. The walls were three feet thick at ground level, with some individual stones weighing as much as 4,000 pounds. The building measured 128 feet long and 88 feet wide. The top of the tower stood 158 feet above ground level and was graced by a golden statue of an angel flying in a horizontal position (doubtless inspired by the prophecy in Rev. 14:6–7).

Prominent features of the stone walls were thirty tall, heavily ornamented pilasters, nine on each side and six on each end. Each pilaster was embellished by a large moonstone at the base and a sunstone at the top. The moon- and sunstones were bas-relief features, hand-chiseled in solid stone. A stone star also graced each pilaster. These cosmic symbols typified the three DEGREES OF GLORY in the life to come (1 Cor. 15:41; D&C 76).

Construction of the building began in the fall of 1840. Cornerstones were set with impressive ceremonies during a general CONFERENCE on April 6, 1841. Financial setbacks and persecution continually interfered with the construction, even up to the days of its completion and dedication.

William Weeks became the official architect and supervised most of the construction. The building was a complexity of architectural styles, yet much of it was also original, inspired by what the Prophet Joseph SMITH had seen in VISION. He closely guided Weeks in the design of the temple as he had seen it, requiring, for example, that it have round windows on the second level (HC 6:196–97).

The call to build so large a structure taxed the resources of a destitute people. The final cost exceeded $1,000,000. Funds came largely from tithes and offerings of Church members, some donating their life savings. Many gave months of physical labor with little or no remuneration, working from early morning until sundown, even during harsh weather.

Stone for the building was quarried near the city. Wood was brought in from Wisconsin in the form of huge rafts of sawed lumber, which were floated down the Mississippi to Nauvoo. Some British converts contributed a large bell weighing over 1,500 pounds. As the Saints left Nauvoo, the bell was removed and taken west as part of the migration, where it was later mounted on a tower on Temple Square, Salt Lake City.

The main feature at the basement level was a large white limestone laver resting on the backs and shoulders of twelve life-sized stone oxen. This was the baptismal font to be used particularly for the ORDINANCE OF BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD. The basement floor was paved with brick. The first story contained a large room in the center, which served as an auditorium. At each end of this large hall were elaborate pulpits, each graded into four tiers of seats to accommodate the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD and MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD leaders. The main floor was fitted with seats, the backs of which could be reversed, allowing congregations to face either direction. The second story was an exact duplicate of the first. The attic story contained two main sections. A half-story on the west end was divided by cloth partitions and used for the ENDOWMENT ordinances. The main attic section, under the pitched roof, was used for SEALING ordinances and celestial or eternal MARRIAGES. The entire attic was plastered and painted, and the floors were covered with carpets.

This model of the Nauvoo Temple (constructed 1841–1846) shows the sunstones and starstones at the tops of the columns and the moonstones at their bases. For Latter-day Saints, a holy temple is a meeting place where heaven and earth come into close contact. Baptisms for the dead were performed in the Nauvoo Temple beginning in 1841, endowments in 1845–1846.

Occasional ceremonial use took place during construction, especially baptisms for the dead. Even though not fully completed, the temple was filled to capacity by members coming for ordinances during the months just prior to the exodus—ordinances on behalf both of the living and the dead. In addition to its sacral uses, the temple served as a multipurpose meeting place. Regular Sunday services and even some general conferences were held in the building. The structure also provided some facilities as a Church office building. The planning and organization of the western migration took place in the temple.

As most of the Saints left Nauvoo under threat of mob violence in early February 1846, a special crew stayed behind and completed the temple. Three months later the building was considered complete and was publicly dedicated on May 1, 1846. Dedication services were repeated over a three-day period and witnessed by thousands. Visitors paid a one-dollar admission fee, and the funds were used to help workmen move their families and join the main body of the Church on the plains to the west.

When most of the remaining Church members were driven from the city in September of 1846, the temple was temporarily abandoned.

One of the few surviving sunstones from the Nauvoo Temple, at the Nauvoo State Park. Another sunstone is in the Smithsonian Museum, Washington, D.C.

Mob forces desecrated and defiled the sacred structure. Some physical damage, though not extensive, was sustained. Attempts were later made to sell the temple, but these proved unsuccessful. The building was consumed by fire in October 1848, by the deliberate act of arson. Only the bare walls were left standing. A French Icarian community purchased the site and was preparing to reclaim the structure when it was struck by a tornado, which knocked down some of the walls and damaged others so severely that they had to be razed. Much of the structural stone was later re-used in other Nauvoo buildings.

Today the temple site has been repurchased by the Church. A Nauvoo Temple exhibit is a key part of the Nauvoo Visitors Center. A small model built to scale is on the exact location of the original temple. The well that supplied water for the baptismal font is preserved. Some sunstones and moonstones that once adorned the building remain here and in museums as a reminder of the beauty of this once majestic temple.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Colvin, Don F. "A Historical Study of the Mormon Temple at Nauvoo, Illinois." Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1962.

Harrington, Virginia S. Rediscovery of the Nauvoo Temple. Salt Lake City, 1971.

DON F. COLVIN

NEHOR, NEHORISM

See: Antichrists; Secret Combinations

NEPHI<sub>1</sub>

The first of several leaders named Nephi in the Book of Mormon, Nephi<sub>1</sub> was an influential prophet and the founder of the NEPHITE people. He was apparently well-educated, faithful and obedient to God, courageous, and bold. An inspired prophet, he had visions of Jesus Christ and of the world's future; he also interpreted the prophecies of others, such as his father, LEHI, and Isaiah. He authored the first two books in the Book of Mormon, which provide virtually all known information about him. He was a skilled craftsman and leader, and succeeded Lehi as leader of the family (ahead of his three older brothers). Above all, he trusted in God: "My voice shall forever ascend up unto thee, my rock and mine everlasting God" (2 Ne. 4:35).

HISTORY. Nephi was born c. 615 B.C. His father, the prophet Lehi, led his family group out of Jerusalem just after 600 B.C., through the Arabian desert, and across the ocean to the Western Hemisphere. While in the wilderness, Nephi saw a vision that was to shape many of his basic views; it is partially reported in 1 Nephi 11–14. In the promised land, he was designated by his father to succeed him as leader of the family (2 Ne. 1:28–29), but his older brothers LAMAN and Lemuel rebelled and half the group associated with them. Nephi was inspired to flee with all who believed in the warnings and revelations of God (2 Ne. 5:6) and set up a new city, the city of Nephi.

Nephi established his people on sound political, legal, economic, and religious bases. They acclaimed him king, although he resisted this action initially. He taught them to be industrious and to provide for their needs, and he prepared them

One of the few surviving sunstones from the Nauvoo Temple, at the Nauvoo State Park. Another sunstone is in the Smithsonian Museum, Washington, D.C.

Mob forces desecrated and defiled the sacred structure. Some physical damage, though not extensive, was sustained. Attempts were later made to sell the temple, but these proved unsuccessful. The building was consumed by fire in October 1848, by the deliberate act of arson. Only the bare walls were left standing. A French Icarian community purchased the site and was preparing to reclaim the structure when it was struck by a tornado, which knocked down some of the walls and damaged others so severely that they had to be razed. Much of the structural stone was later re-used in other Nauvoo buildings.

Today the temple site has been repurchased by the Church. A Nauvoo Temple exhibit is a key part of the Nauvoo Visitors Center. A small model built to scale is on the exact location of the original temple. The well that supplied water for the baptismal font is preserved. Some sunstones and moonstones that once adorned the building remain here and in museums as a reminder of the beauty of this once majestic temple.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Colvin, Don F. "A Historical Study of the Mormon Temple at Nauvoo, Illinois." Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1962.

Harrington, Virginia S. Rediscovery of the Nauvoo Temple. Salt Lake City, 1971.

DON F. COLVIN

NEHOR, NEHORISM

See: Antichrists; Secret Combinations

NEPHI<sub>1</sub>

The first of several leaders named Nephi in the Book of Mormon, Nephi<sub>1</sub> was an influential prophet and the founder of the NEPHITE people. He was apparently well-educated, faithful and obedient to God, courageous, and bold. An inspired prophet, he had visions of Jesus Christ and of the world's future; he also interpreted the prophecies of others, such as his father, LEHI, and Isaiah. He authored the first two books in the Book of Mormon, which provide virtually all known information about him. He was a skilled craftsman and leader, and succeeded Lehi as leader of the family (ahead of his three older brothers). Above all, he trusted in God: "My voice shall forever ascend up unto thee, my rock and mine everlasting God" (2 Ne. 4:35).

HISTORY. Nephi was born c. 615 B.C. His father, the prophet Lehi, led his family group out of Jerusalem just after 600 B.C., through the Arabian desert, and across the ocean to the Western Hemisphere. While in the wilderness, Nephi saw a vision that was to shape many of his basic views; it is partially reported in 1 Nephi 11–14. In the promised land, he was designated by his father to succeed him as leader of the family (2 Ne. 1:28–29), but his older brothers LAMAN and Lemuel rebelled and half the group associated with them. Nephi was inspired to flee with all who believed in the warnings and revelations of God (2 Ne. 5:6) and set up a new city, the city of Nephi.

Nephi established his people on sound political, legal, economic, and religious bases. They acclaimed him king, although he resisted this action initially. He taught them to be industrious and to provide for their needs, and he prepared them with training and weapons for defense against their enemies. He followed the law of Moses, built a temple like the temple of Solomon (though without “so many precious things”), and anointed his younger brothers Jacob and Joseph as priests and teachers to instruct the people and lead them in spiritual matters (2 Ne. 5:10, 16, 26). Before he died, he appointed a new king (called the “second Nephi”; Jacob 1:11) and appointed his brother Jacob as the caretaker of religious records (Jacob 1:1–4, 18).

VISIONS. Because of the great visions and revelations he received, Nephi shared a role with his father as a founding prophet. At a young age he was inspired by the Holy Spirit and believed his father’s words. He heard the voice of the Lord telling him that he would become a ruler and teacher over his brothers (1 Ne. 2:22). He witnessed the vision of the TREE OF LIFE shown earlier to his father (1 Ne. 8), which showed him the future birth, baptism, and ministry of Jesus Christ, as well as the future rise and demise of his own people. He was shown also the future establishment of the Gentiles in the Western Hemisphere and the restoration of the gospel in their midst (1 Ne. 11–14). Because of these revelations, Nephi was able to teach his people the gospel or “doctrine of Christ”—the means by which they could come unto Christ and be saved (2 Ne. 30:5; 31:2–32:6). His carefully formulated teaching of this doctrine provided a model that other Nephite prophets invoked repeatedly (see GOSPEL).

Because the Nephites had received the fullness of the gospel of Jesus Christ, their strict observance of the LAW OF MOSES was oriented toward its ultimate fulfillment in Jesus, and Nephi explained to his people that they should observe the law of Moses as a means of keeping Christ’s future atonement always in their minds (2 Ne. 25:29–30). The law itself had become “dead” to those who were “made alive in Christ” and who knew that Jesus was the one to whom they could look directly “for a remission of their sins” (2 Ne. 25:25–27).

RECORD KEEPING AND LITERACY. Nephi founded the extensive Nephite tradition of record keeping (see BOOK OF MORMON PLATES AND RECORDS). He was inspired to keep two separate accounts, both of which were continued for hundreds of years. The official record kept by the kings, known as the large plates of Nephi, began with the book of Lehi and contained the historical chronicles of the Nephites for one thousand years. The GOLD PLATES given to Joseph Smith contained Mormon’s abridged version of Nephi’s large plates and provided most of the text for the Book of Mormon (from the book of Mosiah to the book of Mormon). However, thirty years after leaving Jerusalem, Nephi was instructed by God to compose a second record focusing on spiritual matters. Known as the small plates of Nephi, this record contains Nephi’s retrospective account of the founding events and subsequent prophecies of a line of prophets and priests that descended from Jacob down to about 200 B.C. The opening books in today’s printed Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi through Omni, come from this record. Nephi’s revelations and inspired teachings shaped the religious understanding of his followers, the Nephites.

When Nephi began writing his small plates, he was a mature prophet-king. The record reveals his concern with helping his people and their descendants to understand the future atonement of Jesus Christ and the legitimacy of his own calling as their ruler and teacher. In composing this record, Nephi used his father’s record and his own earlier and more comprehensive record, both unavailable today.

The exceptional literacy of the later Nephite leaders may have been due to the fact that Nephi was a man of letters. The text suggests that he was probably fluent in both Hebrew and Egyptian and states that he had been “taught somewhat in all the learning” of the Jews and of his father (1 Ne. 1:1–3).

Nephi displayed literary learning in the way he organized his writings and in the variety of literary forms and devices he employed, including those of narrative, rhetoric, and poetry, including a psalm. The techniques, stories, prophecies, and teachings of Nephi provided models and substance for his successors (see BOOK OF MORMON LITERATURE). He loved the writings of Isaiah and quoted them extensively (e.g., 1 Ne. 20–21; 2 Ne. 12–24), often providing interpretations.

THE MAN AND HIS MESSAGES. Nephi constructed the book of 1 Nephi on a tightly balanced and interrelated set of founding stories and revelations, all designed to show “that the tender mercies of the Lord are over all those whom he hath chosen, because of their faith, to make them mighty even unto the power of deliverance” (1 Ne.

1:20). Nephi supports this thesis in 1 Nephi with stories of how God has intervened in human affairs to deliver his faithful followers, and Nephi in particular, from their enemies. But these are only types and shadows. Nephi's true proof is set forth in 2 Nephi, where he says that the atonement of Jesus Christ makes available to all who have faith in Christ a liberation from sin and spiritual redemption from hell and the devil, their greatest enemy. All men and women who follow the example of Christ and enter into his way through repentance and baptism will be blessed with a baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost—which brings a remission of sin and individual guidance—so that they might endure to the end in faith and receive eternal life (2 Ne. 31).

Into a more spiritual account on his small plates, Nephi also wove a vivid defense of his own political primacy by using allusions to MOSES and JOSEPH OF EGYPT (Reynolds, 1987). In defending his ruling position as a younger son, Nephi tells how the two oldest sons rejected their father and the Lord and how he (Nephi) was selected and blessed by the Lord and his father. He relates how, with the help of the Lord, he acquired the brass plates (1 Ne. 3–4), persuaded Ishmael and his family to join Lehi's group (1 Ne. 7), prevented starvation in the wilderness (1 Ne. 16), and constructed a ship and sailed it successfully across the ocean (1 Ne. 17–18). In these exploits, Nephi was consistently opposed and threatened, even with death, by Laman and Lemuel; but in each crisis, he was miraculously delivered by the power of the Lord and blessed to complete his task.

Though unable to bridge the gulf between himself and his brothers, Nephi's writings reveal that he was a man with an impressive range of human sensitivities, and he yearned for their welfare. He developed his enormous faith in his father and in the Lord at a young age and never faltered. Consequently, he obeyed without murmuring. He pondered his father's prophecies and repeatedly asked the Lord for personal understanding and direction. He had a deep love and sense of responsibility for his people: "I pray continually for them by day, and mine eyes water my pillow by night, because of them" (2 Ne. 33:3). He also had charity for all other people. Nephi gloried in plainness and in truth, and he knew that his words were harsh against unrepentant sinners (2 Ne. 33:5–9). He anguished deeply because of temptations and his own sins, and particularly because of his feelings of anger against his enemies (2 Ne. 4:26–29). His spiritual strength and depth were grounded in the knowledge that Jesus Christ had heard his pleas and had redeemed his soul from hell (2 Ne. 33:6).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bergin, Allen E. "Nephi, A Universal Man." Ensign 6 (Sept. 1976):65–70.
- Cannon, George Q. The Life of Nephi. Salt Lake City, 1883; repr. 1957.
- Reynolds, Noel B. "Nephi's Outline." BYU Studies 20 (Winter 1980):131–49.
- . "The Political Dimension in Nephi's Small Plates." BYU Studies 27 (Fall 1987):15–37.
- Sondrup, Steven P. "The Psalm of Nephi: A Lyric Reading." BYU Studies 21 (Summer 1981):357–72.
- Turner, Rodney. "The Prophet Nephi." In The Book of Mormon: First Nephi, the Doctrinal Foundation, ed. M. Nyman and C. Tate, pp. 79–97. Provo, Utah, 1988.

NOEL B. REYNOLDS

---

NEPHI<sub>2</sub>

Nephi<sub>2</sub> succeeded his father HELAMAN<sub>3</sub> in 39 B.C. as the Nephite chief judge, evidently at a young age. Because of wickedness among the Nephites, he resigned the judgment seat in 30 B.C. and went with his younger brother Lehi to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ among the Lamanites. Although imprisoned and threatened with death, they were preserved by the power of God and converted thousands of Lamanites (Hel. 5).

Nephi returned thereafter to Zarahemla, boldly condemned the corrupt Nephite leaders, miraculously revealed the identity of a murderer, and exercised the power of God to invoke a famine on the Nephites. Although the Nephites repented occasionally, their conversion and the peace that followed did not last. When time was about to expire on the prophecy of SAMUEL THE LAMANITE regarding the birth of Christ, Nephi passed the records to his son Nephi<sub>3</sub> and left, never to be heard of again (3 Ne. 1:3; 2:9).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Welch, John W. "Longevity of Book of Mormon People and the Age of Man." Journal of the Collegium Aesculapium 3 (1985):34–42.

MELVIN J. THORNE

1:20). Nephi supports this thesis in 1 Nephi with stories of how God has intervened in human affairs to deliver his faithful followers, and Nephi in particular, from their enemies. But these are only types and shadows. Nephi's true proof is set forth in 2 Nephi, where he says that the atonement of Jesus Christ makes available to all who have faith in Christ a liberation from sin and spiritual redemption from hell and the devil, their greatest enemy. All men and women who follow the example of Christ and enter into his way through repentance and baptism will be blessed with a baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost—which brings a remission of sin and individual guidance—so that they might endure to the end in faith and receive eternal life (2 Ne. 31).

Into a more spiritual account on his small plates, Nephi also wove a vivid defense of his own political primacy by using allusions to MOSES and JOSEPH OF EGYPT (Reynolds, 1987). In defending his ruling position as a younger son, Nephi tells how the two oldest sons rejected their father and the Lord and how he (Nephi) was selected and blessed by the Lord and his father. He relates how, with the help of the Lord, he acquired the brass plates (1 Ne. 3–4), persuaded Ishmael and his family to join Lehi's group (1 Ne. 7), prevented starvation in the wilderness (1 Ne. 16), and constructed a ship and sailed it successfully across the ocean (1 Ne. 17–18). In these exploits, Nephi was consistently opposed and threatened, even with death, by Laman and Lemuel; but in each crisis, he was miraculously delivered by the power of the Lord and blessed to complete his task.

Though unable to bridge the gulf between himself and his brothers, Nephi's writings reveal that he was a man with an impressive range of human sensitivities, and he yearned for their welfare. He developed his enormous faith in his father and in the Lord at a young age and never faltered. Consequently, he obeyed without murmuring. He pondered his father's prophecies and repeatedly asked the Lord for personal understanding and direction. He had a deep love and sense of responsibility for his people: "I pray continually for them by day, and mine eyes water my pillow by night, because of them" (2 Ne. 33:3). He also had charity for all other people. Nephi gloried in plainness and in truth, and he knew that his words were harsh against unrepentant sinners (2 Ne. 33:5–9). He anguished deeply because of temptations and his own sins, and particularly because of his feelings of anger against his enemies (2 Ne. 4:26–29). His spiritual strength and depth were grounded in the knowledge that Jesus Christ had heard his pleas and had redeemed his soul from hell (2 Ne. 33:6).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bergin, Allen E. "Nephi, A Universal Man." Ensign 6 (Sept. 1976):65–70.
- Cannon, George Q. The Life of Nephi. Salt Lake City, 1883; repr. 1957.
- Reynolds, Noel B. "Nephi's Outline." BYU Studies 20 (Winter 1980):131–49.
- . "The Political Dimension in Nephi's Small Plates." BYU Studies 27 (Fall 1987):15–37.
- Sondrup, Steven P. "The Psalm of Nephi: A Lyric Reading." BYU Studies 21 (Summer 1981):357–72.
- Turner, Rodney. "The Prophet Nephi." In The Book of Mormon: First Nephi, the Doctrinal Foundation, ed. M. Nymann and C. Tate, pp. 79–97. Provo, Utah, 1988.

NOEL B. REYNOLDS

---

NEPHI<sub>2</sub>

Nephi<sub>2</sub> succeeded his father HELAMAN<sub>3</sub> in 39 B.C. as the Nephite chief judge, evidently at a young age. Because of wickedness among the Nephites, he resigned the judgment seat in 30 B.C. and went with his younger brother Lehi to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ among the Lamanites. Although imprisoned and threatened with death, they were preserved by the power of God and converted thousands of Lamanites (Hel. 5).

Nephi returned thereafter to Zarahemla, boldly condemned the corrupt Nephite leaders, miraculously revealed the identity of a murderer, and exercised the power of God to invoke a famine on the Nephites. Although the Nephites repented occasionally, their conversion and the peace that followed did not last. When time was about to expire on the prophecy of SAMUEL THE LAMANITE regarding the birth of Christ, Nephi passed the records to his son Nephi<sub>3</sub> and left, never to be heard of again (3 Ne. 1:3; 2:9).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Welch, John W. "Longevity of Book of Mormon People and the Age of Man." Journal of the Collegium Aesculapium 3 (1985):34–42.

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHI<sub>3</sub>

Nephi<sub>3</sub> was the eldest son of Nephi<sub>2</sub>. He was given responsibility for all the Nephite records in 1 B.C. (3 Ne. 1:2). Because of his great faith and his concern for his people, he was told by the voice of Jesus the day before Jesus' birth that the Savior would be born "on the morrow." Later, he consolidated, led, and defended the righteous, moving them to the land Bountiful. He survived the destructions occurring in the Western Hemisphere at the Savior's death (3 Ne. 8–9) and was the first to whom the resurrected Christ gave the power to baptize (3 Ne. 11:18–12). He served as the leading disciple in the Church spoken of in this part of the Book of Mormon and saw his people enjoy years of peace and righteousness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arnold, Marilyn. "The Nephi We Tend to Forget." Ensign 8 (Jan. 1978):68–71.

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHI<sub>4</sub>

Nephi<sub>4</sub> was the son of NEPHI<sub>3</sub>. Nephi<sub>4</sub> kept the Nephite records during the extraordinarily blessed era that followed the appearance of Jesus Christ to the Nephites. He saw his people live in love, unity (having all things in common), righteousness, and obedience because the love of God abounded in their hearts. A type of UNITED ORDER or LAW OF CONSECRATION was practiced by them during this time. His people experienced the rebuilding of cities, prosperity, miracles, peace, and happiness. Little else is known about his life. He died sometime after A.D. 110 (see 4 Ne. 1:1–19).

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHITES

[The Nephites are the primary group who kept the record known as the Book of Mormon. This complex population was initially descended from Lehi through four of his sons (Sam, Nephi<sub>1</sub>, Jacob, and Joseph) and their friend Zoram, although the descendants of other people also joined themselves to the Nephites from time to time (see Book of Mormon Peoples). The Nephites were dis- tinguished by their belief in the gospel of Jesus Christ, as taught by Lehi and Nephi, as opposed to the lack of faith of the Lamanites, often their enemies but also descendants of Lehi.

For an account of Nephite life, see Book of Mormon Economy and Technology. Political and legal practices among the Nephites are described in Book of Mormon, Government and Legal History in. The traditions of record keeping among the Nephites are summarized in Book of Mormon Plates and Records. Nephite religious belief and culture are detailed in Book of Mormon Religious Teachings and Practices. Nephite women and their contributions are reported in Book of Mormon, Women in.]

---

NEUM

Neum was an ancient Israelite PROPHET whose words were contained on the PLATES of brass, a record carried to the Western Hemisphere from JERUSALEM about 600 B.C. by the Book of Mormon prophet LEIII and his colony. Neum's work is not preserved in the Hebrew Bible or other known sources. Concerning the time of his writing, it is only definite that he predated Lehi's departure.

Neum is mentioned only once in the Book of Mormon. In writing to his future readers, NEPHI<sub>1</sub> cited him along with other prophets who foretold aspects of the mortal mission of JESUS CHRIST. According to Neum's words, the God of ABRAHAM, Isaac, and Jacob (Jesus Christ) would be crucified (1 Ne. 19:10). This confirmed what Nephi himself had seen previously in a vision (1 Ne. 11:32–33).

KENT P. JACKSON

---

NEVADA, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN

Latter-day Saints constructed Nevada's first log cabins and founded what became the state's first permanent white settlement when, in 1849, would-be gold miners established a trading post at present-day Genoa (Carson Valley, near Reno) to supply those en route to the goldfields in northern California.

The present state of Nevada lay within the original boundaries of Utah Territory as established by Congress in 1850, and in 1855 territorial governor Brigham YOUNG appointed Orson HYDE, an apostle, as probate judge and sent him to Carson Valley to organize a county government. Hyde called for more LDS settlers to establish political

---

NEPHI<sub>3</sub>

Nephi<sub>3</sub> was the eldest son of Nephi<sub>2</sub>. He was given responsibility for all the Nephite records in 1 B.C. (3 Ne. 1:2). Because of his great faith and his concern for his people, he was told by the voice of Jesus the day before Jesus' birth that the Savior would be born "on the morrow." Later, he consolidated, led, and defended the righteous, moving them to the land Bountiful. He survived the destructions occurring in the Western Hemisphere at the Savior's death (3 Ne. 8–9) and was the first to whom the resurrected Christ gave the power to baptize (3 Ne. 11:18–12). He served as the leading disciple in the Church spoken of in this part of the Book of Mormon and saw his people enjoy years of peace and righteousness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arnold, Marilyn. "The Nephi We Tend to Forget." Ensign 8 (Jan. 1978):68–71.

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHI<sub>4</sub>

Nephi<sub>4</sub> was the son of NEPHI<sub>3</sub>. Nephi<sub>4</sub> kept the Nephite records during the extraordinarily blessed era that followed the appearance of Jesus Christ to the Nephites. He saw his people live in love, unity (having all things in common), righteousness, and obedience because the love of God abounded in their hearts. A type of UNITED ORDER or LAW OF CONSECRATION was practiced by them during this time. His people experienced the rebuilding of cities, prosperity, miracles, peace, and happiness. Little else is known about his life. He died sometime after A.D. 110 (see 4 Ne. 1:1–19).

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHITES

[The Nephites are the primary group who kept the record known as the Book of Mormon. This complex population was initially descended from Lehi through four of his sons (Sam, Nephi<sub>1</sub>, Jacob, and Joseph) and their friend Zoram, although the descendants of other people also joined themselves to the Nephites from time to time (see Book of Mormon Peoples). The Nephites were dis- tinguished by their belief in the gospel of Jesus Christ, as taught by Lehi and Nephi, as opposed to the lack of faith of the Lamanites, often their enemies but also descendants of Lehi.

For an account of Nephite life, see Book of Mormon Economy and Technology. Political and legal practices among the Nephites are described in Book of Mormon, Government and Legal History in. The traditions of record keeping among the Nephites are summarized in Book of Mormon Plates and Records. Nephite religious belief and culture are detailed in Book of Mormon Religious Teachings and Practices. Nephite women and their contributions are reported in Book of Mormon, Women in.]

---

NEUM

Neum was an ancient Israelite PROPHET whose words were contained on the PLATES of brass, a record carried to the Western Hemisphere from JERUSALEM about 600 B.C. by the Book of Mormon prophet LEIII and his colony. Neum's work is not preserved in the Hebrew Bible or other known sources. Concerning the time of his writing, it is only definite that he predated Lehi's departure.

Neum is mentioned only once in the Book of Mormon. In writing to his future readers, NEPHI<sub>1</sub> cited him along with other prophets who foretold aspects of the mortal mission of JESUS CHRIST. According to Neum's words, the God of ABRAHAM, Isaac, and Jacob (Jesus Christ) would be crucified (1 Ne. 19:10). This confirmed what Nephi himself had seen previously in a vision (1 Ne. 11:32–33).

KENT P. JACKSON

---

NEVADA, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN

Latter-day Saints constructed Nevada's first log cabins and founded what became the state's first permanent white settlement when, in 1849, would-be gold miners established a trading post at present-day Genoa (Carson Valley, near Reno) to supply those en route to the goldfields in northern California.

The present state of Nevada lay within the original boundaries of Utah Territory as established by Congress in 1850, and in 1855 territorial governor Brigham YOUNG appointed Orson HYDE, an apostle, as probate judge and sent him to Carson Valley to organize a county government. Hyde called for more LDS settlers to establish political

---

NEPHI<sub>3</sub>

Nephi<sub>3</sub> was the eldest son of Nephi<sub>2</sub>. He was given responsibility for all the Nephite records in 1 B.C. (3 Ne. 1:2). Because of his great faith and his concern for his people, he was told by the voice of Jesus the day before Jesus' birth that the Savior would be born "on the morrow." Later, he consolidated, led, and defended the righteous, moving them to the land Bountiful. He survived the destructions occurring in the Western Hemisphere at the Savior's death (3 Ne. 8–9) and was the first to whom the resurrected Christ gave the power to baptize (3 Ne. 11:18–12). He served as the leading disciple in the Church spoken of in this part of the Book of Mormon and saw his people enjoy years of peace and righteousness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arnold, Marilyn. "The Nephi We Tend to Forget." Ensign 8 (Jan. 1978):68–71.

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHI<sub>4</sub>

Nephi<sub>4</sub> was the son of NEPHI<sub>3</sub>. Nephi<sub>4</sub> kept the Nephite records during the extraordinarily blessed era that followed the appearance of Jesus Christ to the Nephites. He saw his people live in love, unity (having all things in common), righteousness, and obedience because the love of God abounded in their hearts. A type of UNITED ORDER or LAW OF CONSECRATION was practiced by them during this time. His people experienced the rebuilding of cities, prosperity, miracles, peace, and happiness. Little else is known about his life. He died sometime after A.D. 110 (see 4 Ne. 1:1–19).

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHITES

[The Nephites are the primary group who kept the record known as the Book of Mormon. This complex population was initially descended from Lehi through four of his sons (Sam, Nephi<sub>1</sub>, Jacob, and Joseph) and their friend Zoram, although the descendants of other people also joined themselves to the Nephites from time to time (see Book of Mormon Peoples). The Nephites were dis- tinguished by their belief in the gospel of Jesus Christ, as taught by Lehi and Nephi, as opposed to the lack of faith of the Lamanites, often their enemies but also descendants of Lehi.

For an account of Nephite life, see Book of Mormon Economy and Technology. Political and legal practices among the Nephites are described in Book of Mormon, Government and Legal History in. The traditions of record keeping among the Nephites are summarized in Book of Mormon Plates and Records. Nephite religious belief and culture are detailed in Book of Mormon Religious Teachings and Practices. Nephite women and their contributions are reported in Book of Mormon, Women in.]

---

NEUM

Neum was an ancient Israelite PROPHET whose words were contained on the PLATES of brass, a record carried to the Western Hemisphere from JERUSALEM about 600 B.C. by the Book of Mormon prophet LEIII and his colony. Neum's work is not preserved in the Hebrew Bible or other known sources. Concerning the time of his writing, it is only definite that he predated Lehi's departure.

Neum is mentioned only once in the Book of Mormon. In writing to his future readers, NEPHI<sub>1</sub> cited him along with other prophets who foretold aspects of the mortal mission of JESUS CHRIST. According to Neum's words, the God of ABRAHAM, Isaac, and Jacob (Jesus Christ) would be crucified (1 Ne. 19:10). This confirmed what Nephi himself had seen previously in a vision (1 Ne. 11:32–33).

KENT P. JACKSON

---

NEVADA, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN

Latter-day Saints constructed Nevada's first log cabins and founded what became the state's first permanent white settlement when, in 1849, would-be gold miners established a trading post at present-day Genoa (Carson Valley, near Reno) to supply those en route to the goldfields in northern California.

The present state of Nevada lay within the original boundaries of Utah Territory as established by Congress in 1850, and in 1855 territorial governor Brigham YOUNG appointed Orson HYDE, an apostle, as probate judge and sent him to Carson Valley to organize a county government. Hyde called for more LDS settlers to establish political

---

NEPHI<sub>3</sub>

Nephi<sub>3</sub> was the eldest son of Nephi<sub>2</sub>. He was given responsibility for all the Nephite records in 1 B.C. (3 Ne. 1:2). Because of his great faith and his concern for his people, he was told by the voice of Jesus the day before Jesus' birth that the Savior would be born "on the morrow." Later, he consolidated, led, and defended the righteous, moving them to the land Bountiful. He survived the destructions occurring in the Western Hemisphere at the Savior's death (3 Ne. 8–9) and was the first to whom the resurrected Christ gave the power to baptize (3 Ne. 11:18–12). He served as the leading disciple in the Church spoken of in this part of the Book of Mormon and saw his people enjoy years of peace and righteousness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arnold, Marilyn. "The Nephi We Tend to Forget." Ensign 8 (Jan. 1978):68–71.

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHI<sub>4</sub>

Nephi<sub>4</sub> was the son of NEPHI<sub>3</sub>. Nephi<sub>4</sub> kept the Nephite records during the extraordinarily blessed era that followed the appearance of Jesus Christ to the Nephites. He saw his people live in love, unity (having all things in common), righteousness, and obedience because the love of God abounded in their hearts. A type of UNITED ORDER or LAW OF CONSECRATION was practiced by them during this time. His people experienced the rebuilding of cities, prosperity, miracles, peace, and happiness. Little else is known about his life. He died sometime after A.D. 110 (see 4 Ne. 1:1–19).

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHITES

[The Nephites are the primary group who kept the record known as the Book of Mormon. This complex population was initially descended from Lehi through four of his sons (Sam, Nephi<sub>1</sub>, Jacob, and Joseph) and their friend Zoram, although the descendants of other people also joined themselves to the Nephites from time to time (see Book of Mormon Peoples). The Nephites were dis- tinguished by their belief in the gospel of Jesus Christ, as taught by Lehi and Nephi, as opposed to the lack of faith of the Lamanites, often their enemies but also descendants of Lehi.

For an account of Nephite life, see Book of Mormon Economy and Technology. Political and legal practices among the Nephites are described in Book of Mormon, Government and Legal History in. The traditions of record keeping among the Nephites are summarized in Book of Mormon Plates and Records. Nephite religious belief and culture are detailed in Book of Mormon Religious Teachings and Practices. Nephite women and their contributions are reported in Book of Mormon, Women in.]

---

NEUM

Neum was an ancient Israelite PROPHET whose words were contained on the PLATES of brass, a record carried to the Western Hemisphere from JERUSALEM about 600 B.C. by the Book of Mormon prophet LEIII and his colony. Neum's work is not preserved in the Hebrew Bible or other known sources. Concerning the time of his writing, it is only definite that he predated Lehi's departure.

Neum is mentioned only once in the Book of Mormon. In writing to his future readers, NEPHI<sub>1</sub> cited him along with other prophets who foretold aspects of the mortal mission of JESUS CHRIST. According to Neum's words, the God of ABRAHAM, Isaac, and Jacob (Jesus Christ) would be crucified (1 Ne. 19:10). This confirmed what Nephi himself had seen previously in a vision (1 Ne. 11:32–33).

KENT P. JACKSON

---

NEVADA, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN

Latter-day Saints constructed Nevada's first log cabins and founded what became the state's first permanent white settlement when, in 1849, would-be gold miners established a trading post at present-day Genoa (Carson Valley, near Reno) to supply those en route to the goldfields in northern California.

The present state of Nevada lay within the original boundaries of Utah Territory as established by Congress in 1850, and in 1855 territorial governor Brigham YOUNG appointed Orson HYDE, an apostle, as probate judge and sent him to Carson Valley to organize a county government. Hyde called for more LDS settlers to establish political

---

NEPHI<sub>3</sub>

Nephi<sub>3</sub> was the eldest son of Nephi<sub>2</sub>. He was given responsibility for all the Nephite records in 1 B.C. (3 Ne. 1:2). Because of his great faith and his concern for his people, he was told by the voice of Jesus the day before Jesus' birth that the Savior would be born "on the morrow." Later, he consolidated, led, and defended the righteous, moving them to the land Bountiful. He survived the destructions occurring in the Western Hemisphere at the Savior's death (3 Ne. 8–9) and was the first to whom the resurrected Christ gave the power to baptize (3 Ne. 11:18–12). He served as the leading disciple in the Church spoken of in this part of the Book of Mormon and saw his people enjoy years of peace and righteousness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arnold, Marilyn. "The Nephi We Tend to Forget." Ensign 8 (Jan. 1978):68–71.

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHI<sub>4</sub>

Nephi<sub>4</sub> was the son of NEPHI<sub>3</sub>. Nephi<sub>4</sub> kept the Nephite records during the extraordinarily blessed era that followed the appearance of Jesus Christ to the Nephites. He saw his people live in love, unity (having all things in common), righteousness, and obedience because the love of God abounded in their hearts. A type of UNITED ORDER or LAW OF CONSECRATION was practiced by them during this time. His people experienced the rebuilding of cities, prosperity, miracles, peace, and happiness. Little else is known about his life. He died sometime after A.D. 110 (see 4 Ne. 1:1–19).

MELVIN J. THORNE

---

NEPHITES

[The Nephites are the primary group who kept the record known as the Book of Mormon. This complex population was initially descended from Lehi through four of his sons (Sam, Nephi<sub>1</sub>, Jacob, and Joseph) and their friend Zoram, although the descendants of other people also joined themselves to the Nephites from time to time (see Book of Mormon Peoples). The Nephites were dis- tinguished by their belief in the gospel of Jesus Christ, as taught by Lehi and Nephi, as opposed to the lack of faith of the Lamanites, often their enemies but also descendants of Lehi.

For an account of Nephite life, see Book of Mormon Economy and Technology. Political and legal practices among the Nephites are described in Book of Mormon, Government and Legal History in. The traditions of record keeping among the Nephites are summarized in Book of Mormon Plates and Records. Nephite religious belief and culture are detailed in Book of Mormon Religious Teachings and Practices. Nephite women and their contributions are reported in Book of Mormon, Women in.]

---

NEUM

Neum was an ancient Israelite PROPHET whose words were contained on the PLATES of brass, a record carried to the Western Hemisphere from JERUSALEM about 600 B.C. by the Book of Mormon prophet LEIII and his colony. Neum's work is not preserved in the Hebrew Bible or other known sources. Concerning the time of his writing, it is only definite that he predated Lehi's departure.

Neum is mentioned only once in the Book of Mormon. In writing to his future readers, NEPHI<sub>1</sub> cited him along with other prophets who foretold aspects of the mortal mission of JESUS CHRIST. According to Neum's words, the God of ABRAHAM, Isaac, and Jacob (Jesus Christ) would be crucified (1 Ne. 19:10). This confirmed what Nephi himself had seen previously in a vision (1 Ne. 11:32–33).

KENT P. JACKSON

---

NEVADA, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN

Latter-day Saints constructed Nevada's first log cabins and founded what became the state's first permanent white settlement when, in 1849, would-be gold miners established a trading post at present-day Genoa (Carson Valley, near Reno) to supply those en route to the goldfields in northern California.

The present state of Nevada lay within the original boundaries of Utah Territory as established by Congress in 1850, and in 1855 territorial governor Brigham YOUNG appointed Orson HYDE, an apostle, as probate judge and sent him to Carson Valley to organize a county government. Hyde called for more LDS settlers to establish political control of the area and to proselytize and “civilize” the Indians of that region. The following year about 250 Latter-day Saints arrived. Problems promptly developed between them and non-Mormons who resented LDS political control. Reports that they were to be recalled to Utah kept the LDS settlers off balance, and some of the leading members soon departed. As the U.S. Army approached Utah from the east in 1857 (see UTAH EXPEDITION), the remaining colonists were recalled to Salt Lake City.

The Las Vegas Mission was founded in 1855 to proselytize local Indians and teach them agriculture and peaceful ways. Latter-day Saints there labored among the Paiutes, converting many of them and establishing a farm for them. In 1856 the colony, reinforced by men sent from Salt Lake City, established a lead-mining mission. Lead mining was largely unsuccessful, partly due to silver in the ore and the difficulty of separating them. In 1857, after the lead miners returned to Utah, the remainder of the missionaries received permission to return as well. Most departed later that year, after word reached them of the army’s approach to Utah.

In 1865 Brigham Young sent colonists to settle on the Muddy River, in present-day Moapa Valley, to grow cotton and other semitropical crops and to assist with possible LDS overland immigration from a projected port on the Colorado River. In 1867 the boundaries of Nevada Territory, which was created from the western part of Utah Territory in 1861, were extended southward, annexing part of Arizona Territory, including the Muddy settlements. Most Latter-day Saints abandoned these towns in 1871 when they were ordered to pay back taxes to Nevada; farming marginal lands, the settlers lacked the cash to meet additional assessments. The LDS resettlement of Moapa Valley was resumed in 1877 with the founding of Bunkerville, a UNITED ORDER community.

LDS families founded several small communities north of the Muddy River beginning in 1864. Some of these settlers remained despite the problems with taxation, particularly in Panaea, which has remained largely LDS.

In 1898 the LDS settlements of Lund, Preston, and Georgetown were established in White Pine County on land ceded to the Church in lieu of property confiscated under the provisions of the Edmunds-Tucker Act of 1887 (see ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. The Mormons in Nevada. Las Vegas, 1979.
- Hunter, Milton R. Brigham Young the Colonizer. Santa Barbara, Calif., 1973.

TED J. WARNER

---

NEW ERA

The New Era is the official English language publication of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for YOUTH (ages 12–18), their parents, and their Church leaders and teachers. Established in 1971 during a period of consolidation of all Church MAGAZINES, the New Era is published monthly. In its earliest days, it was addressed to readers twelve to twenty-six years old (to include single college students), but after four years its scope was reduced to twelve- to eighteen-year-olds to coincide with the age levels of the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD and YOUNG WOMEN programs. Its features include inspirational messages from GENERAL AUTHORITIES; stories about young Latter-day Saints throughout the world; first-person accounts of FAMILY LIFE, MISSIONARY experiences, CONVERSION stories, and spiritual insights; personality profiles; a question-and-answer section; a news and information section; Church history; poetry; photography; and humor. Another special feature is Mormonads, which appear as one-page “advertisements” of GOSPEL ideals. Some of these ads are made into posters and sold through Church DISTRIBUTION CENTERS and LDS book outlets.

Special issues of the New Era have covered such topics as Christlike service, courtship and marriage, sharing the gospel, the Aaronic Priesthood, the Young Women program, career preparation, leadership, its own tenth anniversary, and a guide to “surviving and thriving in the 1990s.” Special insertions have included a recording of speeches by PRESIDENTS OF THE CHURCH, a leadership game, and an advent calendar based on the life of Christ.

The New Era is a significant source of LDS fiction and music. It sponsors an annual creative talent contest for the youth of the Church with categories in writing, art, photography, and music. The winning entries are published in subsequent issues of the magazine. Consequently, the New Era is known for its policy of encouraging promis-control of the area and to proselytize and “civilize” the Indians of that region. The following year about 250 Latter-day Saints arrived. Problems promptly developed between them and non-Mormons who resented LDS political control. Reports that they were to be recalled to Utah kept the LDS settlers off balance, and some of the leading members soon departed. As the U.S. Army approached Utah from the east in 1857 (see UTAH EXPEDITION), the remaining colonists were recalled to Salt Lake City.

The Las Vegas Mission was founded in 1855 to proselytize local Indians and teach them agriculture and peaceful ways. Latter-day Saints there labored among the Paiutes, converting many of them and establishing a farm for them. In 1856 the colony, reinforced by men sent from Salt Lake City, established a lead-mining mission. Lead mining was largely unsuccessful, partly due to silver in the ore and the difficulty of separating them. In 1857, after the lead miners returned to Utah, the remainder of the missionaries received permission to return as well. Most departed later that year, after word reached them of the army’s approach to Utah.

In 1865 Brigham Young sent colonists to settle on the Muddy River, in present-day Moapa Valley, to grow cotton and other semitropical crops and to assist with possible LDS overland immigration from a projected port on the Colorado River. In 1867 the boundaries of Nevada Territory, which was created from the western part of Utah Territory in 1861, were extended southward, annexing part of Arizona Territory, including the Muddy settlements. Most Latter-day Saints abandoned these towns in 1871 when they were ordered to pay back taxes to Nevada; farming marginal lands, the settlers lacked the cash to meet additional assessments. The LDS resettlement of Moapa Valley was resumed in 1877 with the founding of Bunkerville, a UNITED ORDER community.

LDS families founded several small communities north of the Muddy River beginning in 1864. Some of these settlers remained despite the problems with taxation, particularly in Panaea, which has remained largely LDS.

In 1898 the LDS settlements of Lund, Preston, and Georgetown were established in White Pine County on land ceded to the Church in lieu of property confiscated under the provisions of the Edmunds-Tucker Act of 1887 (see ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. The Mormons in Nevada. Las Vegas, 1979.
- Hunter, Milton R. Brigham Young the Colonizer. Santa Barbara, Calif., 1973.

TED J. WARNER

---

NEW ERA

The New Era is the official English language publication of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for YOUTH (ages 12–18), their parents, and their Church leaders and teachers. Established in 1971 during a period of consolidation of all Church MAGAZINES, the New Era is published monthly. In its earliest days, it was addressed to readers twelve to twenty-six years old (to include single college students), but after four years its scope was reduced to twelve- to eighteen-year-olds to coincide with the age levels of the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD and YOUNG WOMEN programs. Its features include inspirational messages from GENERAL AUTHORITIES; stories about young Latter-day Saints throughout the world; first-person accounts of FAMILY LIFE, MISSIONARY experiences, CONVERSION stories, and spiritual insights; personality profiles; a question-and-answer section; a news and information section; Church history; poetry; photography; and humor. Another special feature is Mormonads, which appear as one-page “advertisements” of GOSPEL ideals. Some of these ads are made into posters and sold through Church DISTRIBUTION CENTERS and LDS book outlets.

Special issues of the New Era have covered such topics as Christlike service, courtship and marriage, sharing the gospel, the Aaronic Priesthood, the Young Women program, career preparation, leadership, its own tenth anniversary, and a guide to “surviving and thriving in the 1990s.” Special insertions have included a recording of speeches by PRESIDENTS OF THE CHURCH, a leadership game, and an advent calendar based on the life of Christ.

The New Era is a significant source of LDS fiction and music. It sponsors an annual creative talent contest for the youth of the Church with categories in writing, art, photography, and music. The winning entries are published in subsequent issues of the magazine. Consequently, the New Era is known for its policy of encouraging promising young LDS authors, artists, and composers, which includes an internship program in writing and editing for LDS college students who show promise.

The New Era is a magazine published for youth, ages 12–18. This boy in Poland (1990) was converted to the gospel through a friend who sent him a copy of the New Era. Courtesy Peggy Jellinghausen.

The New Era has a reputation for being positive and idealistic, and it does not hesitate to combat problems like drug abuse, depression, alcoholism, immorality, suicide, exploitation of “nannies,” and eating disorders. It has also won awards for design and typographical excellence.

The magazine’s charter statement reflects its editorial philosophy: “As an official line of communication to the youth of the Church, the New Era is to provide a positive, uplifting voice for young people to hear. Therefore, each issue must be an example of editorial, photographic, and artistic excellence. The New Era shows every twelve- through eighteen-year-old Latter-day Saint what blessings can come from living the restored gospel. Readers learn from the examples and testimonies of others that being spiritually committed, wholesome, and LDS is the most desirable way to be, that righteous living is the only source of peace and happiness in life.” Its managing editors have been Brian K. Kelly (1972–1989) and Richard M. Romney since 1989.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Gostick, Adrian. “So You Want to Write for the New Era?” New Era 21 (Aug. 1991).
 Todd, Jay M. “The New Era.” New Era 1 (1971):3.
 Wilkins, Richard G. “How to Write for the New Era Without Developing Ulcers.” New Era 7 (Feb. 1977):16–19.

RICHARD M. ROMNEY

NEW AND EVERLASTING COVENANT

The new and everlasting covenant is the gospel of Jesus Christ. The sum of all gospel COVENANTS that God makes with mankind is called “the new and everlasting covenant” and consists of several individual covenants, each of which is called “a new and an everlasting covenant.” It is “new” when given to a person or a people for the first time, and “everlasting” because the gospel of Jesus Christ and PLAN OF SALVATION existed before the world was formed and will exist forever (MD, pp. 479–80).

Baptism, marriage, and all other covenants from God necessary for salvation are new and everlasting (D&C 22:1; 45:9; 66:2; 132:4–7). Holy covenants have been introduced anew in each of the DISPENSATIONS OF THE GOSPEL from Adam to Joseph SMITH, and have been available whenever the gospel of Jesus Christ has been upon the earth. Therefore, these covenants are spoken of as everlasting. Covenants of salvation and exaltation are everlasting in the sense also that once entered into they are forever binding and valid only if they are not broken by transgression.

All covenants between God and mankind are part of the new and everlasting covenant (D&C 22; 132:6–7). Thus, celestial marriage is a new and an everlasting covenant (D&C 132:4) or the new and everlasting covenant of marriage. Some covenants, such as baptism, have force in all dispensations. Other covenants are made for special purposes in particular dispensations; CIRCUMCISION as a sign of a covenant is of this type (MD, p. 479). The same eternal covenant conditions may be established through other ritual signs at other times.

Covenants and promises instituted by God are governed by certain stipulations and conditions that he has set and that his children must comply with to make the covenant or promise valid (DS 1:152–160). The Lord’s house is a house of order, and all things are done according to law (D&C 130:20–21; 132:8–11):

For all who will have a blessing at my hands shall abide the law which was appointed for that blessing, and the conditions thereof, as were instituted from before the foundation of the world.

And as pertaining to the new and everlasting covenant, it was instituted for the fulness of my glory. . . .

And verily I say unto you, that the conditions of this law are these: All covenants, contracts, bonds,

The New Era is a magazine published for youth, ages 12–18. This boy in Poland (1990) was converted to the gospel through a friend who sent him a copy of the New Era. Courtesy Peggy Jellinghausen.

ing young LDS authors, artists, and composers, which includes an internship program in writing and editing for LDS college students who show promise.

The New Era has a reputation for being positive and idealistic, and it does not hesitate to combat problems like drug abuse, depression, alcoholism, immorality, suicide, exploitation of “nannies,” and eating disorders. It has also won awards for design and typographical excellence.

The magazine’s charter statement reflects its editorial philosophy: “As an official line of communication to the youth of the Church, the New Era is to provide a positive, uplifting voice for young people to hear. Therefore, each issue must be an example of editorial, photographic, and artistic excellence. The New Era shows every twelve- through eighteen-year-old Latter-day Saint what blessings can come from living the restored gospel. Readers learn from the examples and testimonies of others that being spiritually committed, wholesome, and LDS is the most desirable way to be, that righteous living is the only source of peace and happiness in life.” Its managing editors have been Brian K. Kelly (1972–1989) and Richard M. Romney since 1989.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Gostick, Adrian. “So You Want to Write for the New Era?” New Era 21 (Aug. 1991).
 Todd, Jay M. “The New Era.” New Era 1 (1971):3.
 Wilkins, Richard G. “How to Write for the New Era Without Developing Ulcers.” New Era 7 (Feb. 1977):16–19.

RICHARD M. ROMNEY

NEW AND EVERLASTING COVENANT

The new and everlasting covenant is the gospel of Jesus Christ. The sum of all gospel COVENANTS that God makes with mankind is called “the new and everlasting covenant” and consists of several individual covenants, each of which is called “a new and an everlasting covenant.” It is “new” when given to a person or a people for the first time, and “everlasting” because the gospel of Jesus Christ and PLAN OF SALVATION existed before the world was formed and will exist forever (MD, pp. 479–80).

Baptism, marriage, and all other covenants from God necessary for salvation are new and everlasting (D&C 22:1; 45:9; 66:2; 132:4–7). Holy covenants have been introduced anew in each of the DISPENSATIONS OF THE GOSPEL from Adam to Joseph SMITH, and have been available whenever the gospel of Jesus Christ has been upon the earth. Therefore, these covenants are spoken of as everlasting. Covenants of salvation and exaltation are everlasting in the sense also that once entered into they are forever binding and valid only if they are not broken by transgression.

All covenants between God and mankind are part of the new and everlasting covenant (D&C 22; 132:6–7). Thus, celestial marriage is a new and an everlasting covenant (D&C 132:4) or the new and everlasting covenant of marriage. Some covenants, such as baptism, have force in all dispensations. Other covenants are made for special purposes in particular dispensations; CIRCUMCISION as a sign of a covenant is of this type (MD, p. 479). The same eternal covenant conditions may be established through other ritual signs at other times.

Covenants and promises instituted by God are governed by certain stipulations and conditions that he has set and that his children must comply with to make the covenant or promise valid (DS 1:152–160). The Lord’s house is a house of order, and all things are done according to law (D&C 130:20–21; 132:8–11):

For all who will have a blessing at my hands shall abide the law which was appointed for that blessing, and the conditions thereof, as were instituted from before the foundation of the world.

And as pertaining to the new and everlasting covenant, it was instituted for the fulness of my glory. . . .

And verily I say unto you, that the conditions of this law are these: All covenants, contracts, bonds, obligations, oaths, vows, performances, connections, associations, or expectations, that are not made and entered into and sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, of him who is anointed, both as well for time and for all eternity, . . . by revelation and commandment through the medium of mine anointed, . . . are of no efficacy, virtue, or force in and after the resurrection from the dead; for all contracts that are not made unto this end have an end when men are dead [D&C 132:5–7].

The Lord has said, “I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say; but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise” (D&C 82:10).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Hyrum M., and Janne M. Sjodahl. Doctrine and Covenants Commentary, pp. xiv, 822. Salt Lake City, 1972.

D. CECIL CLARK

---

NEW HEAVEN AND NEW EARTH

This phrase depicts the EARTH’s destiny of renewal, one cosmic aspect of the RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS. In LDS theology, “the earth will be renewed and receive its paradisiacal glory” (A of F 10). That renewal will include restoration of its former components—for example, the return of the city of ENOCH—and also its former purity and Edenic state.

Ancient biblical prophets taught that the beginnings of this fulfillment are to be associated with the coming of the MESSIAH and his millennial reign. The phrase reflects the vision of Isaiah (65:17; 66:22) and the revelation of JOHN (Rev. 2:17; 3:12; 5:9; 14:3; 21:1). Book of Mormon prophets likewise speak of a new heaven and a new earth (Ether 13:9) and of “all things” becoming new (3 Ne. 15:2). The Doctrine and Covenants contains prophecies that every corruptible “element shall melt with fervent heat; and all things shall become new, that [God’s] knowledge and glory may dwell upon all the earth” (D&C 101:23; cf. 29:23–24; 42:35, 62, 67; 45:66; 84:2–4; 133:56).

The Hebrew root for “new” (chadash) points to a time of refreshing rather than replacement. Consistent with this understanding, Mormons expect that the earth will not be destroyed but glorified, not transcended but transformed, and that ultimately the polarization of earth and heaven will be overcome. Faithful Saints are promised the “fulness of the earth” (D&C 59:16) and “an inheritance upon the earth when the day of transfiguration shall come, when the earth shall be transfigured” (D&C 63:20–21).

The earth fills the “measure [the purpose] of its creation” (D&C 88:19, 25) and its biography follows typologically that of mankind. It has fallen from paradise, it has been baptized in water, and it will be baptized by fire. It will die (Isa. 51:6; D&C 45:22; 88:26) and be “quickened again,” and will not only regain its pristine condition but a higher state still (D&C 88:25–26). “This earth will be Christ’s” (D&C 130:9). It will have a one-thousand-year sabbatical and then become a veritable URIM AND THUMMIM in fulfillment of John’s vision of its appearance as a “sea of glass” (D&C 130:7–9; Rev. 2:17), a habitation worthy of God. “It will be rolled back into the presence of God,” and “crowned with celestial glory” (TPJS, p. 181; cf. WJS, p. 60). Then those who have been “quickened by a portion of the celestial glory shall then receive of the same, even a fulness” (D&C 88:29). God, “in whose bosom it is decreed that the poor and the meek of the earth shall inherit it” (D&C 88:17), will fulfill his promise “that bodies who are of the celestial kingdom may possess it forever and ever; for for this intent was it made and created, and for this intent are they sanctified” (D&C 88:20).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Turner, Rodney. Footstool of God: Earth in Scripture and Prophecy. Orem, Utah, 1983.

THOMAS J. RISKAS, JR.

---

NEW JERUSALEM

For Latter-day Saints, the gathering of ISRAEL in the last days, and the building of the city of ZION and of the New Jerusalem, are closely related concepts.

The tenth ARTICLE OF FAITH, written by the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1842, declares that the New Jerusalem will be built upon the American continent. He learned this as he translated the Book of Mormon (3 Ne. 20:22; Ether 13:2–6). Additional revelation on this subject came in September 1830 and was further clarified in the subsequent months (D&C 28:9; 42:33–36, 62, 67; 57:3). In July 1831, Joseph Smith traveled to Jackson obligations, oaths, vows, performances, connections, associations, or expectations, that are not made and entered into and sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, of him who is anointed, both as well for time and for all eternity, . . . by revelation and commandment through the medium of mine anointed, . . . are of no efficacy, virtue, or force in and after the resurrection from the dead; for all contracts that are not made unto this end have an end when men are dead [D&C 132:5–7].

The Lord has said, “I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say; but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise” (D&C 82:10).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Hyrum M., and Janne M. Sjodahl. Doctrine and Covenants Commentary, pp. xiv, 822. Salt Lake City, 1972.

D. CECIL CLARK

---

NEW HEAVEN AND NEW EARTH

This phrase depicts the EARTH’s destiny of renewal, one cosmic aspect of the RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS. In LDS theology, “the earth will be renewed and receive its paradisiacal glory” (A of F 10). That renewal will include restoration of its former components—for example, the return of the city of ENOCH—and also its former purity and Edenic state.

Ancient biblical prophets taught that the beginnings of this fulfillment are to be associated with the coming of the MESSIAH and his millennial reign. The phrase reflects the vision of Isaiah (65:17; 66:22) and the revelation of JOHN (Rev. 2:17; 3:12; 5:9; 14:3; 21:1). Book of Mormon prophets likewise speak of a new heaven and a new earth (Ether 13:9) and of “all things” becoming new (3 Ne. 15:2). The Doctrine and Covenants contains prophecies that every corruptible “element shall melt with fervent heat; and all things shall become new, that [God’s] knowledge and glory may dwell upon all the earth” (D&C 101:23; cf. 29:23–24; 42:35, 62, 67; 45:66; 84:2–4; 133:56).

The Hebrew root for “new” (chadash) points to a time of refreshing rather than replacement. Consistent with this understanding, Mormons expect that the earth will not be destroyed but glorified, not transcended but transformed, and that ultimately the polarization of earth and heaven will be overcome. Faithful Saints are promised the “fulness of the earth” (D&C 59:16) and “an inheritance upon the earth when the day of transfiguration shall come, when the earth shall be transfigured” (D&C 63:20–21).

The earth fills the “measure [the purpose] of its creation” (D&C 88:19, 25) and its biography follows typologically that of mankind. It has fallen from paradise, it has been baptized in water, and it will be baptized by fire. It will die (Isa. 51:6; D&C 45:22; 88:26) and be “quickened again,” and will not only regain its pristine condition but a higher state still (D&C 88:25–26). “This earth will be Christ’s” (D&C 130:9). It will have a one-thousand-year sabbatical and then become a veritable URIM AND THUMMIM in fulfillment of John’s vision of its appearance as a “sea of glass” (D&C 130:7–9; Rev. 2:17), a habitation worthy of God. “It will be rolled back into the presence of God,” and “crowned with celestial glory” (TPJS, p. 181; cf. WJS, p. 60). Then those who have been “quickened by a portion of the celestial glory shall then receive of the same, even a fulness” (D&C 88:29). God, “in whose bosom it is decreed that the poor and the meek of the earth shall inherit it” (D&C 88:17), will fulfill his promise “that bodies who are of the celestial kingdom may possess it forever and ever; for for this intent was it made and created, and for this intent are they sanctified” (D&C 88:20).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Turner, Rodney. Footstool of God: Earth in Scripture and Prophecy. Orem, Utah, 1983.

THOMAS J. RISKAS, JR.

---

NEW JERUSALEM

For Latter-day Saints, the gathering of ISRAEL in the last days, and the building of the city of ZION and of the New Jerusalem, are closely related concepts.

The tenth ARTICLE OF FAITH, written by the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1842, declares that the New Jerusalem will be built upon the American continent. He learned this as he translated the Book of Mormon (3 Ne. 20:22; Ether 13:2–6). Additional revelation on this subject came in September 1830 and was further clarified in the subsequent months (D&C 28:9; 42:33–36, 62, 67; 57:3). In July 1831, Joseph Smith traveled to Jackson obligations, oaths, vows, performances, connections, associations, or expectations, that are not made and entered into and sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, of him who is anointed, both as well for time and for all eternity, . . . by revelation and commandment through the medium of mine anointed, . . . are of no efficacy, virtue, or force in and after the resurrection from the dead; for all contracts that are not made unto this end have an end when men are dead [D&C 132:5–7].

The Lord has said, “I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say; but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise” (D&C 82:10).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Hyrum M., and Janne M. Sjodahl. Doctrine and Covenants Commentary, pp. xiv, 822. Salt Lake City, 1972.

D. CECIL CLARK

---

NEW HEAVEN AND NEW EARTH

This phrase depicts the EARTH’s destiny of renewal, one cosmic aspect of the RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS. In LDS theology, “the earth will be renewed and receive its paradisiacal glory” (A of F 10). That renewal will include restoration of its former components—for example, the return of the city of ENOCH—and also its former purity and Edenic state.

Ancient biblical prophets taught that the beginnings of this fulfillment are to be associated with the coming of the MESSIAH and his millennial reign. The phrase reflects the vision of Isaiah (65:17; 66:22) and the revelation of JOHN (Rev. 2:17; 3:12; 5:9; 14:3; 21:1). Book of Mormon prophets likewise speak of a new heaven and a new earth (Ether 13:9) and of “all things” becoming new (3 Ne. 15:2). The Doctrine and Covenants contains prophecies that every corruptible “element shall melt with fervent heat; and all things shall become new, that [God’s] knowledge and glory may dwell upon all the earth” (D&C 101:23; cf. 29:23–24; 42:35, 62, 67; 45:66; 84:2–4; 133:56).

The Hebrew root for “new” (chadash) points to a time of refreshing rather than replacement. Consistent with this understanding, Mormons expect that the earth will not be destroyed but glorified, not transcended but transformed, and that ultimately the polarization of earth and heaven will be overcome. Faithful Saints are promised the “fulness of the earth” (D&C 59:16) and “an inheritance upon the earth when the day of transfiguration shall come, when the earth shall be transfigured” (D&C 63:20–21).

The earth fills the “measure [the purpose] of its creation” (D&C 88:19, 25) and its biography follows typologically that of mankind. It has fallen from paradise, it has been baptized in water, and it will be baptized by fire. It will die (Isa. 51:6; D&C 45:22; 88:26) and be “quickened again,” and will not only regain its pristine condition but a higher state still (D&C 88:25–26). “This earth will be Christ’s” (D&C 130:9). It will have a one-thousand-year sabbatical and then become a veritable URIM AND THUMMIM in fulfillment of John’s vision of its appearance as a “sea of glass” (D&C 130:7–9; Rev. 2:17), a habitation worthy of God. “It will be rolled back into the presence of God,” and “crowned with celestial glory” (TPJS, p. 181; cf. WJS, p. 60). Then those who have been “quickened by a portion of the celestial glory shall then receive of the same, even a fulness” (D&C 88:29). God, “in whose bosom it is decreed that the poor and the meek of the earth shall inherit it” (D&C 88:17), will fulfill his promise “that bodies who are of the celestial kingdom may possess it forever and ever; for for this intent was it made and created, and for this intent are they sanctified” (D&C 88:20).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Turner, Rodney. Footstool of God: Earth in Scripture and Prophecy. Orem, Utah, 1983.

THOMAS J. RISKAS, JR.

---

NEW JERUSALEM

For Latter-day Saints, the gathering of ISRAEL in the last days, and the building of the city of ZION and of the New Jerusalem, are closely related concepts.

The tenth ARTICLE OF FAITH, written by the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1842, declares that the New Jerusalem will be built upon the American continent. He learned this as he translated the Book of Mormon (3 Ne. 20:22; Ether 13:2–6). Additional revelation on this subject came in September 1830 and was further clarified in the subsequent months (D&C 28:9; 42:33–36, 62, 67; 57:3). In July 1831, Joseph Smith traveled to Jackson County, Missouri, at the command of the Lord, where it was announced that the long-awaited gathering of Israel would commence. The city of Zion (also called the New Jerusalem) and its temple would be built in Independence, Missouri (D&C 57:1–3).

Even as the ancient tribes of Israel were scattered north of the Holy Land and their identity was lost, their prophets foretold a gathering of Israel in the last days in a consecrated land (Jer. 31:1–12). Zion would be reestablished. This prophecy includes the promise that the “pure in heart” will receive the higher principles and truths of the full GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST (D&C 97:21; 100:16; 101:18). Both where and how they live will come about under divine influence. Since favorable spiritual conditions may exist anywhere in the world, cities of Zion and of Zion people, the “pure in heart,” could be located anywhere in the world (D&C 97:21). However, there is to be a “center place,” or capital city, of Zion. It is referred to both as “the city of Zion” and as “the city of New Jerusalem” (D&C 57:2; 84:2; cf. 45:66–67).

The writings of Ether, written prior to 125 B.C., abridged by MORONI<sup>2</sup> in the Book of Mormon, prophesy of the preparations for the coming of the MESSIAH and of a New Jerusalem in the Western Hemisphere. It is to be built by the remnant of the seed of JOSEPH OF EGYPT (Ether 13:3–10). Ether also speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem of old, adding that it will be rebuilt with a temple and become a holy city (Ether 13:11).

Also, the book of Revelation speaks of “the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven” (Rev. 21:2, 10). This may relate to the return of the city of Enoch, the Zion that in Enoch’s day was caught up into heaven (Moses 7:12–21, 59–64).

The future rebuilding of the Holy Land for the house of Judah and the building of the New Jerusalem in the Western Hemisphere for the house of Joseph are associated with the return of the Messiah to the earth. Of this era, the 1845 Proclamation of the Twelve (MFP 1:252–66) says:

He will assemble the Natives, the remnants of Joseph in America; and make them a great, and strong, and powerful nation: and he will civilize and enlighten them, and will establish a holy city, and temple and seat of government among them, which shall be called Zion.

And there shall be his tabernacle, his sanctuary, his throne, and seat of government for the whole continent of North and South America for ever. In short, it will be to the western hemisphere what Jerusalem will be to the eastern. . . .

The city of Zion, with its sanctuary and priesthood, and the glorious fulness of the gospel, will constitute a standard which will put an end to jarring creeds and political wranglings, by uniting the republics, states, provinces, territories, nations, tribes, kindred, tongues, people and sects of North and South America in one great and common bond of brotherhood. Truth and knowledge shall make them free, and love cement their union. The Lord also shall be their king and their lawgiver; while wars shall cease and peace prevail for a thousand years [pp. 259–60].

The prophet Isaiah declared that in a future time “out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem” (Isa. 2:2–3; cf. Micah 4:1–2). Latter-day Saints believe this refers to the two Zion headquarters in the two hemispheres from which the Messiah, the returned Son of God, will reign triumphantly over the whole earth.

GRAHAM W. DOXEY

---

NEW MEXICO, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN

Although the MORMON BATTALION traversed New Mexico from its northeast to its southwest corner in 1846, the next significant LDS contact in that territory did not occur until nearly three decades later. In 1876 two members of a group of LDS missionaries otherwise assigned to Mexico found notable success in proselytizing among the Zuni in western New Mexico. Subsequent labors among the Zuni were less successful, but a number of Navajos were converted. In 1876, missionaries founded the settlement of Savoia, about twenty miles east of the Zuni village, and were joined by LDS converts from the southern states. The southerners soon moved to LDS settlements on the Little Colorado River in Arizona, and in 1882 the remaining settlers, reinforced by expatriates from the Little Colorado, relocated a few miles south. Eventually named Ramah, the village continues as a predominantly LDS community. Ramah was a major focus in a landmark interdisciplinary study of five cultures by Harvard University scholars in the mid-twentieth century.

County, Missouri, at the command of the Lord, where it was announced that the long-awaited gathering of Israel would commence. The city of Zion (also called the New Jerusalem) and its temple would be built in Independence, Missouri (D&C 57:1–3).

Even as the ancient tribes of Israel were scattered north of the Holy Land and their identity was lost, their prophets foretold a gathering of Israel in the last days in a consecrated land (Jer. 31:1–12). Zion would be reestablished. This prophecy includes the promise that the “pure in heart” will receive the higher principles and truths of the full GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST (D&C 97:21; 100:16; 101:18). Both where and how they live will come about under divine influence. Since favorable spiritual conditions may exist anywhere in the world, cities of Zion and of Zion people, the “pure in heart,” could be located anywhere in the world (D&C 97:21). However, there is to be a “center place,” or capital city, of Zion. It is referred to both as “the city of Zion” and as “the city of New Jerusalem” (D&C 57:2; 84:2; cf. 45:66–67).

The writings of Ether, written prior to 125 B.C., abridged by MORONI<sup>2</sup> in the Book of Mormon, prophesy of the preparations for the coming of the MESSIAH and of a New Jerusalem in the Western Hemisphere. It is to be built by the remnant of the seed of JOSEPH OF EGYPT (Ether 13:3–10). Ether also speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem of old, adding that it will be rebuilt with a temple and become a holy city (Ether 13:11).

Also, the book of Revelation speaks of “the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven” (Rev. 21:2, 10). This may relate to the return of the city of Enoch, the Zion that in Enoch’s day was caught up into heaven (Moses 7:12–21, 59–64).

The future rebuilding of the Holy Land for the house of Judah and the building of the New Jerusalem in the Western Hemisphere for the house of Joseph are associated with the return of the Messiah to the earth. Of this era, the 1845 Proclamation of the Twelve (MFP 1:252–66) says:

He will assemble the Natives, the remnants of Joseph in America; and make them a great, and strong, and powerful nation: and he will civilize and enlighten them, and will establish a holy city, and temple and seat of government among them, which shall be called Zion.

And there shall be his tabernacle, his sanctuary, his throne, and seat of government for the whole continent of North and South America for ever. In short, it will be to the western hemisphere what Jerusalem will be to the eastern. . . .

The city of Zion, with its sanctuary and priesthood, and the glorious fulness of the gospel, will constitute a standard which will put an end to jarring creeds and political wranglings, by uniting the republics, states, provinces, territories, nations, tribes, kindred, tongues, people and sects of North and South America in one great and common bond of brotherhood. Truth and knowledge shall make them free, and love cement their union. The Lord also shall be their king and their lawgiver; while wars shall cease and peace prevail for a thousand years [pp. 259–60].

The prophet Isaiah declared that in a future time “out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem” (Isa. 2:2–3; cf. Micah 4:1–2). Latter-day Saints believe this refers to the two Zion headquarters in the two hemispheres from which the Messiah, the returned Son of God, will reign triumphantly over the whole earth.

GRAHAM W. DOXEY

---

NEW MEXICO, PIONEER SETTLEMENTS IN

Although the MORMON BATTALION traversed New Mexico from its northeast to its southwest corner in 1846, the next significant LDS contact in that territory did not occur until nearly three decades later. In 1876 two members of a group of LDS missionaries otherwise assigned to Mexico found notable success in proselytizing among the Zuni in western New Mexico. Subsequent labors among the Zuni were less successful, but a number of Navajos were converted. In 1876, missionaries founded the settlement of Savoia, about twenty miles east of the Zuni village, and were joined by LDS converts from the southern states. The southerners soon moved to LDS settlements on the Little Colorado River in Arizona, and in 1882 the remaining settlers, reinforced by expatriates from the Little Colorado, relocated a few miles south. Eventually named Ramah, the village continues as a predominantly LDS community. Ramah was a major focus in a landmark interdisciplinary study of five cultures by Harvard University scholars in the mid-twentieth century.

Meanwhile, Latter-day Saints settled along the San Juan River at Fruitland, in northwestern New Mexico, in 1878. Kirtland and Waterflow, additional LDS villages along the San Juan, were initiated in the early 1880s, and Bluewater, a short distance to the north, was founded in 1894. In 1912, Fruitland became headquarters for the Young Stake, which also included wards and branches in nearby southwestern Colorado.

Farther south but also near New Mexico's western border, a group of Latter-day Saints settled in the Luna Valley, beginning in 1883. The Luna Ward was closely associated with LDS congregations across the border in Arizona.

Additional LDS congregations were established in western New Mexico at Pleasanton, Socorro County (1882–1889); and at Virden, Hidalgo County (from 1915). The latter was settled by refugees from the Mormon colonies in Mexico dislodged by the Mexican Revolution.

Most LDS wards and branches established in the twentieth century served minorities in communities east of these predominantly Mormon villages. In the first third of the century, congregations were organized at Albuquerque, Gallup, Taos, Silver City, Clovis, Tres Piedras, Pagosa Springs, and Thoreau. By 1990, as a result of widespread proselytizing and of in-migration, there were 49,000 Latter-day Saints in New Mexico.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Divett, Robert T. "New Mexico and the Mormons." Greater Llano Estacado Southwest Heritage 6 (Spring 1976):14–19.
- Telling, Irving. "Ramah, New Mexico, 1876–1900: An Historical Episode with Some Value Analysis." Utah Historical Quarterly 21 (Apr. 1953):117–36.
- Vogt, Evon Z., and Ethel M. Albert, eds. People of Rimrock: A Study of Values in Five Cultures. Cambridge, Mass., 1966.

RICHARD L. JENSEN

NEWSPAPERS, LDS

The Latter-day Saints have seldom been without a Church-sponsored or -oriented newspaper from the days of The Evening and the Morning Star (Independence, Missouri, 1832–1833, and Kirtland, Ohio, 1833–1834) to the current Deseret News (Salt Lake City, 1850–) and Church News (1931–). Even during their exodus to the West, the Saints could read their Frontier Guardian (Kanesville, Iowa, 1849–1852). For a time they supported both a religious Church paper and a single-sheet local newspaper. Such paired papers were The Upper Missouri Advertiser (Independence, 1832–1833) and The Evening and the Morning Star; the Northern Times (Kirtland, c. 1835–1836) and the Latter Day Saints' Messenger and Advocate (1834–1837); and the Wasp (Nauvoo, 1842–1843) replaced by the Nauvoo Neighbor (1843–1845) and the Times and Seasons (1839–1846).

When Latter-day Saints settle in an area, they often start an unofficial Church-oriented paper to share local news and to keep posted on the international Church. Some of the best-known unofficial twentieth-century local LDS newspapers are California Intermountain News (Los Angeles, 1935–1985, which became Latter-day Sentinel 1985–1989), the Latter-day Sentinel (Phoenix, Arizona 1979–1989), and the Hawaii Record Bulletin (Honolulu, 1977–), currently Hawaii LDS News.

[See the chart of Church periodicals in the Appendix.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- McLaws, Monte Burr. Spokesman for the Kingdom: Early Mormon Journalism and the Deseret News, 1830–1898. Provo, Utah, 1977.

JACK A. NELSON

NEW TESTAMENT

During the early centuries of the Christian era, the New Testament gospels were the principal written witness of Jesus as the Christ. No other collection of writings carried the insight, the power of teaching, and, consequently, the spiritual appeal to Christians. The New Testament also stands as the foundation of the RESTORATION of the gospel in the latter days. It was while reading in the Epistle of JAMES (1:5) that the youthful Joseph SMITH was inspired to pray to the Lord about his confusion over religious matters, leading to his FIRST VISION (JS—H 1:7–20). The New Testament is one of the STANDARD WORKS or canonized scriptures accepted by Latter-day Saints, who seek spiritual strength and enlightenment from its pages. Further, they accept the New Testament sketches as accurate portrayals of the life and ministry of Jesus Christ as well as the ministry of his apostles and

Meanwhile, Latter-day Saints settled along the San Juan River at Fruitland, in northwestern New Mexico, in 1878. Kirtland and Waterflow, additional LDS villages along the San Juan, were initiated in the early 1880s, and Bluewater, a short distance to the north, was founded in 1894. In 1912, Fruitland became headquarters for the Young Stake, which also included wards and branches in nearby southwestern Colorado.

Farther south but also near New Mexico's western border, a group of Latter-day Saints settled in the Luna Valley, beginning in 1883. The Luna Ward was closely associated with LDS congregations across the border in Arizona.

Additional LDS congregations were established in western New Mexico at Pleasanton, Socorro County (1882–1889); and at Virden, Hidalgo County (from 1915). The latter was settled by refugees from the Mormon colonies in Mexico dislodged by the Mexican Revolution.

Most LDS wards and branches established in the twentieth century served minorities in communities east of these predominantly Mormon villages. In the first third of the century, congregations were organized at Albuquerque, Gallup, Taos, Silver City, Clovis, Tres Piedras, Pagosa Springs, and Thoreau. By 1990, as a result of widespread proselytizing and of in-migration, there were 49,000 Latter-day Saints in New Mexico.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Divett, Robert T. "New Mexico and the Mormons." Greater Llano Estacado Southwest Heritage 6 (Spring 1976):14–19.
- Telling, Irving. "Ramah, New Mexico, 1876–1900: An Historical Episode with Some Value Analysis." Utah Historical Quarterly 21 (Apr. 1953):117–36.
- Vogt, Evon Z., and Ethel M. Albert, eds. People of Rimrock: A Study of Values in Five Cultures. Cambridge, Mass., 1966.

RICHARD L. JENSEN

NEWSPAPERS, LDS

The Latter-day Saints have seldom been without a Church-sponsored or -oriented newspaper from the days of The Evening and the Morning Star (Independence, Missouri, 1832–1833, and Kirtland, Ohio, 1833–1834) to the current Deseret News (Salt Lake City, 1850–) and Church News (1931–). Even during their exodus to the West, the Saints could read their Frontier Guardian (Kanesville, Iowa, 1849–1852). For a time they supported both a religious Church paper and a single-sheet local newspaper. Such paired papers were The Upper Missouri Advertiser (Independence, 1832–1833) and The Evening and the Morning Star; the Northern Times (Kirtland, c. 1835–1836) and the Latter Day Saints' Messenger and Advocate (1834–1837); and the Wasp (Nauvoo, 1842–1843) replaced by the Nauvoo Neighbor (1843–1845) and the Times and Seasons (1839–1846).

When Latter-day Saints settle in an area, they often start an unofficial Church-oriented paper to share local news and to keep posted on the international Church. Some of the best-known unofficial twentieth-century local LDS newspapers are California Intermountain News (Los Angeles, 1935–1985, which became Latter-day Sentinel 1985–1989), the Latter-day Sentinel (Phoenix, Arizona 1979–1989), and the Hawaii Record Bulletin (Honolulu, 1977–), currently Hawaii LDS News.

[See the chart of Church periodicals in the Appendix.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- McLaws, Monte Burr. Spokesman for the Kingdom: Early Mormon Journalism and the Deseret News, 1830–1898. Provo, Utah, 1977.

JACK A. NELSON

NEW TESTAMENT

During the early centuries of the Christian era, the New Testament gospels were the principal written witness of Jesus as the Christ. No other collection of writings carried the insight, the power of teaching, and, consequently, the spiritual appeal to Christians. The New Testament also stands as the foundation of the RESTORATION of the gospel in the latter days. It was while reading in the Epistle of JAMES (1:5) that the youthful Joseph SMITH was inspired to pray to the Lord about his confusion over religious matters, leading to his FIRST VISION (JS—H 1:7–20). The New Testament is one of the STANDARD WORKS or canonized scriptures accepted by Latter-day Saints, who seek spiritual strength and enlightenment from its pages. Further, they accept the New Testament sketches as accurate portrayals of the life and ministry of Jesus Christ as well as the ministry of his apostles and

Meanwhile, Latter-day Saints settled along the San Juan River at Fruitland, in northwestern New Mexico, in 1878. Kirtland and Waterflow, additional LDS villages along the San Juan, were initiated in the early 1880s, and Bluewater, a short distance to the north, was founded in 1894. In 1912, Fruitland became headquarters for the Young Stake, which also included wards and branches in nearby southwestern Colorado.

Farther south but also near New Mexico's western border, a group of Latter-day Saints settled in the Luna Valley, beginning in 1883. The Luna Ward was closely associated with LDS congregations across the border in Arizona.

Additional LDS congregations were established in western New Mexico at Pleasanton, Socorro County (1882–1889); and at Virden, Hidalgo County (from 1915). The latter was settled by refugees from the Mormon colonies in Mexico dislodged by the Mexican Revolution.

Most LDS wards and branches established in the twentieth century served minorities in communities east of these predominantly Mormon villages. In the first third of the century, congregations were organized at Albuquerque, Gallup, Taos, Silver City, Clovis, Tres Piedras, Pagosa Springs, and Thoreau. By 1990, as a result of widespread proselytizing and of in-migration, there were 49,000 Latter-day Saints in New Mexico.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Divett, Robert T. "New Mexico and the Mormons." Greater Llano Estacado Southwest Heritage 6 (Spring 1976):14–19.
- Telling, Irving. "Ramah, New Mexico, 1876–1900: An Historical Episode with Some Value Analysis." Utah Historical Quarterly 21 (Apr. 1953):117–36.
- Vogt, Evon Z., and Ethel M. Albert, eds. People of Rimrock: A Study of Values in Five Cultures. Cambridge, Mass., 1966.

RICHARD L. JENSEN

NEWSPAPERS, LDS

The Latter-day Saints have seldom been without a Church-sponsored or -oriented newspaper from the days of The Evening and the Morning Star (Independence, Missouri, 1832–1833, and Kirtland, Ohio, 1833–1834) to the current Deseret News (Salt Lake City, 1850–) and Church News (1931–). Even during their exodus to the West, the Saints could read their Frontier Guardian (Kanesville, Iowa, 1849–1852). For a time they supported both a religious Church paper and a single-sheet local newspaper. Such paired papers were The Upper Missouri Advertiser (Independence, 1832–1833) and The Evening and the Morning Star; the Northern Times (Kirtland, c. 1835–1836) and the Latter Day Saints' Messenger and Advocate (1834–1837); and the Wasp (Nauvoo, 1842–1843) replaced by the Nauvoo Neighbor (1843–1845) and the Times and Seasons (1839–1846).

When Latter-day Saints settle in an area, they often start an unofficial Church-oriented paper to share local news and to keep posted on the international Church. Some of the best-known unofficial twentieth-century local LDS newspapers are California Intermountain News (Los Angeles, 1935–1985, which became Latter-day Sentinel 1985–1989), the Latter-day Sentinel (Phoenix, Arizona 1979–1989), and the Hawaii Record Bulletin (Honolulu, 1977–), currently Hawaii LDS News.

[See the chart of Church periodicals in the Appendix.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- McLaws, Monte Burr. Spokesman for the Kingdom: Early Mormon Journalism and the Deseret News, 1830–1898. Provo, Utah, 1977.

JACK A. NELSON

NEW TESTAMENT

During the early centuries of the Christian era, the New Testament gospels were the principal written witness of Jesus as the Christ. No other collection of writings carried the insight, the power of teaching, and, consequently, the spiritual appeal to Christians. The New Testament also stands as the foundation of the RESTORATION of the gospel in the latter days. It was while reading in the Epistle of JAMES (1:5) that the youthful Joseph SMITH was inspired to pray to the Lord about his confusion over religious matters, leading to his FIRST VISION (JS—H 1:7–20). The New Testament is one of the STANDARD WORKS or canonized scriptures accepted by Latter-day Saints, who seek spiritual strength and enlightenment from its pages. Further, they accept the New Testament sketches as accurate portrayals of the life and ministry of Jesus Christ as well as the ministry of his apostles and their associates, that reveal much of the order and organization of the earliest New Testament Church. Moreover, the New Testament includes many of God's covenants and commandments given personally by Jesus and, after his ascension, through his apostles. Latter-day Saints also value the New Testament prophecies about the latter days.

The writings of the New Testament were likely all produced within the first Christian century of the Christian era. Even so, its collection of texts went through three centuries of changes, and acceptance or rejection, before it acquired its recognized and current form, first listed in the Easter letter of Athanasius in Egypt in A.D. 367. The third synod of Carthage (A.D. 397) canonized the books of the New Testament as represented in the letter of Athanasius because each writing had three qualifications: apostolic authority, support of a major Christian community, and an absence of false teachings.

The rise of so-called heresies in the second century demonstrated the loss of prophetic revelation and thus marked the need for Christians to turn back to the apostles for authoritative writings. One of the heretics, Marcion (c. A.D. 130), limited his early collection of scripture to one gospel, Luke, and to the letters of Paul, which he freely edited.

THE GOSPELS. For at least two reasons Latter-day Saints view the New Testament gospels as essentially accurate accounts of the life and ministry of Jesus Christ. First, many pre-Christian prophecies, especially in the Book of Mormon, detailed specific events in Jesus' life, including his mother's name, circumstances of his birth, his baptism, his selection of twelve apostles, the miracles he performed, his rejection and suffering, and his death and resurrection (e.g., 1 Ne. 11:13–36; Mosiah 3:5–11; see JESUS CHRIST: MINISTRY OF JESUS CHRIST). Second, Joseph Smith's inspired work in the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST) led him to add clarifying details to the setting and content of certain stories about Jesus and to view many of Jesus' PARABLES and teachings as applicable to the latter days.

The Gospel of Matthew is characterized by two distinct features: frequent use of Old Testament references and six of Jesus' discourses (see MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF). It is assumed that Matthew's frequent use of Old Testament references indicates both a Jewish audience and the view that Christianity was the fulfillment of prophetic Judaism.

Significantly for Latter-day Saints, portions of this gospel receive attention in extrabiblical scriptures. For instance, the Book of Mormon records that when the resurrected Jesus visited disciples in the Western Hemisphere (c. A.D. 34), he delivered a sermon almost identical to the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, underscoring the validity and universality of the sermon (3 Ne. 12–14; Matt. 5–7; see also BEATITUDES). Additionally, Joseph Smith's work on the JST led him to make inspired revisions, the most frequently noted being those in the Sermon on the Mount and in Jesus' discourse about the fate of Jerusalem and his second coming (Matt. 24; see JOSEPH SMITH—MATTHEW).

While only modest attention has been given to Mark's gospel in LDS scholarly writings, Church members have traditionally found great value in studying its pages. Its portrayal of Jesus may be the most dynamic, and may ultimately go back to the eyewitness recollections of PETER, the chief apostle.

The Gospel of Luke, called by some scholars "the most beautiful book" in the world, holds special interest for Latter-day Saints for several reasons, including its narrative of the Christmas story, its seventeen parables not recorded elsewhere, its strong emphases on remission of sin and Jesus' sympathy for all people, its account of the call and mission of the SEVENTY disciples, and the distinct prominence it gives to women.

The Gospel of JOHN was written that "ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ" (John 20:31). Besides presenting a series of Jesus' discourses not contained in the other gospels, John uses a series of "Messianic metaphors" to disclose Jesus' divine nature and his mission: Word; Lamb; Living Water; I am; Bread of Life; Living Bread; Light of the World; Good Shepherd; Resurrection; the Way, Truth and Life; and the True Vine. Many of these metaphors also appear in the Doctrine and Covenants, a latter-day scripture, where such language is expanded and applied to the restored Church. Further, Jesus' discussion of "other sheep," recorded only in John 10:14–16, was specifically referred to by the risen Jesus during his visit to disciples in the Western Hemisphere when he wanted to make a point about those to whom he was sent to minister (3 Ne. 15:12–24). During that same post-Resurrection visit, Jesus used several phrases and descriptions—particularly of himself and his work—that are characteristic of John’s gospel (e.g., 3 Ne. 11:10–11, 14, 27, 32–36).

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. From the narrative of the ascension of Jesus through the account of the ministry of Paul, the book of Acts relates the spiritual ministry of apostolic witnesses during the early years of Christianity. Latter-day Saints are interested that, in replacing Judas, one apostle was chosen to complete the twelve and that Peter set the qualifications of apostles: They must know the ministry of Jesus, they must be ordained, and they must be witnesses of his resurrection (Acts 1:21–22). Latter-day apostles in the Church are also “special witnesses of the name of Christ in all the world” (D&C 107:23; cf. 27:12; 84:108). In addition, the book of Acts indicates the rich outpouring of the Holy Ghost in the early Church, both in the form of guiding revelation and in manifestations of the GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT, characteristics that Latter-day Saints experience and value. Further, certain prophetic statements have particular meaning. For example, Latter-day Saints understand Paul’s prophecy to the elders of Ephesus concerning mutinous problems within the early Church to be an inspired declaration about the impending APOSTASY (Acts 20:29–30). Moreover, they view Peter’s prediction of Jesus’ return from heaven at “the times of restitution of all things” as commencing with the latter-day restoration of the gospel (3:19–21). Further, the book of Acts has a good deal to say about the organization, doctrines, and character of the preaching of the early Christian church.

THE EPISTLES. Letters in the new testament are traditionally divided into two groups, the writings of Paul and the general epistles.

The style of Paul’s writings varies from the almost formal exposition in Romans to the charming persuasion in Philemon. In addition to teachings valued by other Christians, Latter-day Saints exhibit particular interest in certain doctrines, ecclesiastical offices, and practices noted in Paul’s works. For instance, the place of the Gentiles in the history of salvation (Rom. 9–11) is also addressed in the Book of Mormon (e.g., 1 Ne. 13:20–14:7; 22:6–11; 2 Ne. 10:8–18; see CENTILES, FULNESS OF); joint-heirship with Christ (Rom. 8:16–17) is taught in modern revelation (D&C 84:35–38; see HEIRS); adoption into the covenant people of God (Rom. 8:14–15) is taught in the Book of Mormon (e.g., 2 Ne. 30:2; see LAW OF ADOPTION); the value of spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12; cf. 1 Thes. 5:19–20) is emphasized in modern scripture (D&C 46); the importance of CHARITY or LOVE (1 Cor. 13) is underscored particularly by words of the prophet Mormon (Moro. 7:40–48); Paul’s list of virtues to be sought (Philip. 4:8) is the base of Joseph Smith’s thirteenth ARTICLE OF FAITH; the encroaching apostasy (Gal. 1:6–9) and disunity in the early church (1 Cor. 1:10–13), as well as Paul’s prophecy about the inevitability of the apostasy (2 Thes. 2:1–4; cf. 1 Tim. 4:1–3), formed an important focus of the risen Jesus’ words to Joseph Smith in the First Vision (JS—H 1:18–19); the fulfillment of the LAW OF MOSES in Christ (e.g., Gal. 3) is emphatically affirmed by the risen Jesus in the Book of Mormon (3 Ne. 15:3–10; cf. 9:19–20); and his literal physical resurrection, attended by many proofs (1 Cor. 15), is underlined and augmented by the appearances of the risen Jesus to disciples in the Western Hemisphere (c. A.D. 34; 3 Ne. 11–28) and in statements to Joseph Smith (cf. D&C 130:22). In matters of Church organization, Latter-day Saints find Paul’s discussions of apostolic leadership (Gal. 1:18–19; 2:9–10) and his mention of priesthood offices such as apostles, prophets, EVANGELISTS (Eph. 2:19–21; 4:11–13), and BISHOPS and DEACONS (1 Tim. 3) to be significant for Church administration. In terms of practices or ordinances, Latter-day Saints value Paul’s statements on the SACRAMENT (1 Cor. 10:14–21; 11:23–30; cf. 3 Ne. 18:28–29; Moro. 4–5), his mention of BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD (1 Cor. 15:29), and his instructions on the LAYING ON OF HANDS (1 Tim. 4:14; 5:22). These things exist in the LDS Church as a result of latter-day revelation, and the New Testament epistles attest to their presence in the early Church.

Concerning the general epistles, that of James stands out in the LDS view because of its influence on the young Joseph Smith. In addition to the passage that led him to pray for divine guidance (James 1:5), Latter-day Saints value both the teaching that the quality of one’s faith in Christ is mirrored in one’s daily actions (James 2:14–26; see FAITH; GRACE) and the practice of blessing the sick (James 5:14–15). From the writings of Peter, perhaps the most frequently cited are those that speak of Jesus’ mission among departed spirits while his body lay in the tomb (1 Pet. 3:18–20; 4:6), an important subject in latter-day revelation (D&C 138; see SALVATION OF THE DEAD). In addition, passages that discuss the TRANSFIGURATION (2 Pet. 1:17–18) and the inspired means whereby prophecy is to be interpreted (2 Pet. 1:19–21) hold interest for Latter-day Saints. Because they are led by apostles and believe that an apostasy occurred from the early Christian church, Latter-day Saints have been drawn to the components of the apostolic witness in John's letters (1 Jn. 1:1) and to indications that a serious apostasy was already under way in the early Church (1 Jn. 4:1–3; 3 Jn. 1:9–10).

BOOK OF REVELATION. Besides naming the apostle John as the author of this work (1 Ne. 14:18–28), latter-day scripture has focused both on issues mentioned in the book of Revelation (D&C 77) and on additional material written by John (D&C 7; see JOHN, REVELATIONS OF). Latter-day Saint interest has focused on matters that have to do with the latter days (cf. TPJS, pp. 287–94), including the discussions of the eventual demise of evil and the millennial reign of Christ and his righteous followers (Rev. 19–20), the anticipation of the NEW JERUSALEM (Rev. 21), and the vision of “another angel [flying] in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth” (Rev. 14:6). This latter passage has usually been interpreted as referring to the angel MORONI, who visited Joseph Smith in 1823 and revealed to him the burial place of the COLD PLATES. Moreover, Latter-day Saints understand the warning against adding to or taking away from the book (Rev. 22:18–19) as applying specifically to the book of Revelation rather than to an expanding canon of scripture that they value (cf. Deut. 4:2; 12:32; 2 Ne. 29:3–14).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard L. Understanding Paul. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- Bruce, Frederick Fyvie. New Testament History. Garden City, N.Y., 1972.
- Conybeare, W. J., and John S. Howson. The Life and Epistles of St. Paul. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1968 (reprint).
- Edersheim, Alfred. The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2 vols. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1950 (reprint).
- Jackson, Kent P., and Robert L. Millet, eds. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 5. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, 3 vols. Salt Lake City, 1965–1973.
- . The Promised Messiah: The First Coming of Christ. Salt Lake City, 1978.

———. The Mortal Messiah: From Bethlehem to Calvary, 4 vols. Salt Lake City, 1979–1981.

Millet, Robert L., ed. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 6. Salt Lake City, 1987.

Sperry, Sidney B. Paul's Life and Letters. Salt Lake City, 1955.

Talmage, James E. JC. Salt Lake City, 1915.

ROBERT C. PATCH

---

NEW YORK, EARLY LDS SITES IN

[Many events in early Latter-day Saint history occurred in the Finger Lakes region of western New York and nearby northern Pennsylvania from 1820 to 1831. Western New York became known as the Burnt-over District because of the intense religious revivals that swept the area from the 1790s to the 1840s, affecting the families of many early LDS converts. See, generally, Historical Sites and History of the Church; c. 1820–1831.

The Palmyra-Manchester neighborhood was the home of the Joseph Smith family and the location of Joseph's First Vision; see Sacred Grove. In this area he obtained the Gold Plates; see Cumorah and Moroni, Visitations of. In 1830 the Book of Mormon was published in Palmyra with the financial assistance of a local resident, Martin Harris.

Joseph Smith was employed near Harmony, Pennsylvania, in 1825. There he met his future wife, Emma Hale Smith; they were married at nearby South Bainbridge (Afton), New York, in 1827. Joseph and Emma lived until 1830 in Harmony, where Joseph translated most of the Book of Mormon. The restoration of the Aaronic Priesthood occurred in this vicinity in May 1829, and the Melchizedek Priesthood was restored between Harmony and Colesville. Some of the earliest converts to the Church belonged to its Colesville branch.

In Fayette, New York, Joseph Smith completed the Book of Mormon translation in June 1829, at the home of Peter Whitmer, Sr., where the Organization of the Church also took place, April 6, 1830.]

---

NEW ZEALAND, THE CHURCH IN

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints first reached New Zealand on October 27, 1854, when President Augustus Farnham, of the Australian MISSION, Elder William Cooke, and Thomas Holder, a PRIEST in the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD, arrived from AUSTRALIA. The missionaries worked first among European immigrants and then among the native Maoris, and the Church grew slowly at first, then steadily, so that by 1990 New Zealand

see SALVATION OF THE DEAD). In addition, passages that discuss the TRANSFIGURATION (2 Pet. 1:17–18) and the inspired means whereby prophecy is to be interpreted (2 Pet. 1:19–21) hold interest for Latter-day Saints. Because they are led by apostles and believe that an apostasy occurred from the early Christian church, Latter-day Saints have been drawn to the components of the apostolic witness in John's letters (1 Jn. 1:1) and to indications that a serious apostasy was already under way in the early Church (1 Jn. 4:1–3; 3 Jn. 1:9–10).

BOOK OF REVELATION. Besides naming the apostle John as the author of this work (1 Ne. 14:18–28), latter-day scripture has focused both on issues mentioned in the book of Revelation (D&C 77) and on additional material written by John (D&C 7; see JOHN, REVELATIONS OF). Latter-day Saint interest has focused on matters that have to do with the latter days (cf. TPJS, pp. 287–94), including the discussions of the eventual demise of evil and the millennial reign of Christ and his righteous followers (Rev. 19–20), the anticipation of the NEW JERUSALEM (Rev. 21), and the vision of “another angel [flying] in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth” (Rev. 14:6). This latter passage has usually been interpreted as referring to the angel MORONI, who visited Joseph Smith in 1823 and revealed to him the burial place of the COLD PLATES. Moreover, Latter-day Saints understand the warning against adding to or taking away from the book (Rev. 22:18–19) as applying specifically to the book of Revelation rather than to an expanding canon of scripture that they value (cf. Deut. 4:2; 12:32; 2 Ne. 29:3–14).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard L. Understanding Paul. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- Bruce, Frederick Fyvie. New Testament History. Garden City, N.Y., 1972.
- Conybeare, W. J., and John S. Howson. The Life and Epistles of St. Paul. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1968 (reprint).
- Edersheim, Alfred. The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2 vols. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1950 (reprint).
- Jackson, Kent P., and Robert L. Millet, eds. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 5. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, 3 vols. Salt Lake City, 1965–1973.
- . The Promised Messiah: The First Coming of Christ. Salt Lake City, 1978.

———. The Mortal Messiah: From Bethlehem to Calvary, 4 vols. Salt Lake City, 1979–1981.

Millet, Robert L., ed. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 6. Salt Lake City, 1987.

Sperry, Sidney B. Paul's Life and Letters. Salt Lake City, 1955.

Talmage, James E. JC. Salt Lake City, 1915.

ROBERT C. PATCH

---

NEW YORK, EARLY LDS SITES IN

[Many events in early Latter-day Saint history occurred in the Finger Lakes region of western New York and nearby northern Pennsylvania from 1820 to 1831. Western New York became known as the Burnt-over District because of the intense religious revivals that swept the area from the 1790s to the 1840s, affecting the families of many early LDS converts. See, generally, Historical Sites and History of the Church; c. 1820–1831.

The Palmyra-Manchester neighborhood was the home of the Joseph Smith family and the location of Joseph's First Vision; see Sacred Grove. In this area he obtained the Gold Plates; see Cumorah and Moroni, Visitations of. In 1830 the Book of Mormon was published in Palmyra with the financial assistance of a local resident, Martin Harris.

Joseph Smith was employed near Harmony, Pennsylvania, in 1825. There he met his future wife, Emma Hale Smith; they were married at nearby South Bainbridge (Afton), New York, in 1827. Joseph and Emma lived until 1830 in Harmony, where Joseph translated most of the Book of Mormon. The restoration of the Aaronic Priesthood occurred in this vicinity in May 1829, and the Melchizedek Priesthood was restored between Harmony and Colesville. Some of the earliest converts to the Church belonged to its Colesville branch.

In Fayette, New York, Joseph Smith completed the Book of Mormon translation in June 1829, at the home of Peter Whitmer, Sr., where the Organization of the Church also took place, April 6, 1830.]

---

NEW ZEALAND, THE CHURCH IN

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints first reached New Zealand on October 27, 1854, when President Augustus Farnham, of the Australian MISSION, Elder William Cooke, and Thomas Holder, a PRIEST in the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD, arrived from AUSTRALIA. The missionaries worked first among European immigrants and then among the native Maoris, and the Church grew slowly at first, then steadily, so that by 1990 New Zealand

see SALVATION OF THE DEAD). In addition, passages that discuss the TRANSFIGURATION (2 Pet. 1:17–18) and the inspired means whereby prophecy is to be interpreted (2 Pet. 1:19–21) hold interest for Latter-day Saints. Because they are led by apostles and believe that an apostasy occurred from the early Christian church, Latter-day Saints have been drawn to the components of the apostolic witness in John's letters (1 Jn. 1:1) and to indications that a serious apostasy was already under way in the early Church (1 Jn. 4:1–3; 3 Jn. 1:9–10).

BOOK OF REVELATION. Besides naming the apostle John as the author of this work (1 Ne. 14:18–28), latter-day scripture has focused both on issues mentioned in the book of Revelation (D&C 77) and on additional material written by John (D&C 7; see JOHN, REVELATIONS OF). Latter-day Saint interest has focused on matters that have to do with the latter days (cf. TPJS, pp. 287–94), including the discussions of the eventual demise of evil and the millennial reign of Christ and his righteous followers (Rev. 19–20), the anticipation of the NEW JERUSALEM (Rev. 21), and the vision of “another angel [flying] in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth” (Rev. 14:6). This latter passage has usually been interpreted as referring to the angel MORONI, who visited Joseph Smith in 1823 and revealed to him the burial place of the COLD PLATES. Moreover, Latter-day Saints understand the warning against adding to or taking away from the book (Rev. 22:18–19) as applying specifically to the book of Revelation rather than to an expanding canon of scripture that they value (cf. Deut. 4:2; 12:32; 2 Ne. 29:3–14).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard L. Understanding Paul. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- Bruce, Frederick Fyvie. New Testament History. Garden City, N.Y., 1972.
- Conybeare, W. J., and John S. Howson. The Life and Epistles of St. Paul. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1968 (reprint).
- Edersheim, Alfred. The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2 vols. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1950 (reprint).
- Jackson, Kent P., and Robert L. Millet, eds. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 5. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, 3 vols. Salt Lake City, 1965–1973.
- . The Promised Messiah: The First Coming of Christ. Salt Lake City, 1978.

———. The Mortal Messiah: From Bethlehem to Calvary, 4 vols. Salt Lake City, 1979–1981.

Millet, Robert L., ed. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 6. Salt Lake City, 1987.

Sperry, Sidney B. Paul's Life and Letters. Salt Lake City, 1955.

Talmage, James E. JC. Salt Lake City, 1915.

ROBERT C. PATCH

---

NEW YORK, EARLY LDS SITES IN

[Many events in early Latter-day Saint history occurred in the Finger Lakes region of western New York and nearby northern Pennsylvania from 1820 to 1831. Western New York became known as the Burnt-over District because of the intense religious revivals that swept the area from the 1790s to the 1840s, affecting the families of many early LDS converts. See, generally, Historical Sites and History of the Church; c. 1820–1831.

The Palmyra-Manchester neighborhood was the home of the Joseph Smith family and the location of Joseph's First Vision; see Sacred Grove. In this area he obtained the Gold Plates; see Cumorah and Moroni, Visitations of. In 1830 the Book of Mormon was published in Palmyra with the financial assistance of a local resident, Martin Harris.

Joseph Smith was employed near Harmony, Pennsylvania, in 1825. There he met his future wife, Emma Hale Smith; they were married at nearby South Bainbridge (Afton), New York, in 1827. Joseph and Emma lived until 1830 in Harmony, where Joseph translated most of the Book of Mormon. The restoration of the Aaronic Priesthood occurred in this vicinity in May 1829, and the Melchizedek Priesthood was restored between Harmony and Colesville. Some of the earliest converts to the Church belonged to its Colesville branch.

In Fayette, New York, Joseph Smith completed the Book of Mormon translation in June 1829, at the home of Peter Whitmer, Sr., where the Organization of the Church also took place, April 6, 1830.]

---

NEW ZEALAND, THE CHURCH IN

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints first reached New Zealand on October 27, 1854, when President Augustus Farnham, of the Australian MISSION, Elder William Cooke, and Thomas Holder, a PRIEST in the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD, arrived from AUSTRALIA. The missionaries worked first among European immigrants and then among the native Maoris, and the Church grew slowly at first, then steadily, so that by 1990 New Zealand

had about 70,000 Latter-day Saints, two MISSIONS, and sixteen STAKES.

The first two people baptized into the LDS Church in New Zealand were Martha Holder and her daughter Louisa. The first Church branch was established in April 1855 among the European immigrants in Karori, a suburb of Wellington. The April 15, 1881, assignment of Elder William J. McDonnel to go to the Maori people coincided with prophecies of at least five separate Maori tohungas (tribal priests) that the true church of God would soon come to New Zealand. The best-known of these prophecies was the one given by Paora Potangaroa in 1881. Collectively they helped the Maoris to readily identify with the Church when its missionaries came among them (Britsch, pp. 274–76). In 1883–1884, Elders Alma Greenwood and Ira Hinckley, Jr., were especially successful among the Maoris, baptizing several hundred converts and organizing thirteen branches.

SCRIPTURES IN THE MAORI LANGUAGE. Before the LDS missionaries arrived, the Bible had already been published in Maori by earlier Christian missionaries, but expanding Maori membership created an urgent need to have the Book of Mormon translated. Ezra F. Richards and Sondra Sanders, assisted by Henare Potae, Te Pirihi Tutokohi, and James Jury, local Maori members, published the first translation in 1889. During World War I, President Joseph F. SMITH approved a second translation of the Book of Mormon, and Elder Matthew Cowley, a young missionary with unusual skill in the Maori language, was assigned to the work. He made changes in approximately 2,500 verses in the original translation, and the second edition appeared in 1917. Elder Cowley was then assigned to translate the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price, assisted by Wiremu Duncan and Stuart Meha. These translations appeared in 1919.

RELIEF SOCIETY, PRIMARY, AND THE MUTUAL IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION. The first branch RELIEF SOCIETY in New Zealand was organized in 1878, with Ann Jones as president. The first Maori Relief Society was organized in 1901, with Sister Mangu Reweti as president. In 1904, Sister Emma E. Wright, the wife of a missionary, was called as the first president of the Mission Relief Society, which coordinated the local units. Thereafter until 1931, the wife of the mission president presided over the mission Relief Society, PRIMARY, and

One of the five buildings of the Latter-day Saints' Maori Agricultural College, near Hastings, Hawke's Bay District, New Zealand, in 1919. The Church operated this school for Maori boys from 1912 to 1931, when its buildings were destroyed by an earthquake. Courtesy Edith W. Morgan.

Young Women Mutual Improvement Association (YWMIA, now YOUNG WOMEN). Then in 1931, Hepera Takare Duncan became the first local sister to preside over the Mission Relief Society.

The first MIA was organized in the Auckland branch in 1907, and the first units among the Maoris came in 1918. Sister Una Thompson is remembered for her leadership of the MIA in those early years. The first Primaries were organized in 1913, with Sisters Ere Hapati Mete and Bessie Greening as presidents. Between 1928 and 1931, Sister Arta Romney Ballif, wife of the principal of the Maori Agricultural College, was instrumental in building the Primary association throughout the mission.

CHURCH SCHOOLS. Because many Maori converts lived in outlying areas with no schools for their children, the Church established schools in local branch meetinghouses as early as 1886. In 1907 the FIRST PRESIDENCY of the Church authorized creation of a secondary school to train boys in farming, technology, and leadership skills, and to teach them religion. Accordingly, Maori Agricultural College was dedicated on April 6, 1913, in Korongata, Hastings, Hawkes Bay. A February 1931 earthquake rendered the buildings unsafe, and the Church closed the college.

Because many of the alumni of the college had become prominent Church leaders by the 1940s, Mission President Matthew Cowley recommended that a coeducational secondary school be established in New Zealand, with capacity increased from eighty to more than five hundred students.

The First Presidency approved building the present Church College of New Zealand (CCNZ) at Temple View, near Hamilton. Since its inception in 1955, CCNZ has played a significant role in the educational and spiritual development of thousands of LDS high school students.

NEW ZEALAND TEMPLE. Prior to 1958, Latter-day Saints in New Zealand had to travel to the Hawaii Temple to receive the significant ORDINANCES available only in temples. The decision to build a temple in New Zealand was announced by President David O. MCKAY in February 1955 and brought great joy among the local SAINTS. The temple and college buildings were to be built simultaneously under the newly conceived Church Building Missionary Program, which provided for supervisory craftsmen to be called from the United States to construct the buildings with a local voluntary missionary labor force of hundreds of members, mainly Maoris, who would learn construction skills on the job. In less than two and a half years, both the temple and the college were completed at minimal expense, and hundreds of previously unskilled and unemployed Maori members had learned building skills and were qualified for gainful employment. E. Albert and Vernice Gold Rosenvall were called as the first president and matron. President McKay dedicated the temple on April 20, 1958, and the college on April 26.

The New Zealand Temple, Hamilton, New Zealand. Dedicated in 1958, its spire rises 157 feet.

The Building Missionary Program was so successful that it was used for several years to construct Church buildings in other parts of the world. For years the New Zealand Temple served Church members living throughout the South Pacific, but since September 1984, temples have been in service in Australia, Samoa, Tonga, and Tahiti.

MATTHEW COWLEY. With the coming of World War II, all American missionaries were called home, but President Matthew and Sister Elva Taylor Cowley chose to remain in New Zealand with their family to supervise the work during the war. It was September 1945 before the Cowleys were released after seven and a half years of service. At the October 1945 GENERAL CONFERENCE, Matthew Cowley was called to be a member of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES and was affectionately called their "Polynesian Apostle" by the Saints of the South Pacific. Six other men with New Zealand connections have been called as GENERAL AUTHORITIES, all in the QUORUMS OF THE SEVENTY: Douglas J. Martin, a native New Zealander, and former New Zealand mission presidents Rufus K. Hardy, John J. Lasater, Glenn L. Rudd, Robert L. Simpson, Philip T. Sonntag, and Rulon G. Craven.

The year 1958 was pivotal for the Church in New Zealand. In that year the temple and the college were completed, the first stake was organized in Auckland, and the mission was divided into two missions. Since then, the Church has shown increasing growth in New Zealand.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Britsch, R. Lanier. "New Zealand." In Unto the Islands of the Sea: A History of the Latter-day Saints in the Pacific, pp. 215–345. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Clement, Russell T., comp. Mormons in the Pacific: A Bibliography. Laie, Hawaii, 1981.

ROBERT L. SIMPSON

---

NOAH

Noah is one of God's most notable prophets, patriarchs, and ministering messengers. He became a second father—with ADAM—of all mankind following the Flood and later returned to earth as the angel Gabriel to announce the births of JOHN THE BAPTIST and Jesus Christ (HC 3:386; TPJS, p. 157).

The First Presidency approved building the present Church College of New Zealand (CCNZ) at Temple View, near Hamilton. Since its inception in 1955, CCNZ has played a significant role in the educational and spiritual development of thousands of LDS high school students.

NEW ZEALAND TEMPLE. Prior to 1958, Latter-day Saints in New Zealand had to travel to the Hawaii Temple to receive the significant ORDINANCES available only in temples. The decision to build a temple in New Zealand was announced by President David O. MCKAY in February 1955 and brought great joy among the local SAINTS. The temple and college buildings were to be built simultaneously under the newly conceived Church Building Missionary Program, which provided for supervisory craftsmen to be called from the United States to construct the buildings with a local voluntary missionary labor force of hundreds of members, mainly Maoris, who would learn construction skills on the job. In less than two and a half years, both the temple and the college were completed at minimal expense, and hundreds of previously unskilled and unemployed Maori members had learned building skills and were qualified for gainful employment. E. Albert and Vernice Gold Rosenvall were called as the first president and matron. President McKay dedicated the temple on April 20, 1958, and the college on April 26.

The New Zealand Temple, Hamilton, New Zealand. Dedicated in 1958, its spire rises 157 feet.

The Building Missionary Program was so successful that it was used for several years to construct Church buildings in other parts of the world. For years the New Zealand Temple served Church members living throughout the South Pacific, but since September 1984, temples have been in service in Australia, Samoa, Tonga, and Tahiti.

MATTHEW COWLEY. With the coming of World War II, all American missionaries were called home, but President Matthew and Sister Elva Taylor Cowley chose to remain in New Zealand with their family to supervise the work during the war. It was September 1945 before the Cowleys were released after seven and a half years of service. At the October 1945 GENERAL CONFERENCE, Matthew Cowley was called to be a member of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES and was affectionately called their "Polynesian Apostle" by the Saints of the South Pacific. Six other men with New Zealand connections have been called as GENERAL AUTHORITIES, all in the QUORUMS OF THE SEVENTY: Douglas J. Martin, a native New Zealander, and former New Zealand mission presidents Rufus K. Hardy, John J. Lasater, Glenn L. Rudd, Robert L. Simpson, Philip T. Sonntag, and Rulon G. Craven.

The year 1958 was pivotal for the Church in New Zealand. In that year the temple and the college were completed, the first stake was organized in Auckland, and the mission was divided into two missions. Since then, the Church has shown increasing growth in New Zealand.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Britsch, R. Lanier. "New Zealand." In Unto the Islands of the Sea: A History of the Latter-day Saints in the Pacific, pp. 215–345. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Clement, Russell T., comp. Mormons in the Pacific: A Bibliography. Laie, Hawaii, 1981.

ROBERT L. SIMPSON

---

NOAH

Noah is one of God's most notable prophets, patriarchs, and ministering messengers. He became a second father—with ADAM—of all mankind following the Flood and later returned to earth as the angel Gabriel to announce the births of JOHN THE BAPTIST and Jesus Christ (HC 3:386; TPJS, p. 157).

LDS REVELATION has amplified what is known about Noah in the Bible.

Lamech, son of Methuselah and grandson of ENOCH, begat Noah, fulfilling COVENANTS that the Lord made with Enoch that a remnant of his posterity would always be found among all nations (Moses 7:52) and that Noah would be born of his lineage through Methuselah (Moses 8:2). Lamech chose the name Noah because of the "comfort" the child would bring to his family in their toil (8:9). Though Noah had brothers and sisters, nothing about them is known (8:10).

A promised child of noble ancestry, including Adam and other "preachers of righteousness" (Moses 6:22–23), Noah was ordained to the PRIESTHOOD at age ten by Methuselah (D&C 107:52), an unusually young age when compared with the ages at which other antediluvian patriarchs were ordained (D&C 107:42–51).

Though Noah lived in times of wickedness (Moses 8:20–22, 28–30), Noah successfully raised three sons who "hearkened unto the Lord . . . and they were called the sons of God" (8:13). Unfortunately, his "fair" granddaughters "sold themselves" by marrying wicked husbands, losing the benefits of living in a righteous environment (8:14–15). He taught the gospel of the anticipated Savior Anointed (Jesus Christ), as Enoch had, including FAITH, REPENTANCE, BAPTISM in the name of the Savior and reception of the HOLY GHOST (Moses 8:16, 19, 23–24). He warned that failure to heed his message would bring the floods upon his hearers (D&C 138:41; Moses 8:24).

Noah was "perfect in his generation; and he walked with God" (Moses 8:27). Like Adam, he received dominion over the EARTH and all living things (HC 3:386). Thus, Methuselah's PROPHECY "that from his [own] loins should spring all the kingdoms of the earth (through Noah)" was dramatically fulfilled (Moses 8:3).

Noah stands "next in authority to Adam in the Priesthood" (HC 3:386), and "in third position from the Lord" (Petersen, p. 2), and conferred the power of the priesthood on his righteous posterity (D&C 84:14–15).

Eighteen centuries after announcing Christ's birth, Noah—again as Gabriel—visited the Prophet Joseph SMITH to restore priesthood KEYS (D&C 128:21). Noah is to return to earth after Christ's second coming to attend the MARRIAGE SUPPER OF THE LAMB (D&C 27:5–7).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Parrish, Alan K. "The Days of Noah." In Studies in Scripture, ed. R. Millet and K. Jackson, Vol. 2, pp. 145–59. Salt Lake City, 1985.

Petersen, Mark E. Noah and the Flood. Salt Lake City, 1982.

ANDREW C. SKINNER

---

NON-MORMONS, SOCIAL RELATIONS WITH

The social milieu of the Church in modern times may be compared to that of the New Testament Church. In each situation, a PECULIAR PEOPLE amid multiple religious traditions and structures engendered hostility.

In and around Palmyra, New York, prior to the organization of the Church, the Smith family was welcomed in the community. But the announcements of new revelation, new scripture, and direct communication with God engendered a negative social reaction. Within a year, the family and all other members of the Church moved from that area. None returned for nearly eighty-five years. Similar hostilities developed in other areas (see ANTI-MORMONISM; PERSECUTION). The missionary outreach of the fledgling Church extended into England, Scandinavia, and western Europe, where churches were mostly state-controlled, and alternative faiths were oppressed. To listen to, sympathize with, or join the Latter-day Saints often meant that one would be disowned by parents and relatives, socially ostracized, fined, jailed, or even in some instances threatened with death. The resulting stream of LDS emigrants to Church settlements in Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois was so extensive that even in the melting-pot atmosphere of America, they were often confronted immediately with suspicion and opposition.

Following its withdrawal from New York, the Church established its headquarters in Kirtland, Ohio. There the vigorous missionary thrust continued to bring into the Church many people with commitment and dedication, leaving little time in their lives for social relationships with those outside the Church, who often shunned friendly overtures when they were made. The reaction of many churches was strongly negative to the LDS influence, and the typical responses of Latter-day Saints was to draw closer to each other for mutual

LDS REVELATION has amplified what is known about Noah in the Bible.

Lamech, son of Methuselah and grandson of ENOCH, begat Noah, fulfilling COVENANTS that the Lord made with Enoch that a remnant of his posterity would always be found among all nations (Moses 7:52) and that Noah would be born of his lineage through Methuselah (Moses 8:2). Lamech chose the name Noah because of the "comfort" the child would bring to his family in their toil (8:9). Though Noah had brothers and sisters, nothing about them is known (8:10).

A promised child of noble ancestry, including Adam and other "preachers of righteousness" (Moses 6:22–23), Noah was ordained to the PRIESTHOOD at age ten by Methuselah (D&C 107:52), an unusually young age when compared with the ages at which other antediluvian patriarchs were ordained (D&C 107:42–51).

Though Noah lived in times of wickedness (Moses 8:20–22, 28–30), Noah successfully raised three sons who "hearkened unto the Lord . . . and they were called the sons of God" (8:13). Unfortunately, his "fair" granddaughters "sold themselves" by marrying wicked husbands, losing the benefits of living in a righteous environment (8:14–15). He taught the gospel of the anticipated Savior Anointed (Jesus Christ), as Enoch had, including FAITH, REPENTANCE, BAPTISM in the name of the Savior and reception of the HOLY GHOST (Moses 8:16, 19, 23–24). He warned that failure to heed his message would bring the floods upon his hearers (D&C 138:41; Moses 8:24).

Noah was "perfect in his generation; and he walked with God" (Moses 8:27). Like Adam, he received dominion over the EARTH and all living things (HC 3:386). Thus, Methuselah's PROPHECY "that from his [own] loins should spring all the kingdoms of the earth (through Noah)" was dramatically fulfilled (Moses 8:3).

Noah stands "next in authority to Adam in the Priesthood" (HC 3:386), and "in third position from the Lord" (Petersen, p. 2), and conferred the power of the priesthood on his righteous posterity (D&C 84:14–15).

Eighteen centuries after announcing Christ's birth, Noah—again as Gabriel—visited the Prophet Joseph SMITH to restore priesthood KEYS (D&C 128:21). Noah is to return to earth after Christ's second coming to attend the MARRIAGE SUPPER OF THE LAMB (D&C 27:5–7).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Parrish, Alan K. "The Days of Noah." In Studies in Scripture, ed. R. Millet and K. Jackson, Vol. 2, pp. 145–59. Salt Lake City, 1985.

Petersen, Mark E. Noah and the Flood. Salt Lake City, 1982.

ANDREW C. SKINNER

---

NON-MORMONS, SOCIAL RELATIONS WITH

The social milieu of the Church in modern times may be compared to that of the New Testament Church. In each situation, a PECULIAR PEOPLE amid multiple religious traditions and structures engendered hostility.

In and around Palmyra, New York, prior to the organization of the Church, the Smith family was welcomed in the community. But the announcements of new revelation, new scripture, and direct communication with God engendered a negative social reaction. Within a year, the family and all other members of the Church moved from that area. None returned for nearly eighty-five years. Similar hostilities developed in other areas (see ANTI-MORMONISM; PERSECUTION). The missionary outreach of the fledgling Church extended into England, Scandinavia, and western Europe, where churches were mostly state-controlled, and alternative faiths were oppressed. To listen to, sympathize with, or join the Latter-day Saints often meant that one would be disowned by parents and relatives, socially ostracized, fined, jailed, or even in some instances threatened with death. The resulting stream of LDS emigrants to Church settlements in Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois was so extensive that even in the melting-pot atmosphere of America, they were often confronted immediately with suspicion and opposition.

Following its withdrawal from New York, the Church established its headquarters in Kirtland, Ohio. There the vigorous missionary thrust continued to bring into the Church many people with commitment and dedication, leaving little time in their lives for social relationships with those outside the Church, who often shunned friendly overtures when they were made. The reaction of many churches was strongly negative to the LDS influence, and the typical responses of Latter-day Saints was to draw closer to each other for mutual protection and support. Communication was sporadic and fleeting at best. Misunderstandings grew.

Under divine command, the Church relocated in northern Missouri, where rapid growth multiplied tensions and frictions. The specter of growing LDS economic and political power in five counties amplified the social stress. There was also the complication of "apostates," or dissidents, who often joined anti-Mormon coalitions. The "old settlers" and the new LDS ones were polarized. The Church's social and political difficulties in Missouri culminated in Governor Lillburn Boggs' infamous EXTERMINATION ORDER and resulted in some 1,500 LDS families being forced to abandon their farms, homes, and other possessions and flee for their lives into Illinois. There, a new LDS gathering place called NAUVOO was founded.

For a time Nauvoo was a community almost unto itself. Its singular status, the inclusive character of its life patterns, and the extension of the religious vision into all aspects of culture were stabilized by a strong self-sufficient charter and even a militia, the NAUVOO LEGION. Many visitors came to view the new city, and efforts to promote cultural and intellectual exchange increased. Joseph Smith and about 1,500 other Church members joined the Masonic lodges in Nauvoo and nearby Keokuk and Montrose to promote fraternal relations (see FREEMASONRY IN NAUVOO). However, once again the old settlers outside the Church clashed with the LDS settlers, and hostilities grew.

Driven westward, the Saints settled in the Great Basin, where comparative freedom and peace enabled them to pursue their social, intellectual, and spiritual goals. For several decades social exchange and the development of intercultural relations with those outside the group were limited. The Church was the leading influence—social, political, economical, and educational. Relative calm and cooperation prevailed until tensions mounted, primarily over the practice of plural marriage. A half century passed before this issue was resolved, and in 1896, Utah Territory in the Great Basin became a state (see UTAH STATEHOOD).

In the twentieth century, congenial relations have developed between the Church and other groups and institutions throughout the United States and the world. Church membership has become increasingly diverse and widespread, and new motivations for communication, goodwill, and cooperation have arisen. The needs of modern society have cried out for improved relations among faiths and people worldwide. The critical need for efforts and participation that unite churches and social organizations has become more apparent. Problems relating to the hungry and homeless, the illiterate and underprivileged, the drug-addicted and abused, and the victims of disintegrating family life have increased on a worldwide scale. The relative stability of LDS society is attractive to many who seek leadership and example. Latter-day Saints and their neighbors have increasingly recognized common ground and common causes. They participate extensively in such groups as Boy Scouts, chambers of commerce, service clubs, the YMCA, the United Fund, local school systems, and a variety of professional and benevolent civic organizations (see CIVIC DUTIES).

Although social relations of Church members with others are generally much more congenial in the late twentieth century than earlier, some sources of friction persist. Some negative responses continue to arise in other church communities because of LDS missionary efforts, with Latter-day Saints sometimes accused of being aggressive in both religious and nonreligious contexts.

[See also Interfaith Relations; Social and Cultural History.]

DARL ANDERSON
DAVID K. UDALL
ELEANOR PARK JONES

---

OATH AND COVENANT OF THE PRIESTHOOD

Among the most important covenants is the oath and covenant of the priesthood, a set of mutual promises between God and those who receive the Melchizedek Priesthood. Doctrine and Covenants 84:33–42 states the obligations involved, affirming the rewards that will be given to those who faithfully discharge their oath, and confirming the consequences of breaking this covenant.

The priesthood holder's first responsibility is to receive in good faith and with honest intent both the Aaronic and the Melchizedek priesthoods. The covenant then obligates that priesthood holder to magnify his callings by fulfilling all the responsibilities associated with the office, teaching the word of God, and laboring with all his might to advance the purposes of the Lord (see MAGNIFYING ONE'S CALLING; cf. Jacob 1:19). The priesthood holder is required to "obtain a knowledge of the gospel . . . [and] to render service—service in carrying the restored gospel, with all the blessings of the priesthood, to the peoples of the earth; and service in comforting, strengthening, and perfecting the lives of one another and all the Saints of God" (Romney, p. 43).

God then promises that those who fulfill their part of the agreement will be "sanctified by the Spirit unto the renewing of their bodies," will become "the sons of Moses and of Aaron and the seed of Abraham" and members of "the church and kingdom, and the elect of God," and will receive the Father's kingdom, and, thus, "all" that the "Father hath shall be given unto" them (D&C 84:33–38). Latter-day Saints see in the first of these promises a change that purifies not only the minds of worthy priesthood holders, but also their bodies, until they are enlivened and strengthened to minister among the nations of the earth. Those who keep this covenant are then counted among those in the celestial kingdom, "into whose hand the Father has given all things—they are they who are priests and kings, who have received of his fulness, and of his glory; . . . they are gods, even the sons of God" (D&C 76:55–58).

This oath and covenant of the priesthood also carries a severe warning. The Lord has stated that anyone who breaks this covenant and "altogether turneth therefrom, shall not have forgiveness of sins in this world nor in the world to come" (D&C 84:41).

Ancient prophets received the priesthood by oath and covenant. Latter-day Saints understand several Old and New Testament covenantal texts to refer to the oath and covenant by which the priesthood has been received through all generations (e.g., Num. 25:13; 1 Chr. 16:15–17; Ps. 110:4; Heb. 7:20–21, 28). Enoch, Melchizedek, Abraham, and all others who received the fulness of the gospel of Jesus Christ have obtained the priesthood after the order of the Son of God in a covenant-based relationship with the Lord (e.g., JST Gen. 13:13; 14:27–30). In this way, the priesthood has been transmitted to man since the beginning of time with an eternal obligation and unfailing promise, both of which the Lord communicates through the sacred medium of an oath and a covenant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Asay, Carlos E. "The Oath and Covenant of the Priesthood." Ensign 15 (Nov. 1985):43–45.
- Brown, Hugh B. "Participation: The Way to Salvation." IE 66 (June 1963):506–507.
- Kimball, Spencer W. "Becoming Pure in Heart." Ensign 15 (Mar. 1985):2–5.
- Monson, Thomas S. First British Area General Conference Report, pp. 142–46. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- Romney, Marion G. "The Oath and Covenant Which Belongeth to the Priesthood." Ensign 2 (July 1972):43–45.

MICHAEL K. YOUNG

---

OATHS

Oaths are solemn declarations used to affirm a statement or strengthen a promise. Anciently, oath-swearing formed an important part of social, political, economic, and religious interaction. God himself uses an oath and promise in his covenants with man (cf. Jer. 22:5; Amos 6:8; D&C 97:20). In covenant-making, ritual oaths attest the fidelity of those entering into the COVENANT. Sometimes an oath is sworn that anticipates punishment in case of failure to perform a specified act, and in some cases the covenant process symbolically depicts specific punishments (Jer. 34:18–19).

Oath-swearing was common among the Book of Mormon peoples. NEPHI<sub>1</sub> swore an oath to Zoram assuring him full status in Lehi's family (1 Ne. 4:32–34), and Zoram swore to accompany Nephi and his brothers into the wilderness, after which their "fears did cease concerning him" (1 Ne. 4:37). Oaths of office were administered to judges (Alma 50:39). In a manner reminiscent of biblical and other Near Eastern peoples, the NEPHITES swore to support MORONI<sub>1</sub> in defensive war, and used their rent garments to represent the punishment they wished upon themselves should they fail (Alma 46:21–22).

Oaths were also used with evil intent. For sinister purposes, the Gadianton robbers and the JAREDITES swore secret oaths that had once been sworn by Cain (Hel. 6:21–26; Ether 8:15; Moses 5:29).

Oaths continue to play a role in Latter-day Saint religion and ritual. The higher PRIESTHOOD is received through an "oath and covenant" (D&C 84:39–40; cf. Heb. 7:11–22) of faithfulness. Following a pattern similar to ancient covenant-making, Latter-day Saints make holy covenants in TEMPLES. In their worship and prayer they use the word AMEN, which in Hebrew means "verily," "truly," or "let it be affirmed," and is considered a form of an oath comparable to expressions used in ancient Israel (Deut. 27:14–26; cf. D&C 88:135). The raising of the right hand of the congregation in periodic CONFERENCES in approval for those called to Church positions is viewed as a silent oath signifying one's determination to sustain those persons in their CALLINGS.

Frequent and superficial use of oaths can become an abuse and may diminish their sincere and sacred functions and oaths made "in vain" are profane and blasphemous. Christ admonished his followers to avoid oaths sworn without real intent and told them to make their commitments simply by saying "yes" or "no" (Matt. 5:33–37; 23:16–22).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Johnson, Roy. "The Use of Oaths in the Old Testament and the Book of Mormon." F.A.R.M.S., Provo, Utah, 1982.
- Szink, Terrence. "An Oath of Allegiance in the Book of Mormon." In Warfare in the Book of Mormon, ed. S. Ricks and W. Hamblin. Salt Lake City, 1990.

TERRENCE L. SZINK

---

OBEDIENCE

Obedience in the context of the gospel of Jesus Christ means to comply with God's will, to live in accordance with his teachings and the promptings of his Spirit, and to keep his COMMANDMENTS. Disobedience means to do anything less, whether it be to follow Satan and his will, to live in accordance with one's own selfish wants and desires, or to be a "slothful" person who must be "compelled in all things" (D&C 58:26).

Part of God's purpose in designing mortal life for his children was to "prove them herewith, to see if they will do all things whatsoever the Lord gospel of Jesus Christ have obtained the priesthood after the order of the Son of God in a covenant-based relationship with the Lord (e.g., JST Gen. 13:13; 14:27–30). In this way, the priesthood has been transmitted to man since the beginning of time with an eternal obligation and unfailing promise, both of which the Lord communicates through the sacred medium of an oath and a covenant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Asay, Carlos E. "The Oath and Covenant of the Priesthood." Ensign 15 (Nov. 1985):43–45.
- Brown, Hugh B. "Participation: The Way to Salvation." IE 66 (June 1963):506–507.
- Kimball, Spencer W. "Becoming Pure in Heart." Ensign 15 (Mar. 1985):2–5.
- Monson, Thomas S. First British Area General Conference Report, pp. 142–46. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- Romney, Marion G. "The Oath and Covenant Which Belongeth to the Priesthood." Ensign 2 (July 1972):43–45.

MICHAEL K. YOUNG

---

OATHS

Oaths are solemn declarations used to affirm a statement or strengthen a promise. Anciently, oath-swearing formed an important part of social, political, economic, and religious interaction. God himself uses an oath and promise in his covenants with man (cf. Jer. 22:5; Amos 6:8; D&C 97:20). In covenant-making, ritual oaths attest the fidelity of those entering into the COVENANT. Sometimes an oath is sworn that anticipates punishment in case of failure to perform a specified act, and in some cases the covenant process symbolically depicts specific punishments (Jer. 34:18–19).

Oath-swearing was common among the Book of Mormon peoples. NEPHI<sub>1</sub> swore an oath to Zoram assuring him full status in Lehi's family (1 Ne. 4:32–34), and Zoram swore to accompany Nephi and his brothers into the wilderness, after which their "fears did cease concerning him" (1 Ne. 4:37). Oaths of office were administered to judges (Alma 50:39). In a manner reminiscent of biblical and other Near Eastern peoples, the NEPHITES swore to support MORONI<sub>1</sub> in defensive war, and used their rent garments to represent the punishment they wished upon themselves should they fail (Alma 46:21–22).

Oaths were also used with evil intent. For sinister purposes, the Gadianton robbers and the JAREDITES swore secret oaths that had once been sworn by Cain (Hel. 6:21–26; Ether 8:15; Moses 5:29).

Oaths continue to play a role in Latter-day Saint religion and ritual. The higher PRIESTHOOD is received through an "oath and covenant" (D&C 84:39–40; cf. Heb. 7:11–22) of faithfulness. Following a pattern similar to ancient covenant-making, Latter-day Saints make holy covenants in TEMPLES. In their worship and prayer they use the word AMEN, which in Hebrew means "verily," "truly," or "let it be affirmed," and is considered a form of an oath comparable to expressions used in ancient Israel (Deut. 27:14–26; cf. D&C 88:135). The raising of the right hand of the congregation in periodic CONFERENCES in approval for those called to Church positions is viewed as a silent oath signifying one's determination to sustain those persons in their CALLINGS.

Frequent and superficial use of oaths can become an abuse and may diminish their sincere and sacred functions and oaths made "in vain" are profane and blasphemous. Christ admonished his followers to avoid oaths sworn without real intent and told them to make their commitments simply by saying "yes" or "no" (Matt. 5:33–37; 23:16–22).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Johnson, Roy. "The Use of Oaths in the Old Testament and the Book of Mormon." F.A.R.M.S., Provo, Utah, 1982.
- Szink, Terrence. "An Oath of Allegiance in the Book of Mormon." In Warfare in the Book of Mormon, ed. S. Ricks and W. Hamblin. Salt Lake City, 1990.

TERRENCE L. SZINK

---

OBEDIENCE

Obedience in the context of the gospel of Jesus Christ means to comply with God's will, to live in accordance with his teachings and the promptings of his Spirit, and to keep his COMMANDMENTS. Disobedience means to do anything less, whether it be to follow Satan and his will, to live in accordance with one's own selfish wants and desires, or to be a "slothful" person who must be "compelled in all things" (D&C 58:26).

Part of God's purpose in designing mortal life for his children was to "prove them herewith, to see if they will do all things whatsoever the Lord gospel of Jesus Christ have obtained the priesthood after the order of the Son of God in a covenant-based relationship with the Lord (e.g., JST Gen. 13:13; 14:27–30). In this way, the priesthood has been transmitted to man since the beginning of time with an eternal obligation and unfailing promise, both of which the Lord communicates through the sacred medium of an oath and a covenant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Asay, Carlos E. "The Oath and Covenant of the Priesthood." Ensign 15 (Nov. 1985):43–45.
- Brown, Hugh B. "Participation: The Way to Salvation." IE 66 (June 1963):506–507.
- Kimball, Spencer W. "Becoming Pure in Heart." Ensign 15 (Mar. 1985):2–5.
- Monson, Thomas S. First British Area General Conference Report, pp. 142–46. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- Romney, Marion G. "The Oath and Covenant Which Belongeth to the Priesthood." Ensign 2 (July 1972):43–45.

MICHAEL K. YOUNG

---

OATHS

Oaths are solemn declarations used to affirm a statement or strengthen a promise. Anciently, oath-swearing formed an important part of social, political, economic, and religious interaction. God himself uses an oath and promise in his covenants with man (cf. Jer. 22:5; Amos 6:8; D&C 97:20). In covenant-making, ritual oaths attest the fidelity of those entering into the COVENANT. Sometimes an oath is sworn that anticipates punishment in case of failure to perform a specified act, and in some cases the covenant process symbolically depicts specific punishments (Jer. 34:18–19).

Oath-swearing was common among the Book of Mormon peoples. NEPHI<sub>1</sub> swore an oath to Zoram assuring him full status in Lehi's family (1 Ne. 4:32–34), and Zoram swore to accompany Nephi and his brothers into the wilderness, after which their "fears did cease concerning him" (1 Ne. 4:37). Oaths of office were administered to judges (Alma 50:39). In a manner reminiscent of biblical and other Near Eastern peoples, the NEPHITES swore to support MORONI<sub>1</sub> in defensive war, and used their rent garments to represent the punishment they wished upon themselves should they fail (Alma 46:21–22).

Oaths were also used with evil intent. For sinister purposes, the Gadianton robbers and the JAREDITES swore secret oaths that had once been sworn by Cain (Hel. 6:21–26; Ether 8:15; Moses 5:29).

Oaths continue to play a role in Latter-day Saint religion and ritual. The higher PRIESTHOOD is received through an "oath and covenant" (D&C 84:39–40; cf. Heb. 7:11–22) of faithfulness. Following a pattern similar to ancient covenant-making, Latter-day Saints make holy covenants in TEMPLES. In their worship and prayer they use the word AMEN, which in Hebrew means "verily," "truly," or "let it be affirmed," and is considered a form of an oath comparable to expressions used in ancient Israel (Deut. 27:14–26; cf. D&C 88:135). The raising of the right hand of the congregation in periodic CONFERENCES in approval for those called to Church positions is viewed as a silent oath signifying one's determination to sustain those persons in their CALLINGS.

Frequent and superficial use of oaths can become an abuse and may diminish their sincere and sacred functions and oaths made "in vain" are profane and blasphemous. Christ admonished his followers to avoid oaths sworn without real intent and told them to make their commitments simply by saying "yes" or "no" (Matt. 5:33–37; 23:16–22).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Johnson, Roy. "The Use of Oaths in the Old Testament and the Book of Mormon." F.A.R.M.S., Provo, Utah, 1982.
- Szink, Terrence. "An Oath of Allegiance in the Book of Mormon." In Warfare in the Book of Mormon, ed. S. Ricks and W. Hamblin. Salt Lake City, 1990.

TERRENCE L. SZINK

---

OBEDIENCE

Obedience in the context of the gospel of Jesus Christ means to comply with God's will, to live in accordance with his teachings and the promptings of his Spirit, and to keep his COMMANDMENTS. Disobedience means to do anything less, whether it be to follow Satan and his will, to live in accordance with one's own selfish wants and desires, or to be a "slothful" person who must be "compelled in all things" (D&C 58:26).

Part of God's purpose in designing mortal life for his children was to "prove them herewith, to see if they will do all things whatsoever the Lord their God shall command them" (Abr. 3:25; cf. D&C 98:14). Passing such a test is necessary for one to progress to become like God because he, himself, lives in accordance with law and principles of justice (Alma 42:22–26; see GODHOOD). Thus, obedience to DIVINE LAW is essential to ETERNAL PROGRESSION, and those who live obediently in this life will "have glory added upon their heads for ever and ever" (Abr. 3:26).

The importance of obedience is further emphasized by the fact that God permits sorrows and suffering on this earth in part to help teach obedience. Thus Jesus Christ, the exemplar, learned "obedience by the things which he suffered" (Heb. 5:8; cf. Alma 7:12), and the Lord's people "must needs be chastened until they learn obedience, if it must needs be, by the things which they suffer" (D&C 105:6). On the other hand, God has also promised that he will provide a way for his children to obey him (cf. 1 Ne. 3:7).

In the LDS view, although it can sometimes be difficult to be obedient because it requires making difficult choices among alternatives, it does bring BLESSINGS in this life and in eternity. In fact, all blessings depend upon obedience: "When we obtain any blessing from God, it is by obedience to that law upon which it is predicated" (D&C 130:21). Disobedience may result in the loss of blessings in this world and may bring curses or punishments in the next life as well. Therefore, when God gives a commandment, he frequently specifies both the blessings that come from obedience and the curses or punishments that come from disobedience. Accordingly, the commandment to "honour thy father and thy mother" specifies the potential blessing "that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee" (Ex. 20:12); and the commandment to Book of Mormon peoples to serve God on the American continent came with the promise of being "free from bondage" or, in the case of noncompliance, the curse of being "swept off" (Ether 2:8–12; see AGENCY).

God also recognizes the need to obey the laws of governments. Thus he states: "Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land. Wherefore, be subject to the powers that be, until he reigns whose right it is to reign" (D&C 58:21–22). Joseph SMITH reiterated this principle: "We believe in . . . obeying, honoring, and sustaining the law" (A of F 12).

The purest and best motivation for obedience to godly law is LOVE: "If ye love me, keep my commandments" (John 14:15). However, because God wants his children to grow spiritually, he neither requires nor desires unwilling or begrudged compliance, nor "blind obedience." Every person has the right, and even the responsibility, to learn whether a commandment, prompting, or teaching comes from God. However, because God also requires faithful response—"the heart and a willing mind" (D&C 64:34)—from his children, he does sometimes require obedience of the type wherein one complies humbly with his teachings, promptings, or commandments even before totally understanding the reasons for them. ADAM gave such obedience when commanded by the Lord to offer the firstlings of his flocks. "After many days," when an angel asked him why he was offering such sacrifice, Adam replied: "I know not, save the Lord commanded me." The angel then taught Adam the reason for the offering: It represented the atoning SACRIFICE that Jesus Christ would eventually make on behalf of all human beings (Moses 5:5–8).

God does not hold people responsible or punish them for disobedience to laws and commandments that they have not had opportunity to learn and understand. King BENJAMIN taught that Christ's "blood atoneth for the sins of those who have fallen by the transgression of Adam, who have died not knowing the will of God concerning them, or who have ignorantly sinned" (Mosiah 3:11).

As with Adam, men and women who willingly obey the commandments of God because they love him will receive greater KNOWLEDGE and understanding of God and his purposes. Disobedience brings no such growth in knowledge or understanding, and may result in loss of previously gained knowledge and ability or opportunity to make further choices (D&C 1:33). In other words, it can result in both spiritual and temporal captivity for the disobedient. Thus, Jacob taught the Nephites that they were free to choose "liberty and eternal life" or to choose "captivity and death" (2 Ne. 2:27).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Packer, Boyd K. "Obedience." BYU Speeches of the Year. Provo, Utah, 1971.

CHERYL BROWN

OCCUPATIONAL STATUS

Occupational and employment data collected in the United States, Canada, Britain, Japan, and Mexico from 1980 to 1983 indicate that members of the Church differ in some respects from the general populations in which they live, but are generally similar.

In the United States, LDS men tend to be about 7 percent more likely than the rest of the population to be in the labor force. LDS women have labor-force participation rates almost identical to U.S. women generally, but LDS women are about 4 percent more likely to work part-time rather than full-time. In single-parent families, LDS women are some 16 percent more likely to be employed than other single mothers. LDS mothers with children under six years of age are 9 percent less likely to be in the labor force than other U.S. mothers of preschoolers.

Among LDS men and women who are employed, occupational distributions are very similar to the United States generally. LDS men are slightly more likely to be professionals and a little less likely to be machine or equipment operators, but in all other occupational categories the percentages tend to be virtually the same.

In Canada the occupational and employment figures tend to be very similar to the United States. Canadian LDS men are 7 percent more likely to have employment than the general population, and about half of the LDS women are employed and 9 percent more likely than others to work part-time. The occupational breakdowns in Canada for LDS men and women tend to follow the national patterns within a few percentage points.

Church survey data from Britain, Mexico, and Japan for the years 1981–1983 show that British LDS men had 87 percent participation in the labor force, the highest of the countries examined. The employment rate for LDS men in Mexico was 67 percent; in Japan, 77 percent; and in the United States, 85 percent. Japanese LDS women active in the Church were generally in the labor force at a slightly higher rate (5 percent higher) than other women in Japan.

When Church populations are compared, greater concentrations of white-collar workers are usually found in areas where members are mainly urban. Their proportion in specific white-collar categories varies somewhat in each country. In 1981–1983, LDS men were found more in managerial, administrative, and production positions in the five countries that were examined. Men and women were in professions in about the same proportion in all countries except Mexico, where greater numbers of women are in the professions (especially teaching), while LDS women were overrepresented in clerical, sales, and service occupations.

WILLIAM G. DYER

OCEANIA, THE CHURCH IN

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has been established in Oceania (the islands of the central and southern Pacific) since 1844, when its missionaries first arrived in French Polynesia and organized a branch there. The Church moved into Hawaii in 1850, New Zealand in 1854, Samoa in 1888, Tonga in 1891, and other islands after World War II. By 1990 the Church in Oceania had grown to over 100,000 members living in several MISSIONS and hundreds of STAKES, WARDS, and branches, and it had TEMPLES in Samoa, Tahiti, and Tonga (see also HAWAII and NEW ZEALAND).

FRENCH POLYNESIA. The Prophet Joseph SMITH sent four missionaries, Addison Pratt, Benjamin Franklin Grouard, Noah Rogers, and Knowlton F. Hanks (who died at sea), to the islands of the Pacific in May 1843. Arriving at Tubuai Island, 350 miles south of Tahiti, on April 30, 1844, they established the first branch of the Church in Oceania in July 1844, with eleven members. When friction with the French territorial government ended the first period of missionary work in 1852, the Church had nearly 2,000 converts scattered on at least twenty islands.

The mission was refounded in 1892, when William A. Seegmiller and Joseph W. Damron, Jr., were sent to Tahiti from the Samoan mission. Growth was negligible until 1950, when the Church placed leadership in the hands of local members and moved the proselytizing missionaries from the Tuamotu Islands to Tahiti. This move accelerated Church growth. Three other factors also contributed to more rapid growth after 1953: increased use of the French language, use of organized proselytizing plans, and the building of modern MEETINGHOUSES.

OCCUPATIONAL STATUS

Occupational and employment data collected in the United States, Canada, Britain, Japan, and Mexico from 1980 to 1983 indicate that members of the Church differ in some respects from the general populations in which they live, but are generally similar.

In the United States, LDS men tend to be about 7 percent more likely than the rest of the population to be in the labor force. LDS women have labor-force participation rates almost identical to U.S. women generally, but LDS women are about 4 percent more likely to work part-time rather than full-time. In single-parent families, LDS women are some 16 percent more likely to be employed than other single mothers. LDS mothers with children under six years of age are 9 percent less likely to be in the labor force than other U.S. mothers of preschoolers.

Among LDS men and women who are employed, occupational distributions are very similar to the United States generally. LDS men are slightly more likely to be professionals and a little less likely to be machine or equipment operators, but in all other occupational categories the percentages tend to be virtually the same.

In Canada the occupational and employment figures tend to be very similar to the United States. Canadian LDS men are 7 percent more likely to have employment than the general population, and about half of the LDS women are employed and 9 percent more likely than others to work part-time. The occupational breakdowns in Canada for LDS men and women tend to follow the national patterns within a few percentage points.

Church survey data from Britain, Mexico, and Japan for the years 1981–1983 show that British LDS men had 87 percent participation in the labor force, the highest of the countries examined. The employment rate for LDS men in Mexico was 67 percent; in Japan, 77 percent; and in the United States, 85 percent. Japanese LDS women active in the Church were generally in the labor force at a slightly higher rate (5 percent higher) than other women in Japan.

When Church populations are compared, greater concentrations of white-collar workers are usually found in areas where members are mainly urban. Their proportion in specific white-collar categories varies somewhat in each country. In 1981–1983, LDS men were found more in managerial, administrative, and production positions in the five countries that were examined. Men and women were in professions in about the same proportion in all countries except Mexico, where greater numbers of women are in the professions (especially teaching), while LDS women were overrepresented in clerical, sales, and service occupations.

WILLIAM G. DYER

OCEANIA, THE CHURCH IN

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has been established in Oceania (the islands of the central and southern Pacific) since 1844, when its missionaries first arrived in French Polynesia and organized a branch there. The Church moved into Hawaii in 1850, New Zealand in 1854, Samoa in 1888, Tonga in 1891, and other islands after World War II. By 1990 the Church in Oceania had grown to over 100,000 members living in several MISSIONS and hundreds of STAKES, WARDS, and branches, and it had TEMPLES in Samoa, Tahiti, and Tonga (see also HAWAII and NEW ZEALAND).

FRENCH POLYNESIA. The Prophet Joseph SMITH sent four missionaries, Addison Pratt, Benjamin Franklin Grouard, Noah Rogers, and Knowlton F. Hanks (who died at sea), to the islands of the Pacific in May 1843. Arriving at Tubuai Island, 350 miles south of Tahiti, on April 30, 1844, they established the first branch of the Church in Oceania in July 1844, with eleven members. When friction with the French territorial government ended the first period of missionary work in 1852, the Church had nearly 2,000 converts scattered on at least twenty islands.

The mission was refounded in 1892, when William A. Seegmiller and Joseph W. Damron, Jr., were sent to Tahiti from the Samoan mission. Growth was negligible until 1950, when the Church placed leadership in the hands of local members and moved the proselytizing missionaries from the Tuamotu Islands to Tahiti. This move accelerated Church growth. Three other factors also contributed to more rapid growth after 1953: increased use of the French language, use of organized proselytizing plans, and the building of modern MEETINGHOUSES.

Mormon missionaries in 1887. Photographer: Edward Cliff.

The first stake organized in French Polynesia was the Papeete Tahiti Stake, on May 14, 1972, with Raituia Tehina Tapu as stake president. Church President Spencer W. KIMBALL broke ground for the Papeete Tahiti Temple on February 13, 1981, and Gordon B. Hinckley, first counselor in the FIRST PRESIDENCY, dedicated the completed structure on October 27–29, 1983. LDS scriptures are available in Tahitian and French.

SAMOA. LDS missionary work in Samoa officially began on June 18, 1888, when Joseph Harry Dean and Florence Ridges Dean arrived on Tutuila. There had been an unofficial start in January 1863, when Walter Murray Gibson sent two Hawaiian elders, Kimo Pelio and Samuela Manoa, to Samoa to teach the restored gospel; they baptized about fifty people. Pelio died in 1876, and Manoa married and settled on the little island of Aunu'u, from which he wrote letters to Hawaii and Church headquarters asking for assistance. One of those letters prompted the Deans to go to Samoa from Hawaii.

Growth of the Church in Samoa was steady from 1888 on. During their first four months the Deans baptized forty people and formed a branch. By 1899 the Church had 1,139 Samoan Latter-day Saints scattered across the major islands. Local leaders led most branches, and Samoan priesthood holders and their wives served missions. Church schools were operated in a number of villages, and three "central" residential schools were created on the islands of Tutuila, Upolu, and Savai'i. The Church has continued to operate many schools, the most important being the Church College of Western Samoa, a high school in Apia, Western Samoa. Gathering places for Church families to establish homes were founded at Mapusaga on Tutuila, American Samoa, in 1903 and at Sauniatu, Upolu, in Western Samoa, in 1904.

In 1902, Church headquarters were established at Pesega, near Apia, on land donated by Ah Mu, a Chinese member. The Apia Samoa Temple, the Church College of Western Samoa, a stake center, the mission headquarters, and the missionary training center are all built on that land. The Book of Mormon was translated and published in Samoan in 1903, and the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price, in 1963.

On March 18, 1962, the Apia Stake was organized with Percy John Rivers, a descendant of Ah Mu, as stake president. On February 19, 1981, President Spencer W. Kimball broke ground for the Samoa Temple at Pesega, and the completed structure was dedicated on August 5–7, 1983.

TONGA. LDS missionaries first visited the “Friendly Islands” on July 15, 1891, when Brigham Smoot and Alva J. Butler arrived at Nuku’alofa, Tongatapu Island, from Samoa. However, this first phase of the Tongan mission was short-lived because of political and religious circumstances. In June 1907, William O. Facer and Heber J. McKay reopened missionary work in Tonga, this time at Vava’u, the northern island group. Until 1916, when Willard L. Smith arrived as the first mission president, Tonga was part of the Samoan mission. Until the early 1950s, Church growth in Tonga was slow, being retarded by misunderstandings with the government. When those difficulties were resolved, the Church showed significant growth in Tonga, reflecting the maturity in leadership, understanding of Church organization, and depth of spirituality of the Tongan Saints. The Nuku’alofa Stake was organized on September 5, 1968, with Orson Hyde White as stake president. As growth continued, Church President Spencer W. Kimball broke ground for a temple near Nuku’alofa on February 18, 1981. It was dedicated August 9, 1983, by his counselor, President Gordon B. Hinckley.

Education has played an important role in the Church in Tonga. Of the many schools established, the most important are Liahona High School (1952) on Tongatapu and Saineha High School (1978) on Vava’u. The Book of Mormon was published in Tongan in 1946 and the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price, in 1959.

Fiji. Although Tongan and other Latter-day Saints had lived and held Church meetings in Fiji for many years, not until May 1954 were missionaries sent to Suva from the Samoan mission to officially commence LDS proselytizing. Boyd L. Harris and Sheldon L. Abbott organized the Suva Branch on September 5, 1954. An initial boost in Church growth occurred when Church President David O. McKay visited Suva in January 1955 and decided that a large chapel should be built, which he dedicated three years later on May 4, 1958. That building was part of President McKay’s vision for Fiji and manifested to the government and people alike that the LDS Church was in Fiji to stay.

Temple Square and Eagle Gate, by Relief Society members, Vava’u District, Tonga (c. 1935, tapa cloth—pigment on bark). Created by LDS women who loved a temple that most of them would never see, this detail shows the six-spired Salt Lake Temple and the domed Tabernacle on Temple Square in Salt Lake City. Nearly fifty years later, on August 9, 1983, an LDS temple was dedicated in Nuku’alofa, Tonga. Church Museum of History and Art.

Fiji was assigned to the Samoan and Tongan missions until July 1971, when it was made an independent mission. Since then, the Fiji Suva Mission has had many South Pacific areas assigned to it for a time, such as New Caledonia, Niue, the Cook Islands, Kiribati, Vanuatu, and Rotuma. Church growth and development in Fiji have been steady. In 1969 the Suva chapel also housed a Church-sponsored elementary school. Seminary classes began in 1973, and two years later, the LDS Fiji Technical College (equivalent to a U.S. vocational high school) opened on a new campus in Suva. By 1984, 372 students, mostly LDS, were enrolled.

Overall Church membership also continued to grow in Fiji, and in February 1976, one thousand Fijian Latter-day Saints attended an area conference held by President Spencer W. Kimball. On June 5, 1983, Howard W. Hunter organized the Suva Fiji Stake, with Inosi Naga as stake president. The Book of Mormon was published in Fijian in 1980.

← The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Australia, New Zealand, and the South Pacific Islands as of January 1, 1991.

NEW CALEDONIA. Some LDS Tahitian laborers migrated to New Caledonia during the 1950s and established small units of the Church there. Under the direction of the French Polynesia (Tahiti) mission president, the Noumea Branch was organized in October 1961. Years of negotiations between mission leaders and the New Caledonian government led to permission for LDS missionaries to proselytize. On May 2, 1968, Elder Thomas S. Monson, of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, dedicated New Caledonia for the preaching of the gospel. Two months later, the first missionary couple arrived. In 1990 the full program of the Church had been established, and New Caledonia was under the Fiji Suva Mission.

GUAM AND MICRONESIA. Latter-day Saints have lived on many of the Micronesian islands since World War II. But only Guam has had LDS servicemen's groups and branches consistently. President Joseph Fielding SMITH dedicated Guam to the preaching of the gospel on August 25, 1955, and the first full-time missionaries were sent there in January 1957. However, until the mid-1970s, missionary work was confined primarily to U.S. military personnel and their families. Since that time, expansion into the many islands of Micronesia has been rapid. In the spring of 1980, the Church created the Micronesia Cuam Mission, with Ferron C. Losec as president. Book of Mormon selections were published in Marshallese and Polynesian in 1984 and 1987, respectively.

KIRIBATI. LDS missionary efforts in the Republic of Kiribati (formerly the Gilbert Islands) have proven quite fruitful. On October 19, 1975, six Gilbertese students who had studied at Liahona High School in Tonga returned to the island of Tarawa and commenced missionary work. They had been ordained elders and were serving in the Fiji Suva Mission. At about the same time, the Church took over a small middle school in 1977 and renamed it Moroni Community School. It has served as the physical focus of the Church in Kiribati. Relative to the small population, Church growth has been rapid. In 1990 the Church was also established in Belau, the Cook Islands, Marshall, Niue, Nauru, Northern Marietta, Tuvalu, and Vanuata.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Britsch, R. Lanier. Unto the Islands of the Sea: A History of the Latter-day Saints in the Pacific. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Clement, Russell T., comp. Mormons in the Pacific: A Bibliography. Laie, Hawaii, 1981.

R. LANIER BRITSCH

Papeete Tahiti Temple in 1986 in Pirae, Tahiti (dedicated 1983). The design shows influences of local French and Polynesian culture. Courtesy Floyd Holdman.

OHIO, LDS COMMUNITIES IN

[The Church became established in Ohio after Sidney Rigdon and his Reformed Baptist congregations at Mentor and Kirtland converted in October–November 1830. Others around the vicinity of Kirtland joined the Church. A December 1830 revelation initiated a Gathering of Church members to Ohio (D&C 37:1–2), where they were to be “endowed with power from on high” (D&C 38:32). See History of the Church: 1831–1844.

Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon lived at Hiram, Ohio, from September 1831 to September 1832, where both were tarred and feathered. There Joseph Smith received sixteen revelations later published in the Doctrine and Covenants.

the Suva Fiji Stake, with Inosi Naga as stake president. The Book of Mormon was published in Fijian in 1980.

NEW CALEDONIA. Some LDS Tahitian laborers migrated to New Caledonia during the 1950s and established small units of the Church there. Under the direction of the French Polynesia (Tahiti) mission president, the Noumea Branch was organized in October 1961. Years of negotiations between mission leaders and the New Caledonian government led to permission for LDS missionaries to proselytize. On May 2, 1968, Elder Thomas S. Monson, of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, dedicated New Caledonia for the preaching of the gospel. Two months later, the first missionary couple arrived. In 1990 the full program of the Church had been established, and New Caledonia was under the Fiji Suva Mission.

GUAM AND MICRONESIA. Latter-day Saints have lived on many of the Micronesian islands since World War II. But only Guam has had LDS servicemen's groups and branches consistently. President Joseph Fielding SMITH dedicated Guam to the preaching of the gospel on August 25, 1955, and the first full-time missionaries were sent there in January 1957. However, until the mid-1970s, missionary work was confined primarily to U.S. military personnel and their families. Since that time, expansion into the many islands of Micronesia has been rapid. In the spring of 1980, the Church created the Micronesia Cuam Mission, with Ferron C. Losec as president. Book of Mormon selections were published in Marshallese and Polynesian in 1984 and 1987, respectively.

KIRIBATI. LDS missionary efforts in the Republic of Kiribati (formerly the Gilbert Islands) have proven quite fruitful. On October 19, 1975, six Gilbertese students who had studied at Liahona High School in Tonga returned to the island of Tarawa and commenced missionary work. They had been ordained elders and were serving in the Fiji Suva Mission. At about the same time, the Church took over a small middle school in 1977 and renamed it Moroni Community School. It has served as the physical focus of the Church in Kiribati. Relative to the small population, Church growth has been rapid. In 1990 the Church was also established in Belau, the Cook Islands, Marshall, Niue, Nauru, Northern Marietta, Tuvalu, and Vanuata.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Britsch, R. Lanier. Unto the Islands of the Sea: A History of the Latter-day Saints in the Pacific. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Clement, Russell T., comp. Mormons in the Pacific: A Bibliography. Laie, Hawaii, 1981.

R. LANIER BRITSCH

Papeete Tahiti Temple in 1986 in Pirae, Tahiti (dedicated 1983). The design shows influences of local French and Polynesian culture. Courtesy Floyd Holdman.

OHIO, LDS COMMUNITIES IN

[The Church became established in Ohio after Sidney Rigdon and his Reformed Baptist congregations at Mentor and Kirtland converted in October–November 1830. Others around the vicinity of Kirtland joined the Church. A December 1830 revelation initiated a Gathering of Church members to Ohio (D&C 37:1–2), where they were to be “endowed with power from on high” (D&C 38:32). See History of the Church: 1831–1844.

Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon lived at Hiram, Ohio, from September 1831 to September 1832, where both were tarred and feathered. There Joseph Smith received sixteen revelations later published in the Doctrine and Covenants.

Between 1831 and 1838, Kirtland served as Church headquarters. See such entries as Kirtland: LDS Community; Schools of the Prophets; and Whitney Store. Here many more revelations were received, and in the Kirtland Temple, in 1836, Latter-day Saints experienced an increased outpouring of spiritual manifestations and visitations.

By 1838, the Church had organized more than two dozen branches in communities mostly in northeastern Ohio.

Some early Ohio converts had formed a communal society prior to their conversion. This communitarian impulse was redirected by a revelation, Doctrine and Covenants: Section 42; see Consecration in Ohio. Management of temporal affairs was seen as an integral part of building the Kingdom of God on the earth. Joseph Smith's role in the development of the Kirtland Economy became a focal point of dissent in the wake of the failure of an unchartered Kirtland bank during the Panic of 1837.

In early 1838, threatened by malecontents, Joseph Smith and other Church leaders fled Kirtland, moving Church headquarters to Missouri. Most Latter-day Saints soon left Ohio, although a Church organization was maintained at Kirtland for several years.]

---

OIL, CONSECRATED

Olive oil is used by members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in blessing the sick and in performing initiatory ORDINANCES in the TEMPLE. Before oil is used, it is consecrated in a short ceremony. An officiating MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD bearer, holding an open vessel containing pure olive oil, consecrates it by the authority of the priesthood and in the name of Jesus Christ for its intended purposes. The oil is then stored and used upon occasion as required.

The use of oil in religious rites can be seen in the record of Old Testament times, when it was used to anoint objects (Gen. 28:18–19; Lev. 8:10–12), as an offering (Ex. 25:1–6), and to anoint priests (Ex. 29:7; Lev. 21:10–12) and kings (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:3). In the New Testament, oil was used to anoint the sick (Mark 6:13; James 5:14).

Two New Testament PARABLES illustrate possible symbolisms of oil both as a therapeutic ointment and as a source of light. The good Samaritan, finding the injured traveler, “bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine” (Luke 10:34). In another parable wise virgins “took oil in their vessels with their lamps” and thus were in possession of material to provide light, to celebrate the coming of the bridegroom, Christ (Matt. 25:1–13).

The reason for using olive oil rather than any other kind of oil is never clearly stated in the scriptures. To say that olive oil is preferred because it is the oil indigenous to the Holy Land would be simplistic. A more likely explanation results from examining the wide range of meanings symbolized by the olive tree and the oil derived from the olive fruit, the only major culinary oil that is derived from a fruit. The olive branch has long been a token of peace. The olive tree is used in scripture as a symbol for the house of Israel (Hosea 14:6; Rom. 11:17; Jacob 5; D&C 101:43–62).

PAUL Y. HOSKISSON

---

OLD TESTAMENT

The Old Testament is one of the STANDARD WORKS, or SCRIPTURES, accepted by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which values it for its prophetic, historical, doctrinal, and moral teachings. The Old Testament recounts an epochal series of ancient DISPENSATIONS during which people received periodic guidance through divine COVENANTS and COMMANDMENTS, many of which remain basic and timeless. In relation to the Old Testament, it is significant for Latter-day Saints that in September 1823 the angel Moroni quoted a series of Old Testament PROPHECIES when he revealed the location of an ancient record written on GOLD PLATES to the Prophet Joseph SMITH, whose translation yielded the Book of Mormon (JS—H 1:36–41). Moreover, Joseph Smith's extensive labors on the Old Testament and the accompanying revelations to him (June 1830–July 1833), which led to the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST) and certain informative sections of the Doctrine and Covenants, underscore the importance of these scriptural texts. In addition, from the Book of Mormon it is clear that before 600 B.C. the prophet LEHI and his colony carried to the Western Hemisphere from Jerusalem a record on the PLATES of brass that included many Old Testament texts (1 Ne. 5:10–15), leading Lehi and his descendants to look forward to a redeemer (1 Ne. 19:22–23) and giving them a guide for their moral and spiritual development (Mosiah 1:3, 5).

The Old Testament, even by the name Old Covenant, is thus not outmoded in the LDS view.

Between 1831 and 1838, Kirtland served as Church headquarters. See such entries as Kirtland: LDS Community; Schools of the Prophets; and Whitney Store. Here many more revelations were received, and in the Kirtland Temple, in 1836, Latter-day Saints experienced an increased outpouring of spiritual manifestations and visitations.

By 1838, the Church had organized more than two dozen branches in communities mostly in northeastern Ohio.

Some early Ohio converts had formed a communal society prior to their conversion. This communitarian impulse was redirected by a revelation, Doctrine and Covenants: Section 42; see Consecration in Ohio. Management of temporal affairs was seen as an integral part of building the Kingdom of God on the earth. Joseph Smith's role in the development of the Kirtland Economy became a focal point of dissent in the wake of the failure of an unchartered Kirtland bank during the Panic of 1837.

In early 1838, threatened by malecontents, Joseph Smith and other Church leaders fled Kirtland, moving Church headquarters to Missouri. Most Latter-day Saints soon left Ohio, although a Church organization was maintained at Kirtland for several years.]

---

OIL, CONSECRATED

Olive oil is used by members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in blessing the sick and in performing initiatory ORDINANCES in the TEMPLE. Before oil is used, it is consecrated in a short ceremony. An officiating MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD bearer, holding an open vessel containing pure olive oil, consecrates it by the authority of the priesthood and in the name of Jesus Christ for its intended purposes. The oil is then stored and used upon occasion as required.

The use of oil in religious rites can be seen in the record of Old Testament times, when it was used to anoint objects (Gen. 28:18–19; Lev. 8:10–12), as an offering (Ex. 25:1–6), and to anoint priests (Ex. 29:7; Lev. 21:10–12) and kings (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:3). In the New Testament, oil was used to anoint the sick (Mark 6:13; James 5:14).

Two New Testament PARABLES illustrate possible symbolisms of oil both as a therapeutic ointment and as a source of light. The good Samaritan, finding the injured traveler, “bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine” (Luke 10:34). In another parable wise virgins “took oil in their vessels with their lamps” and thus were in possession of material to provide light, to celebrate the coming of the bridegroom, Christ (Matt. 25:1–13).

The reason for using olive oil rather than any other kind of oil is never clearly stated in the scriptures. To say that olive oil is preferred because it is the oil indigenous to the Holy Land would be simplistic. A more likely explanation results from examining the wide range of meanings symbolized by the olive tree and the oil derived from the olive fruit, the only major culinary oil that is derived from a fruit. The olive branch has long been a token of peace. The olive tree is used in scripture as a symbol for the house of Israel (Hosea 14:6; Rom. 11:17; Jacob 5; D&C 101:43–62).

PAUL Y. HOSKISSON

---

OLD TESTAMENT

The Old Testament is one of the STANDARD WORKS, or SCRIPTURES, accepted by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which values it for its prophetic, historical, doctrinal, and moral teachings. The Old Testament recounts an epochal series of ancient DISPENSATIONS during which people received periodic guidance through divine COVENANTS and COMMANDMENTS, many of which remain basic and timeless. In relation to the Old Testament, it is significant for Latter-day Saints that in September 1823 the angel Moroni quoted a series of Old Testament PROPHECIES when he revealed the location of an ancient record written on GOLD PLATES to the Prophet Joseph SMITH, whose translation yielded the Book of Mormon (JS—H 1:36–41). Moreover, Joseph Smith's extensive labors on the Old Testament and the accompanying revelations to him (June 1830–July 1833), which led to the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST) and certain informative sections of the Doctrine and Covenants, underscore the importance of these scriptural texts. In addition, from the Book of Mormon it is clear that before 600 B.C. the prophet LEHI and his colony carried to the Western Hemisphere from Jerusalem a record on the PLATES of brass that included many Old Testament texts (1 Ne. 5:10–15), leading Lehi and his descendants to look forward to a redeemer (1 Ne. 19:22–23) and giving them a guide for their moral and spiritual development (Mosiah 1:3, 5).

The Old Testament, even by the name Old Covenant, is thus not outmoded in the LDS view.

Between 1831 and 1838, Kirtland served as Church headquarters. See such entries as Kirtland: LDS Community; Schools of the Prophets; and Whitney Store. Here many more revelations were received, and in the Kirtland Temple, in 1836, Latter-day Saints experienced an increased outpouring of spiritual manifestations and visitations.

By 1838, the Church had organized more than two dozen branches in communities mostly in northeastern Ohio.

Some early Ohio converts had formed a communal society prior to their conversion. This communitarian impulse was redirected by a revelation, Doctrine and Covenants: Section 42; see Consecration in Ohio. Management of temporal affairs was seen as an integral part of building the Kingdom of God on the earth. Joseph Smith's role in the development of the Kirtland Economy became a focal point of dissent in the wake of the failure of an unchartered Kirtland bank during the Panic of 1837.

In early 1838, threatened by malecontents, Joseph Smith and other Church leaders fled Kirtland, moving Church headquarters to Missouri. Most Latter-day Saints soon left Ohio, although a Church organization was maintained at Kirtland for several years.]

---

OIL, CONSECRATED

Olive oil is used by members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in blessing the sick and in performing initiatory ORDINANCES in the TEMPLE. Before oil is used, it is consecrated in a short ceremony. An officiating MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD bearer, holding an open vessel containing pure olive oil, consecrates it by the authority of the priesthood and in the name of Jesus Christ for its intended purposes. The oil is then stored and used upon occasion as required.

The use of oil in religious rites can be seen in the record of Old Testament times, when it was used to anoint objects (Gen. 28:18–19; Lev. 8:10–12), as an offering (Ex. 25:1–6), and to anoint priests (Ex. 29:7; Lev. 21:10–12) and kings (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:3). In the New Testament, oil was used to anoint the sick (Mark 6:13; James 5:14).

Two New Testament PARABLES illustrate possible symbolisms of oil both as a therapeutic ointment and as a source of light. The good Samaritan, finding the injured traveler, “bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine” (Luke 10:34). In another parable wise virgins “took oil in their vessels with their lamps” and thus were in possession of material to provide light, to celebrate the coming of the bridegroom, Christ (Matt. 25:1–13).

The reason for using olive oil rather than any other kind of oil is never clearly stated in the scriptures. To say that olive oil is preferred because it is the oil indigenous to the Holy Land would be simplistic. A more likely explanation results from examining the wide range of meanings symbolized by the olive tree and the oil derived from the olive fruit, the only major culinary oil that is derived from a fruit. The olive branch has long been a token of peace. The olive tree is used in scripture as a symbol for the house of Israel (Hosea 14:6; Rom. 11:17; Jacob 5; D&C 101:43–62).

PAUL Y. HOSKISSON

---

OLD TESTAMENT

The Old Testament is one of the STANDARD WORKS, or SCRIPTURES, accepted by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which values it for its prophetic, historical, doctrinal, and moral teachings. The Old Testament recounts an epochal series of ancient DISPENSATIONS during which people received periodic guidance through divine COVENANTS and COMMANDMENTS, many of which remain basic and timeless. In relation to the Old Testament, it is significant for Latter-day Saints that in September 1823 the angel Moroni quoted a series of Old Testament PROPHECIES when he revealed the location of an ancient record written on GOLD PLATES to the Prophet Joseph SMITH, whose translation yielded the Book of Mormon (JS—H 1:36–41). Moreover, Joseph Smith's extensive labors on the Old Testament and the accompanying revelations to him (June 1830–July 1833), which led to the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST) and certain informative sections of the Doctrine and Covenants, underscore the importance of these scriptural texts. In addition, from the Book of Mormon it is clear that before 600 B.C. the prophet LEHI and his colony carried to the Western Hemisphere from Jerusalem a record on the PLATES of brass that included many Old Testament texts (1 Ne. 5:10–15), leading Lehi and his descendants to look forward to a redeemer (1 Ne. 19:22–23) and giving them a guide for their moral and spiritual development (Mosiah 1:3, 5).

The Old Testament, even by the name Old Covenant, is thus not outmoded in the LDS view.

It contains narrative, wisdom, and prophetic literature from ancient epochs; and even though some “plain and precious” parts have been lost, many of these have been restored in LDS scripture (1 Ne. 13:40). It frames a series of ancient covenants with Jehovah (Jesus Christ) as distinguished from the higher covenants in the New Testament (e.g., Matt. 26:28; Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; 2 Cor. 3:6; Heb. 7:22). Latter-day Saints view them all as elements in the same divine PLAN OF SALVATION.

ETERNAL COVENANTS AND COMMANDMENTS. Latter-day Saints feel a need to learn and practice the principles prescribed in all the divine covenants and commandments, which are eternally valid. To know and understand God’s eternal purposes requires a study of the past eras documented in the Old Testament, together with those available in other ancient and modern scriptures. For example, Latter-day revelations help Latter-day Saints read the Old Testament with fuller appreciation for the continuity of the eternally significant concepts taught by the prophets in the scriptures.

From the beginning, the divine covenants associated with salvation have been taught through prophetic words, and some have been typified by sacrificial ordinances. A revelation to Moses, restored through Joseph Smith, states that animal sacrifice was required from the days of Adam and Eve (Moses 5:5) and that such sacrifices were “a similitude of the sacrifice of the Only Begotten of the Father” (Moses 5:7).

Another Old Testament covenant verified in modern revelation is the ABRAHAMIC COVENANT. It pertains not alone to literal descendants of Abraham but also to those adopted into Abraham’s family because of their faith in the true God and their baptism into the gospel of Christ (Gen. 12:1; Gal. 3:26–29). These “descendants” of Abraham are charged with bringing the blessings of this covenant to all nations, through teaching about the true and living God and making known his plan of salvation (Abr. 2:9–11). Responsibility for knowing and acting in accordance with the covenant of Abraham has been transmitted to latter-day heirs by revelation (D&C 110:12). Moreover, a promise by the resurrected Jesus is recorded in the Book of Mormon that descendants of his ancient covenant people Israel, who have been scattered abroad, shall “be gathered in from the east and from the west, and from the south and from the north; and they shall be brought to the knowledge of the Lord their God, who hath redeemed them” (3 Ne. 20:13). They are to be established in their lands of inheritance and will accomplish their ancient and culminating responsibility of building the kingdom of the Lord (3 Ne. 20:21–46; cf. Isa. 52:1–15). For Latter-day Saints the RESTORATION “of all things” (Acts 3:21) includes many Old Testament principles, doctrines, and ideals.

TEMPORARY AND ETERNAL LAWS. Latter-day Saints do not believe that when Jesus fulfilled the LAW OF MOSES he thereby abrogated the law, the prophets, and the writings of the Old Testament (3 Ne. 15:5–8). Indeed, he fulfilled the law of sacrifice by allowing his own blood to be shed (Alma 34:13) and by replacing certain ancient worship performances (3 Ne. 12:18–20; 15:2–10). Thus, the feast of Passover became the commemorative sacrament of the Last Supper (Luke 22:1–20): The paschal lamb culminated in the Lamb of God (Ex. 12:5, 21; 1 Cor. 5:7; 1 Pet. 1:19; Rev. 5:6). Sacrifice of animals culminated in Jesus’ ultimate sacrifice, of which they were mere types, but the sacrifice of “a broken heart and contrite spirit” continues (3 Ne. 9:19–20; cf. Rom. 12:1).

Jesus reiterated many moral and spiritual laws taught by Moses and the prophets. These include laws regarding REVERENCE for God, respect for parents, CHASTITY in moral conduct, avoiding violence and MURDER, and practicing honesty with fellow beings (e.g., Matt. 5:17–48; cf. 3 Ne. 12:17–48; Luke 16:19–31; 24:13–47). The Book of Mormon prophet ABINADI reiterated the Ten Commandments and was adamant about the necessity of teaching and living according to their standards (Mosiah 12:33–37; 13:12–26). And latter-day revelation confirms the same necessity for any who would please the Lord (e.g., D&C 20:17–19; 42:18–29; 52:39).

For Latter-day Saints, all principles of morality and righteousness taught by Old Testament prophets remain valid. Micah, for instance, asks, “What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?” (Micah 6:8). The Lord taught through Habakkuk that divinely inspired visions will surely come to fulfillment, even if far off; therefore, “the just shall live by his faith” (Hab. 2:3–4). Moses urged the Israelites to live according to God’s laws as good examples to others: “Keep therefore and do them [the laws and ordinances], for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people" (Deut. 4:6). Jesus appealed to Deuteronomy and Leviticus concerning the first and second commandments, to love God and one's fellow beings (Deut. 6:4–5; Lev. 19:18, 33–34; Mark 12:28–34).

This, however, is not to say that all worship practices admonished in "the law and the prophets" were to be perpetuated eternally. About 150 B.C., the Book of Mormon prophet Abinadi explained, "I say unto you that it is expedient that ye should keep the law of Moses as yet; but I say unto you, that the time shall come when it shall no more be expedient to keep the law of Moses. And moreover, I say unto you, that salvation doth not come by the law alone; and were it not for the atonement, which God himself shall make for the sins and iniquities of his people, that they must unavoidably perish, notwithstanding the law of Moses" (Mosiah 13:27). The risen Jesus rehearsed teachings which he had fulfilled from the law and the prophets, the Psalms and "all the scriptures," to the disciples on the road to Emmaus and to the eleven apostles gathered in Jerusalem (Luke 24:13, 27, 33, 44). Only certain things had an end in him (3 Ne. 15:8; Gal. 3:24).

Latter-day Saints therefore value those Old Testament laws and doctrines that are eternal, believing that they were "given by inspiration of God" and are "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (2 Tim. 3:16).

PROPHETIC ANTICIPATION OF THE MESSIAH. More than five centuries before the time of Christ, JACOB, a Book of Mormon prophet, stated that his people knew of Christ through the teachings of Moses and the prophets, and thus had hope of his coming (Jacob 4:4–5). And NEPHI added, "For this end hath the law of Moses been given; and all things which have been given of God from the beginning of the world, unto man, are the typifying of [Christ]" (2 Ne. 11:4). On another occasion, Jacob said that "all the holy prophets . . . believed in Christ," and that his people faithfully kept the law of Moses, "it pointing our souls to [Christ]." Indeed, they saw in Abraham's offering of Isaac "a similitude of God and his Only Begotten Son" (Jacob 4:4–5). Amulek, a later Book of Mormon teacher (c. 75 B.C.), when speaking of the "great and last sacrifice" of the Son of God, declared that "this is the whole meaning of the law, every whit pointing to that great and last sacrifice . . . [of] the Son of God" (Alma 34:13–14).

The relevance of prophetic teachings and ordinances for bringing people to Christ is shown by Jesus' own references to such rites and teachings. While coming down from the MOUNT OF TRANSFIGURATION, he spoke to Peter, James, and John about things "written of the Son of man, that he must suffer many things, and be set at nought" (Mark 9:12; cf. Isa. 53:3–7). In his hometown of Nazareth, he announced his fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy of the Messiah's actions of healing and making people free (Luke 4:21; Isa. 61:1–2). After healing a man on the Sabbath, Jesus told those who would condemn him that the time was nigh that even the dead would hear his voice alluding, no doubt, to prophecies of that event (John 5:25; cf. Isa. 24:22). His parting words to that same audience were, "Had ye believed Moses, you would have believed me: for he wrote of me" (John 5:46; cf. Deut. 18:15–19 and Acts 3:22–23; 1 Ne. 22:21; 3 Ne. 20:23). Even in his last mortal hour, as he suffered and fulfilled the promises of redemption, Jesus quoted the first line of Psalm 22—"My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"—as if to point to the imminent fulfillment of the remaining lines of the Psalm (Matt. 27:46; cf. Ps. 22:7–8, 12–19).

Early Christian missionaries converted many to Christ among those who "searched the scriptures daily" (Acts 17:10–12). Those scriptures included what is now known as the Old Testament. Christian teachers succeeded in showing "by the scriptures that Jesus was Christ" (Acts 18:24–28). PAUL declared that scriptures "written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope" of salvation (Rom. 15:4).

Concerning Christ's future advent, more than a score of "royal" and "messianic" psalms anticipate the Lord's reign in the final age. Psalms 72 and 100 are typical (see PSALMS, MESSIANIC PROPHECIES IN). Moreover, in the prophetic books of the Old Testament more chapters look forward to his triumphant final reign than point toward his first advent and sacrifice (e.g., Isa. 40, 43, 45, 52, 60, 63, 65; Ezek. 37–48; Dan. 12; Zech. 12–14).

PROPHECIES FOR PRESENT AND FUTURE. For Latter-day Saints, the present era of the gospel of Jesus Christ began not only with Joseph Smith's

FIRST VISION but also with the visits of other divine messengers, who quoted Old Testament prophecies with the promise that they were about to be fulfilled. The angel Moroni quoted to Joseph Smith some of the eschatological prophecies of Malachi, Isaiah, Joel, and—according to Wilford WOODRUFF—Daniel, and promised their fulfillment (JS—H 1:29, 33, 36–41; JD 24:241).

Latter-day Saints use both ancient and modern prophecies to bring the gospel light to the GENTILES so that all can be mutually blessed (Isa. 49:5–22; D&C 86:11; 110:12; 124:9). In the LAST DAYS the God of heaven will set up his kingdom to embrace all people, rolling forth until it fills the earth (Dan. 2:31–45; D&C 65). The Lord “shall bring again Zion” and, in doing so, will publish peace and salvation, proclaiming, “Thy God reigneth!” Then all nations will see the salvation of God (Isa. 52:7–10). All can be a part of ZION, “the pure in heart” (D&C 97:19–21). “Saviours shall come up on mount Zion,” as Obadiah said, “and the kingdom shall be the LORD’s” (Obad. 1:21; D&C 103:7–10).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ludlow, Daniel H. A Companion to Your Study of the Old Testament. Salt Lake City, 1981.
- Ludlow, Victor L. Unlocking the Old Testament. Salt Lake City, 1981.
- Matthews, Robert J. “A Plain Translation”: Joseph Smith’s Translation of the Bible. Provo, Utah, 1975.
- McConkie, Bruce R. The Promised Messiah. Salt Lake City, 1978.
- Nyman, Monte S., ed. Isaiah and the Prophets. Provo, Utah, 1984.
- Reynolds, Noel B. “The Brass Plates Version of Genesis.” In By Study and Also by Faith, ed. J. Lundquist and S. Ricks, Vol. 2, pp. 136–73. Salt Lake City, 1990.
- Sperry, Sidney B. The Voice of Israel’s Prophets. Salt Lake City, 1965.
- . The Spirit of the Old Testament. Salt Lake City, 1970.

ELLIS T. RASMUSSEN

---

OMNIPOTENT GOD; OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD; OMNISCIENCE OF GOD

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints uses the familiar terms “omnipotent,” “omnipresent,” and “omniscient” to describe members of the GODHEAD.

OMNIPOTENCE. The Church affirms the biblical view of divine omnipotence (often rendered as “almighty”), that GOD is supreme, having power over all things. No one or no force or happening can frustrate or prevent him from accomplishing his designs (D&C 3:1–3). His power is sufficient to fulfill all his purposes and promises, including his promise of ETERNAL LIFE for all who obey him.

However, the Church does not understand this term in the traditional sense of absoluteness, and, on the authority of modern REVELATION, rejects the classical doctrine of CREATION out of nothing. It affirms, rather, that there are actualities that are coeternal with the persons of the Godhead, including elements, intelligence, and law (D&C 93:29, 33, 35; 88:34–40). Omnipotence, therefore, cannot coherently be understood as absolutely unlimited power. That view is internally self-contradictory and, given the fact that evil and suffering are real, not reconcilable with God’s omnibenevolence or loving kindness (see THEODICY).

OMNIPRESENCE. Since Latter-day Saints believe that God the Father and God the Son are gloriously embodied persons, they do not believe them to be bodily omnipresent. They do affirm, rather, that their power is immanent “in all and through all things” and is the power “by which all things are governed” (D&C 88:6, 7, 13, 40–41). By their knowledge and power, and through the influence of the Holy Ghost, they are omnipresent.

OMNISCIENCE. Latter-day Saints differ among themselves in their understanding of the nature of God’s knowledge. Some have thought that God increases endlessly in knowledge as well as in glory and dominion. Others hold to the more traditional view that God’s knowledge, including the FOREKNOWLEDGE of future free contingencies, is complete. Despite these differing views, there is accord on two fundamental issues: (1) God’s foreknowledge does not causally determine human choices, and (2) this knowledge, like God’s power, is maximally efficacious. No event occurs that he has not anticipated or has not taken into account in his planning.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Roberts, B. H. “The Doctrine of Deity.” Seventy’s Course in Theology, third year. Salt Lake City, 1910.

DAVID L. PAULSEN

FIRST VISION but also with the visits of other divine messengers, who quoted Old Testament prophecies with the promise that they were about to be fulfilled. The angel Moroni quoted to Joseph Smith some of the eschatological prophecies of Malachi, Isaiah, Joel, and—according to Wilford WOODRUFF—Daniel, and promised their fulfillment (JS—H 1:29, 33, 36–41; JD 24:241).

Latter-day Saints use both ancient and modern prophecies to bring the gospel light to the GENTILES so that all can be mutually blessed (Isa. 49:5–22; D&C 86:11; 110:12; 124:9). In the LAST DAYS the God of heaven will set up his kingdom to embrace all people, rolling forth until it fills the earth (Dan. 2:31–45; D&C 65). The Lord “shall bring again Zion” and, in doing so, will publish peace and salvation, proclaiming, “Thy God reigneth!” Then all nations will see the salvation of God (Isa. 52:7–10). All can be a part of ZION, “the pure in heart” (D&C 97:19–21). “Saviours shall come up on mount Zion,” as Obadiah said, “and the kingdom shall be the LORD’s” (Obad. 1:21; D&C 103:7–10).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ludlow, Daniel H. A Companion to Your Study of the Old Testament. Salt Lake City, 1981.
- Ludlow, Victor L. Unlocking the Old Testament. Salt Lake City, 1981.
- Matthews, Robert J. “A Plain Translation”: Joseph Smith’s Translation of the Bible. Provo, Utah, 1975.
- McConkie, Bruce R. The Promised Messiah. Salt Lake City, 1978.
- Nyman, Monte S., ed. Isaiah and the Prophets. Provo, Utah, 1984.
- Reynolds, Noel B. “The Brass Plates Version of Genesis.” In By Study and Also by Faith, ed. J. Lundquist and S. Ricks, Vol. 2, pp. 136–73. Salt Lake City, 1990.
- Sperry, Sidney B. The Voice of Israel’s Prophets. Salt Lake City, 1965.
- . The Spirit of the Old Testament. Salt Lake City, 1970.

ELLIS T. RASMUSSEN

---

OMNIPOTENT GOD; OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD; OMNISCIENCE OF GOD

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints uses the familiar terms “omnipotent,” “omnipresent,” and “omniscient” to describe members of the GODHEAD.

OMNIPOTENCE. The Church affirms the biblical view of divine omnipotence (often rendered as “almighty”), that GOD is supreme, having power over all things. No one or no force or happening can frustrate or prevent him from accomplishing his designs (D&C 3:1–3). His power is sufficient to fulfill all his purposes and promises, including his promise of ETERNAL LIFE for all who obey him.

However, the Church does not understand this term in the traditional sense of absoluteness, and, on the authority of modern REVELATION, rejects the classical doctrine of CREATION out of nothing. It affirms, rather, that there are actualities that are coeternal with the persons of the Godhead, including elements, intelligence, and law (D&C 93:29, 33, 35; 88:34–40). Omnipotence, therefore, cannot coherently be understood as absolutely unlimited power. That view is internally self-contradictory and, given the fact that evil and suffering are real, not reconcilable with God’s omnibenevolence or loving kindness (see THEODICY).

OMNIPRESENCE. Since Latter-day Saints believe that God the Father and God the Son are gloriously embodied persons, they do not believe them to be bodily omnipresent. They do affirm, rather, that their power is immanent “in all and through all things” and is the power “by which all things are governed” (D&C 88:6, 7, 13, 40–41). By their knowledge and power, and through the influence of the Holy Ghost, they are omnipresent.

OMNISCIENCE. Latter-day Saints differ among themselves in their understanding of the nature of God’s knowledge. Some have thought that God increases endlessly in knowledge as well as in glory and dominion. Others hold to the more traditional view that God’s knowledge, including the FOREKNOWLEDGE of future free contingencies, is complete. Despite these differing views, there is accord on two fundamental issues: (1) God’s foreknowledge does not causally determine human choices, and (2) this knowledge, like God’s power, is maximally efficacious. No event occurs that he has not anticipated or has not taken into account in his planning.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Roberts, B. H. “The Doctrine of Deity.” Seventy’s Course in Theology, third year. Salt Lake City, 1910.

DAVID L. PAULSEN

---

ONLY BEGOTTEN SON OF GOD

See: Jesus Christ: Only Begotten in the Flesh

---

OPPOSITION

Opposition and AGENCY are eternal and interrelated principles in the theology of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Agency is man's innate power to choose between alternative commitments and finally between whole ways of life. Opposition is the framework within which these choices and their consequences are possible.

In his account of the FALL OF ADAM, LEHI teaches that the philosophy of opposites is at the heart of the plan of redemption. Had ADAM and EVE continued in a state of premortal innocence, they would have experienced "no joy, for they knew no misery; doing no good, for they knew no sin" (2 Ne. 2:23). Hence, Lehi concludes, "it must needs be, that there is an opposition in all things . . . [otherwise] righteousness could not be brought to pass, neither wickedness, neither holiness nor misery, neither good nor bad" (2 Ne. 2:11).

Latter-day Saints understand that contrast and opposition were manifest in PREMORTAL LIFE as well as on EARTH (Abr. 3:23–28; Moses 6:56) and that the distinction between good and evil is eternal. Prior to earth life the spirits of all men had opportunities to choose God and demonstrate love for him by obeying his LAW (Matt. 22:37) or to yield to satanic proposals for rebellion and coercion (2 Ne. 2:11–15; cf. Luke 16:13; 2 Ne. 10:16). Different, indeed opposite, consequences followed these choices (Abr. 3:26).

Scripture relates the principle of opposition to crucial states of human experience. Among them are life and death, knowledge and ignorance, light and darkness, growth and atrophy.

LIFE AND DEATH. As a consequence of Adam and Eve's partaking of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, they and all their posterity became subject to physical death and to the afflictions and degeneration of the mortal body (2 Ne. 9:6–7). They also became subject to spiritual death, which means spiritual separation from God because of SIN. However, through Christ, provision had already been made for their redemption (2 Ne. 2:26), the overcoming of both deaths, and the return to the presence of God. In the span of eternity, the worst form of death is subjection to Satan and thereby exclusion from the presence of God (2 Ne. 2:29). Christ came to bring life, abundant life, everlasting life with God (John 10:28; 17:3; D&C 132:23–24).

KNOWLEDGE AND IGNORANCE. Opposition was, and is, a prerequisite of authentic KNOWLEDGE, "for if they never should have bitter they could not know the sweet" (D&C 29:39; cf. 2 Ne. 2:15). Such knowledge is participative. Because "it is impossible for a man to be saved in ignorance" (D&C 131:6), the Prophet Joseph SMITH taught, "A man is saved no faster than he gets [such] knowledge" (TPJS, p. 217; cf. 357). One may aspire to all truth (D&C 93:28), but not without confronting the heights and depths of mortal experience, either vicariously or actually.

LIGHT AND DARKNESS. Latter-day Saints find a parallel between light and darkness, the concept of the "two ways," and the idea of the warring "sons of darkness" and "sons of light" apparent in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. Jesus teaches that "if therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!" (Matt. 6:23) and that "he who sins against the greater light shall receive the greater condemnation" (D&C 82:3). Finally, the sons and daughters of God are to reach the point where "there shall be no darkness in [them]" (D&C 88:67).

GROWTH AND ATROPHY. The principle of opposition also implies that people cannot be tested and strengthened unless there are genuine alternatives (Abr. 3:23–25) and resistances. Life is a predicament in which there are real risks, real gains, real losses. From such tests emerge responsibility, judgment, and soul growth. Latter-day Saints believe that this encounter with choice and conditions for progression will continue forever. It follows that in the gospel framework, once one is committed, there is no such thing as neutrality or standing still. Joseph Smith taught, "If we are not drawing towards God in principle, we are going from Him" (TPJS, p. 216).

One may err in religion by attempting to reconcile the irreconcilable; so one may assume opposition when there is none. In some forms of Judaism and Christianity, for example, the view prevails that the flesh and the spirit are opposed and antithetical. PAUL is often cited in this connection. But a close reading of Paul and other writers shows that “flesh” most often applies to man bound by SIN, and “spirit” to one regenerated through Christ. Thus, it is not the flesh, but the vices of the flesh that are to be avoided. And it is not the earth, but worldliness (wickedness) that is to be transcended (JST Rom. 7:5–27). Similarly, Latter-day Saints do not finally pit faith against reason, or the spirit against the senses, or the life of contemplation against the life of activity and service. Only when these are distorted are they opposed, for when the self is united under Christ, they are reconciled.

In the plan of redemption, opposition is not obliterated but overcome: evil by good, death by life, ignorance by knowledge, darkness by light, weakness by strength.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Roberts, B. H. The Gospel. Liverpool, 1888.

———. Comprehensive History of the Church. Vol. 2, pp. 403–406. Salt Lake City, 1930.

KAY P. EDWARDS

---

ORDINANCES

[This entry consists of two articles: An Overview, a general discussion of the nature of ordinances in the broadest sense, and Administration of Ordinances, the actual ecclesiastical procedures involved in the authorization and performance of ordinances in the Church.]

OVERVIEW

The word “ordinance” is derived from the Latin ordinare, which means to put in order or sequence; or to act by authorization or command. Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints regard religious ordinances not as arbitrarily established but as purposefully instituted by GOD and eternal in scope.

The power to perform ordinances whose validity is recognized by God is inseparably connected with the divine AUTHORITY conferred on mortal man, that is, the PRIESTHOOD of God: “Which priesthood continueth in the church of God in all generations. . . . Therefore, in the ordinances thereof, the power of godliness is manifest. And without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the priesthood, the power of godliness is not manifest unto men in the flesh” (D&C 84:17, 20–21).

Ordinances in the Church contain instructions and rich SYMBOLISM. Anointing with consecrated OIL (e.g., as in the TEMPLE) is reminiscent of the use of sacred oil in the coronation of kings and the calling of PROPHETS in ancient days. Laying hands on the head of the sick symbolically suggests the invocation and transmission of power from on high. The “waters of baptism” richly symbolize the actuality of new birth.

Latter-day scriptures give ample evidence that God has established unchangeable, eternal ordinances as essential elements of the PLAN OF SALVATION and redemption (Isa. 24:5; Mal. 3:7; Alma 13:16; D&C 124:38). The Prophet Joseph SMITH taught that “the ordinances of the Gospel . . . were laid out before the foundations of the world” and “are not to be altered or changed. All must be saved on the same principles” (TPJS, pp. 367, 308).

A biblical example of the necessity of ordinances can be found in the Lord’s statement to Nicodemus that one must “be born again” (John 3:3). The Prophet Joseph Smith taught that “being born again comes by the spirit of God through ordinances” (TPJS, p. 162). The process of salvation is experienced as a “mighty change in your hearts” (Alma 5:14) under the guidance and assistance of the Spirit of God through keeping the divine ordinances. The test of obedience is reiterated in modern times, a pattern that is said to apply “in all cases under the whole heavens.” One is fully accepted of God and is “of God” if, and only if, she or “he obey mine ordinances” (D&C 52:14–19). Some ordinances are universal in nature (cf. Lev. 18:4; Rom. 13:2; Alma 30:3; D&C 136:4), while others are rites and ceremonies decreed for special purposes within the Lord’s work (e.g., Num. 18:8; Heb. 9:10; Alma 13:8; D&C 128:12).

Ordinances, in the sense of rituals and ceremonies, embrace the entire mortal life of God’s sons and daughters and are performed by the Lord’s authorized representatives, the bearers of his priesthood. Indeed, ordinances are the visible aspect of priesthood efficacy, the operation of proper divine authority conferred upon mortal man.

Some ordinances are prerequisite for entering celestial glory (BAPTISM, GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST) and for EXALTATION (priesthood ordination. But a close reading of Paul and other writers shows that “flesh” most often applies to man bound by SIN, and “spirit” to one regenerated through Christ. Thus, it is not the flesh, but the vices of the flesh that are to be avoided. And it is not the earth, but worldliness (wickedness) that is to be transcended (JST Rom. 7:5–27). Similarly, Latter-day Saints do not finally pit faith against reason, or the spirit against the senses, or the life of contemplation against the life of activity and service. Only when these are distorted are they opposed, for when the self is united under Christ, they are reconciled.

In the plan of redemption, opposition is not obliterated but overcome: evil by good, death by life, ignorance by knowledge, darkness by light, weakness by strength.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Roberts, B. H. The Gospel. Liverpool, 1888.

———. Comprehensive History of the Church. Vol. 2, pp. 403–406. Salt Lake City, 1930.

KAY P. EDWARDS

---

ORDINANCES

[This entry consists of two articles: An Overview, a general discussion of the nature of ordinances in the broadest sense, and Administration of Ordinances, the actual ecclesiastical procedures involved in the authorization and performance of ordinances in the Church.]

OVERVIEW

The word “ordinance” is derived from the Latin ordinare, which means to put in order or sequence; or to act by authorization or command. Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints regard religious ordinances not as arbitrarily established but as purposefully instituted by GOD and eternal in scope.

The power to perform ordinances whose validity is recognized by God is inseparably connected with the divine AUTHORITY conferred on mortal man, that is, the PRIESTHOOD of God: “Which priesthood continueth in the church of God in all generations. . . . Therefore, in the ordinances thereof, the power of godliness is manifest. And without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the priesthood, the power of godliness is not manifest unto men in the flesh” (D&C 84:17, 20–21).

Ordinances in the Church contain instructions and rich SYMBOLISM. Anointing with consecrated OIL (e.g., as in the TEMPLE) is reminiscent of the use of sacred oil in the coronation of kings and the calling of PROPHETS in ancient days. Laying hands on the head of the sick symbolically suggests the invocation and transmission of power from on high. The “waters of baptism” richly symbolize the actuality of new birth.

Latter-day scriptures give ample evidence that God has established unchangeable, eternal ordinances as essential elements of the PLAN OF SALVATION and redemption (Isa. 24:5; Mal. 3:7; Alma 13:16; D&C 124:38). The Prophet Joseph SMITH taught that “the ordinances of the Gospel . . . were laid out before the foundations of the world” and “are not to be altered or changed. All must be saved on the same principles” (TPJS, pp. 367, 308).

A biblical example of the necessity of ordinances can be found in the Lord’s statement to Nicodemus that one must “be born again” (John 3:3). The Prophet Joseph Smith taught that “being born again comes by the spirit of God through ordinances” (TPJS, p. 162). The process of salvation is experienced as a “mighty change in your hearts” (Alma 5:14) under the guidance and assistance of the Spirit of God through keeping the divine ordinances. The test of obedience is reiterated in modern times, a pattern that is said to apply “in all cases under the whole heavens.” One is fully accepted of God and is “of God” if, and only if, she or “he obey mine ordinances” (D&C 52:14–19). Some ordinances are universal in nature (cf. Lev. 18:4; Rom. 13:2; Alma 30:3; D&C 136:4), while others are rites and ceremonies decreed for special purposes within the Lord’s work (e.g., Num. 18:8; Heb. 9:10; Alma 13:8; D&C 128:12).

Ordinances, in the sense of rituals and ceremonies, embrace the entire mortal life of God’s sons and daughters and are performed by the Lord’s authorized representatives, the bearers of his priesthood. Indeed, ordinances are the visible aspect of priesthood efficacy, the operation of proper divine authority conferred upon mortal man.

Some ordinances are prerequisite for entering celestial glory (BAPTISM, GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST) and for EXALTATION (priesthood ordination, temple endowment, celestial marriage). Each human who lives, who has ever lived, or who will yet live upon the earth has need of these ordinances. Therefore, ordinances are to be performed vicariously in behalf of those who had no opportunity to receive them during their mortal lives.

Other ordinances enhance the physical, emotional, and spiritual welfare of their recipients though they may not be prerequisites for celestial glory or entering into the actual presence of God the Father. Such additional ordinances include the naming of children, confirmation, consecration of oil, dedication of buildings, and dedication of graves. Administering to the sick contributes to health and well-being and to emotional relief and comfort. Spiritual guidance is provided by the bestowal on children of patriarchal and paternal blessings. Vital COVENANT renewal occurs in partaking of the SACRAMENT, when one makes a solemn commitment to conduct one's self appropriately as a bearer of the name of Christ, to always remember him, and to keep the commandments that he has given. Such obedience increases susceptibility to the guidance and sanctification of the Spirit.

Ordinances reflect the truth that the Lord's Church is a house of order. They also remind members of their standing in God's kingdom on earth.

Not only should the one performing an ordinance qualify to do so, but those receiving the ordinance should prepare themselves for the occasion. The fourth ARTICLE OF FAITH says, "We believe that the first principles and ordinances of the Gospel are: first, Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; second, Repentance; third, Baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; fourth, Laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost." These initiatory steps are in precise and divinely appointed sequence, and by following them one moves "from grace to grace" as did the Son of God himself (D&C 93:13; cf. Luke 2:52). Indeed, modern revelation teaches, "If a man gets the fulness of the priesthood of God, he has to get it in the same way that Jesus Christ obtained it, and that was by keeping all the commandments and obeying all the ordinances of the House of the Lord" (TPJS, p. 308).

When ordinances are performed with authority and power, they are followed by divine blessings. They have "efficacy, virtue, [and] force" (D&C 132:7). They are enlightening to the mind and enlivening to the whole soul (JS—H 1:74). The first man, after he entered the process of baptism, was "quickened in the inner man" (Moses 6:65). Ordinances unify man with God, and man with man: "Behold, thou art one in me, a son of God; and thus may all become my sons" (Moses 6:68).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Joseph F. GD.

IMMO LUSCHIN

ADMINISTRATION OF ORDINANCES

Ordinances performed in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are to "be done in order" (D&C 20:68) by one who is ordained. The common linguistic root of the words "ordinance," "order," and "ordain" implies fixed succession, privilege, right, and solemn responsibility.

The administration of all ordinances presupposes worthiness of the administrator and the recipient. Most are performed by the LAYING ON OF HANDS of one properly ordained. It must be "known to the church that he [the officiator] has authority" (D&C 42:11), which can be traced in a documented line to the source of all AUTHORITY, Jesus Christ. All ordinances are performed in the name of the Son, Jesus Christ, and in the authority of the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD or MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD. For some ordinances, such as BAPTISM and administration of the SACRAMENT, the scriptures prescribe exact words. For others, such as administration to the sick, the pronouncement of the recipient's name and a statement of the authority of the officiator are followed by a spontaneous blessing as inspiration directs.

Ordinances that are essential to SALVATION must be performed under the direction of those who hold the KEYS to assign the administration (see Heb. 5:4; cf. D&C 132:7). The validity of ordinances performed, and their divine ratification or SEALING, require this approval.

In harmony with biblical precedent and latter-day commandment, all saving and exalting ordinances, from baptism to temple MARRIAGE, are performed in the presence of WITNESSES, and a proper and faithful record is made and kept in the archives of the Church (2 Cor. 13:1; cf. D&C 128:2–5). Thus, ordinances become "a law on earth and in heaven” and, unless the COVENANTS are violated, they cannot be annulled, “according to the decrees of the great Jehovah” (D&C 128:6–10).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Melchizedek Priesthood Handbook. Salt Lake City, 1989.

IMMO LUSCHIN

ORDINATION TO THE PRIESTHOOD

Ordination to the priesthood is required in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints of all who administer the ORDINANCES of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

The pattern of ordaining men to PRIESTHOOD OFFICES and CALLINGS is found in the Bible as well as in sacred history. Joshua was ordained by MOSES (Num. 27:18–23), and Christ chose and ordained his APOSTLES (John 15:16). Latter-day Saints believe these ordinations involved the LAYING ON OF HANDS. The sequence of ordaining ancient prophets and thereby transmitting author-

Christ Ordains the Apostles (detail), by Harry Anderson (1964, oil on canvas, 5' × 12'). Christ called and ordained twelve apostles early in his Galilean ministry (Matt. 10:1–4). “Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain” (John 15:16). Church Museum of History and Art.

Worthy male members of the Church are given priesthood authority and ordained to offices within the priesthood by the laying on of hands by those in authority (A of F 5). Photograph, 1982; courtesy Floyd Holdman.

ity from Adam to Noah is outlined in modern REVELATION (D&C 84:6–16; 107:40–52).

LDS officers trace their “line of authority” in steps back to the Lord Jesus Christ. Modern conferrals of priesthood authority are based on the specific historical claim of ordinations under the hands of ancient worthies (see AARONIC PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF; MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF). Priesthood authority and power from on high can be transmitted by the laying on of hands to all men who qualify for it in a spirit of humility. They who are ordained by an authorized agent of God look upon their ordinations as coming from the Lord himself (cf. Alma 13:1). An 1830 revelation declared in the voice of the Lord, “I will lay my hand upon you by the hand of my servant” (D&C 36:2).

Efficacy of ordination depends not simply upon the formula or words, but upon worthiness and the sanction of the Spirit. One may forfeit his priesthood authority by abusing it. The priesthood is not a domineering power. “No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood, only by persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned” (D&C 121:41).

and in heaven” and, unless the COVENANTS are violated, they cannot be annulled, “according to the decrees of the great Jehovah” (D&C 128:6–10).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Melchizedek Priesthood Handbook. Salt Lake City, 1989.

IMMO LUSCHIN

ORDINATION TO THE PRIESTHOOD

Ordination to the priesthood is required in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints of all who administer the ORDINANCES of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

The pattern of ordaining men to PRIESTHOOD OFFICES and CALLINGS is found in the Bible as well as in sacred history. Joshua was ordained by MOSES (Num. 27:18–23), and Christ chose and ordained his APOSTLES (John 15:16). Latter-day Saints believe these ordinations involved the LAYING ON OF HANDS. The sequence of ordaining ancient prophets and thereby transmitting author-

Christ Ordains the Apostles (detail), by Harry Anderson (1964, oil on canvas, 5' × 12'). Christ called and ordained twelve apostles early in his Galilean ministry (Matt. 10:1–4). “Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain” (John 15:16). Church Museum of History and Art.

Worthy male members of the Church are given priesthood authority and ordained to offices within the priesthood by the laying on of hands by those in authority (A of F 5). Photograph, 1982; courtesy Floyd Holdman.

ity from Adam to Noah is outlined in modern REVELATION (D&C 84:6–16; 107:40–52).

LDS officers trace their “line of authority” in steps back to the Lord Jesus Christ. Modern conferrals of priesthood authority are based on the specific historical claim of ordinations under the hands of ancient worthies (see AARONIC PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF; MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF). Priesthood authority and power from on high can be transmitted by the laying on of hands to all men who qualify for it in a spirit of humility. They who are ordained by an authorized agent of God look upon their ordinations as coming from the Lord himself (cf. Alma 13:1). An 1830 revelation declared in the voice of the Lord, “I will lay my hand upon you by the hand of my servant” (D&C 36:2).

Efficacy of ordination depends not simply upon the formula or words, but upon worthiness and the sanction of the Spirit. One may forfeit his priesthood authority by abusing it. The priesthood is not a domineering power. “No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood, only by persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned” (D&C 121:41).

In LDS understanding, those who are ordained to the priesthood are not an elite or professional priestly class distinct from laymen. They are all laymen. It is taught that “a man must be called of God by prophecy and the laying on of hands” by those who are in authority (A of F 5; cf. 1 Tim. 4:14). “By prophecy” means the right to receive and the power to interpret manifestations of the divine will.

At the age of twelve, all worthy LDS men may receive the Aaronic Priesthood and be ordained to the office of DEACON. At later ages they may be ordained TEACHERS and PRIESTS. Adult male converts are generally ordained priests shortly after BAPTISM. An ordained BISHOP is SET APART to preside over the Aaronic Priesthood and to serve as the PRESIDING HIGH PRIEST of his WARD. He authorizes all ordinations in the Aaronic Priesthood in his ward, which are performed either by a priest or a member of the Melchizedek Priesthood, often the father. Other priesthood holders usually join in the ordination standing in a circle around the seated person and laying their hands on his head. The one serving as voice invokes the authority of the priesthood and the name of Jesus Christ and pronounces the specific ordination, with accompanying words of counsel and promise.

Worthy men eighteen years of age and older may receive the Melchizedek Priesthood and be ordained ELDERS. Men called to presiding positions in the Church such as BISHOPS, HIGH COUNCILS, and STAKE PRESIDENCIES, as well as PATRIARCHS and APOSTLES, are ordained high priests.

At the present time only those called to serve as GENERAL AUTHORITIES in a quorum of SEVENTY are ordained to the office of seventy. Members of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES are ordained apostles. Counselors in the First Presidency generally, but not always, also hold the office of apostle. The PROPHET of the Church is the Senior Apostle. When he becomes the presiding officer, he is ordained and set apart as the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH by the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.

HOYT W. BREWSTER, JR.

---

ORGANIC EVOLUTION

See: Creation; Creation Accounts; Evolution

---

ORGANIZATION

[This entry is divided into two parts:

Organizational and Administrative History
Contemporary Organization

The first article summarizes 160 years of Church organization and programs, and Contemporary Organization examines the organization of the Church in 1990. There are separate entries for most major officers and units. See Auxiliary Organizations for an overview of subsidiary units that support the work of Priesthood. For details of local organization, consult District, Ward, and Stake entries; see also those associated with Mission. Correlation of the Church, Administration reviews more recent efforts to streamline and coordinate all Church curricula and administration.]

ORGANIZATIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE HISTORY

Church organization and administration since 1830 have been the result of the restoration of ancient PRIESTHOOD authority and offices, of decisions made by living PROPHETS receptive to divine revelation, and of practical responses to changing world and Church circumstances. From its inception the Church has been hierarchical, with authority flowing from the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH. Most positions are filled by lay members called to serve without remuneration, and members are entitled to sustain or not sustain decisions and officers proposed by their leaders (see COMMON CONSENT; LAY PARTICIPATION AND LEADERSHIP).

THE FOUNDATION. Joseph SMITH and Oliver COWDERY received priesthood ordination and baptism under the direction of heavenly messengers in 1829. They then baptized others. This cluster of believers gathered on April 6, 1830, for the formal ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH, with Joseph Smith as First Elder and Oliver as Second Elder. Two months later the Church held its first conference and soon established a tradition of semiannual general conferences. From the beginning, Church officers were sustained by conference vote, and members and officials received certificates of membership or ordination from conferences.

During the first two years of the Church, DEACONS, TEACHERS, PRIESTS, and ELDERS constituted the local ministry. “The Articles and Covenants” served as a handbook explaining the duties of these officers (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTION 20).

In LDS understanding, those who are ordained to the priesthood are not an elite or professional priestly class distinct from laymen. They are all laymen. It is taught that “a man must be called of God by prophecy and the laying on of hands” by those who are in authority (A of F 5; cf. 1 Tim. 4:14). “By prophecy” means the right to receive and the power to interpret manifestations of the divine will.

At the age of twelve, all worthy LDS men may receive the Aaronic Priesthood and be ordained to the office of DEACON. At later ages they may be ordained TEACHERS and PRIESTS. Adult male converts are generally ordained priests shortly after BAPTISM. An ordained BISHOP is SET APART to preside over the Aaronic Priesthood and to serve as the PRESIDING HIGH PRIEST of his WARD. He authorizes all ordinations in the Aaronic Priesthood in his ward, which are performed either by a priest or a member of the Melchizedek Priesthood, often the father. Other priesthood holders usually join in the ordination standing in a circle around the seated person and laying their hands on his head. The one serving as voice invokes the authority of the priesthood and the name of Jesus Christ and pronounces the specific ordination, with accompanying words of counsel and promise.

Worthy men eighteen years of age and older may receive the Melchizedek Priesthood and be ordained ELDERS. Men called to presiding positions in the Church such as BISHOPS, HIGH COUNCILS, and STAKE PRESIDENCIES, as well as PATRIARCHS and APOSTLES, are ordained high priests.

At the present time only those called to serve as GENERAL AUTHORITIES in a quorum of SEVENTY are ordained to the office of seventy. Members of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES are ordained apostles. Counselors in the First Presidency generally, but not always, also hold the office of apostle. The PROPHET of the Church is the Senior Apostle. When he becomes the presiding officer, he is ordained and set apart as the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH by the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.

HOYT W. BREWSTER, JR.

---

ORGANIC EVOLUTION

See: Creation; Creation Accounts; Evolution

---

ORGANIZATION

[This entry is divided into two parts:

Organizational and Administrative History
Contemporary Organization

The first article summarizes 160 years of Church organization and programs, and Contemporary Organization examines the organization of the Church in 1990. There are separate entries for most major officers and units. See Auxiliary Organizations for an overview of subsidiary units that support the work of Priesthood. For details of local organization, consult District, Ward, and Stake entries; see also those associated with Mission. Correlation of the Church, Administration reviews more recent efforts to streamline and coordinate all Church curricula and administration.]

ORGANIZATIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE HISTORY

Church organization and administration since 1830 have been the result of the restoration of ancient PRIESTHOOD authority and offices, of decisions made by living PROPHETS receptive to divine revelation, and of practical responses to changing world and Church circumstances. From its inception the Church has been hierarchical, with authority flowing from the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH. Most positions are filled by lay members called to serve without remuneration, and members are entitled to sustain or not sustain decisions and officers proposed by their leaders (see COMMON CONSENT; LAY PARTICIPATION AND LEADERSHIP).

THE FOUNDATION. Joseph SMITH and Oliver COWDERY received priesthood ordination and baptism under the direction of heavenly messengers in 1829. They then baptized others. This cluster of believers gathered on April 6, 1830, for the formal ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH, with Joseph Smith as First Elder and Oliver as Second Elder. Two months later the Church held its first conference and soon established a tradition of semiannual general conferences. From the beginning, Church officers were sustained by conference vote, and members and officials received certificates of membership or ordination from conferences.

During the first two years of the Church, DEACONS, TEACHERS, PRIESTS, and ELDERS constituted the local ministry. “The Articles and Covenants” served as a handbook explaining the duties of these officers (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTION 20).

First Presidency and Quorum of the Twelve Apostles (engraving, 1853). Top row: Heber C. Kimball, President Brigham Young, Willard Richards. Apostles (second row) Orson Hyde, Parley P. Pratt, Orson Pratt, Wilford Woodruff, (third row) John Taylor, George A. Smith, Amasa Lyman, Ezra T. Benson, (fourth row) Charles C. Rich, Lorenzo Snow, Erastus Snow, Franklin D. Richards.

A revelation in 1831 instituted the office of BISHOP, initially one for Missouri and another for Ohio. Temporal affairs were their primary stewardship at first; they received consecrations of property in the 1830s, tithes afterward, and cared for the poor. Soon bishops also received responsibility for disciplinary procedures and for the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD. Not until 1839, in Nauvoo, Illinois, did the Church have bishops assigned to local geographical subdivisions called WARDS, under the jurisdiction of the bishop responsible for the larger region.

The office of HIGH PRIEST was instituted in 1831, with Joseph Smith as the PRESIDING HIGH PRIEST over the Church. In 1832 he chose counselors to assist him, initiating what became the FIRST PRESIDENCY. Revelation in March 1833 (D&C 90) gave the presidency supreme authority over all affairs of the Church; their roles at the head of the hierarchy remain essentially unchanged. Late in 1833 a second general officer, the PATRIARCH TO THE CHURCH, was called and ordained.

In 1834 two STAKES—geographic entities—were formed (one in Ohio and the second in Missouri) to direct the operation of BRANCHES (congregations) and local officers. Stakes were led by a three-man STAKE PRESIDENCY and a twelve-member HIGH COUNCIL (D&C 102). High councils arbitrated disputes, investigated and tried charges of misconduct, and generally oversaw local ecclesiastical operations. Outside stake boundaries, members clustered into isolated branches led by elders or priests.

In 1835 the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES and the QUORUM OF THE SEVENTY were organized. The Twelve, subordinate to the First Presidency, were assigned by revelation to preside outside organized stakes as a traveling high council. This included ordaining and supervising other officers of the Church outside stakes, including patriarchs. They were also to direct proselytizing in all lands, assisted by the SEVENTY. The Seventy's presidency of seven, called the FIRST COUNCIL OF THE SEVENTY, were sustained with other GENERAL AUTHORITIES in August 1835.

By 1835 revelations defined two orders of priesthood: the higher, or MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD, including the offices of high priest, seventy, and elder; and the lesser, or Aaronic Priesthood, comprising priests, teachers, and deacons. PRIESTHOOD QUORUMS in the stakes consisted of up to ninety-six elders, forty-eight priests, twenty-four teachers, and twelve deacons, each with its own presidency except the priests, whose president is a bishop.

In the fall of 1835 the Church published the first edition of the Doctrine and Covenants. The three revelations placed first (now sections 20, 107, and 84) described priesthood and its organization.

Visitations by Moses, Elias, and Elijah in 1836 restored the KEYS OF THE PRIESTHOOD and responsibility to gather scattered Israel and the SEALING powers by which families could be linked for eternity in TEMPLES (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTIONS 109–110). These keys are still the basis for LDS missionary, family history/genealogy, and temple work.

After a mission to Great Britain, in 1839–1841, the Twelve received broadened responsibility, under the First Presidency, for Church government within the stakes as well as outside them, a responsibility they have carried since. In Nauvoo they received temple ordinances and the keys necessary to govern the Church if there were no First Presidency.

To complete Church organization and prepare the women, along with the men, for the temple, in 1842 Joseph Smith organized the women's RELIEF SOCIETY IN NAUVOO. A counterpart of priesthood organization for men, the RELIEF SOCIETY was seen as a more integral part of Church organization than were later AUXILIARY ORGANIZATIONS.

In 1841 Joseph Smith established the office of Trustee-in-Trust to manage Church properties at the general level. The role of bishops in temporal affairs thus became subordinate to that of the Trustee-in-Trust, generally the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH. In Nauvoo, and for the next decade after, a Council of Fifty assisted as political and temporal administrators.

The last body in the governing hierarchy to emerge was the PRESIDING BISHOPRIC. Until 1847 the Church had two general bishops, but that year Bishop Newel K. Whitney became Presiding Bishop. When his successor (1851), Bishop Edward Hunter, received two regular counselors in 1856, the three constituted the first full Presiding Bishopric. Initially, the Presiding Bishopric's primary responsibility was the overall management of temporal affairs, including the supervision of ward bishops in their temporal duties. Beginning in the 1850s, the Presiding Bishopric also oversaw Aaronic Priesthood matters.

The First Presidency, Twelve, Seventy, and Presiding Bishopric—all dating from this first generation—continue to be the main administrative officers of the Church. These General Authority offices are generally life-tenured callings except in cases of calls to a higher position or removal for cause or health problems, though emeritus status has recently been introduced. The Second Quorum of the Seventy is comprised of men called to serve a five-year period. Between 1941 and 1976 additional General Authorities known as ASSISTANTS TO THE TWELVE also served. The office of Patriarch to the Church, which earlier had

The Council House, Salt Lake City, completed in 1850, was one of the early public and church buildings in Utah. The territorial legislature met here; a public library was here; endowments were given here; and for several years the University of Deseret occupied the building. It was destroyed by fire in 1883.

administrative functions, was eventually limited to giving PATRIARCHAL BLESSINGS to Church members outside stakes, and in 1979 was discontinued.

After Joseph Smith's death in 1844, the Twelve Apostles led the Church under the direction of senior apostle and quorum president Brigham YOUNG. In 1847 he was sustained as President in a new First Presidency. SUCCESSION IN THE PRESIDENCY continues to adhere to that basic pattern.

THE PIONEER ORGANIZATION. After migration to the West in the late 1840s, Church organization adapted to facilitate COLONIZATION of the undeveloped Great Basin. Church officers directed the establishment of hundreds of colonies and helped provide settlements with economic, political, judicial, social, and spiritual programs. Often, one of the Twelve presided in larger settlements. Mormon villages combined private enterprise and economic cooperation, with bishops or stake presidents supervising the dispensing of land, building of roads, digging of ditches and canals, and conducting of business ventures (see CITY PLANNING; PIONEER ECONOMY). Although civil government gradually assumed an increasing role, the Church remained a significant influence in local and regional affairs throughout the pioneer period.

In a largely cashless economy with little investment capital, Church leaders promoted colonization and industrial enterprises by calling individuals on special missions and by using Church resources to foster community enterprises. A Church public works program, directed by the First Presidency and managed by the Presiding Bishopric, provided employment and helped build the SALT LAKE TEMPLE and TABERNACLE and create other community improvements. In the 1870s Brigham Young directed the organization of UNITED ORDERS, economic endeavors managed by stake presidents and bishops. Since TITHING donations were usually in "kind" rather than cash, local bishops and the Presiding Bishopric directed a gigantic barter and transfer system that paid for needed services, fed public works employees, and assisted the needy.

Much Church effort went toward assisting with immigration to the Great Basin (see IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION). The PERPETUAL EMIGRATING FUND, a revolving loan fund, helped poorer immigrants, including HANDCART immigrants, make the trek. In the 1860s Church wagon trains were sent from Utah to convey immigrants from the railroad terminus. After they arrived in Utah, the First Presidency and Presiding Bishopric directed immigrants to settlements where they were needed.

In the 1850s and thereafter, the ward became the primary Church organization in the lives of the Saints. In the pioneer era, bishops selected by the First Presidency and priesthood “block teachers” called by bishops were the main ward officers. General Authorities maintained contact through semiannual general conferences in Salt Lake City, visits to the settlements, DESERET NEWS articles, and epistles.

Missionary work, most of it outside the Great Basin, also had to be organized. In 1850 several of the Twelve opened new missions in Europe. Usually an apostle residing in Britain supervised all European missionary work. Missions were divided into conferences, districts, and branches, each with a president selected by the line officer above him.

During the 1860s and 1870s auxiliary organizations started locally and then became general Church organizations under the supervision or presidency of General Authorities. These included SUNDAY SCHOOLS; the RETRENCHMENT ASSOCIATION, predecessor to the Young Ladies’ Mutual Improvement Association (YLMIA; see YOUNG WOMEN); the Young Men’s Mutual Improvement Association (YMMIA; see YOUNG MEN); and the PRIMARY for children. Relief Society for women was revived in Utah and established throughout the Church beginning in 1867.

In 1877 President Brigham Young implemented a massive reordering of wards, stakes, and priesthood quorums. This reform removed the Twelve from local leadership assignments, created new quorums for elders and Aaronic Priesthood, expanded the role of bishops as ward leaders, gave stakes increased responsibility, and, for the first time, involved most young men in Aaronic Priesthood offices. These and other changes at that time, such as quarterly stake conferences and reporting procedures, remained standard for nearly a century.

During the changes of 1877, Elder Orson PRATT explained the Church’s organizational flexibility in terms that also foreshadowed future developments:

To say that there will be a stated time, in the history of this church, during its imperfections and weaknesses, when the organization will be perfect, and that there will be no further extension or addition to the organization, would be a mistake. Organization is to go on, step after step, . . . just as the people increase and grow in the knowledge of the principles and laws of the kingdom of God [Deseret News Weekly, July 18, 1877].

Led by PROPHETS, SEERS, AND REVELATORS, the Church has exhibited its flexibility in adapting to changing needs and circumstances.

ELABORATION AND CONTINUITY. The Church faced the 1880s with a well-developed and well-functioning organization; in addition, it was beginning to create auxiliary organizations for children and youth. Over decades these would mature and be fine-tuned to function more effectively in an increasingly complex world.

Church pioneering institutions also remained. During the 1880s and 1890s, the Church continued to direct colonization and economic development (see ECONOMIC HISTORY OF THE CHURCH). Building on the cooperative movement of the 1860s and the united orders of the 1870s, by the 1880s the First Presidency was coordinating development and regulated economic competition through a central Board of Trade and similar stake boards. During this period as well, revelations to President John TAYLOR initiated a revitalization of quorums of Seventy and moved these quorums toward becoming stake rather than general Church entities.

Federal prosecutions of polygamists during the 1880s disrupted Church administration as General Authorities, stake presidents, and bishops went into hiding or left Utah (see ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION). Franklin D. Richards, an apostle whose plural wife had died, carried on many of the public functions of general Church leadership under the direction of the First Presidency, who were in hiding. With general Church ownership of property severely restricted, stakes, wards, and individuals formed nonprofit associations to hold Church property, including temples, meeting-houses, tithing houses, and livestock. After the MANIFESTO OF 1890 and the granting of amnesty, Church leaders resumed their full administrative duties.

During the 1880s stake boards or committees were created for YMMIA, YLMIA, Relief Society, Primary, and Sunday School to promote and supervise auxiliary work locally. In 1889 the Relief Society began holding conferences in connection with the Church's general conferences, as did the Primary. By 1902 each of the auxiliaries was publishing its own magazine.

Though an extensive bureaucracy was not necessary until rapid international growth began in the 1960s, between 1900 and 1930 the Church modernized management and constructed important new facilities. The Church acquired HISTORICAL SITES, supported HOSPITALS, established recreation centers in local meetinghouses, and erected new offices in Salt Lake City, including a Bishop's Building (1910) for the Presiding Bishopric and auxiliary organizations, and the Administration Building (1917), in which the First Presidency and Quorum of the Twelve still have their offices. Zions Securities Corporation was created to manage taxable Church properties, and the Corporation of the President was established to oversee ecclesiastical properties.

Church leaders also attended to programs for youth. Early CORRELATION efforts saw the autonomy of Church auxiliaries decline as the Church assumed greater control over auxiliary magazines; the YMMIA's IMPROVEMENT ERA became a magazine for priesthood and Church readership. In 1911 the Church adopted the Boy Scout program as part of the YMMIA (see SCOUTING). In response to the secularization of Utah schools during the late nineteenth century, the Church had created stake ACADEMIES and conducted religion classes after school for elementary-school children. By 1910 a General Board of Education supervised thirty-four stake academies; Brigham Young College in Logan, Utah; Latter-day Saint University in Salt Lake City; and BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY in Provo, Utah. By the 1920s the Church had closed most of its academies or transferred them to the state. Starting in 1912 released-time SEMINARIES provided religious instruction for high school students. In 1926 the first INSTITUTE OF RELIGION for college students opened adjacent to the University of Idaho (see CHURCH EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM).

Correlation efforts also extended to the work of priesthood, including missionary work, and to auxiliaries. A Priesthood Committee on Outlines Construction on the Gardo house began under the direction of Brigham Young and was completed during John Taylor's administration. The Gardo house was the official Salt Lake residence of President John Taylor, and it was used by President Wilford Woodruff as a Church office. Begun under direction of Brigham Young for one of his wives, it was eventually purchased from the Church by the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco. It was razed in 1921. Photographer: Albert Wilkes. Courtesy Utah State Historical Society.

began publishing lesson materials for each priesthood quorum during a priesthood revitalization movement (1908–1922). Church leaders also grouped deacons, teachers, and priests by age and defined their duties more fully; instituted weekly ward priesthood meetings, conducted by the bishops; and improved ward (formerly “block”) teaching. After 1923 members of the Quorum of the Twelve directly supervised Melchizedek Priesthood work while the Presiding Bishopric supervised the Aaronic Priesthood, and in 1928 the Church published its first Melchizedek Priesthood handbook. A Priesthood-Auxiliary Movement, in 1928–1937, made Sunday School the instructional arm and YMMIA the activity arm of priesthood. This plan defined auxiliaries as aids to the priesthood and made the adult Gospel Doctrine class in Sunday School an integral part of adults' Sunday activity. Junior Sunday School for children became part of the Sunday School program Churchwide in 1934.

The Presiding Bishopric began providing aggressive leadership to Aaronic Priesthood work and to the YMMIA in 1938, and shortly thereafter they were given supervision of the young women. They provided counsel to bishops and stake presidents on Aaronic Priesthood, buildings, records and reports, and ward teaching through a weekly bulletin, Progress of the Church.

Beginning in 1925 a mission home in Salt Lake City provided training for new full-time missionaries. During the 1920s radio and motion pictures first helped missionaries convey the LDS message. Stake missionary work (part-time proselytizing by local members), started locally by 1915, was supervised by the First Council of Seventy after 1936. In 1937 the first missionary handbook was published, and in 1952 missionaries began using A Systematic Program for Teaching the Gospel, the Church's first official proselytizing outline. In 1954 a Missionary Committee, under General Authorities, began overseeing missionary appointments, the mission home in Salt Lake City, and publicity and literature. A Language Training Mission for full-time missionaries called to foreign lands opened in 1961 at Provo, Utah, and in 1978 it was expanded to become a MISSIONARY TRAINING CENTER for most new missionaries. Eventually Mission Training Centers were established in other countries; collectively these provide intensive training in dozens of languages.

In 1936, to ease hardships caused by the Great Depression, the First Presidency introduced the Church Security Program. Renamed the Welfare Program in 1938, it established through existing priesthood channels a network of farms, canneries, and factories that sent food, clothing, furniture, and household goods to BISHOP'S STOREHOUSES to assist the needy and, later, disaster victims. Soon after World War I, the Relief Society developed a SOCIAL SERVICES department to help families. This was gradually expanded to provide professional assistance, available through priesthood leaders, in such matters as counseling, therapy, and adoptive services. Eventually Social Services joined health services, employment bureaus, and other guidance programs as part of WELFARE SERVICES.

To meet the needs of LDS servicemen far from home wards and stakes, the Church responded with servicemen's groups on military bases, LDS chaplains, servicemen's coordinators, a Military Relations Committee, servicemen's conferences, seminars to prepare young men for the service, and an English-speaking servicemen's stake in West Germany (see MILITARY AND THE CHURCH). NATIVE AMERICANS also received renewed administrative attention. An Indian mission was formed in 1936 in the American Southwest, a general-level Indian Committee in the late 1940s, and the INDIAN STUDENT PLACEMENT SERVICES beginning in 1947.

CHALLENGES OF GROWTH AND INTERNATIONALIZATION. Between 1960 and 1990, Church membership more than quadrupled, with especially rapid growth outside the United States. Many organizational developments during these decades were designed to streamline operations, enhance communication and leadership training, and focus resources on the needs of Church members far from headquarters.

First Presidency (1901–1910). Left to right: President Joseph F. Smith, second counselor Anthon H. Lund, first counselor John R. Winder. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

The Church Administration Building, at 47 East South Temple Street, Salt Lake City, completed in 1917, serves as the main office building for the Church President, his counselors, the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, and other General Authorities.

By the 1960s three kinds of organizations were operating within the Church: (1) an ecclesiastical system under a priesthood chain of command; (2) auxiliaries, each with its own general officers, manuals, conferences, and publication; and (3) professional services and departments for education, social work, legal affairs, building, communications, accounting, etc. Early in the 1960s, efforts began to correlate these organizations. A Correlation Committee consolidated and simplified Church curriculum, publications, meetings, and activities. Further elements of the correlation program, implemented in 1964, grouped priesthood responsibilities into four categories: missionary, genealogy, welfare, and home teaching. Ward teaching became HOME TEACHING, giving the priesthood quorums new responsibility for carrying Church programs to LDS families. Wards developed PRIESTHOOD EXECUTIVE COMMITTEES and WARD COUNCILS to coordinate functions and reach out to individuals. In 1965 FAMILY HOME EVENING was established Churchwide and, in 1970, Monday nights were set aside for families; special manuals provided suggestions for gospel-oriented family activities.

Beginning in 1965 all messages from general Church agencies to wards and stakes were funneled into the PRIESTHOOD BULLETIN. Regional publications merged in 1967 into a unified INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINE, published in several languages. In 1971 Church magazines in the United States and Great Britain were restructured with the publication of the ENSIGN for adults, the NEW ERA for teens, and the FRIEND for children. By 1970 the Church had implemented a worldwide translation and distribution organization with publishing and DISTRIBUTION CENTERS in European countries, the Americas, and the Pacific Rim.

Members of the First Council of the Seventy were ordained high priests in 1961 in order to better assist the Twelve in overseeing the growing number of wards and stakes. REGIONAL REPRESENTATIVES and Mission Representatives of the Twelve were called in 1967 and 1972, respectively (and merged in 1974). These officers played a key role in training and advising local leaders, an increasing number of whom were relatively recent converts with little administrative experience.

Spencer W. KIMBALL's presidency (1973–1985) saw important administrative changes, often in the direction of regionalizing responsibilities. Several functions previously reserved for General Authorities were delegated to stake presidents. In 1975 the First Quorum of the Seventy was reinstated as a body of General Authorities; a decade later the office of Seventy became exclusively a General Authority position. Regional Representatives received limited line authority to supervise stake work (1976). In 1978 the Twelve became more directly involved in such ecclesiastical matters as curriculum, activity programs, and Scouting; the Presiding Bishopric retained responsibility for temporal programs but no longer for the youth. To enhance general Church supervision of local operations throughout the world and at the same time facilitate regionalization, in 1984 an AREA PRESIDENCY (a president and two counselors, all of the Seventy) was organized for each of several major geographic areas. As the Church expands, boundaries are redrawn, and the number and importance of area presidencies increase.

Church programs have also been redesigned to meet the needs of an increasingly international membership. During the 1960s a labor missionary program (modeled after one that earlier constructed a college and a temple in New Zealand, and numerous chapels, especially in the South Pacific) helped the Church build meetinghouses in all parts of the world (see BUILDING PROGRAM). In the mid-1970s the Church divested itself of hospitals that benefited primarily residents of the intermountain West and focused increased attention on the construction of chapels and temples worldwide—this time not by labor missionaries but by professional builders. A consolidated Sunday three-hour meeting schedule for priesthood, SACRAMENT MEETING, and auxiliary meetings was introduced in the United States and Canada in 1980 and later worldwide. By the 1980s a SATELLITE COMMUNICATIONS NETWORK linked headquarters with many local stakes; that, and the widespread use of videotapes, made general conferences and communications from Church headquarters much more accessible. By 1990 much of the training of local leaders had been assumed by area presidencies and regional representatives.

The Quorum of the Twelve Apostles (1953): Front (left to right): Joseph Fielding Smith, Harold B. Lee, Speneer W. Kimball, Ezra Taft Benson, Mark E. Petersen, Matthew Cowley. Back (left to right): Henry D. Moyle, Delbert L. Stapley, Marion G. Romney, LeGrand Richards, Adam S. Bennion, Richard L. Evans. The first four became Presidents of the Church in succession (1970–).

In the 1980s Church financing became increasingly centralized, relieving local units of a major burden. Beginning in 1982 ward and stake buildings were funded fully from general Church funds (from tithes). In 1990 general funds also became the source for financing all local operations in the United States and Canada (see FINANCES OF THE CHURCH).

Though the basic administrative officers date from the founding generation, the challenges faced and the way the Church organizes itself to meet those challenges have changed dramatically. Such changes will continue. As President John Taylor said in 1886, the priesthood must not be fettered by “cast iron rules,” for it is “a living, intelligent principle, and must necessarily have freedom to act” as circumstances require (First Council of the Seventy, Minutes, Dec. 15, 1886, Church Archives).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B., and Glen M. Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City, 1976.
- Cowan, Richard O. The Church in the Twentieth Century. Salt Lake City, 1985.

Hartley, William G. "The Priesthood Reform Movement, 1908–1922." BYU Studies 13 (Winter 1973):137–56.

———. "The Priesthood Reorganization of 1877: Brigham Young's Last Achievement." BYU Studies 20 (Fall 1979):3–36.

Quinn, D. Michael. "The Evolution of the Presiding Quorums of the LDS Church." Journal of Mormon History 1 (1974):21–38.

Widtsoe, John A. Priesthood and Church Government. Salt Lake City, 1954.

WILLIAM G. HARTLEY

CONTEMPORARY ORGANIZATION

Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints believe that certain organizational principles, laws, and arrangements are divinely inspired. As evidence of this they point to callings and offices in the contemporary organization of the Church (e.g., prophet, apostle, the seventy, and evangelist or patriarch) that were also present in the early Christian church. Several early revelations, including the original articles of Church organization and government (D&C 20) and the revelation on PRIESTHOOD (D&C 107), are seen by members of the Church as sources of a divinely inspired organizational pattern. All offices and callings are filled by lay leaders, as the Church has no professional clergy. Even full-time missionaries and GENERAL AUTHORITIES are drawn from the laity (see LAY PARTICIPATION AND LEADERSHIP).

PRINCIPLES OF ORGANIZATION. Six basic principles that can be inferred from the revelations have shaped the historical and contemporary organization of the Church.

First is the guiding principle that the Church functions in the context of God's eternal plan. Latter-day Saints believe that God's work and glory is to "bring to pass the immortality and eternal life" of mankind (Moses 1:39). To further this plan, the Church pursues a complex mission that can be described as threefold: (1) proclaiming the gospel of Jesus Christ to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people; (2) perfecting the Saints by preparing them to receive the ordinances of the gospel and, by instruction and discipline, to gain exaltation; and, (3) redeeming the dead by performing vicarious ordinances in the temple for those who have lived on the earth (Kimball, p. 5). The structures, programs, and processes of the contemporary organization of the Church are designed to fulfill one or more dimensions of the Church mission.

The second principle establishes the priesthood of God as the organizing authority of the Church. Structurally, the Church follows a strict hierarchical form, and authority is exercised through priesthood KEYS, which determine who presides over the Church and who directs its affairs at each organizational level. The PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH is the only person on earth authorized to exercise all priesthood keys. But through his authority different keys are delegated to individuals when they are called and "set apart" to specific positions of priesthood leadership and responsibility.

Third is the principle of presidencies and councils (see PRESIDENCY, CONCEPT OF; PRIEST-HOOD COUNCILS). Presidents, because they hold priesthood keys and are entitled to the powers of presidency, possess the ultimate decision-making authority for their assigned stewardships. Nevertheless, all presidents are instructed to meet in presidencies and councils to hear various points of view. For example, it is the responsibility of counselors to presidents to give counsel; in Church disciplinary councils, council members may even be assigned to represent competing points of view. The same patterns are observed in the presidencies of the AUXILIARY ORGANIZATIONS, even though no priesthood keys may be involved.

Fourth is the law of COMMON CONSENT. Church leaders are selected through revelation by those in authority. Before new leaders may serve, they must receive a formal sustaining vote from the members whom they will serve or over whom they will preside. When members of the Church sustain leaders, they commit themselves to support these leaders in fulfilling their various stewardships.

Fifth is the principle of orderly administration. The organization of the Church follows prescribed policies and procedures that in the contemporary Church are defined in the GENERAL HANDBOOK OF INSTRUCTIONS, the Melchizedek Priesthood Handbook, and other handbooks and manuals for specific programs. An order or pattern is indicated for such procedures as ordinations, ordinances, and blessings; conducting meetings; extending callings and releases to members in various callings in the Church; keeping records and reports; controlling finances; and exercising Church discipline (see DISCIPLINARY PROCEDURES).

Sixth, the contemporary organization of the Church continues to change in response to the demands of rapid international growth. New auxiliary organizations and new levels of geographic representation (e.g., REGION and AREA) have been added since the original revelations were received. Nevertheless, the influence of the first five organizing principles can still be seen at every organizational level, in both the ecclesiastical order and the administrative support system of the Church. In this respect, the contemporary organization of the Church is a product of both constancy and change.

Most people experience the organization of the LDS Church principally at the local level, where congregations are organized into WARDS. Although the local ward organization meets most of the religious needs of the members within its boundaries, many specialized services are provided at a higher level. In addition, ward officers are in continuing contact with a hierarchy of priesthood leaders linking them directly to the central authorities in Salt Lake City. Wards are organized into STAKES, stakes into regions, and regions into areas, which constitute the major international divisions of the Church organization. The present article will describe the organization beginning with the most general level and ending with the local wards.

First Presidency (1963–1965). Left to right: First counselor Hugh B. Brown, President David O. McKay, and second counselor N. Eldon Tanner.

A body of priesthood leaders called the General Authorities heads the organization of the Church. They are full-time ecclesiastical leaders drawn from the laity, and they receive modest living allowances from returns on investments made by the Church, not from the tithes and offerings paid by members of the Church. The General Authorities consist of the FIRST PRESIDENCY of the Church, the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES or Council of the Twelve, the quorums of the SEVENTY, and the PRESIDING BISHOPRIC.

These General Authorities preside over the entire ecclesiastical organization of the Church, from the central headquarters in Salt Lake City, and its area offices in major cities in different parts of the world. They also manage the departments of the central office, which are composed largely of full-time employees who serve the administrative needs of the Church from offices in Salt Lake City and other locations as needed. This administrative support system functions in cooperation with the normal ecclesiastical channels, maintaining clear and direct lines of authority and responsibility between local and general officers of the Church.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY. The First Presidency is the highest council of the Church, and is composed of the President of the Church and usually two counselors. The First Presidency performs the central and authoritative role of receiving revelation and establishing policies and procedures for the Church. When the President dies, the senior apostle (i.e., the member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles with the longest tenure) becomes President of the Church, and he chooses his counselors usually from among the other apostles, without regard to seniority. A new apostle is then chosen to fill the complement of twelve.

Since the First Presidency is a policymaking body, relatively few organizations and departments of the Church administrative support system report directly to it. For example, the various units of the CHURCH EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM (CES), including INSTITUTES and SEMINARIES, report through a Board of Education. Brigham Young University, BYU–Hawaii, Ricks College, the LDS Business College, and several small colleges and schools located outside the United States also report through their boards of trustees.

The Church Auditing Department, the Budget Office, and the Personnel Department report directly to the First Presidency or its committees, as do the advisers to the MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR and the MORMON YOUTH SYMPHONY AND CHORUS. Although not a part of the Church administrative system, TEMPLE PRESIDENTS likewise report directly to the First Presidency.

THE COUNCIL OF THE TWELVE. The Council, or Quorum, of the Twelve Apostles is a quorum “equal in authority and power” to the First Presidency, meaning that when the First Presidency is dissolved (which occurs upon the death of the President of the Church) the Council of the Twelve exercises all of the power and authority previously reserved to the First Presidency until a new First Presidency is organized (D&C 107:23–24). The Council of the Twelve is presently organized into four executive groups—the Correlation Executive Committee composed of the Council of the Twelve’s three most senior apostles; the Missionary Executive Council; the Priesthood Executive Council; and the Temple and Family History Executive Council.

The Correlation Executive Council reviews the work of the three other councils. It also directs the Correlation Department, which evaluates manuals and other materials disseminated to the membership of the Church and conducts research for the General Authorities (see CORRELATION). The Evaluation Division of the Correlation Department includes lay-member committees responsible for reviewing all Church materials, research, and the translation of materials.

The Missionary Executive Council directs the work of the Missionary Department of the Church, which provides support to a worldwide proselytizing effort. It is made up of several major sections, including the Proselyting Resource Division; several MISSIONARY TRAINING CENTERS; the Missionary Operations Division, for handling day-to-day missionary activities; and the Media Division.

The Priesthood Executive Council directs the Priesthood Department and the Curriculum Department of the Church (see CURRICULUM). The Priesthood Department supervises the activities of the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD and the auxiliaries of the Church. Among these auxiliary organizations are the PRIMARY (for young children), the YOUNG MEN and YOUNG WOMEN (for youth ages twelve to eighteen), the RELIEF SOCIETY (for adult women), and the SUNDAY SCHOOL. The members of the general presidencies of the Relief Society, Young Women, and Primary are women who are called to serve on a part-time basis, while members of the general presidencies of the Young Men and Sunday School are members of the quorums of the Seventy. The principal role of the general presidencies of the auxiliaries is to train and serve the leaders and members of their respective organizations in the stakes and wards of the Church. The Curriculum Department is responsible for planning, developing, and producing printed, audio, and audiovisual materials for the Church. It includes the Curriculum Planning and Development Division, the Audiovisual Planning and Development Division, the Publications Coordination Division, the Scriptures Coordination Division, and the Church Magazines Division.

The Temple and Family History Executive Council directs the Temple Department, the Family History Department, and the Historical Department of the Church. The Temple Department supervises the operation of the Church's temples throughout the world. The major divisions of the Temple Department are the Recording and Ordinance Procedures Division, the Ordinance Recording Systems Division, and the Audiovisual Services Division. The Family History Department manages the genealogical research done by members of the Church all over the world and assists members in researching their ancestors (see FAMILY HISTORY, GENEALOGY; GENEALOGY). It engages in the acquisition and storage of genealogical records, manages the worldwide system of genealogical libraries, and supervises the preparation of individual names for temple ordinance work. The Historical Department acquires, organizes, preserves, and oversees the use of materials of enduring value to the Church. The department includes the Archives Division, the Library Division (for historical research), and the Museum Division.

Members of the Missionary, Priesthood, and Temple and Family History executive councils also have "first contact" assignments in various areas of the Church. This means that these members of the Council of the Twelve work with specific area presidencies and are ultimately responsible for all the work of the Church in their assigned areas.

THE QUORUMS OF THE SEVENTY. Members of the First Quorum of the Seventy are called to serve usually until they reach seventy years of age, while members of the Second Quorum of the Seventy are normally called to serve for five years. Members of the quorums of the Seventy serve under the direction of the Presidency of the Seventy. The seven presidents of the Seventy presently serve as Executive Directors of, respectively, the Correlation, Missionary, Priesthood (two Executive Directors assigned), Curriculum, Temple, and Family History departments of the Church. Members of the quorums of the Seventy are assigned to serve in area presidencies throughout the world. Area presidencies oversee both the local units and the missions of the Church. Each mission is presided over by a MISSION PRESIDENT, who oversees the proselytizing activities of approximately two hundred missionaries.

Those members of the quorums of the Seventy assigned to the areas of North America work at the general headquarters of the Church in Salt Lake City. They also receive assignments as assistant executive directors over the departments of the Church or as members of general presidencies of the Young Men and Sunday School organizations of the Church.

THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC. The Presiding Bishopric is made up of three General Authorities—the Presiding Bishop and two counselors—responsible for many of the temporal affairs of the Church. They report directly to the First Presidency of the Church and oversee the WELFARE SERVICES, Physical Facilities, Materials Management, Information Systems, Finance and Records, Investments, LDS FOUNDATION, and Security departments of the Church. The members of the Presiding Bishopric also support directors for temporal affairs assigned to each of the areas of the Church, who oversee all the temporal affairs of the Church in their assigned areas.

The Welfare Services Department is charged with helping members of the Church to care for themselves and for the poor and needy. The department consists of the Employment Services Division, DESERET INDUSTRIES (organized for the employment and rehabilitation of disadvantaged members of the Church), and the Production/Distribution Division (responsible for the production, processing, and distribution of sustenance to temporarily disadvantaged Church members).

The Physical Facilities Department provides, maintains, and manages Church buildings and sites in the United States and Canada, and provides functional support for Church-owned physical facilities throughout the world. The department is divided into the Architecture and Engineering Division, the Headquarters Facilities Division, the Real Estate Division, and the Temple and Special Projects Division.

The Materials Management Department provides Church members and the local units of the Church with equipment, functional services, supplies, sacred clothing, and published materials.

The divisions of this department include Printing Services, Beehive Clothing (a production facility for articles of sacred clothing), the Purchasing Division, the Translation Division, the Vehicle Fleet Division, and the Food Services Division.

The Information Systems Department provides information services to the administrative departments and the areas, regions, stakes, and wards of the Church. The department is composed of the Client Services Division, the Operations Services Division (Data Center), and the Applications Services Division.

The Finance and Records Department protects the assets and vital administrative records of the Church. It is organized into the Treasury Services, Controller, Tax Administration, Risk Management, and Membership and Statistical Records divisions.

The Investments Department is responsible to the Presiding Bishopric for investment securities and investment properties of the Church and is organized into separate divisions to perform these responsibilities (see BUSINESS: CHURCH PARTICIPATION IN).

The purpose of the LDS Foundation is to encourage and facilitate charitable giving to the Church and its programs. The LDS Foundation consists of the Donor Services, Donor Services Support, and Administrative Services divisions.

Finally, the Security Department is charged with providing security for properties at Church headquarters and other locations and personal protection as determined by the First Presidency. The department is organized into divisions responsible for each activity.

THE LOCAL UNITS OF THE CHURCH. The General Authorities oversee the geographical areas of the Church and normally become involved in local Church affairs through regional representatives. Regional representatives, like stake and ward leaders, serve on a part-time basis. All are lay members, and receive no financial compensation from the Church for their services. Regional representatives perform an advisory and training role. Their principal responsibility is to train local Church leaders in their assigned regions, as directed by the Council of the Twelve through the area presidencies.

The local units of the Church are stakes and wards. Stakes are centers of Church activity. The size of a stake may range from 2,000 to 7,000 members, and each stake provides its members with the full range of programs and services of the Church. Each stake is presided over by a STAKE PRESIDENT and two counselors, assisted by a HIGH COUNCIL of twelve or more men. The stake presidency and high council form the Stake Priesthood Executive Committee, which directs all stake activities. The Stake Priesthood Executive Committee is usually divided into the Stake Melchizedek Priesthood Committee and the Stake Aaronic Priesthood Committee. The Stake Melchizedek Priesthood Committee, under the direction of the stake president (chairman) and a counselor in the stake presidency (vice-chairman), supervises Melchizedek Priesthood quorums and trains quorum and group leaders. The Stake Aaronic Priesthood Committee, chaired by the other counselor in the stake presidency, meets to correlate and supervise stake and multiward Aaronic Priesthood programs. Finally, the Stake Council, formed of the members of the Stake Priesthood Executive Committee and the presidents of the stake auxiliaries, meets regularly to coordinate the planning of stake programs and activities.

Wards are the basic ecclesiastical unit of the Church. They normally have between 200 and 800 members and are presided over by a BISHOP and two counselors. The operation of substantially all the programs of the Church takes place in wards. Moreover, all Aaronic Priesthood quorums are ward quorums, in contrast to Melchizedek Priesthood quorums, which are primarily supervised by stakes. The organization of wards resembles the organization of stakes, with the BISHOPRIC serving as the presidency of the ward and the Ward Priesthood Executive Committee and the WARD COUNCIL serving as the major councils. Ward members meet together frequently for spiritual and social purposes. According to President Harold B. Lee, "Perhaps the most important of all the work done in the Church is done in the wards." In areas where there is a smaller Church membership, members are organized into local BRANCHES and DISTRICTS under the direction of missions, until there is sufficient membership strength to organize them as self-operating wards and stakes.

The contemporary organization of the Church is unique in its complexity and its use of lay members, though experience indicates that many details of that organization are necessarily subject to change. It is the intent of the Church to provide multiple opportunities for its members to serve in formal organizational roles and to perform Christian service, such as visiting the sick, caring for the poor, and serving as missionaries. Accordingly, a ward of 400 members may involve as many as 250 of those members in a variety of ward and stake positions. Members view their positions in the Church as "callings." Those who are in positions of Church authority seek inspiration from God in determining which member should receive a particular calling and then extend the call accordingly. Soon thereafter, the member is sustained by the body of membership that he or she serves, and is then set apart to the position by the presiding authority. Members of the Church expect to serve in a variety of positions throughout their lives. Although some positions are seen to carry greater status—roughly correlated with the ecclesiastical hierarchy—there is no prescribed sequence of Church positions. For example, a man might serve as a stake president and, upon his release, be called as a Sunday School teacher. Members accept such changes as inspired and as new opportunities to serve.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. "Instructions to Bishops." Salt Lake City, Dec. 13, 1967.
- Coleman, Neil K. "A Study of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints as an Administrative System, Its Structure and Maintenance." Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1967.
- Kimball, Spencer W. "A Report of My Stewardship." Ensign 11 (May 1981):5–7.

LEE TOM PERRY
PAUL M. BONS
ALAN L. WILKINS

ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH, 1830

On Tuesday, April 6, 1830, under the direction of the Prophet Joseph SMITH, a group of friends assembled in Peter Whitmer, Sr.'s log farmhouse to organize the Church, later named The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (see NAME OF THE CHURCH). Whitmer, a German immigrant from Pennsylvania, had come to Fayette, New York, in the Seneca Lake region in 1809. Joseph and Emma SMITH and Oliver COWDERY had lived and worked in the Whitmer farmhouse in 1829 while they completed the translation of the Book of Mormon.

The Organization of the Church—April 6, 1830, by Robert E. Barrett (1989, 36" × 44"). As instructed by the Lord, Joseph Smith presided over the organization of the Church on April 6, 1830. Six men participated in the organization. About fifty believers and friends were present. Courtesy Robert E. Barrett.

Prior to this date, Joseph Smith and his small but growing group of believers had held meetings regularly in Fayette, Manchester, and Colesville, New York, but April 6 was the day given them by revelation to organize formally as a church, in compliance with laws regulating the creation of new churches in New York State. It appears that the legal requirements were checked and steps taken to comply with New York law prior to the organization. The law required notice on two successive sabbaths, nomination and election of three to nine trustees, and nomination of two members to preside at the election (Carmack, p. 16). These steps assured formal status to the fledgling Church, validating property and ecclesiastical actions in the eyes of the state. Joseph Smith's official history reports his conclusion that the organizers held the meeting agreeable to the laws of the country (see JOSEPH SMITH—HISTORY). There is no record of any challenge to the action, and thereafter the Church conducted both religious rites and business transactions on a regular basis.

The organizational meeting commenced with prayer. The small congregation, made up of about fifty men and women, unanimously voted approval to organize a new church and elected Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, Hyrum SMITH, Peter Whitmer, Jr., Samuel H. Smith, and David WHITMER as trustees. They also unanimously formal organizational roles and to perform Christian service, such as visiting the sick, caring for the poor, and serving as missionaries. Accordingly, a ward of 400 members may involve as many as 250 of those members in a variety of ward and stake positions. Members view their positions in the Church as "callings." Those who are in positions of Church authority seek inspiration from God in determining which member should receive a particular calling and then extend the call accordingly. Soon thereafter, the member is sustained by the body of membership that he or she serves, and is then set apart to the position by the presiding authority. Members of the Church expect to serve in a variety of positions throughout their lives. Although some positions are seen to carry greater status—roughly correlated with the ecclesiastical hierarchy—there is no prescribed sequence of Church positions. For example, a man might serve as a stake president and, upon his release, be called as a Sunday School teacher. Members accept such changes as inspired and as new opportunities to serve.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. "Instructions to Bishops." Salt Lake City, Dec. 13, 1967.
- Coleman, Neil K. "A Study of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints as an Administrative System, Its Structure and Maintenance." Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1967.
- Kimball, Spencer W. "A Report of My Stewardship." Ensign 11 (May 1981):5–7.

LEE TOM PERRY
PAUL M. BONS
ALAN L. WILKINS

ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH, 1830

On Tuesday, April 6, 1830, under the direction of the Prophet Joseph SMITH, a group of friends assembled in Peter Whitmer, Sr.'s log farmhouse to organize the Church, later named The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (see NAME OF THE CHURCH). Whitmer, a German immigrant from Pennsylvania, had come to Fayette, New York, in the Seneca Lake region in 1809. Joseph and Emma SMITH and Oliver COWDERY had lived and worked in the Whitmer farmhouse in 1829 while they completed the translation of the Book of Mormon.

The Organization of the Church—April 6, 1830, by Robert E. Barrett (1989, 36" × 44"). As instructed by the Lord, Joseph Smith presided over the organization of the Church on April 6, 1830. Six men participated in the organization. About fifty believers and friends were present. Courtesy Robert E. Barrett.

Prior to this date, Joseph Smith and his small but growing group of believers had held meetings regularly in Fayette, Manchester, and Colesville, New York, but April 6 was the day given them by revelation to organize formally as a church, in compliance with laws regulating the creation of new churches in New York State. It appears that the legal requirements were checked and steps taken to comply with New York law prior to the organization. The law required notice on two successive sabbaths, nomination and election of three to nine trustees, and nomination of two members to preside at the election (Carmack, p. 16). These steps assured formal status to the fledgling Church, validating property and ecclesiastical actions in the eyes of the state. Joseph Smith's official history reports his conclusion that the organizers held the meeting agreeable to the laws of the country (see JOSEPH SMITH—HISTORY). There is no record of any challenge to the action, and thereafter the Church conducted both religious rites and business transactions on a regular basis.

The organizational meeting commenced with prayer. The small congregation, made up of about fifty men and women, unanimously voted approval to organize a new church and elected Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, Hyrum SMITH, Peter Whitmer, Jr., Samuel H. Smith, and David WHITMER as trustees. They also unanimously elected Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery as teachers and first and second elders of the newly organized Church of Christ. Smith ordained Cowdery as an elder of the Church, and in turn Cowdery ordained Smith, even though they had previously ordained each other to the priesthood office of ELDER (see MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION). The second ordination signified that the two elders were empowered to act in the new Church. They blessed and shared the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper with those present in honor of the special occasion, bestowed the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST on each individual member present by the LAYING ON OF HANDS, and confirmed each of those previously baptized as members. Smith and Cowdery called and ordained men to different offices of the PRIESTHOOD. Those present at the meeting enjoyed an unusual outpouring of the Spirit of the Lord. After the spiritual feast, they dismissed the formal meeting. Having authority bestowed upon them, the newly appointed Church officers baptized several persons, including Joseph SMITH, Sr., Martin HARRIS, and Orrin Porter Rockwell. On this day the Prophet Joseph Smith also received revelations to guide the Church (cf. D&C 21).

Important events such as the restoration of priesthood AUTHORITY and the translation and publishing of the Book of Mormon preceded this date, and subsequent revelations and administrative changes defined and expanded Church organization, but Latter-day Saints consider April 6, 1830, as the birthday of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard L. "The House Where the Church Was Organized." IE 73 (Apr. 1970):16–19, 21–25.
- Carmack, John K. "Fayette, the Place the Church Was Organized." Ensign 19 (Feb. 1989):15–19.
- Porter, Larry C. "A Study of the Origins of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the States of New York and Pennsylvania, 1816–1831." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1971.

JOHN K. CARMACK

ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH IN NEW TESTAMENT TIMES

Latter-day Saints "believe in the same organization that existed in the Primitive Church, namely, apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, evangelists, and so forth" (A of F 6). They believe that Jesus Christ bestowed his PRIESTHOOD on those he called and appointed to positions of responsibility in the church he organized. They believe that in the "Primitive Church" a person had to be "called of God, by prophecy, and by the laying on of hands, by those who [were] in authority, to preach the Gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof" (A of F 5, cf. John 15:16; 20:22–23; Acts 6:6; 13:1–3). The Church established by Christ provided for a general leadership composed of apostles and prophets, with each local congregation under the direction of an "overseer," a bishop. The apostles were charged to bear the good news of the GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST to all the world and to organize converts into churches or mutually supportive communities of saints.

The latter-day restoration of this administrative structure is distinctive, but shares some features retained also by Protestant and Catholic traditions. It resembles Protestantism in its attempt to return to the basic doctrines and procedures of the early Church. However, it shares a more Catholic conviction of the need for authoritative church leadership and a centralized organization. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is particularly distinctive in its belief in the leadership of living PROPHETS who guide it through REVELATION.

The LDS position is in agreement with the several allusions to Church structure in the NEW TESTAMENT. In 1 Corinthians 12:28, Paul describes the organization of the Church as "first apostles [apostoloi, "sent ones," i.e., representatives, agents], secondarily prophets." In Ephesians 2:20, the Church at Ephesus is said to be "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone." Three of the apostles—PETER, JAMES, and JOHN—are clearly a leading group (like a FIRST PRESIDENCY), and Peter seems to lead this group in initiating authoritative action and receiving revelation (Matt. 16:18; Acts 1–5; 8–10). Latter-day Saints regard Peter as the prophet or president of the Church in New Testament times.

The early church also had BISHOPS (epískopoi, "overseers, supervisors," 1 Tim. 3:1), ELDERS (presbíteroi, Acts 15:22; 16:4; 20:17, where a council of elders is grouped with the apostles), TEACHERS (didáskaloi, 1 Cor. 12:28, here men-elected Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery as teachers and first and second elders of the newly organized Church of Christ. Smith ordained Cowdery as an elder of the Church, and in turn Cowdery ordained Smith, even though they had previously ordained each other to the priesthood office of ELDER (see MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION). The second ordination signified that the two elders were empowered to act in the new Church. They blessed and shared the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper with those present in honor of the special occasion, bestowed the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST on each individual member present by the LAYING ON OF HANDS, and confirmed each of those previously baptized as members. Smith and Cowdery called and ordained men to different offices of the PRIESTHOOD. Those present at the meeting enjoyed an unusual outpouring of the Spirit of the Lord. After the spiritual feast, they dismissed the formal meeting. Having authority bestowed upon them, the newly appointed Church officers baptized several persons, including Joseph SMITH, Sr., Martin HARRIS, and Orrin Porter Rockwell. On this day the Prophet Joseph Smith also received revelations to guide the Church (cf. D&C 21).

Important events such as the restoration of priesthood AUTHORITY and the translation and publishing of the Book of Mormon preceded this date, and subsequent revelations and administrative changes defined and expanded Church organization, but Latter-day Saints consider April 6, 1830, as the birthday of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard L. "The House Where the Church Was Organized." IE 73 (Apr. 1970):16–19, 21–25.
- Carmack, John K. "Fayette, the Place the Church Was Organized." Ensign 19 (Feb. 1989):15–19.
- Porter, Larry C. "A Study of the Origins of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the States of New York and Pennsylvania, 1816–1831." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1971.

JOHN K. CARMACK

ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH IN NEW TESTAMENT TIMES

Latter-day Saints "believe in the same organization that existed in the Primitive Church, namely, apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, evangelists, and so forth" (A of F 6). They believe that Jesus Christ bestowed his PRIESTHOOD on those he called and appointed to positions of responsibility in the church he organized. They believe that in the "Primitive Church" a person had to be "called of God, by prophecy, and by the laying on of hands, by those who [were] in authority, to preach the Gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof" (A of F 5, cf. John 15:16; 20:22–23; Acts 6:6; 13:1–3). The Church established by Christ provided for a general leadership composed of apostles and prophets, with each local congregation under the direction of an "overseer," a bishop. The apostles were charged to bear the good news of the GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST to all the world and to organize converts into churches or mutually supportive communities of saints.

The latter-day restoration of this administrative structure is distinctive, but shares some features retained also by Protestant and Catholic traditions. It resembles Protestantism in its attempt to return to the basic doctrines and procedures of the early Church. However, it shares a more Catholic conviction of the need for authoritative church leadership and a centralized organization. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is particularly distinctive in its belief in the leadership of living PROPHETS who guide it through REVELATION.

The LDS position is in agreement with the several allusions to Church structure in the NEW TESTAMENT. In 1 Corinthians 12:28, Paul describes the organization of the Church as "first apostles [apostoloi, "sent ones," i.e., representatives, agents], secondarily prophets." In Ephesians 2:20, the Church at Ephesus is said to be "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone." Three of the apostles—PETER, JAMES, and JOHN—are clearly a leading group (like a FIRST PRESIDENCY), and Peter seems to lead this group in initiating authoritative action and receiving revelation (Matt. 16:18; Acts 1–5; 8–10). Latter-day Saints regard Peter as the prophet or president of the Church in New Testament times.

The early church also had BISHOPS (epískopoi, "overseers, supervisors," 1 Tim. 3:1), ELDERS (presbúteroi, Acts 15:22; 16:4; 20:17, where a council of elders is grouped with the apostles), TEACHERS (didáskaloi, 1 Cor. 12:28, here mentioned just after the apostles and prophets; Eph. 4:11), DEACONS (diákonoi, "servants, helpers," Philip 1:1), and a group of SEVENTY (Luke 10:1) who gave missionary service. All of these offices have LDS equivalents.

However, Latter-day Saints do not claim an exact, one-to-one correspondence between the primitive Church and the restored Church. Continuing revelation provides for continual adaptations of the basic ecclesiastical pattern. For instance, in the early New Testament Church the three leading apostles were part of the council of the twelve, while in the latter-day Church they generally are a separate quorum. In the early Church, elders appear to have been older members of a congregation, while in the LDS Church they are often, or usually, younger men. Deacons and teachers were adults in the primitive Church (1 Tim. 3:12) and in the early LDS Church. In the twentieth-century Church, however, young men ordinarily receive these priesthood offices at the ages of twelve and fourteen. The LDS Church has no officer entitled EVANGELIST (euaggelistēs, "good-message announcer") or pastor (poimēn, "shepherd," Eph. 4:11–14); but Joseph Smith taught that the evangelist was a PATRIARCH, an official who gives revelatory "fatherly" blessings (see TPJS, p. 151); and a pastor, although not an ordained officer in the priesthood, could well be any leader who serves as a "shepherd of the flock" (MD, p. 557).

[See also Apostasy.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Dahl, Larry E., and Charles D. Tate, Jr., eds. The Lectures on Faith in Historical Perspective. Provo, Utah, 1990.

See Bruce R. McConkie, Mormon Doctrine (Salt Lake City, 1966), for articles on separate offices in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Thomas F. O'Dea, The Mormons, pp. 174–86 (Chicago, 1957); James Talmage, The Articles of Faith, chap. 11, pp. 198–216 (Salt Lake City, 1971); and D. Michael Quinn, "From Sacred Grove to Sacred Power Structure," Dialogue 17.2 (1984):9–34.

See The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible (Nashville, Tenn., 1962), for articles on separate offices from a non-Mormon perspective; F. Agnew, "The Origin of the New Testament Apostle Concept: A Review of Research," Journal of Biblical Literature 105 (1986):75–96; and A. Lemaire, "The Ministries in the New Testament: Recent Research," Biblical Theology Bulletin 3 (1973):133–66.

TODD COMPTON

ORGAN TRANSPLANTS AND DONATIONS

Because the transplanting of body parts raises some concerns regarding ethics and moral issues, the Church has issued the following statement: "Whether an individual chooses to will his own bodily organs or authorizes the transplant of organs from a deceased family member is a decision for the individual or the deceased member's family. The decision to receive a donated organ should be made with competent medical counsel and confirmation through prayer" (General Handbook of Instructions, 11–6).

The transplanting of certain organs is now being done with increasing success. For example, transplantation of the cornea has been done for many years, and now a better than 90 percent chance of vision restoration is expected in cases of blindness due to corneal disease. As successful replacements increasingly occur, more people become aware of the various diseases and disorders that can be treated and cured by transplantation, and more people want to become recipients. According to the American Council on Transplantation, more than 50,000 people benefited from organ transplants in 1989. And according to the Intermountain Transplant Program, "more than 100,000 could benefit if enough organs and tissue were available."

Organs and tissue that can now be transplanted include the cornea, kidney, pancreas, heart, liver, skin, bone, veins, tendons, lung, bone marrow, and blood. Heart and liver donations are immediate matters of life and death. Donated kidneys replace thrice-weekly dialysis treatments. A donated pancreas may "cure" someone's diabetes. Donated eyes provide not only corneas for sight-restoring corneal transplants but also vital eye tissue for other surgical procedures and for research into blinding eye disorders.

According to organizations handling organs for transplantation, only those who meet strict criteria are considered for donors. These criteria include careful testing for infectious diseases, including AIDS. Because of these procedures and advances in transplant techniques, donors and recipients do not face the risks faced a few years ago.

In some instances, as where a kidney is needed, a close relative can serve as a donor. (A healthy person can continue a normal life with one tioned just after the apostles and prophets; Eph. 4:11), DEACONS (diákonoi, "servants, helpers," Philip 1:1), and a group of SEVENTY (Luke 10:1) who gave missionary service. All of these offices have LDS equivalents.

However, Latter-day Saints do not claim an exact, one-to-one correspondence between the primitive Church and the restored Church. Continuing revelation provides for continual adaptations of the basic ecclesiastical pattern. For instance, in the early New Testament Church the three leading apostles were part of the council of the twelve, while in the latter-day Church they generally are a separate quorum. In the early Church, elders appear to have been older members of a congregation, while in the LDS Church they are often, or usually, younger men. Deacons and teachers were adults in the primitive Church (1 Tim. 3:12) and in the early LDS Church. In the twentieth-century Church, however, young men ordinarily receive these priesthood offices at the ages of twelve and fourteen. The LDS Church has no officer entitled EVANGELIST (euaggelistēs, "good-message announcer") or pastor (poimēn, "shepherd," Eph. 4:11–14); but Joseph Smith taught that the evangelist was a PATRIARCH, an official who gives revelatory "fatherly" blessings (see TPJS, p. 151); and a pastor, although not an ordained officer in the priesthood, could well be any leader who serves as a "shepherd of the flock" (MD, p. 557).

[See also Apostasy.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Dahl, Larry E., and Charles D. Tate, Jr., eds. The Lectures on Faith in Historical Perspective. Provo, Utah, 1990.

See Bruce R. McConkie, Mormon Doctrine (Salt Lake City, 1966), for articles on separate offices in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Thomas F. O'Dea, The Mormons, pp. 174–86 (Chicago, 1957); James Talmage, The Articles of Faith, chap. 11, pp. 198–216 (Salt Lake City, 1971); and D. Michael Quinn, "From Sacred Grove to Sacred Power Structure," Dialogue 17.2 (1984):9–34.

See The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible (Nashville, Tenn., 1962), for articles on separate offices from a non-Mormon perspective; F. Agnew, "The Origin of the New Testament Apostle Concept: A Review of Research," Journal of Biblical Literature 105 (1986):75–96; and A. Lemaire, "The Ministries in the New Testament: Recent Research," Biblical Theology Bulletin 3 (1973):133–66.

TODD COMPTON

ORGAN TRANSPLANTS AND DONATIONS

Because the transplanting of body parts raises some concerns regarding ethics and moral issues, the Church has issued the following statement: "Whether an individual chooses to will his own bodily organs or authorizes the transplant of organs from a deceased family member is a decision for the individual or the deceased member's family. The decision to receive a donated organ should be made with competent medical counsel and confirmation through prayer" (General Handbook of Instructions, 11–6).

The transplanting of certain organs is now being done with increasing success. For example, transplantation of the cornea has been done for many years, and now a better than 90 percent chance of vision restoration is expected in cases of blindness due to corneal disease. As successful replacements increasingly occur, more people become aware of the various diseases and disorders that can be treated and cured by transplantation, and more people want to become recipients. According to the American Council on Transplantation, more than 50,000 people benefited from organ transplants in 1989. And according to the Intermountain Transplant Program, "more than 100,000 could benefit if enough organs and tissue were available."

Organs and tissue that can now be transplanted include the cornea, kidney, pancreas, heart, liver, skin, bone, veins, tendons, lung, bone marrow, and blood. Heart and liver donations are immediate matters of life and death. Donated kidneys replace thrice-weekly dialysis treatments. A donated pancreas may "cure" someone's diabetes. Donated eyes provide not only corneas for sight-restoring corneal transplants but also vital eye tissue for other surgical procedures and for research into blinding eye disorders.

According to organizations handling organs for transplantation, only those who meet strict criteria are considered for donors. These criteria include careful testing for infectious diseases, including AIDS. Because of these procedures and advances in transplant techniques, donors and recipients do not face the risks faced a few years ago.

In some instances, as where a kidney is needed, a close relative can serve as a donor. (A healthy person can continue a normal life with one kidney.) In the case of some organs, such as the cornea of the eye, the donated organ usually comes from one who signs a statement indicating a desire to donate organs upon death. In the event of an accident or untimely death, the donor's eyes may then be used with the consent of the family.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

General Handbook of Instructions, 11-6. Salt Lake City, 1989.

WAYNE A. MINEER

---

ORIGINAL SIN

While The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints teaches that the transgression of ADAM and EVE brought death into the world and made all mortals subject to temptation, suffering, and weakness, it denies that any culpability is automatically transmitted to Adam and Eve's offspring. All mortals commit sin, but they will be punished "for their own sins, and not for Adam's transgression" (A of F 2).

IN OTHER FAITHS. The doctrine of original sin as taught traditionally states that, due to the FALL OF ADAM, infants are born tainted with actual SIN, resulting in the "privation of sanctifying grace"; this dogma "does not attribute to the children of Adam any properly so-called responsibility for the act of their father," nor is it a voluntary sin "in the strict sense of the word," yet it is a "real sin" (S. Harent, "Original Sin," in Catholic Encyclopedia, 1911 ed., Vol. 11, p. 315). All people, according to this doctrine, except the Virgin Mary and Jesus Christ, inherit an actual, existing personal guilt (see IMMACULATE CONCEPTION). A corollary of this belief is the doctrine of INFANT BAPTISM, holding that infants are to be baptized to remove this sin because those who die without baptism remain unsanctified and forever excluded from heaven and the presence of God.

The doctrine of original sin derives from an interpretation given to the writings of Paul, particularly Romans 5:12-21, by some theologians of the second and third centuries. More than any other, Augustine in the fifth century transformed Paul's teachings on the Fall into the doctrine of original sin. His views were adopted as doctrine and formally canonized by the decrees of the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century. According to this view, Adam's sin is considered "original" because it arose with the "origin" of man.

Protestantism largely accepts this doctrine. John Calvin stated: "We believe that all the posterity of Adam is in bondage to original sin, which is a hereditary evil" (R. Reed, The Gospel as Taught by Calvin [Grand Rapids, Mich., 1979], p. 33). Protestant views emphasize the inherited nature of the sin, reflecting the German word for "original sin," Erbsünde (literally "inherited sin"). Rabbinic Judaism teaches of two inclinations, one evil and one good; and some Jews consider "circumcision as a means of escaping damnation" (Samuel Cohon, Essays in Jewish Theology [Cincinnati, Ohio, 1987], p. 265).

IN LDS DOCTRINE. Latter-day Saints believe that infants inherit certain effects of the Fall, but not the responsibility for any sin as a result of Adam's or Eve's transgression. From the foundation of the world, the atonement of Jesus Christ makes amends "for the sins of those who have fallen by the transgression of Adam" (Mosiah 3:11). Therefore, baptism is not needed until children reach a state of accountability, generally at the age of eight years, for little children cannot sin and are innocent (see CHILDREN: SALVATION OF CHILDREN). They are redeemed from the beginning by the grace of Jesus Christ (D&C 29:46-47), whose atonement cleanses them of the effects of the Fall (D&C 137:10). The Prophet Mormon wrote the following words of Christ: "Little children are whole, for they are not capable of committing sin; wherefore the curse of Adam is taken from them in me, that it hath no power over them" (Moro. 8:8).

In one account in the Pearl of Great Price, Adam learned that he had been forgiven for his transgression in the Garden of Eden, and that "the Son of God hath atoned for original guilt, wherein the sins of the parents cannot be answered upon the heads of the children" (Moses 6:54). However, as a consequence of the Fall, evil is present in the world and all "children are conceived in sin, [and] so when they begin to grow up, sin conceiveth in their hearts, and they taste the bitter, that they may know to prize the good" (Moses 6:55). Begetting children in marriage is not a sin (cf. Heb. 13:4), but the propensity for sin is inherited.

No mortal person bears the burden of repenting for Adam's transgression. Nevertheless, all inherit the effects of the Fall: All leave the presence of God at birth, all are subject to physical death, kidney.) In the case of some organs, such as the cornea of the eye, the donated organ usually comes from one who signs a statement indicating a desire to donate organs upon death. In the event of an accident or untimely death, the donor's eyes may then be used with the consent of the family.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

General Handbook of Instructions, 11-6. Salt Lake City, 1989.

WAYNE A. MINEER

---

ORIGINAL SIN

While The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints teaches that the transgression of ADAM and EVE brought death into the world and made all mortals subject to temptation, suffering, and weakness, it denies that any culpability is automatically transmitted to Adam and Eve's offspring. All mortals commit sin, but they will be punished "for their own sins, and not for Adam's transgression" (A of F 2).

IN OTHER FAITHS. The doctrine of original sin as taught traditionally states that, due to the FALL OF ADAM, infants are born tainted with actual SIN, resulting in the "privation of sanctifying grace"; this dogma "does not attribute to the children of Adam any properly so-called responsibility for the act of their father," nor is it a voluntary sin "in the strict sense of the word," yet it is a "real sin" (S. Harent, "Original Sin," in Catholic Encyclopedia, 1911 ed., Vol. 11, p. 315). All people, according to this doctrine, except the Virgin Mary and Jesus Christ, inherit an actual, existing personal guilt (see IMMACULATE CONCEPTION). A corollary of this belief is the doctrine of INFANT BAPTISM, holding that infants are to be baptized to remove this sin because those who die without baptism remain unsanctified and forever excluded from heaven and the presence of God.

The doctrine of original sin derives from an interpretation given to the writings of Paul, particularly Romans 5:12-21, by some theologians of the second and third centuries. More than any other, Augustine in the fifth century transformed Paul's teachings on the Fall into the doctrine of original sin. His views were adopted as doctrine and formally canonized by the decrees of the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century. According to this view, Adam's sin is considered "original" because it arose with the "origin" of man.

Protestantism largely accepts this doctrine. John Calvin stated: "We believe that all the posterity of Adam is in bondage to original sin, which is a hereditary evil" (R. Reed, The Gospel as Taught by Calvin [Grand Rapids, Mich., 1979], p. 33). Protestant views emphasize the inherited nature of the sin, reflecting the German word for "original sin," Erbsünde (literally "inherited sin"). Rabbinic Judaism teaches of two inclinations, one evil and one good; and some Jews consider "circumcision as a means of escaping damnation" (Samuel Cohon, Essays in Jewish Theology [Cincinnati, Ohio, 1987], p. 265).

IN LDS DOCTRINE. Latter-day Saints believe that infants inherit certain effects of the Fall, but not the responsibility for any sin as a result of Adam's or Eve's transgression. From the foundation of the world, the atonement of Jesus Christ makes amends "for the sins of those who have fallen by the transgression of Adam" (Mosiah 3:11). Therefore, baptism is not needed until children reach a state of accountability, generally at the age of eight years, for little children cannot sin and are innocent (see CHILDREN: SALVATION OF CHILDREN). They are redeemed from the beginning by the grace of Jesus Christ (D&C 29:46-47), whose atonement cleanses them of the effects of the Fall (D&C 137:10). The Prophet Mormon wrote the following words of Christ: "Little children are whole, for they are not capable of committing sin; wherefore the curse of Adam is taken from them in me, that it hath no power over them" (Moro. 8:8).

In one account in the Pearl of Great Price, Adam learned that he had been forgiven for his transgression in the Garden of Eden, and that "the Son of God hath atoned for original guilt, wherein the sins of the parents cannot be answered upon the heads of the children" (Moses 6:54). However, as a consequence of the Fall, evil is present in the world and all "children are conceived in sin, [and] so when they begin to grow up, sin conceiveth in their hearts, and they taste the bitter, that they may know to prize the good" (Moses 6:55). Begetting children in marriage is not a sin (cf. Heb. 13:4), but the propensity for sin is inherited.

No mortal person bears the burden of repenting for Adam's transgression. Nevertheless, all inherit the effects of the Fall: All leave the presence of God at birth, all are subject to physical death, and all will sin in some measure. From the moment of conception, the body inherits the seed of mortality that will eventually result in death, but only as a person becomes accountable and chooses evil over good do personal sins result in further separation from God. Thus Adam was counseled: "Wherefore teach it unto your children, that all men, everywhere, must repent, or they can in nowise inherit the kingdom of God, for no unclean thing can dwell there" (Moses 5:57).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Haag, Herbert. Is Original Sin in Scripture? New York, 1969.
McConkie, Bruce R. A New Witness for the Articles of Faith, pp. 81–104. Salt Lake City, 1985.

BYRON R. MERRILL

---

ORIGIN OF MAN

The view of the "origin of man" in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints differs significantly from that in most other modern traditions. Its prime concern is to affirm that humans were created as SPIRITS by and in the image of God, which determined their form and nature long before they became earthly organisms. Questions about what biological or cultural mechanisms might have produced Homo sapiens and over what period of time that often dominate secular discussions are of limited interest for Latter-day Saints.

The clearest presentation of the Church position may be a 1909 statement by the FIRST PRESIDENCY entitled "The Origin of Man," where four essential points are made: (1) God created humans (Gen. 1:27–28); (2) God created ADAM, "the origin of the human family" and "the first man"; (3) CREATION was sequential: first spiritual, later physical; and (4) each human body displays the characteristics of the individual premortal SPIRIT that inhabits it. Other ideas included in the statement are that humanity was not "a development from the lower orders of creation" but a "fall" from a higher state of existence; that an understanding of all the details about the origin of man is not vital to one's salvation, although the matter is related to several important truths; that the subject cannot be fully clarified by human learning alone; and that only certain relevant facts are now known, to which the Church adheres.

Subsequent official statements indicate that the details of how Adam became "the first man" are considered not to have been revealed clearly enough to settle questions of process. Emphasized instead is an eternal perspective wherein the individual as an "undeveloped offspring of celestial parentage is capable, by experience through ages and aeons, of evolving into a God" (IE 28:1091).

Since the rise of Darwinism in 1860, individual Latter-day Saints, both leaders and members, have occasionally participated in public discussion about EVOLUTION, since the official position of the Church on man's origin is not definitive in all respects. Mormons have expressed a wide range of views that are reminiscent of the well-known debates among Christians. Since a large number of Latter-day Saints entered careers in science early in this century, some have attempted to reconcile scientific facts and ideas with statements from the scriptures and prophetic leaders that are emphasized in the LDS tradition. Others have argued that in this area science merely offers "theories of men" and should therefore be discounted.

Many sympathetic to science interpret certain statements in LDS scripture to mean that God used a version of evolution to prepare BODIES and environmental surroundings suitable for the premortal spirits. For example, one scriptural description of creation says, "the Gods organized the earth to bring forth . . . every thing that creepeth upon the earth after its kind" (Abr. 4:25 [emphasis added]). Certain statements of various GENERAL AUTHORITIES are also used by proponents of this idea to justify their opinions.

Other Latter-day Saints accept a more literal reading of scriptural passages that suggest to them an abrupt creation. Proponents of this view also support their positions with statements from scripture and General Authorities (see EARTH).

While the current state of revealed truth on the LDS doctrine of man's origin may permit some differences of opinion concerning the relationship of science and religion, it clearly affirms that God created man, that the FALL OF ADAM was foreknown of God and was real and significant, and that the ATONEMENT of Christ was foreordained and necessary to reverse the effects of the Fall. Perhaps because these claims embrace the main doctrinal issues relevant to the condition of man, the description of the actual creation process does not receive much attention from the general membership of the Church or from the authorities.

and all will sin in some measure. From the moment of conception, the body inherits the seed of mortality that will eventually result in death, but only as a person becomes accountable and chooses evil over good do personal sins result in further separation from God. Thus Adam was counseled: "Wherefore teach it unto your children, that all men, everywhere, must repent, or they can in nowise inherit the kingdom of God, for no unclean thing can dwell there" (Moses 5:57).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Haag, Herbert. Is Original Sin in Scripture? New York, 1969.
McConkie, Bruce R. A New Witness for the Articles of Faith, pp. 81–104. Salt Lake City, 1985.

BYRON R. MERRILL

---

ORIGIN OF MAN

The view of the "origin of man" in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints differs significantly from that in most other modern traditions. Its prime concern is to affirm that humans were created as SPIRITS by and in the image of God, which determined their form and nature long before they became earthly organisms. Questions about what biological or cultural mechanisms might have produced Homo sapiens and over what period of time that often dominate secular discussions are of limited interest for Latter-day Saints.

The clearest presentation of the Church position may be a 1909 statement by the FIRST PRESIDENCY entitled "The Origin of Man," where four essential points are made: (1) God created humans (Gen. 1:27–28); (2) God created ADAM, "the origin of the human family" and "the first man"; (3) CREATION was sequential: first spiritual, later physical; and (4) each human body displays the characteristics of the individual premortal SPIRIT that inhabits it. Other ideas included in the statement are that humanity was not "a development from the lower orders of creation" but a "fall" from a higher state of existence; that an understanding of all the details about the origin of man is not vital to one's salvation, although the matter is related to several important truths; that the subject cannot be fully clarified by human learning alone; and that only certain relevant facts are now known, to which the Church adheres.

Subsequent official statements indicate that the details of how Adam became "the first man" are considered not to have been revealed clearly enough to settle questions of process. Emphasized instead is an eternal perspective wherein the individual as an "undeveloped offspring of celestial parentage is capable, by experience through ages and aeons, of evolving into a God" (JE 28:1091).

Since the rise of Darwinism in 1860, individual Latter-day Saints, both leaders and members, have occasionally participated in public discussion about EVOLUTION, since the official position of the Church on man's origin is not definitive in all respects. Mormons have expressed a wide range of views that are reminiscent of the well-known debates among Christians. Since a large number of Latter-day Saints entered careers in science early in this century, some have attempted to reconcile scientific facts and ideas with statements from the scriptures and prophetic leaders that are emphasized in the LDS tradition. Others have argued that in this area science merely offers "theories of men" and should therefore be discounted.

Many sympathetic to science interpret certain statements in LDS scripture to mean that God used a version of evolution to prepare BODIES and environmental surroundings suitable for the premortal spirits. For example, one scriptural description of creation says, "the Gods organized the earth to bring forth . . . every thing that creepeth upon the earth after its kind" (Abr. 4:25 [emphasis added]). Certain statements of various GENERAL AUTHORITIES are also used by proponents of this idea to justify their opinions.

Other Latter-day Saints accept a more literal reading of scriptural passages that suggest to them an abrupt creation. Proponents of this view also support their positions with statements from scripture and General Authorities (see EARTH).

While the current state of revealed truth on the LDS doctrine of man's origin may permit some differences of opinion concerning the relationship of science and religion, it clearly affirms that God created man, that the FALL OF ADAM was foreknown of God and was real and significant, and that the ATONEMENT of Christ was foreordained and necessary to reverse the effects of the Fall. Perhaps because these claims embrace the main doctrinal issues relevant to the condition of man, the description of the actual creation process does not receive much attention from the general membership of the Church or from the authorities.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Jeffrey, Duane E. "Seers, Savants and Evolution: The Uncomfortable Interface." Dialogue 8, Nos. 3/4 (1973):41-75.
- "Mormon View of Evolution." IE 28 (Sept. 1925):1090-91; reprinted in MFP 5:244.
- "The Origin of Man." IE 13 (Nov. 1909):75-81; reprinted in MFP 4:199-206.
- Packer, Boyd K. "The Law and the Light." In The Book of Mormon: Jacob Through Words of Mormon, To Learn with Joy, ed. M. Nyman and C. Tate, pp. 1-31. Salt Lake City, 1990.

JOHN L. SORENSON

---

ORTHODOXY, HETERODOXY, HERESY

Concepts of orthodoxy, heterodoxy, and heresy are found in virtually all religious traditions. This is also the case among Latter-day Saints, but with important distinctions that arise from the emphasis placed on individual agency, accountability, behavior, and growth.

The traditional terms "orthodoxy," "heterodoxy," and "heresy" are used rarely by Latter-day Saints. Moreover, in words like "orthodoxy" and "heresy" the stress is on religious belief rather than on religious practice. In the determination of an individual's standing within the LDS tradition, emphasis is placed more on what a member says or does than on what he or she believes. Thus, the terms "orthodoxy," "heterodoxy," and "heresy," in a traditional sense, are less significant to Latter-day Saints.

In general, the word "orthodoxy," which derives from the Greek orthos, "straight" or "right," and doxa, "opinion" or "belief," means adhering to what is commonly accepted, customary, or traditional. The term "heterodoxy" means not being in agreement with accepted teachings or holding beliefs that go contrary to established norms. The word "heresy," from the Greek haireisis, initially was a value-free term based on the word meaning "to choose" or "to act with purposive effort." This term came to mean any school, movement, or religious system of belief that was freely chosen. By the second century A.D., however, "heresy" was used in a strictly negative sense, referring to the doctrine of those who publicly dissented from or denied any of the established teachings of the tradition to which they belonged. The dissenter was thus a "heretic."

The traditional Christian concept of "church" (ekklesiā) excluded the concept of private "choice" (haireisis). Religious groups characteristically identify certain beliefs and practices that they view as being primary or foundational. On that basis they establish criteria for determining what is deemed acceptable belief and behavior for their adherents, often appealing to an established canon of scripture, to recognized sources of authority, and to the requirements of an organized ecclesiastical structure. How these criteria are interpreted and implemented determines the extent to which deviant belief or practice is allowed or tolerated.

Instead, the Church admonishes its members to use their agency to do all they can to accept and live all the teachings and principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ (Moro. 10:32-33), knowing that they will eventually be held accountable for their choices and, for those who have lived worthily, lay claim to the promises made to them when they entered into covenants with God. Each member, at any given time, may be at any stage in this process. Each is encouraged to grow closer to the Heavenly Father and to emulate the Savior in thought and action. Members are urged to expand their knowledge of truth, grace upon grace, line upon line, and precept upon precept. Provided one continues in this effort, relying on the means of repentance that lead from baptism to eternal life, no rigid conceptual checkpoints or belief requirements are imposed to challenge a person's membership in the Church.

Distinctions arise, however, when worthiness to teach, to preach, to hold office, or to participate in temple worship comes into question. The more a person may influence others by virtue of his or her Church assignments or activities, the greater is the concern about worthiness to serve. In these instances, members are asked if they follow certain basic Church tenets (see INTERVIEWS; TEMPLE RECOMMEND). These include, among others, having faith in God the Father and in his Son Jesus Christ, believing in the fundamental concepts set forth in the ARTICLES OF FAITH, acknowledging Joseph SMITH as a prophet of God, and sustaining the current President of the Church, the GENERAL AUTHORITIES, and local Church leaders. They also are asked if they abide by certain prescribed patterns of conduct (see PRAYER; RIGHTEOUSNESS; CHASTITY; WORD OF WISDOM; TITHING; FAMILY; CALLINGS; ACTIVITY IN THE CHURCH). The goal is that each Latter-day Saint will obtain a personal

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Jeffrey, Duane E. "Seers, Savants and Evolution: The Uncomfortable Interface." Dialogue 8, Nos. 3/4 (1973):41-75.
- "Mormon View of Evolution." IE 28 (Sept. 1925):1090-91; reprinted in MFP 5:244.
- "The Origin of Man." IE 13 (Nov. 1909):75-81; reprinted in MFP 4:199-206.
- Packer, Boyd K. "The Law and the Light." In The Book of Mormon: Jacob Through Words of Mormon, To Learn with Joy, ed. M. Nyman and C. Tate, pp. 1-31. Salt Lake City, 1990.

JOHN L. SORENSON

---

ORTHODOXY, HETERODOXY, HERESY

Concepts of orthodoxy, heterodoxy, and heresy are found in virtually all religious traditions. This is also the case among Latter-day Saints, but with important distinctions that arise from the emphasis placed on individual agency, accountability, behavior, and growth.

The traditional terms "orthodoxy," "heterodoxy," and "heresy" are used rarely by Latter-day Saints. Moreover, in words like "orthodoxy" and "heresy" the stress is on religious belief rather than on religious practice. In the determination of an individual's standing within the LDS tradition, emphasis is placed more on what a member says or does than on what he or she believes. Thus, the terms "orthodoxy," "heterodoxy," and "heresy," in a traditional sense, are less significant to Latter-day Saints.

In general, the word "orthodoxy," which derives from the Greek orthos, "straight" or "right," and doxa, "opinion" or "belief," means adhering to what is commonly accepted, customary, or traditional. The term "heterodoxy" means not being in agreement with accepted teachings or holding beliefs that go contrary to established norms. The word "heresy," from the Greek hairesis, initially was a value-free term based on the word meaning "to choose" or "to act with purposive effort." This term came to mean any school, movement, or religious system of belief that was freely chosen. By the second century A.D., however, "heresy" was used in a strictly negative sense, referring to the doctrine of those who publicly dissented from or denied any of the established teachings of the tradition to which they belonged. The dissenter was thus a "heretic."

The traditional Christian concept of "church" (ekklesiā) excluded the concept of private "choice" (hairesis). Religious groups characteristically identify certain beliefs and practices that they view as being primary or foundational. On that basis they establish criteria for determining what is deemed acceptable belief and behavior for their adherents, often appealing to an established canon of scripture, to recognized sources of authority, and to the requirements of an organized ecclesiastical structure. How these criteria are interpreted and implemented determines the extent to which deviant belief or practice is allowed or tolerated.

Instead, the Church admonishes its members to use their agency to do all they can to accept and live all the teachings and principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ (Moro. 10:32-33), knowing that they will eventually be held accountable for their choices and, for those who have lived worthily, lay claim to the promises made to them when they entered into covenants with God. Each member, at any given time, may be at any stage in this process. Each is encouraged to grow closer to the Heavenly Father and to emulate the Savior in thought and action. Members are urged to expand their knowledge of truth, grace upon grace, line upon line, and precept upon precept. Provided one continues in this effort, relying on the means of repentance that lead from baptism to eternal life, no rigid conceptual checkpoints or belief requirements are imposed to challenge a person's membership in the Church.

Distinctions arise, however, when worthiness to teach, to preach, to hold office, or to participate in temple worship comes into question. The more a person may influence others by virtue of his or her Church assignments or activities, the greater is the concern about worthiness to serve. In these instances, members are asked if they follow certain basic Church tenets (see INTERVIEWS; TEMPLE RECOMMEND). These include, among others, having faith in God the Father and in his Son Jesus Christ, believing in the fundamental concepts set forth in the ARTICLES OF FAITH, acknowledging Joseph SMITH as a prophet of God, and sustaining the current President of the Church, the GENERAL AUTHORITIES, and local Church leaders. They also are asked if they abide by certain prescribed patterns of conduct (see PRAYER; RIGHTEOUSNESS; CHASTITY; WORD OF WISDOM; TITHING; FAMILY; CALLINGS; ACTIVITY IN THE CHURCH). The goal is that each Latter-day Saint will obtain a personal TESTIMONY of all gospel truths and will increasingly understand and live in accordance with those truths.

All members who live the gospel are promised the companionship of the Holy Ghost and personal revelation to help them grow in their knowledge of the Lord and to bring their lives into greater conformity with his will while they work out their "own salvation with fear and trembling" (Philip. 2:12). Thus, there will always be individual diversity within the overall unity of the Church, as each member grows in his or her chosen way in harmony with fundamental principles. Such choice and individuality are looked upon as sources of strength within the tradition so long as individuals remain within the confines of the doctrine of Jesus Christ (3 Ne. 11:31–35), the consistent teachings of the scriptures, and the clear words of the living prophets on what is required of each member to gain his or her salvation and exaltation.

Those who break their covenants or whose conduct brings discredit upon the Church may be dealt with in a DISCIPLINARY PROCEDURE. Occasionally such action may arise when a member publicly disavows certain basic tenets of the faith, actively teaches against Church doctrines, or tries to subvert the work of the Church. However, most disciplinary action is taken because a member's dealings with others are deemed to be morally improper. Virtually every disciplinary action has as its ultimate purpose to assist a member in the difficult process of repentance, which can in time result in his or her being restored to full fellowship in the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Barlow, Philip L., ed. A Thoughtful Faith. Centerville, Utah, 1986.
- Bradford, M. Gerald. "On Doing Theology." BYU Studies 14 (Spring 1974):345–58.
- Widtsoc, John A. "What Is Orthodoxy." In Evidences and Reconciliations, pp. 276–78. Salt Lake City, 1960.

M. GERALD BRADFORD

---

P

---

---

PAGEANTS

In the Church, pageants are outdoor theatrical productions that celebrate a place, person, or event in religious history. Some pageants depict the earthly mission of the Savior and his dealings with covenant peoples in Jerusalem and the New World, both before and after his resurrection. Other pageants dramatize some historical aspect of how the Church in this dispensation fulfills its mission of taking the gospel of Jesus Christ to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people (cf. Rev. 14:6).

Most pageants are initiated and sponsored by local Church leaders and carried out by Church members who reside in the area where the pageant is performed. They are usually presented out-of-doors on temporary stages on the site of the event or on or near the grounds of LDS temples. Typically they present a sequence of short but elaborate scenes that unseen speakers narrate over an audio system. The pageants often feature original music prerecorded by a professional orchestra and delivered through an audio system powerful enough to be heard for several hundred meters. Pageant casts consist of businessmen, homemakers, teenagers, children, college students, grandparents, craftsmen, and professional actors whose involvement is voluntary and without remuneration. Each pageant is typically presented for about seven performances to as many as 20,000 people at a single performance. No admission fee is charged.

LDS pageants often feature appropriately costumed casts of as many as 600 performers, and may include live orchestras, choirs, and dancers. Each pageant is different in form as well as content. The "City of Joseph" pageant in Nauvoo, Illinois, is a conventional musical play. The Calgary (Canada) Nativity Pageant in December portrays how the Savior's birth is a blessing to all peoples. "The Man Who Knew," in Clarkston, Utah, is a narrative drama about the life of Martin HARRIS.

The CUMORAH PAGEANT, near Rochester, New York, has been presented at the hill CUMORAH since 1937. It depicts how Joseph SMITH learned about and acquired the plates of gold from which the Book of Mormon was translated and it presents a dramatized sampling of some of the epic events and prophecies described in them. Cast members include young adults called from other areas of the Church to participate in the July–August productions. Other pageants, such as at the Manti, Utah, or Oakland, California, temples, depict the restoration of the gospel. The Mesa, Arizona, pageant presents the story of the Savior's life. Other pageants are performed in Independence, Missouri; Castle Valley, Utah; and Auckland, New Zealand.

LAEL J. WOODBURY

PALMYRA/MANCHESTER, NEW YORK

The Palmyra/Manchester area of New York is significant to the LDS Church because the Joseph SMITH, Sr., family settled there in 1816, and the hill CUMORAH, from which came the gold plates of the Book of Mormon, is nearby. Many events in early Church history occurred in the vicinity, including Joseph Smith's FIRST VISION, and also the visits of the ANGEL MORONI leading to the translation and publication of the Book of Mormon in Palmyra. A number of persons, including Martin HARRIS, Oliver COWDERY, and E. B. Grandin, prominent in the early scenes of the Church, also lived in the vicinity. Four revelations now published in the Doctrine and Covenants were received in the area (see D&C 2, 19, 22, 23).

The Joseph Smith, Sr., family arrived in the village of Palmyra, New York, in 1816 from their home in Norwich, Vermont. By the fall of 1817 they made a down payment on a 100-acre farm two miles south of the village in the adjoining township of Farmington (which became Manchester in 1822). During the winter of 1817–1818, they began the construction of a log house, which was completed by the fall of 1818 (Enders, p. 16). A 1982 archaeological dig revealed the exact location of the log cabin on the southern edge of Palmyra township (Berge, pp. 24–26).

In the early spring of 1820, Joseph Smith, Jr., sought the Lord in prayer and experienced the First Vision, in a grove of trees near the home, and three years later, on the evening of September 21–22, 1823, the angel Moroni visited him in the log cabin and gave him instructions about the coming forth of the Book of Mormon. The hill Cumorah where Joseph first viewed the gold plates and received annual visits from Moroni is about three miles to the southeast, on the Canandaigua Road.

From 1822 to 1826 the Smiths built a frame house in Manchester; and in January 1827 Joseph and his new bride, Emma Hale Smith, came to that home to work on the farm. Attempts to steal the gold plates required their being concealed both under the hearthstone of the house and in the cooper's shop.

The Book of Mormon was printed by Egbert B. Grandin in his Palmyra Bookstore, with Martin Harris's mortgaged farm guaranteeing that the printing costs would be met. With the organization of the Church on April 6, 1830, at Fayette, the Manchester/Palmyra area was identified as one of three branches.

The Church still has interest in the area, maintaining VISITORS CENTERS in the Grandin printing shop and bookstore; at the Smith farm and SACRED GROVE; and also at the hill Cumorah, where an appropriate monument and building have been erected, and where an annual pageant is held. A portion of the Martin Harris farm is also owned by the Church. Members of the Smith family and others prominent in the early history of the Church are buried in the cemeteries of the area.

[See also History of the Church, c. 1820–1831; New York: Early LDS Sites in.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Berge, Dale L. "Archaeological Work at the Smith Log House." Ensign 15 (Aug. 1985):24–26.
- Enders, Donald L. "A Snug Log House": A Historical Look at the Joseph Smith, Sr., Family Home in Palmyra, New York." Ensign 15 (Aug. 1985):14–23.
- Porter, Larry C. "A Study of the Origins of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the States of New York and Pennsylvania, 1816–1831." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1971.

LARRY C. PORTER

PAPYRI, JOSEPH SMITH

The term "Joseph Smith papyri" refers narrowly to twelve extant pieces of the Egyptian papyrus that the Prophet Joseph Smith acquired from Michael H. Chandler in July 1835. Located in the Church Archives, these fragments range in size from 7.5 in. x 12.5 in. to 6.5 in. x 4.5 in. Facsimile No. 1 in the BOOK OF ABRAHAM came from one of these fragments. Broadly, the term also refers to Facsimiles Nos. 2 and 3 in the same book and to papers and all the Egyptian materials of the KIRTLAND period of Church history containing small sections of copied papyrus text. The discovery and transmission of the mummies and papyri are discussed in BOOK OF ABRAHAM: ORIGIN.

The origin of the ancient writings is fascinating to trace. In 1798 Napoleon's Egyptian conquest reawakened Europe to Egypt's treasures. One Italian collector, Antonio Lebolo, excavated in Egypt between 1817 and 1821. In 1820 he worked at

PALMYRA/MANCHESTER, NEW YORK

The Palmyra/Manchester area of New York is significant to the LDS Church because the Joseph SMITH, Sr., family settled there in 1816, and the hill CUMORAH, from which came the gold plates of the Book of Mormon, is nearby. Many events in early Church history occurred in the vicinity, including Joseph Smith's FIRST VISION, and also the visits of the ANGEL MORONI leading to the translation and publication of the Book of Mormon in Palmyra. A number of persons, including Martin HARRIS, Oliver COWDERY, and E. B. Grandin, prominent in the early scenes of the Church, also lived in the vicinity. Four revelations now published in the Doctrine and Covenants were received in the area (see D&C 2, 19, 22, 23).

The Joseph Smith, Sr., family arrived in the village of Palmyra, New York, in 1816 from their home in Norwich, Vermont. By the fall of 1817 they made a down payment on a 100-acre farm two miles south of the village in the adjoining township of Farmington (which became Manchester in 1822). During the winter of 1817–1818, they began the construction of a log house, which was completed by the fall of 1818 (Enders, p. 16). A 1982 archaeological dig revealed the exact location of the log cabin on the southern edge of Palmyra township (Berge, pp. 24–26).

In the early spring of 1820, Joseph Smith, Jr., sought the Lord in prayer and experienced the First Vision, in a grove of trees near the home, and three years later, on the evening of September 21–22, 1823, the angel Moroni visited him in the log cabin and gave him instructions about the coming forth of the Book of Mormon. The hill Cumorah where Joseph first viewed the gold plates and received annual visits from Moroni is about three miles to the southeast, on the Canandaigua Road.

From 1822 to 1826 the Smiths built a frame house in Manchester; and in January 1827 Joseph and his new bride, Emma Hale Smith, came to that home to work on the farm. Attempts to steal the gold plates required their being concealed both under the hearthstone of the house and in the cooper's shop.

The Book of Mormon was printed by Egbert B. Grandin in his Palmyra Bookstore, with Martin Harris's mortgaged farm guaranteeing that the printing costs would be met. With the organization of the Church on April 6, 1830, at Fayette, the Manchester/Palmyra area was identified as one of three branches.

The Church still has interest in the area, maintaining VISITORS CENTERS in the Grandin printing shop and bookstore; at the Smith farm and SACRED GROVE; and also at the hill Cumorah, where an appropriate monument and building have been erected, and where an annual pageant is held. A portion of the Martin Harris farm is also owned by the Church. Members of the Smith family and others prominent in the early history of the Church are buried in the cemeteries of the area.

[See also History of the Church, c. 1820–1831; New York: Early LDS Sites in.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Berge, Dale L. "Archaeological Work at the Smith Log House." Ensign 15 (Aug. 1985):24–26.
- Enders, Donald L. "A Snug Log House": A Historical Look at the Joseph Smith, Sr., Family Home in Palmyra, New York." Ensign 15 (Aug. 1985):14–23.
- Porter, Larry C. "A Study of the Origins of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the States of New York and Pennsylvania, 1816–1831." Ph.D. diss., Brigham Young University, 1971.

LARRY C. PORTER

PAPYRI, JOSEPH SMITH

The term "Joseph Smith papyri" refers narrowly to twelve extant pieces of the Egyptian papyrus that the Prophet Joseph Smith acquired from Michael H. Chandler in July 1835. Located in the Church Archives, these fragments range in size from 7.5 in. x 12.5 in. to 6.5 in. x 4.5 in. Facsimile No. 1 in the BOOK OF ABRAHAM came from one of these fragments. Broadly, the term also refers to Facsimiles Nos. 2 and 3 in the same book and to papers and all the Egyptian materials of the KIRTLAND period of Church history containing small sections of copied papyrus text. The discovery and transmission of the mummies and papyri are discussed in BOOK OF ABRAHAM: ORIGIN.

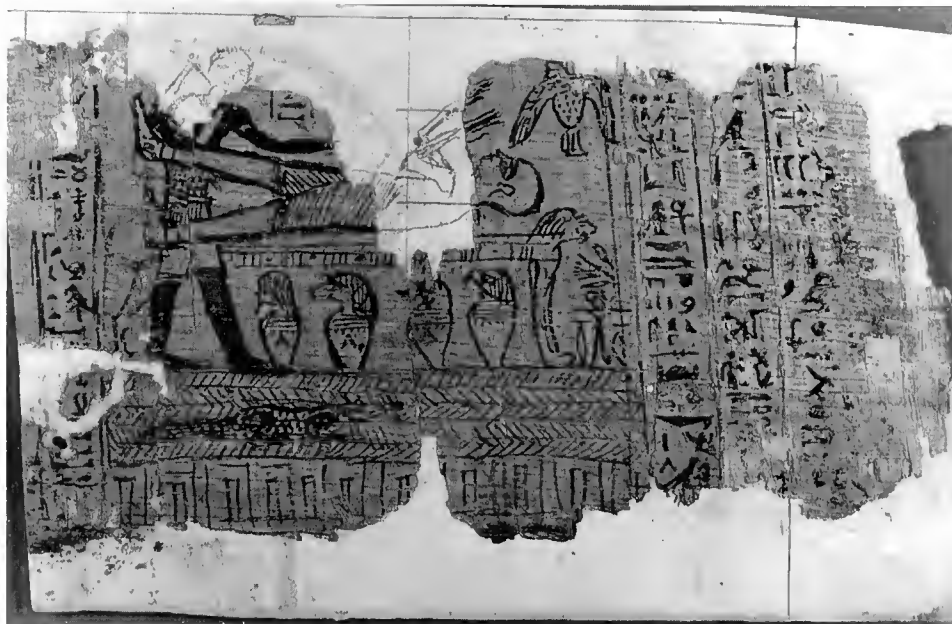

The origin of the ancient writings is fascinating to trace. In 1798 Napoleon's Egyptian conquest reawakened Europe to Egypt's treasures. One Italian collector, Antonio Lebolo, excavated in Egypt between 1817 and 1821. In 1820 he worked at Thebes, near El Gurna; Chandler said that Lebolo's mummies came from there (Todd, pp. 45, 130). About 1822 Lebolo returned to Italy, where he died on February 19, 1830. In 1831 his son Pietro investigated why shipping merchant Albano Oblasser had not reimbursed him for eleven mummies. In 1833 Pietro authorized Francesco Bertola, in Philadelphia, to sell eleven mummies that Oblasser had sent to a partnership in New York (Peterson, pp. 145–47).

How Chandler obtained his possessions is not known. It is known that Lebolo mummies and papyri were exhibited in Philadelphia (April–May 1833) and Baltimore. By September 1833, six had been shown in Harrisburg and one had been publicly dissected in Philadelphia. In June of 1835, four mummies and papyri were exhibited at Cleveland, twenty miles southwest of Kirtland (Todd, pp. 108–143).

In early July 1835, Chandler visited Kirtland, where he met Joseph Smith and inquired “if he had a power by which he could translate the ancient Egyptian. Mr. Smith replied that he had” (P. Pratt, Millennial Star, July 1842). Chandler presented some hieroglyphics, which others supposedly had interpreted. Joseph Smith left and returned with a written English translation corresponding to the interpretation Chandler had already received. The Prophet displayed interest in the papyri, but Chandler would not break up his exhibit. Shortly thereafter, Church members purchased for $2,400 “four human figures . . . with two or more rolls of papyrus” (HC 2:235). Oliver COWDERY remembered that it was “two rolls . . . [with] two or three other small pieces,” the text written “with black, and a small part, red ink or paint” (Messenger and Advocate, Dec. 31, 1835). Within three days, Joseph Smith translated some “hieroglyphics, and much to our joy found that one of the rolls contained the writings of ABRAHAM, another, writings of JOSEPH OF EGYPT.” Joseph Smith spent from July 17 to 31 “continually . . . translating an alphabet . . . and arranging a grammar” of Egyptian (HC 2:236–38). On October 1, while he worked on the alphabet, the “principles of astronomy as understood by Father Abraham . . . unfolded” (HC 2:286). On November 17 he “exhibited the alphabet” (HC 2:316). He recorded “translating the Egyptian records” on October 7, November 19–20 (20th: “made rapid progress”), and November 24–26 (IIC 2:289, 318, 320). LDS Church Archives contain Book of Abraham texts (Abr. 1:1–2:18) from this period.

Faefimile No. 1, an extant piece from some rolls of Egyptian papyrus that Joseph Smith acquired in 1835, illustrates some of the text in the book of Abraham, translated by Joseph Smith. The Prophet said the upper right bird figure represents the angel of the Lord, the prone man represents Abraham, and the upper left figure represents the idolatrous priest who attempted to sacrifice Abraham.

In 1837 a visitor wrote: “These records were torn, . . . some parts entirely lost, but Smith is to translate the whole by divine inspiration and that which is lost, like Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, can be interpreted as well as that which is preserved.” Joseph Smith let the mummies and papyri be moved to nearby towns, and in 1836 they were in the KIRTLAND TEMPLE. Despite care, the papyri had been damaged. Consequently, they were cut into pieces, and some were pasted on paper for preservation. By January 4, 1838, there were at least “two undivided thirds.” During 1838–1839, the papyri and mummies spent the winter in Quiney, Illinois, where they were exhibited, a practice that continued until 1856 (Todd, pp. 197–203).

In 1842 Joseph Smith worked to prepare the facsimiles for publication and, likely, wrote his “Explanations,” which are printed with them; on February 23, he instructed the printer on making the plate for Facsimile No. 1, which with its “Explanation” was printed in the March 1 issue of the Times and Seasons, with Abraham 1:1–2:18. On March 4 he instructed the printer on Facsimiles Nos. 2 and 3; on March 8–9 he did “translating” and “revising” (IIC 4:518, 543–48). The final installment of the Book of Abraham (2:19–5:21) and Facsimile No. 2 with its “Explanation” were printed in the March 15 issue; Facsimile No. 3 and its “Explanation” were printed May 16.

Although the papyrus rolls had been shortened, a visitor in February 1843 saw “a long roll of manuscript, [being told] it was the ‘writing of Abraham’” and was shown “another roll” (Todd, p. 245). After Joseph Smith’s death, the Egyptian artifacts were held principally by his mother, and then by Emma SMITH after Lucy’s death on May 14, 1856. On May 25, 1856, Emma sold “four Egyptian mummies with the records with them” to Mr. Abel Combs (IE, Jan. 1968, pp. 12–16). (Pioneers brought one fragment west.) Combs then sold two mummies with some papyri, which were sent to the St. Louis Museum (1856); they ended up in the Chicago Museum (1863), where they apparently burned in 1871. The fate of Combs’s two other mummies and papyri is unknown, but some papyri remained, for in 1918 Mrs. Alice Heusser of Brooklyn, a daughter of Combs’s housekeeper, approached the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art (MMA) with papyri once owned by Joseph Smith. In 1947 MMA acquired papyri from her widower. In May 1966 Aziz S. Atiya of the University of Utah saw eleven Heusser fragments at MMA. He informed Church leaders, and on November 27, 1967, the Church acquired the fragments; one of them is Facsimile No. 1.

Egyptologists who have studied the fragments in recent years generally identify them as religious texts, some from the Book of the Dead dating from 500–300 B.C., and some from the Book of Breathings dating from about A.D. 100. Since the rediscovery of the fragments, researchers have sought to learn if any of them, other than Facsimile No. 1, is related to the Book of Abraham.

[See also Book of Abraham: Facsimiles.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Nibley, Hugh. The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri. Salt Lake City, 1975.
- Peterson, H. Donl. “Sacred Writings from the Tombs of Egypt.” In The Pearl of Great Price: Revelations from God, ed. D. Peterson and C. Tate. Provo, Utah, 1989.
- Todd, Jay M. Saga of the Book of Abraham. Salt Lake City, 1969.

JAY M. TODD

---

PARABLES

Parables are short didactic narratives that make use of characters, situations, and customs familiar to their audience. They are meant to convey a spiritual message, but the reader usually must infer the message from the story, which generally is a presentation of some aspect of daily life. Because they are stories, parables are sometimes more memorable and more interesting than direct exhortation. Parables are seen to have several layers of meaning and may be understood differently, depending on the sensitivity and spiritual preparation of the hearer. For Latter-day Saints, it is significant that through the Prophet Joseph SMITH the Lord offered some additional parables and used those given during Jesus’ ministry to enrich that part of the message of the RESTORATION of the gospel that points to events of the latter days.

In the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST), Joseph Smith reworked some of the parables of Christ recorded in the synoptic gospels. In addition, he often referred to Christ’s par-and November 24–26 (IIC 2:289, 318, 320). LDS Church Archives contain Book of Abraham texts (Abr. 1:1–2:18) from this period.

In 1837 a visitor wrote: “These records were torn, . . . some parts entirely lost, but Smith is to translate the whole by divine inspiration and that which is lost, like Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, can be interpreted as well as that which is preserved.” Joseph Smith let the mummies and papyri be moved to nearby towns, and in 1836 they were in the KIRTLAND TEMPLE. Despite care, the papyri had been damaged. Consequently, they were cut into pieces, and some were pasted on paper for preservation. By January 4, 1838, there were at least “two undivided thirds.” During 1838–1839, the papyri and mummies spent the winter in Quiney, Illinois, where they were exhibited, a practice that continued until 1856 (Todd, pp. 197–203).

In 1842 Joseph Smith worked to prepare the facsimiles for publication and, likely, wrote his “Explanations,” which are printed with them; on February 23, he instructed the printer on making the plate for Facsimile No. 1, which with its “Explanation” was printed in the March 1 issue of the Times and Seasons, with Abraham 1:1–2:18. On March 4 he instructed the printer on Facsimiles Nos. 2 and 3; on March 8–9 he did “translating” and “revising” (IIC 4:518, 543–48). The final installment of the Book of Abraham (2:19–5:21) and Facsimile No. 2 with its “Explanation” were printed in the March 15 issue; Facsimile No. 3 and its “Explanation” were printed May 16.

Although the papyrus rolls had been shortened, a visitor in February 1843 saw “a long roll of manuscript, [being told] it was the ‘writing of Abraham’” and was shown “another roll” (Todd, p. 245). After Joseph Smith’s death, the Egyptian artifacts were held principally by his mother, and then by Emma SMITH after Lucy’s death on May 14, 1856. On May 25, 1856, Emma sold “four Egyptian mummies with the records with them” to Mr. Abel Combs (IE, Jan. 1968, pp. 12–16). (Pioneers brought one fragment west.) Combs then sold two mummies with some papyri, which were sent to the St. Louis Museum (1856); they ended up in the Chicago Museum (1863), where they apparently burned in 1871. The fate of Combs’s two other mummies and papyri is unknown, but some papyri remained, for in 1918 Mrs. Alice Heusser of Brooklyn, a daughter of Combs’s housekeeper, approached the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art (MMA) with papyri once owned by Joseph Smith. In 1947 MMA acquired papyri from her widower. In May 1966 Aziz S. Atiya of the University of Utah saw eleven Heusser fragments at MMA. He informed Church leaders, and on November 27, 1967, the Church acquired the fragments; one of them is Facsimile No. 1.

Egyptologists who have studied the fragments in recent years generally identify them as religious texts, some from the Book of the Dead dating from 500–300 B.C., and some from the Book of Breathings dating from about A.D. 100. Since the rediscovery of the fragments, researchers have sought to learn if any of them, other than Facsimile No. 1, is related to the Book of Abraham.

[See also Book of Abraham: Facsimiles.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Nibley, Hugh. The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri. Salt Lake City, 1975.
- Peterson, H. Donl. “Sacred Writings from the Tombs of Egypt.” In The Pearl of Great Price: Revelations from God, ed. D. Peterson and C. Tate. Provo, Utah, 1989.
- Todd, Jay M. Saga of the Book of Abraham. Salt Lake City, 1969.

JAY M. TODD

---

PARABLES

Parables are short didactic narratives that make use of characters, situations, and customs familiar to their audience. They are meant to convey a spiritual message, but the reader usually must infer the message from the story, which generally is a presentation of some aspect of daily life. Because they are stories, parables are sometimes more memorable and more interesting than direct exhortation. Parables are seen to have several layers of meaning and may be understood differently, depending on the sensitivity and spiritual preparation of the hearer. For Latter-day Saints, it is significant that through the Prophet Joseph SMITH the Lord offered some additional parables and used those given during Jesus’ ministry to enrich that part of the message of the RESTORATION of the gospel that points to events of the latter days.

In the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST), Joseph Smith reworked some of the parables of Christ recorded in the synoptic gospels. In addition, he often referred to Christ’s parables in discourses and articles. In revelations from the Lord, he received at least three original parables not in the New Testament (D&C 38:26–27; 88:51–61; 101:43–62). For those in the New Testament that he reworked, because he recognized that the meaning of a parable is in its relevance to the original audience, he used as a key for interpretation the situation that drew the parable from Christ (TPJS, pp. 276–77). Then under inspiration he interpreted virtually all the parables of Matthew 13 to apply to the latter days or to the mission of the restored Church of helping to prepare people for the SECOND COMING of Christ (cf. D&C 45:56; 63:53–54; TPJS, pp. 94–99).

Joseph Smith showed many of Christ's parables to be relevant to the mission of the latter-day Church. For example, Doctrine and Covenants section 86 interprets the parable of the wheat and the tares (cf. Matt. 13:24–30, 36–43) as portraying the APOSTASY and the restoration of Christ's true gospel: "The apostles were the sowers of the seed," but "after they have fallen asleep . . . the tares choke the wheat and drive the church into the wilderness" (D&C 86:2–3). However, the wheat, or Christ's true church, resprouts: "In the last days, . . . the Lord is beginning to bring forth the word, and the blade is springing up and is yet tender" (D&C 86:4). The JST applies this parable to the latter days: "In that day, before the Son of Man shall come, he shall send forth his angels and messengers of heaven" (JST, Matt. 13:42). These angels and messengers are called to strengthen the wheat in the LAST DAYS before the wicked will be destroyed. The focus of this parable thus becomes the time just before the end of the world (cf. D&C 101:65–66).

Other references further link Christ's parables to the latter-day Church. The JST version of the parable of the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1–13) begins, "At that day, before the Son of man comes, the kingdom of heaven shall be likened unto ten virgins" (JST, Matt. 25:1). The Doctrine and Covenants also refers to this parable: At "the coming of the Son of Man . . . there will be foolish virgins among the wise; and at that hour cometh an entire separation of the righteous and the wicked" (D&C 63:53–54; cf. 45:56–57). Of the parable of the mustard seed (Matt. 13:31–32), "the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs" (Matt. 13:32), Joseph Smith wrote, "Now we can discover plainly that this figure is given to represent the Church as it shall come forth in the last days" (TPJS, p. 98). He also saw a comparison with the Book of Mormon:

Let us take the Book of Mormon, which a man took and hid in his field . . . to spring up in the last days, or in due time; let us behold it coming forth out of the ground, . . . even towering, with lofty branches, and God-like majesty, until it, like the mustard seed, becomes the greatest of all herbs. And it is truth, and it has sprouted and come forth out of the earth, and righteousness begins to look down from heaven, and God is sending down His powers, gifts and angels, to lodge in the branches thereof [TPJS, p. 98].

In discussing other parables, Joseph Smith compared the three measures of meal in which a woman hid leaven (Matt. 13:33) to the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon (TPJS, p. 100). The treasure hidden in a field for which a man "selles all that he hath, and buyeth that field" (Matt. 13:44) is likened to the Saints' "selling all that they have, and gathering themselves together unto a place that they may purchase for an inheritance" (TPJS, p. 101). To the "householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things that are new and old" (Matt. 13:52), the Prophet Joseph Smith compared "the Book of Mormon coming forth out of the treasure of the heart, . . . the covenants given to the Latter-day Saints, [and] the translation of the Bible—thus bringing forth out of the heart things new and old" (TPJS, p. 102).

Other parables were used in the Doctrine and Covenants to offer counsel for particular incidents. In 1833, Latter-day Saints in Jackson County, Missouri, were driven from their homes by armed mobs. In a revelation received by Joseph Smith on December 16, 1833, two parables suggested appropriate action. The first parable (D&C 101:43–62) is original, although it echoes Christ's parable of the wicked husbandmen (cf. Matt. 21:33–44). A nobleman sends servants to his vineyard to plant twelve olive trees and then to protect the vineyard by raising a hedge, setting watchmen, and erecting a tower. His servants at first obey but then become slothful. An enemy comes at night, breaks down the hedge and the olive trees, and takes over the vineyard. The nobleman calls the servants to task and then asks all the men of his house to go "straightway unto the land of [his] vineyard, and redeem [his] vineyard" (D&C 101:56). This parable, interpreted two months later in a subsequent revelation (D&C 103), served as the basis of ZION'S CAMP, a militia of LDS men called to march from Ohio to Missouri for the purpose of recovering the land of their fellow Saints.

The other parable cited in the December 1833 revelation (D&C 101:81–91) is that of the woman and the unjust judge (Luke 18:1–8). The judge grants the woman's suit because her continual pleading annoys him. Likewise the displaced Saints of the time were urged to "importune at the feet of the judge," then the governor, then the president of the United States, until they obtained redress (D&C 101:85–89).

These parables, as well as others he employed (cf. D&C 35:16; 38:24–27; 45:36–38; 88:51–61), add a richness to Joseph Smith's teachings.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brooks, Melvin R. Parables of the Kingdom. Salt Lake City, 1965.
- Burton, Alma P., ed. Discourses of the Prophet Joseph Smith, pp. 196–204. Salt Lake City, 1965.
- Jeremias, Joachim. The Parables of Jesus. London, 1954.

SUSAN HOWE

---

PARADISE

Paradise is a Persian word (para-daeza, meaning "enclosure") that came into Greek and meant a pleasant place, such as a park or garden. Later it came to refer generally in scripture to that place where righteous spirits go after death. The word "paradise" is not found in the Old Testament, but occurs three times in the New Testament: Luke 23:43, where the Savior on the cross says to the thief, "Today shalt thou be with me in paradise"; 2 Corinthians 12:2–4, where Paul alludes to his vision of the third heaven and also to paradise; and Revelation 2:7, which describes the righteous who partake of the TREE OF LIFE in the midst of God's paradise (cf. D&C 77:2, 5). The latter two uses of paradise seem to refer to the highest degree of heaven (the CELESTIAL KINGDOM) rather than to the SPIRIT WORLD. Another sense of paradise pertains to the condition of the GARDEN OF EDEN, which was paradisiacal in nature. Article of Faith 10 declares that "the earth will be renewed and receive its paradisiacal glory," which is to say that it will eventually return to the edenic state that existed before the FALL OF ADAM (see NEW HEAVEN AND NEW EARTH).

The Savior's reference to paradise in Luke 23:43 pertains neither to heaven, nor to a specific place of righteous spirits, but to the spirit world in general, since the thief was not prepared to enter into the abode of the righteous. It is a misconception that this passage justifies "deathbed REPENTANCE," that is, the idea that one can delay repentance until death and still enter a heavenly condition. The gospel of Jesus Christ requires that persons use the gift of mortal life to learn to control appetites, thus preparing themselves to meet God and to acquire the divine nature (Rom. 8:29; Alma 34:32–35). The Prophet Joseph SMITH taught that the thief on the cross was to be with Jesus Christ "in the world of spirits" (he did not say paradise or heaven). "Hades, Sheol, paradise, spirits in prison, are all one: it is a world of spirits. The righteous and the wicked all go to the same world of spirits" (TPJS, pp. 309–310).

It is apparent from the scriptures, however, that even though the spirit world is one world, there exists a division between righteous and disobedient spirits. Luke 16:22–26 indicates a division and also a gulf fixed between the place of the righteous (Abraham's bosom) and the place of the wicked (cf. 1 Ne. 15:28–29). Between his death and his RESURRECTION, the Savior visited the spirit world (1 Pet. 3:18–20; 4:6; D&C 138) and bridged the gulf by giving righteous spirits authority to cross the gulf and carry the gospel to the spirits dwelling in darkness. This darkness is sometimes referred to as SPIRIT PRISON, HELL, or even "outer darkness" (Alma 40:13–14).

The Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants teach that paradise is the part of the spirit world where the righteous, those who in mortality obeyed God's commandments and were faithful to their COVENANTS, await the resurrection. ALMA teaches that the spirits of the righteous "are received into a state of happiness, which is called paradise, a state of rest, a state of peace, where they shall rest from all their troubles and from all care, and sorrow" (Alma 40:12). It was in paradise that righteous spirits like ADAM, EVE, and ABRAHAM greeted the Savior on his appearance in the spirit world after his crucifixion (D&C 138:38–49). Paradise is a temporary condition. At the resurrection it "must deliver up the spirits of the righteous" (2 Ne. 9:13). Even though the righteous spirits attain to a greater state of rest and happiness (Alma 40:12) than is possible in this life, they look

Ohio to Missouri for the purpose of recovering the land of their fellow Saints.

The other parable cited in the December 1833 revelation (D&C 101:81–91) is that of the woman and the unjust judge (Luke 18:1–8). The judge grants the woman's suit because her continual pleading annoys him. Likewise the displaced Saints of the time were urged to "importune at the feet of the judge," then the governor, then the president of the United States, until they obtained redress (D&C 101:85–89).

These parables, as well as others he employed (cf. D&C 35:16; 38:24–27; 45:36–38; 88:51–61), add a richness to Joseph Smith's teachings.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brooks, Melvin R. Parables of the Kingdom. Salt Lake City, 1965.
- Burton, Alma P., ed. Discourses of the Prophet Joseph Smith, pp. 196–204. Salt Lake City, 1965.
- Jeremias, Joachim. The Parables of Jesus. London, 1954.

SUSAN HOWE

---

PARADISE

Paradise is a Persian word (para-daeza, meaning "enclosure") that came into Greek and meant a pleasant place, such as a park or garden. Later it came to refer generally in scripture to that place where righteous spirits go after death. The word "paradise" is not found in the Old Testament, but occurs three times in the New Testament: Luke 23:43, where the Savior on the cross says to the thief, "Today shalt thou be with me in paradise"; 2 Corinthians 12:2–4, where Paul alludes to his vision of the third heaven and also to paradise; and Revelation 2:7, which describes the righteous who partake of the TREE OF LIFE in the midst of God's paradise (cf. D&C 77:2, 5). The latter two uses of paradise seem to refer to the highest degree of heaven (the CELESTIAL KINGDOM) rather than to the SPIRIT WORLD. Another sense of paradise pertains to the condition of the GARDEN OF EDEN, which was paradisiacal in nature. Article of Faith 10 declares that "the earth will be renewed and receive its paradisiacal glory," which is to say that it will eventually return to the edenic state that existed before the FALL OF ADAM (see NEW HEAVEN AND NEW EARTH).

The Savior's reference to paradise in Luke 23:43 pertains neither to heaven, nor to a specific place of righteous spirits, but to the spirit world in general, since the thief was not prepared to enter into the abode of the righteous. It is a misconception that this passage justifies "deathbed REPENTANCE," that is, the idea that one can delay repentance until death and still enter a heavenly condition. The gospel of Jesus Christ requires that persons use the gift of mortal life to learn to control appetites, thus preparing themselves to meet God and to acquire the divine nature (Rom. 8:29; Alma 34:32–35). The Prophet Joseph SMITH taught that the thief on the cross was to be with Jesus Christ "in the world of spirits" (he did not say paradise or heaven). "Hades, Sheol, paradise, spirits in prison, are all one: it is a world of spirits. The righteous and the wicked all go to the same world of spirits" (TPJS, pp. 309–310).

It is apparent from the scriptures, however, that even though the spirit world is one world, there exists a division between righteous and disobedient spirits. Luke 16:22–26 indicates a division and also a gulf fixed between the place of the righteous (Abraham's bosom) and the place of the wicked (cf. 1 Ne. 15:28–29). Between his death and his RESURRECTION, the Savior visited the spirit world (1 Pet. 3:18–20; 4:6; D&C 138) and bridged the gulf by giving righteous spirits authority to cross the gulf and carry the gospel to the spirits dwelling in darkness. This darkness is sometimes referred to as SPIRIT PRISON, HELL, or even "outer darkness" (Alma 40:13–14).

The Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants teach that paradise is the part of the spirit world where the righteous, those who in mortality obeyed God's commandments and were faithful to their COVENANTS, await the resurrection. ALMA teaches that the spirits of the righteous "are received into a state of happiness, which is called paradise, a state of rest, a state of peace, where they shall rest from all their troubles and from all care, and sorrow" (Alma 40:12). It was in paradise that righteous spirits like ADAM, EVE, and ABRAHAM greeted the Savior on his appearance in the spirit world after his crucifixion (D&C 138:38–49). Paradise is a temporary condition. At the resurrection it "must deliver up the spirits of the righteous" (2 Ne. 9:13). Even though the righteous spirits attain to a greater state of rest and happiness (Alma 40:12) than is possible in this life, they look “upon the long absence of their spirits from their bodies as a bondage” (D&C 138:50). When the Savior visited the spirit world, he taught these righteous spirits in paradise and “gave them power to come forth, after his resurrection from the dead, to enter into his Father’s kingdom, there to be crowned with IMMORTALITY AND ETERNAL LIFE, and continue thenceforth their labor as had been promised by the Lord, and be partakers of all blessings which were held in reserve for them that love him” (D&C 138:51–52). As teaching and missionary work proceed in the spirit prison and ORDINANCES for the dead are performed in temples on the earth, the once uninformed and the disobedient but now repentant and purified spirits may enter into paradise and enjoy association with the righteous and the blessings of the gospel. The Prophet Joseph Smith taught, “There is never a time when the spirit [of man] is too old to approach God. All are within the reach of pardoning mercy, who have not committed the unpardonable sin, which hath no forgiveness, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. There is a way to release the spirits of the dead; that is by the power and authority of the Priesthood—by binding and loosing on earth” (TPJS, pp. 191–92).

[See also Spirit World.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Young, Brigham. Discourses of Brigham Young, comp. John A. Widtsoe, pp. 376–81. Salt Lake City, 1946.

M. CATHERINE THOMAS

PARMLEY, LAVERN WATTS

Martha LaVern Watts Parmley (1900–1980) served as general president of the PRIMARY of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints from 1951 to 1974, a period when the Church was adapting its programs to serve the needs of a rapidly growing, worldwide membership. She was born January 1, 1900, in Murray, Utah, to LDS parents. LaVern served as a Primary teacher at age fourteen. She married Thomas Jennison Parmley on June 28, 1923. After her husband completed a doctorate at Cornell University in New York, the Parmleys returned to Utah. They were the parents of three children.

When she returned from New York, LaVern Parmley became a member of a STAKE Primary board. After serving on that board for three years, she was called as a member of the Primary General Board in 1942. Six months later, she was appointed second counselor to Primary President May Green Hinckley. She became first counselor to a new president, Adele Cannon Howells, a year later, a position she held until her call as Primary general president in 1951.

As president, LaVern Parmley was instrumental in adapting the Primary programs to meet a new set of challenges. When the Boy Scouts of America lowered its admission age to eleven, Church and Primary leaders discussed whether the Primary or the YOUNG MEN’S organization should direct the activities of the eleven-year-old boys. Although the National Scout Committee initially opposed having women leaders direct a scouting program, the Primary obtained permission for women to administer SCOUTING activities for boys until they turned twelve. The Primary also adopted Cub Scouting, thereby assuming responsibility for four years of scouting. LDS women

LaVern W. Parmley (1900–1980), fifth general president of the Primary Association, served from 1951 to 1974.

“upon the long absence of their spirits from their bodies as a bondage” (D&C 138:50). When the Savior visited the spirit world, he taught these righteous spirits in paradise and “gave them power to come forth, after his resurrection from the dead, to enter into his Father’s kingdom, there to be crowned with IMMORTALITY AND ETERNAL LIFE, and continue thenceforth their labor as had been promised by the Lord, and be partakers of all blessings which were held in reserve for them that love him” (D&C 138:51–52). As teaching and missionary work proceed in the spirit prison and ORDINANCES for the dead are performed in temples on the earth, the once uninformed and the disobedient but now repentant and purified spirits may enter into paradise and enjoy association with the righteous and the blessings of the gospel. The Prophet Joseph Smith taught, “There is never a time when the spirit [of man] is too old to approach God. All are within the reach of pardoning mercy, who have not committed the unpardonable sin, which hath no forgiveness, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. There is a way to release the spirits of the dead; that is by the power and authority of the Priesthood—by binding and loosing on earth” (TPJS, pp. 191–92).

[See also Spirit World.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Young, Brigham. Discourses of Brigham Young, comp. John A. Widtsoe, pp. 376–81. Salt Lake City, 1946.

M. CATHERINE THOMAS

PARMLEY, LAVERN WATTS

Martha LaVern Watts Parmley (1900–1980) served as general president of the PRIMARY of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints from 1951 to 1974, a period when the Church was adapting its programs to serve the needs of a rapidly growing, worldwide membership. She was born January 1, 1900, in Murray, Utah, to LDS parents. LaVern served as a Primary teacher at age fourteen. She married Thomas Jennison Parmley on June 28, 1923. After her husband completed a doctorate at Cornell University in New York, the Parmleys returned to Utah. They were the parents of three children.

When she returned from New York, LaVern Parmley became a member of a STAKE Primary board. After serving on that board for three years, she was called as a member of the Primary General Board in 1942. Six months later, she was appointed second counselor to Primary President May Green Hinckley. She became first counselor to a new president, Adele Cannon Howells, a year later, a position she held until her call as Primary general president in 1951.

As president, LaVern Parmley was instrumental in adapting the Primary programs to meet a new set of challenges. When the Boy Scouts of America lowered its admission age to eleven, Church and Primary leaders discussed whether the Primary or the YOUNG MEN’S organization should direct the activities of the eleven-year-old boys. Although the National Scout Committee initially opposed having women leaders direct a scouting program, the Primary obtained permission for women to administer SCOUTING activities for boys until they turned twelve. The Primary also adopted Cub Scouting, thereby assuming responsibility for four years of scouting. LDS women helped open the Boy Scouts program to women leaders nationwide. They served not only in local troops but eventually on local and national boards. In 1967 Parmley became the first woman member of a national scouting committee and later served on several scouting boards. She received the highest honors awarded by the Boy Scouts of America, including the Silver Buffalo award.

LaVern W. Parmley (1900–1980), fifth general president of the Primary Association, served from 1951 to 1974.

President Parmley also supervised the adaptation of the Primary organization to serve the needs of a growing, widely distributed world membership. When Primary membership doubled during her first decade as president, she doubled the members on the Primary General Board. She set up committees to establish new activities, including an annual sacrament meeting presentation by the children, special Primaries for handicapped children, and a reverence program. As editor of the CHILDREN'S FRIEND, she restructured its format to make it a magazine for children (see FRIEND). Under her direction, teacher training, which began with Primary, developed into a well-ordered general Church program.

As the Church grew, stake Primary conventions and general Primary conferences were discontinued. The Church began to centralize the publication of educational materials, and Primary publications were reduced. President Parmley responded to these challenges by standardizing lesson materials and by preparing audiovisual and printed materials for presentation to Primary leaders in regional meetings.

A major challenge during her administration was the need to accommodate the Primary program to the CORRELATION process implemented in 1961 to place all Church programs under the authority and direction of the priesthood. As part of the process, responsibility for Primary lessons was transferred to the Church Correlation Committee. In a spirit of cooperation, President Parmley helped merge the goals and programs of the Primary into a larger Church-sponsored program for children.

President Parmley helped promote the construction of a new Primary Children's Hospital (later Primary Children's Medical Center), completed in 1952, and encouraged donations from Primary children. As Primary president, she served as chairman of the board for the hospital until 1970. When the Health Service Corporation was organized later that year to oversee all LDS hospitals, she was appointed a board member. In 1975, after she was released as Primary president, the Primary Children's Hospital was transferred to Intermountain Health Care, a private nonprofit corporation (see HOSPITALS).

LaVern Parmley presided over the Primary Association at a time when its programs became more complex and wide-ranging than at any earlier time in its history. As its president during a period of rapid Church growth and expansion, she traveled more than any Primary president before her, providing firsthand supervision and unity in an organization otherwise subject to much local variation. Her contributions are reflected in the organization and direction of Primary today.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Madsen, Carol Cornwall, and Susan Staker Oman. Sisters and Little Saints. Salt Lake City, 1979.

Parmley, Martha LaVern Watts. Oral history interview with Jill Mulvey Derr, 1974–1976. Church Archives, Historical Dept., Salt Lake City.

JESSIE L. EMBRY

---

PASSOVER

See: Law of Moses

---

PATRIARCH

[This entry consists of two articles: Stake Patriarch and Patriarch to the Church. A patriarch is a Church priesthood calling. Each stake has one or more patriarchs and their duties are given in the first article. The second article gives the history of the Church office Patriarch to the Church.]

STAKE PATRIARCH

Each STAKE in the Church has at least one patriarch ordained, as the Prophet Joseph SMITH wrote, "for the benefit of the posterity of the Saints as it was with Jacob in giving his patriarchal blessing unto his sons" (WJS, p. 6). Age is not a factor, and the call, which is for voluntary service in giving patriarchal blessings to stake members, may come to any worthy, spiritually mature high priest.

The fathers from Adam to Jacob are seen as patriarchs of this order. The word "patriarch" is often used in the Bible as a title of honor for the early leaders of the Israelites. It is perhaps in this sense that Peter spoke of "the patriarch David" helped open the Boy Scouts program to women leaders nationwide. They served not only in local troops but eventually on local and national boards. In 1967 Parmley became the first woman member of a national scouting committee and later served on several scouting boards. She received the highest honors awarded by the Boy Scouts of America, including the Silver Buffalo award.

President Parmley also supervised the adaptation of the Primary organization to serve the needs of a growing, widely distributed world membership. When Primary membership doubled during her first decade as president, she doubled the members on the Primary General Board. She set up committees to establish new activities, including an annual sacrament meeting presentation by the children, special Primaries for handicapped children, and a reverence program. As editor of the CHILDREN'S FRIEND, she restructured its format to make it a magazine for children (see FRIEND). Under her direction, teacher training, which began with Primary, developed into a well-ordered general Church program.

As the Church grew, stake Primary conventions and general Primary conferences were discontinued. The Church began to centralize the publication of educational materials, and Primary publications were reduced. President Parmley responded to these challenges by standardizing lesson materials and by preparing audiovisual and printed materials for presentation to Primary leaders in regional meetings.

A major challenge during her administration was the need to accommodate the Primary program to the CORRELATION process implemented in 1961 to place all Church programs under the authority and direction of the priesthood. As part of the process, responsibility for Primary lessons was transferred to the Church Correlation Committee. In a spirit of cooperation, President Parmley helped merge the goals and programs of the Primary into a larger Church-sponsored program for children.

President Parmley helped promote the construction of a new Primary Children's Hospital (later Primary Children's Medical Center), completed in 1952, and encouraged donations from Primary children. As Primary president, she served as chairman of the board for the hospital until 1970. When the Health Service Corporation was organized later that year to oversee all LDS hospitals, she was appointed a board member. In 1975, after she was released as Primary president, the Primary Children's Hospital was transferred to Intermountain Health Care, a private nonprofit corporation (see HOSPITALS).

LaVern Parmley presided over the Primary Association at a time when its programs became more complex and wide-ranging than at any earlier time in its history. As its president during a period of rapid Church growth and expansion, she traveled more than any Primary president before her, providing firsthand supervision and unity in an organization otherwise subject to much local variation. Her contributions are reflected in the organization and direction of Primary today.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Madsen, Carol Cornwall, and Susan Staker Oman. Sisters and Little Saints. Salt Lake City, 1979.

Parmley, Martha LaVern Watts. Oral history interview with Jill Mulvey Derr, 1974–1976. Church Archives, Historical Dept., Salt Lake City.

JESSIE L. EMBRY

---

PASSOVER

See: Law of Moses

---

PATRIARCH

[This entry consists of two articles: Stake Patriarch and Patriarch to the Church. A patriarch is a Church priesthood calling. Each stake has one or more patriarchs and their duties are given in the first article. The second article gives the history of the Church office Patriarch to the Church.]

STAKE PATRIARCH

Each STAKE in the Church has at least one patriarch ordained, as the Prophet Joseph SMITH wrote, "for the benefit of the posterity of the Saints as it was with Jacob in giving his patriarchal blessing unto his sons" (WJS, p. 6). Age is not a factor, and the call, which is for voluntary service in giving patriarchal blessings to stake members, may come to any worthy, spiritually mature high priest.

The fathers from Adam to Jacob are seen as patriarchs of this order. The word "patriarch" is often used in the Bible as a title of honor for the early leaders of the Israelites. It is perhaps in this sense that Peter spoke of "the patriarch David"

(Acts 2:29). Stephen spoke of the sons of Jacob as "the twelve patriarchs" (Acts 7:8-9). These men may have been natural patriarchs, being fathers, and some of them may also have been ordained to the patriarchal priesthood. By right of this priesthood and under inspiration, they could confer upon their sons and daughters promises, privileges, and duties like unto those of the family of Abraham.

The Doctrine and Covenants speaks of "evangelical ministers," which is understood to refer to patriarchs. The Council of the Twelve Apostles has the responsibility of calling and ordaining stake patriarchs "as they shall be designated unto them by revelation" (D&C 107:39). This responsibility is now generally delegated to stake presidents. A stake patriarch may also give patriarchal blessings outside his stake to members of his own family. If he moves to another stake, his jurisdiction there requires approval through the Council of the Twelve.

The training and preparation of patriarchs includes spiritual enhancement through prayer and righteous living, constant study of the scriptural and historical heritage of the calling, and occasional meetings where they are instructed by their leaders.

Members of the Church receive a blessing from a stake patriarch only on a bishop's recommendation following an interview. Approval is based on a desire and readiness to receive the blessing, and on personal worthiness as shown by faithfulness in the gospel and Church service. The blessing is given in a quiet setting, usually a room in the stake center or the home of the patriarch. Parents, a spouse, or other immediate family members may be invited to witness the blessing. The recipient is seated. The patriarch lays his hands on the head of the person and invokes the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. In the spirit of fasting and prayer all present are united in faith to seek inspired insight into the birthright blessings and destinies of the recipient. The patriarch also seeks inspiration to specify the dominant family line that leads back to Abraham. Then, as manifested by the Spirit, the patriarch gives admonitions, promises, and assurances.

The stake patriarch always records and transcribes the blessings he gives. The original copy is sent to the patriarchal division of the Church Historical Department. A copy given to the individual becomes a permanent record that is held sacred. It is usually available only to the recipient, or later to his family and descendants.

The appointment of stake patriarchs does not preempt the calling and right of every father in the Church who holds the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD also to give each of his children father's blessings. Both ordained patriarchs and priesthood-bearing fathers have the power, through spiritual inspiration, to give a priesthood blessing that will look down the corridor of time and expand the vision, strengthen the faith, and clarify the life mission of the one receiving the blessing.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Widtsoe, John A. Evidences and Reconciliations, chap. 16, pp. 321-25. Salt Lake City, 1967.

ARIEL S. BALLIF

PATRIARCH TO THE CHURCH

Before 1979, Patriarch to the Church was a Church officer whose chief duty was to confer patriarchal blessings on Church members who generally did not have the service of stake patriarchs readily available to them. The Prophet Joseph SMITH explained that an "evangelist" (as in Ephesians 4:11) is a "patriarch" (TPJS, p. 151); that is, he confers the blessings of a patriarch upon members of the Church. Patriarchs are currently ordained in individual stakes of the Church, but for many years there was a patriarch to the entire Church. He was considered one of the GENERAL AUTHORITIES.

On December 18, 1833, in KIRTLAND, OHIO, Joseph SMITH, Sr., was ordained the first Patriarch to the Church (D&C 107:39-56), with jurisdiction throughout the Church. Upon his death, he was succeeded by his oldest living son, Hyrum SMITH, who served until he was martyred on June 27, 1844. William Smith, a younger brother, was ordained Patriarch to the Church on May 24, 1845, by the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, but William was rejected by the Church on October 6, 1845, for misconduct. The office was vacant until January 1, 1849, when John Smith, brother of Joseph Smith, Sr., was called. He served until his death on May 23, 1854.

A second John Smith, son of Hyrum Smith, was Patriarch to the Church from February 18, 1855, until November 6, 1911. Hyrum Gibbs Smith, grandson of the second John Smith, then served from May 9, 1912, until February 4, 1932.

For ten years Acting Patriarchs were called who were not in the direct hereditary line. They included Nicholas G. Smith (October 1932 to October 1934), Frank B. Woodbury (June 1935 to October 1937), and George F. Richards (October 1937 to October 1942).

The call returned to the hereditary line on October 3, 1942, with the call of Elder Joseph Fielding SMITH (1899–1964), a great-grandson of Hyrum Smith. He was released at his own request on October 7, 1946, because of poor health. Eldred G. Smith, eldest son of Hyrum Gibbs Smith, was called in April 1947.

In 1979 the office of Patriarch to the Church was retired “because of the large increase in the number of stake patriarchs and the availability of patriarchal service throughout the world.” Eldred G. Smith was designated “a Patriarch Emeritus, which means that he is honorably relieved of all duties and responsibilities pertaining to the office of Patriarch to the Church” (CR [Oct. 1979]:25).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Joseph Fielding. In Doctrines of Salvation, comp. Bruce R. McConkie, Vol. 3, pp. 104–108, 162–72. Salt Lake City, 1956.

CALVIN R. STEPHENS

---

PATRIARCHAL BLESSINGS

The practice of a father blessing his sons and daughters can be traced from earliest times. ADAM, as the first patriarch and father of the human race, blessed his son SETH, promising that “his posterity should be the chosen of the Lord, and that they should be preserved unto the end of the earth” (D&C 107:42). Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob blessed their children, opening up a vision of their inheritance and their destinies (e.g., Gen. 28:4; 49:3–27).

Each family in the Church, and the larger family that is the Church, perpetuates this heritage. Members have the right to go to the stake patriarch for a Church blessing. Stake patriarchs are ordained wherever the Church is organized that all may have this privilege.

Patriarchal blessings are given by the authority of the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD which “is to hold the keys of all the spiritual blessings of the Church” (D&C 107:18).

When God covenanted with Abraham that through his posterity all the families of the earth would be blessed, he promised “the blessings of the Gospel, which are the blessings of salvation, even of life eternal” (Abr. 2:11). The scope of these promises, both here and hereafter, is outlined in modern day scripture:

Abraham received promises concerning his seed, and of the fruit of his loins . . . which were to continue so long as they were in the world; and as touching Abraham and his seed, out of the world they should continue. . . . This promise is yours also, because ye are of Abraham, and the promise was made unto Abraham [D&C 132:30–31].

An essential part of a patriarchal blessing is a declaration of lineage. The patriarch seeks inspiration to specify the dominant family line that leads back to Abraham. The majority of modern blessings have designated EPHRAIM or MANASSEH as the main link in this tracing, but others of every tribe of Israel have also been named. Whether this is a pronouncement of blood inheritance or of adoption does not matter (see Abr. 2:10). It is seen as the line and legacy through which one’s blessings are transmitted. Thus the blessings “of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob” are conferred.

In addition, as the patriarch seeks the SPIRIT he may be moved to give admonitions, promises, and assurances. Individual traits of personality and strengths and weaknesses may be mentioned. Against the backdrop of the prophetic anticipation of world events, individual roles and CALLINGS may be named. One’s spiritual gifts, talents, skills, and potentials may be specified with their associated obligations of gratitude and dedication. Karl G. Maeser described these blessings as “paragraphs from the book of one’s possibilities” (Alma P. Burton, Karl G. Maeser: Mormon Educator, p. 82 [Salt Lake City, 1953]).

It is continually taught in the Church that the fulfillment of patriarchal blessings, as of all divine promises, is conditioned on the faith and works of the individual. Typically, blessings close with such a statement as, “I pronounce these blessings upon your head according to your faith and your diligence in keeping the commandments of the Lord.”

The practice of giving patriarchal blessings is a constant reminder of the honor and glory of family: that one is not alone and that every person stands on the shoulders of those who have gone before. They prompt those who receive blessings to “look unto Abraham, your father,” (2 Ne. 8:2) to “do the

For ten years Acting Patriarchs were called who were not in the direct hereditary line. They included Nicholas G. Smith (October 1932 to October 1934), Frank B. Woodbury (June 1935 to October 1937), and George F. Richards (October 1937 to October 1942).

The call returned to the hereditary line on October 3, 1942, with the call of Elder Joseph Fielding SMITH (1899–1964), a great-grandson of Hyrum Smith. He was released at his own request on October 7, 1946, because of poor health. Eldred G. Smith, eldest son of Hyrum Gibbs Smith, was called in April 1947.

In 1979 the office of Patriarch to the Church was retired “because of the large increase in the number of stake patriarchs and the availability of patriarchal service throughout the world.” Eldred G. Smith was designated “a Patriarch Emeritus, which means that he is honorably relieved of all duties and responsibilities pertaining to the office of Patriarch to the Church” (CR [Oct. 1979]:25).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Joseph Fielding. In Doctrines of Salvation, comp. Bruce R. McConkie, Vol. 3, pp. 104–108, 162–72. Salt Lake City, 1956.

CALVIN R. STEPHENS

---

PATRIARCHAL BLESSINGS

The practice of a father blessing his sons and daughters can be traced from earliest times. ADAM, as the first patriarch and father of the human race, blessed his son SETH, promising that “his posterity should be the chosen of the Lord, and that they should be preserved unto the end of the earth” (D&C 107:42). Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob blessed their children, opening up a vision of their inheritance and their destinies (e.g., Gen. 28:4; 49:3–27).

Each family in the Church, and the larger family that is the Church, perpetuates this heritage. Members have the right to go to the stake patriarch for a Church blessing. Stake patriarchs are ordained wherever the Church is organized that all may have this privilege.

Patriarchal blessings are given by the authority of the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD which “is to hold the keys of all the spiritual blessings of the Church” (D&C 107:18).

When God covenanted with Abraham that through his posterity all the families of the earth would be blessed, he promised “the blessings of the Gospel, which are the blessings of salvation, even of life eternal” (Abr. 2:11). The scope of these promises, both here and hereafter, is outlined in modern day scripture:

Abraham received promises concerning his seed, and of the fruit of his loins . . . which were to continue so long as they were in the world; and as touching Abraham and his seed, out of the world they should continue. . . . This promise is yours also, because ye are of Abraham, and the promise was made unto Abraham [D&C 132:30–31].

An essential part of a patriarchal blessing is a declaration of lineage. The patriarch seeks inspiration to specify the dominant family line that leads back to Abraham. The majority of modern blessings have designated EPHRAIM or MANASSEH as the main link in this tracing, but others of every tribe of Israel have also been named. Whether this is a pronouncement of blood inheritance or of adoption does not matter (see Abr. 2:10). It is seen as the line and legacy through which one’s blessings are transmitted. Thus the blessings “of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob” are conferred.

In addition, as the patriarch seeks the SPIRIT he may be moved to give admonitions, promises, and assurances. Individual traits of personality and strengths and weaknesses may be mentioned. Against the backdrop of the prophetic anticipation of world events, individual roles and CALLINGS may be named. One’s spiritual gifts, talents, skills, and potentials may be specified with their associated obligations of gratitude and dedication. Karl G. Maeser described these blessings as “paragraphs from the book of one’s possibilities” (Alma P. Burton, Karl G. Maeser: Mormon Educator, p. 82 [Salt Lake City, 1953]).

It is continually taught in the Church that the fulfillment of patriarchal blessings, as of all divine promises, is conditioned on the faith and works of the individual. Typically, blessings close with such a statement as, “I pronounce these blessings upon your head according to your faith and your diligence in keeping the commandments of the Lord.”

The practice of giving patriarchal blessings is a constant reminder of the honor and glory of family: that one is not alone and that every person stands on the shoulders of those who have gone before. They prompt those who receive blessings to “look unto Abraham, your father,” (2 Ne. 8:2) to “do the works of Abraham" (D&C 132:32; cf. John 8:39), to be willing to be "chastened and tried even as Abraham" (D&C 101:4), and to recognize that Abraham's willingness in offering up his son was "a similitude of God and his Only Begotten Son" (Jacob 4:5). In short, the command to honor one's father and mother does not end with death, nor with the unfolding growth of the human family.

All patriarchal blessings are recorded and transcribed; copies are preserved in official Church archives and by the recipient. They are held sacred by those receiving them.

In the history of ISRAEL, as of the Latter-day Saints, the moving appeal of these blessings is incalculable. They open many doors to self-awareness. They have inspired men and women of renown, as well as those in the most obscure and remote places, to lose themselves in a realization of mission; to serve and give in the spirit of CONSECRATION. They have been a strength amidst the tests and temptations of life, a comfort in the darkness of bereavement and loss, and an anchor in stormy days, a "daily help in all the affairs of life" (Widtsoe, p. 74).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Widtsoe, John A. Evidences and Reconciliations. Salt Lake City, pp. 72-77.

WILLIAM JAMES MORTIMER

PATRIARCHAL ORDER OF THE PRIESTHOOD

To Latter-day Saints, the patriarchal order of the priesthood is the organizing power and principle of celestial family life. It is the ultimate and ideal form of government. It answers the query of Elder Parley P. Pratt: "Who can endure to be forever banished and separated from father, mother, wife, children and every kindred affection and from every family tie?" (Pratt, Utah Genealogical and Historical Magazine 23 [Apr. 1932]:59).

In The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints there are two priesthood divisions: the Aaronic and the Melchizedek. The highest order of the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD is patriarchal authority. The order was divinely established with father ADAM and mother EVE. They are the fount and progenitors of all living, and they will appear at the culmination of earth's history at the head of the whole sealed family of the redeemed. The promises given to ABRAHAM and SARAH pertain to this same order.

Three principles underlie the patriarchal order. First, the primal parents of the race were in their paradisiacal state in Eden united in eternal bonds before death entered their lives. Second, the fall of man and the continual source of degeneration in this world have resulted in the estrangement of parents from God, from each other, and from their children. Third, the healing of this broken harmony is the essence of ETERNAL LIFE, as is the perpetuation of powers of creation and procreation—eternal increase.

The patriarchal order is, in the words of Elder James E. Talmage, a condition where "woman shares with man the blessings of the Priesthood," where husband and wife minister, "seeing and understanding alike, and cooperating to the full in the government of their family kingdom" (Young Woman's Journal 25 [Oct. 1914]:602-603). A man cannot hold this priesthood without a wife, and a woman cannot share the blessings of this priesthood without a husband, sealed in the TEMPLE.

Concerning patriarchal authority, the Prophet Joseph SMITH admonished the Saints: "Go to and finish the [Nauvoo] temple, and God will fill it with power, and you will then receive more knowledge concerning this priesthood" (TPJS, p. 323, cf. D&C 107:18, 20). This priesthood and its associated powers were introduced in NAUVOO, Illinois, in 1843. It was first conferred upon the FIRST PRESIDENCY, the APOSTLES, and their wives (WJS, pp. 244-45).

Today dedicated husbands and wives enter this order in the temple in a COVENANT with God. The blessings of this priesthood is given only to husbands and wives together. Their covenants extend beyond this life (D&C 76:59, 60), beyond death (D&C 132:20-24), and into the resurrection, to eternal lives, the eternal giving and receiving of life.

Thus united, they work in love, faith, and harmony for the glorification of their family. If they are not united in obedient love, if they are not one, they are not of the Lord. Eventually, through this order, families will be linked in indissoluble bonds all the way back to the first parents, and all the way forward to the last child born into this world. This priesthood order will be both the means and the end of reconciliation, redemption, peace, joy, and eternal life.

LYNN A. MCKINLAY

works of Abraham" (D&C 132:32; cf. John 8:39), to be willing to be "chastened and tried even as Abraham" (D&C 101:4), and to recognize that Abraham's willingness in offering up his son was "a similitude of God and his Only Begotten Son" (Jacob 4:5). In short, the command to honor one's father and mother does not end with death, nor with the unfolding growth of the human family.

All patriarchal blessings are recorded and transcribed; copies are preserved in official Church archives and by the recipient. They are held sacred by those receiving them.

In the history of ISRAEL, as of the Latter-day Saints, the moving appeal of these blessings is incalculable. They open many doors to self-awareness. They have inspired men and women of renown, as well as those in the most obscure and remote places, to lose themselves in a realization of mission; to serve and give in the spirit of CONSECRATION. They have been a strength amidst the tests and temptations of life, a comfort in the darkness of bereavement and loss, and an anchor in stormy days, a "daily help in all the affairs of life" (Widtsoe, p. 74).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Widtsoe, John A. Evidences and Reconciliations. Salt Lake City, pp. 72-77.

WILLIAM JAMES MORTIMER

PATRIARCHAL ORDER OF THE PRIESTHOOD

To Latter-day Saints, the patriarchal order of the priesthood is the organizing power and principle of celestial family life. It is the ultimate and ideal form of government. It answers the query of Elder Parley P. Pratt: "Who can endure to be forever banished and separated from father, mother, wife, children and every kindred affection and from every family tie?" (Pratt, Utah Genealogical and Historical Magazine 23 [Apr. 1932]:59).

In The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints there are two priesthood divisions: the Aaronic and the Melchizedek. The highest order of the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD is patriarchal authority. The order was divinely established with father ADAM and mother EVE. They are the fount and progenitors of all living, and they will appear at the culmination of earth's history at the head of the whole sealed family of the redeemed. The promises given to ABRAHAM and SARAH pertain to this same order.

Three principles underlie the patriarchal order. First, the primal parents of the race were in their paradisiacal state in Eden united in eternal bonds before death entered their lives. Second, the fall of man and the continual source of degeneration in this world have resulted in the estrangement of parents from God, from each other, and from their children. Third, the healing of this broken harmony is the essence of ETERNAL LIFE, as is the perpetuation of powers of creation and procreation—eternal increase.

The patriarchal order is, in the words of Elder James E. Talmage, a condition where "woman shares with man the blessings of the Priesthood," where husband and wife minister, "seeing and understanding alike, and cooperating to the full in the government of their family kingdom" (Young Woman's Journal 25 [Oct. 1914]:602-603). A man cannot hold this priesthood without a wife, and a woman cannot share the blessings of this priesthood without a husband, sealed in the TEMPLE.

Concerning patriarchal authority, the Prophet Joseph SMITH admonished the Saints: "Go to and finish the [Nauvoo] temple, and God will fill it with power, and you will then receive more knowledge concerning this priesthood" (TPJS, p. 323, cf. D&C 107:18, 20). This priesthood and its associated powers were introduced in NAUVOO, Illinois, in 1843. It was first conferred upon the FIRST PRESIDENCY, the APOSTLES, and their wives (WJS, pp. 244-45).

Today dedicated husbands and wives enter this order in the temple in a COVENANT with God. The blessings of this priesthood is given only to husbands and wives together. Their covenants extend beyond this life (D&C 76:59, 60), beyond death (D&C 132:20-24), and into the resurrection, to eternal lives, the eternal giving and receiving of life.

Thus united, they work in love, faith, and harmony for the glorification of their family. If they are not united in obedient love, if they are not one, they are not of the Lord. Eventually, through this order, families will be linked in indissoluble bonds all the way back to the first parents, and all the way forward to the last child born into this world. This priesthood order will be both the means and the end of reconciliation, redemption, peace, joy, and eternal life.

LYNN A. MCKINLAY

---

PATTEN, DAVID W.

David Wyman Patten (1799–1838), son of Benenio (Benoni) Patten and Abigale (Edith) Cole, was born in Theresa, Jefferson County, New York, on November 14, 1799. He left his home at an early age and settled near Dundee, Monroe County, Michigan. In 1828 he married Phoebe Ann Babcock. They had no children.

Patten first became acquainted with the Book of Mormon around 1830. In May 1832 he received a letter from his brother John, who was living in Green County, Indiana, noting that he had joined The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Patten journeyed to Indiana and was baptized by his brother on June 15, 1832. Two days later he was ordained an elder by Elisha H. Groves. On September 2, 1832, he was ordained a high priest by Hyrum Smith.

Until his death in 1838, Patten served almost continuously as a missionary for the Church. He established numerous branches of the Church on each of his proselytizing journeys and was renowned for his spiritual gift of healing.

On February 14, 1835, Patten was chosen as one of the Twelve Apostles and was ordained the following day by Oliver Cowdery. On May 2, 1835, the Prophet Joseph Smith directed that the seniority of the Twelve be determined according to the members' ages. Patten was uncertain of his exact birth date, and Thomas B. Marsh (born 1800) was mistakenly adjudged to be the older of the two, and thus was made the President of the Quorum.

During the latter part of 1836, Elder Patten settled in Far West, Missouri. Following Church action taken against the presidency of the stake in Missouri (David Whitmer, William W. Phelps, and John Whitmer) in early February 1838, Thomas B. Marsh and Patten were appointed as Presidents pro tem of the Church in Missouri. On April 6, 1838, Patten and Brigham Young were sustained as assistant presidents of the Church in Missouri, with Thomas B. Marsh as President pro tem.

In April 1838, Joseph Smith received a revelation instructing Patten to prepare for a mission with the Twelve the following spring (D&C 114); however, Patten did not live to fulfill the assignment. He died on October 25, 1838, from a wound suffered in a battle at Crooked River when a contingent of Caldwell County militia (all Mormons), under his leadership, attempted to rescue three Latter-day Saints who had been taken prisoners by a company of Missourians from Ray County. He was buried in Far West, Missouri, two days later. In January 1841 a revelation was given to Joseph Smith in which the Lord indicated that David W. Patten "is with me at this time" (D&C 124:19, 130).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Jenson, Andrew. Latter-day Saint Biographical Encyclopedia, Vol. 1, pp. 76–80. Salt Lake City, 1901.

Wilson, Lycurgus A. Life of David W. Patten, the First Apostolic Martyr. Salt Lake City, 1900.

ALEXANDER L. BAUGH

---

PAUL

The Church recognizes Paul as a true APOSTLE of Jesus Christ. No other early Apostle has had the impact on subsequent believers through both his personal example and his written words that Paul has. The early Christian apostle to the Gentiles, in his New Testament letters, produced a rich source of Christian doctrine and the single most important doctrinal influence upon many of the denominations of modern Christendom. Without Paul, the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ would be largely missing from the Bible, and considerably less would be known about grace, the Lord's Supper, church structure, the Apostasy, or the role of gifts of the spirit in the Church.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH. Details of Paul's life are found in his letters and in the book of Acts. Born in Tarsus of Cilicia (modern southeastern Turkey), Paul was multicultural. As a Jew, he was known by the name of Saul and was educated in Jerusalem as a Pharisee under the famous rabbi Gamaliel. He was also a Roman citizen by birth, a rare privilege for a Jew at that time. Finally, he was familiar with Greek language and culture through his early environment in the Hellenistic city of Tarsus. Thus, he was able to deal with Jews, Romans, and Greeks on their own cultural terms—a great advantage for his later missionary work.

As a Pharisee working for the Jewish high priest, Saul was an early and zealous persecutor of Christians and personally assented to the execution of Stephen (Acts 7:58–8:3). However, as Saul traveled toward Damascus to arrest Christians there, the resurrected Christ appeared to him in a

---

PATTEN, DAVID W.

David Wyman Patten (1799–1838), son of Benenio (Benoni) Patten and Abigale (Edith) Cole, was born in Theresa, Jefferson County, New York, on November 14, 1799. He left his home at an early age and settled near Dundee, Monroe County, Michigan. In 1828 he married Phoebe Ann Babcock. They had no children.

Patten first became acquainted with the Book of Mormon around 1830. In May 1832 he received a letter from his brother John, who was living in Green County, Indiana, noting that he had joined The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Patten journeyed to Indiana and was baptized by his brother on June 15, 1832. Two days later he was ordained an elder by Elisha H. Groves. On September 2, 1832, he was ordained a high priest by Hyrum Smith.

Until his death in 1838, Patten served almost continuously as a missionary for the Church. He established numerous branches of the Church on each of his proselytizing journeys and was renowned for his spiritual gift of healing.

On February 14, 1835, Patten was chosen as one of the Twelve Apostles and was ordained the following day by Oliver Cowdery. On May 2, 1835, the Prophet Joseph Smith directed that the seniority of the Twelve be determined according to the members' ages. Patten was uncertain of his exact birth date, and Thomas B. Marsh (born 1800) was mistakenly adjudged to be the older of the two, and thus was made the President of the Quorum.

During the latter part of 1836, Elder Patten settled in Far West, Missouri. Following Church action taken against the presidency of the stake in Missouri (David Whitmer, William W. Phelps, and John Whitmer) in early February 1838, Thomas B. Marsh and Patten were appointed as Presidents pro tem of the Church in Missouri. On April 6, 1838, Patten and Brigham Young were sustained as assistant presidents of the Church in Missouri, with Thomas B. Marsh as President pro tem.

In April 1838, Joseph Smith received a revelation instructing Patten to prepare for a mission with the Twelve the following spring (D&C 114); however, Patten did not live to fulfill the assignment. He died on October 25, 1838, from a wound suffered in a battle at Crooked River when a contingent of Caldwell County militia (all Mormons), under his leadership, attempted to rescue three Latter-day Saints who had been taken prisoners by a company of Missourians from Ray County. He was buried in Far West, Missouri, two days later. In January 1841 a revelation was given to Joseph Smith in which the Lord indicated that David W. Patten "is with me at this time" (D&C 124:19, 130).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Jenson, Andrew. Latter-day Saint Biographical Encyclopedia, Vol. 1, pp. 76–80. Salt Lake City, 1901.

Wilson, Lycurgus A. Life of David W. Patten, the First Apostolic Martyr. Salt Lake City, 1900.

ALEXANDER L. BAUGH

---

PAUL

The Church recognizes Paul as a true APOSTLE of Jesus Christ. No other early Apostle has had the impact on subsequent believers through both his personal example and his written words that Paul has. The early Christian apostle to the Gentiles, in his New Testament letters, produced a rich source of Christian doctrine and the single most important doctrinal influence upon many of the denominations of modern Christendom. Without Paul, the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ would be largely missing from the Bible, and considerably less would be known about grace, the Lord's Supper, church structure, the Apostasy, or the role of gifts of the spirit in the Church.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH. Details of Paul's life are found in his letters and in the book of Acts. Born in Tarsus of Cilicia (modern southeastern Turkey), Paul was multicultural. As a Jew, he was known by the name of Saul and was educated in Jerusalem as a Pharisee under the famous rabbi Gamaliel. He was also a Roman citizen by birth, a rare privilege for a Jew at that time. Finally, he was familiar with Greek language and culture through his early environment in the Hellenistic city of Tarsus. Thus, he was able to deal with Jews, Romans, and Greeks on their own cultural terms—a great advantage for his later missionary work.

As a Pharisee working for the Jewish high priest, Saul was an early and zealous persecutor of Christians and personally assented to the execution of Stephen (Acts 7:58–8:3). However, as Saul traveled toward Damascus to arrest Christians there, the resurrected Christ appeared to him in a vision. As a result of this experience, Saul embraced the cause of Christ and spent the rest of his life in his service.

After baptism, Saul “went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus” (Gal. 1:17). He was so effective in preaching Christ that he provoked much Jewish opposition and was eventually compelled to flee for his life. Returning to Jerusalem after three years, he met briefly with Peter and James, the Lord’s brother, and then went to Cilicia and Syria, where he spent approximately the next decade preaching the gospel.

Barnabas brought Saul to Antioch, whence they left on their first missionary journey. On this journey, Saul began using his Roman name, Paul, and established his basic strategy for missionary work. Whenever he entered a city, Paul went first to the Jews, preaching Christ in their synagogues. Usually they would reject his message, but Gentiles associated with the synagogues would frequently be converted; Paul would then turn his attention to teaching the Gentiles of that city and would establish a branch of the Church made up of Gentiles and perhaps a few Jewish converts.

Two more missionary journeys of over three years each are described in Acts, and Paul was successful in teaching the gospel and establishing churches throughout much of present-day Turkey and Greece. Returning to Jerusalem after his third missionary journey, Paul met with such intense Jewish opposition to his presence in the temple that he was put into custody by the Romans and held in prison in Caesarea for two years before being sent to Rome for trial. Though shipwrecked on the way, he was eventually imprisoned in Rome and was executed around A.D. 64, during the reign of the emperor Nero.

The Prophet Joseph SMITH gave a description of Paul: about five feet tall, dark hair, penetrating eyes, and a powerful orator (TPJS, p. 180; WJS, p. 59). He also indicated that Paul was acquainted with ENOCH (TPJS, p. 170) and that Abel “was sent down from heaven unto Paul to minister consoling words, and to commit unto him a knowledge of the mysteries of godliness” (TPJS, p. 169).

PAUL’S TEACHINGS. One of Paul’s greatest contributions to the New Testament is his forceful statement of justification (that is, being absolved of guilt) by faith in Christ (cf. Gal. 2–3; Rom. 2–5). Early on, Paul had taught his gentile converts that they did not need to live the LAW OF MOSES in order to be justified before God. It was sufficient to make and keep the gospel COVENANT, the covenant of faith, to do this, while outward observance of the law of Moses was not (Gal. 2:16). In particular, after Christ’s atonement, there was no longer any necessity of observing the earlier law and covenant of Moses, which were rendered obsolete by the law and covenant of the gospel (cf. Heb. 8:6–13; 3 Ne. 9:17–20). Thus, Paul’s Gentile converts did not need to become Jews in order to become Christians (cf. Acts 15:5–29), for human beings are “justified by faith without the deeds of the law” (Rom. 3:28). A complete commitment to the gospel of Jesus Christ, the covenant of faith, automatically fulfills all previous obligations before God, including the obligations of the law of Moses.

Paul also taught the related doctrine of salvation by grace. Latter-day Saints recognize at least four ways in which Paul spoke of salvation as an operation of the grace of God. First, through the atonement of Christ, a free gift, Adam’s posterity is not accountable for the transgression of Adam (Rom. 5:18–21). Second, it naturally follows that death—a consequence of Adam’s transgression—will be done away by the gift of resurrection that will be graciously given to all human beings (1 Cor. 15:21–22). Third, the fact that God has offered a new covenant of faith in place of the old rules of performances and ordinances, which mankind then was not able to live perfectly, is in itself an act of grace. And fourth, that the Savior volunteered to suffer and die for the sake of others is the greatest expression of the grace of God. Thus, salvation is accessible to mankind only through the gracious acts and gifts of God. As Paul said, “We have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God” (Rom. 5:2). However, in Paul’s theology, the doctrines of salvation by grace and justification by faith do not eliminate but require the absolute necessity for high personal standards of conduct (1 Cor. 6:9–11; Gal. 5:19–21).

Paul also taught that God’s knowledge is unlimited and that God’s plan has anticipated all future events and cannot be thwarted. God knows the end from the beginning and has already prepared the inheritance of those who choose to keep his will (Eph. 1:4–14). Though the King James Version of the Bible uses the problematic word “predestinated” (Greek, proorizō), Latter-day Saints do not understand it to mean that some are saved and some are damned according to a prior decision by God. Latter-day Saints prefer the term FOREORDINATION to “predestination” and insist that the FOREKNOWLEDGE OF GOD does not impinge upon the free agency of human beings.

Not all, or possibly not even most, of Paul’s letters have been preserved. Latter-day Saints believe that if a more complete collection of Paul’s letters had survived, it would reflect a theology much like that of the restored gospel of latter days. They see support for this in the number of references in Paul to doctrines that are now peculiar to the Latter-day Saints, such as BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD (1 Cor. 15:29), the three DEGREES OF GLORY (1 Cor. 15:39–41; 2 Cor. 12:2), the PREMORTAL LIFE (Eph. 1:4), and the necessity of an ecclesiastical organization that includes apostles and prophets (Eph. 2:19–20; 4:11–13). Latter-day Saints assume that Paul did not expand on these topics in his extant writings because they were written to people who already knew about them.

Paul is a major source of predictions of the apostasy of the early Christian church. He is quoted in Acts 20:29–30 as warning the elders from Ephesus and Miletus that grievous wolves would descend after his departure, “not sparing the flock,” and that disaffected members would tear up the Church from within. He warned the Thessalonians not to expect the coming of Christ before the Apostasy had taken place (2 Thes. 2:2–3). Significantly, he reminded both groups that this warning had been part of his preaching from the first (2 Thes. 2:5; Acts 20:31).

Latter-day Saints do not see in Paul an opposition to women, sex, or marriage. Rather, Paul’s general statement of principle on marriage is “Let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband” (1 Cor. 7:2; cf. Heb. 13:4). Paul goes on to address special circumstances (1 Cor. 7:8–16) and admonishes all people to care first for the things of God (verses 25–38), but his advice regarding particular situations should not be confused with his general policy. Husbands are to love their wives, and vice versa (Eph. 5:28), for “neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord” (1 Cor. 11:11). It is clear that women were valued associates and held positions of responsibility in Paul’s congregations (cf. Rom. 16:1–4).

Paul’s influence upon Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saints is seen at many points. Joseph Smith referred to “the admonition of Paul” (cf. Philip. 4:8) in describing the highest moral aspirations of the Latter-day Saints (A of F 13). The language of Paul is discernible in most of the Articles of Faith (e.g., in A of F 4 on the first principles of the gospel [cf. Heb. 6:1–2]; in A of F 5 on ordination to the priesthood [cf. 1 Tim. 4:14]; in A of F 6 on the officers of the Primitive Church [cf. Eph. 4:11]; and in A of F 7 on the gifts of the spirit [cf. 1 Cor. 12:8–12]), and part of the sublime hymn to charity (1 Cor. 13:4–8) is also found in the Book of Mormon (Moro. 7:45–46). These are taken as indications that Jesus was the ultimate source of all of these teachings.

Of Paul’s life, the Prophet Joseph Smith observed:

Follow the labors of this Apostle from the time of his conversion to the time of his death, and you will have a fair sample of industry and patience in promulgating the Gospel of Christ. Derided, whipped, and stoned, the moment he escaped the hands of his persecutors he as zealously as ever proclaimed the doctrine of the Savior. . . . Paul rested his hope in Christ, because he had kept the faith, and loved His appearing and from His hand he had a promise of receiving a crown of righteousness [TPJS, pp. 63–64].

[See also Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible (JST); New Testament.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard Lloyd. Understanding Paul. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, Vols. 2–3. Salt Lake City, 1970–1973.
- Sperry, Sidney B. Paul’s Life and Letters. Salt Lake City, 1955.

J. PHILIP SCHAELELLING

---

PEACE

See: War and Peace

---

PEARL OF GREAT PRICE

[The Pearl of Great Price consists of a diverse collection of sacred works that are accepted as scripture by Latter-day Saints. The article Contents and Publication offers an overview of the individual texts in the collection as well as details about the history of how the documents were brought together and were then received as scripture by Church members. The article titled Literature briefly treats the variety of literary features that characterize the Pearl of Great Price.]

decision by God. Latter-day Saints prefer the term FOREORDINATION to “predestination” and insist that the FOREKNOWLEDGE OF GOD does not impinge upon the free agency of human beings.

Not all, or possibly not even most, of Paul’s letters have been preserved. Latter-day Saints believe that if a more complete collection of Paul’s letters had survived, it would reflect a theology much like that of the restored gospel of latter days. They see support for this in the number of references in Paul to doctrines that are now peculiar to the Latter-day Saints, such as BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD (1 Cor. 15:29), the three DEGREES OF GLORY (1 Cor. 15:39–41; 2 Cor. 12:2), the PREMORTAL LIFE (Eph. 1:4), and the necessity of an ecclesiastical organization that includes apostles and prophets (Eph. 2:19–20; 4:11–13). Latter-day Saints assume that Paul did not expand on these topics in his extant writings because they were written to people who already knew about them.

Paul is a major source of predictions of the apostasy of the early Christian church. He is quoted in Acts 20:29–30 as warning the elders from Ephesus and Miletus that grievous wolves would descend after his departure, “not sparing the flock,” and that disaffected members would tear up the Church from within. He warned the Thessalonians not to expect the coming of Christ before the Apostasy had taken place (2 Thes. 2:2–3). Significantly, he reminded both groups that this warning had been part of his preaching from the first (2 Thes. 2:5; Acts 20:31).

Latter-day Saints do not see in Paul an opposition to women, sex, or marriage. Rather, Paul’s general statement of principle on marriage is “Let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband” (1 Cor. 7:2; cf. Heb. 13:4). Paul goes on to address special circumstances (1 Cor. 7:8–16) and admonishes all people to care first for the things of God (verses 25–38), but his advice regarding particular situations should not be confused with his general policy. Husbands are to love their wives, and vice versa (Eph. 5:28), for “neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord” (1 Cor. 11:11). It is clear that women were valued associates and held positions of responsibility in Paul’s congregations (cf. Rom. 16:1–4).

Paul’s influence upon Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saints is seen at many points. Joseph Smith referred to “the admonition of Paul” (cf. Philip. 4:8) in describing the highest moral aspirations of the Latter-day Saints (A of F 13). The language of Paul is discernible in most of the Articles of Faith (e.g., in A of F 4 on the first principles of the gospel [cf. Heb. 6:1–2]; in A of F 5 on ordination to the priesthood [cf. 1 Tim. 4:14]; in A of F 6 on the officers of the Primitive Church [cf. Eph. 4:11]; and in A of F 7 on the gifts of the spirit [cf. 1 Cor. 12:8–12]), and part of the sublime hymn to charity (1 Cor. 13:4–8) is also found in the Book of Mormon (Moro. 7:45–46). These are taken as indications that Jesus was the ultimate source of all of these teachings.

Of Paul’s life, the Prophet Joseph Smith observed:

Follow the labors of this Apostle from the time of his conversion to the time of his death, and you will have a fair sample of industry and patience in promulgating the Gospel of Christ. Derided, whipped, and stoned, the moment he escaped the hands of his persecutors he as zealously as ever proclaimed the doctrine of the Savior. . . . Paul rested his hope in Christ, because he had kept the faith, and loved His appearing and from His hand he had a promise of receiving a crown of righteousness [TPJS, pp. 63–64].

[See also Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible (JST); New Testament.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Richard Lloyd. Understanding Paul. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, Vols. 2–3. Salt Lake City, 1970–1973.
- Sperry, Sidney B. Paul’s Life and Letters. Salt Lake City, 1955.

J. PHILIP SCHAELELLING

---

PEACE

See: War and Peace

---

PEARL OF GREAT PRICE

[The Pearl of Great Price consists of a diverse collection of sacred works that are accepted as scripture by Latter-day Saints. The article Contents and Publication offers an overview of the individual texts in the collection as well as details about the history of how the documents were brought together and were then received as scripture by Church members. The article titled Literature briefly treats the variety of literary features that characterize the Pearl of Great Price.]

CONTENTS AND PUBLICATION

One of the four STANDARD WORKS accepted as scripture by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the Pearl of Great Price includes various documents known as “Selections from the Book of Moses,” “The Book of Abraham,” “Joseph Smith—Matthew,” “Joseph Smith—History,” and “The Articles of Faith.”

It was first published at Liverpool, England, in 1851 by Franklin D. Richards, then president of the British Mission and a member of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES, in response to requests from converts for further information about their new church. In addition to selected revelations from Genesis in the JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE (JST) and the BOOK OF ABRAHAM, the 1851 edition contained Matthew 24 as revealed to the Prophet Joseph SMITH in 1831 (currently titled JOSEPH SMITH—MATTHEW); “A Key to the Revelations of St. John” (now D&C 77), a revelation received by Joseph Smith on December 25, 1832 (now D&C 87); and Joseph Smith’s 1838 account of his early VISIONS and translation of the Book of Mormon (now JOSEPH SMITH—HISTORY). It also incorporated certain extracts from the Doctrine and Covenants (sections 20, 107, and 27), thirteen untitled statements previously published in the Times and Seasons in March 1842 and now known as the ARTICLES OF FAITH, and a poem titled “Truth” that later became the LDS hymn “Oh Say, What Is Truth?”

The book of Moses originally consisted of several revelations given to Joseph Smith as he was revising the Bible under inspiration, beginning in June 1830. In the 1851 edition of the Pearl of Great Price, these excerpts were untitled. The 1878 edition added the titles “Visions of Moses” (chap. 1) and “Writings of Moses” (chaps. 2–8). These revelations were first printed in Church newspapers between 1832 and 1851 (Clark, pp. 9–17).

The book of Abraham is linked to Joseph Smith’s work on rolls of papyri that the Church obtained in 1835. Soon after he began studying the rolls, he produced a record of the life of the patriarch Abraham and a description of the creation of the world similar to that in Genesis and the book of Moses. In 1842 the Nauvoo Times and Seasons and the Millennial Star in England printed the available text and facsimiles. It is certain that the materials incorporated into the books of Moses and Abraham were extracts and that more information was available than has ever been included in the printed editions of the Pearl of Great Price.

The second edition of the Pearl of Great Price, the first American edition, was published at Salt Lake City in 1878 and added “A Revelation on the Eternity of the Marriage Covenant, Including Plurality of Wives,” which is now known as Doctrine and Covenants section 132. On October 10, 1880, in general conference at Salt Lake City, the membership of the Church accepted the Pearl of Great Price as a standard work. When additional changes were made—including page size and format—another vote in 1890 reaffirmed the acceptance of the Pearl of Great Price as scripture.

Cover of the first edition of the Pearl of Great Price, published by Elder Franklin D. Richards at Liverpool in 1851 as a “choice selection” of revelations, translations, and narrations of Joseph Smith. The Pearl of Great Price was accepted as a standard work by the body of the Church in 1880. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

James E. Talmage, later a member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, under assignment of the FIRST PRESIDENCY, divided the work into chapters and verses, added some titles (such as "The Book of Moses"), and eliminated some portions, such as the materials also published in the Doctrine and Covenants. These changes were formally approved by Church membership at the October conference of 1902.

At general conference on April 3, 1976, Joseph Smith's vision of the CELESTIAL KINGDOM received in the Kirtland Temple on January 21, 1836, and President Joseph F. SMITH's vision of the redemption of the dead (October 3, 1918) were added to the Pearl of Great Price. In 1979 these two revelations were transferred to the Doctrine and Covenants as sections 137 and 138.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Clark, James R. The Story of the Pearl of Great Price. Salt Lake City, 1955.
- Millet, Robert L., and Kent P. Jackson, eds. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 2. Salt Lake City, 1985.
- Peterson, H. Donl, and Charles D. Tate, Jr., eds. The Pearl of Great Price: Revelations from God. Provo, Utah, 1989.

KENNETH W. BALDRIDGE

LITERATURE

Drawing the effective metaphor of its title from the literary treasures of the Savior's parables (Matt. 13:45), this book of scripture—despite its diversity of sections—consistently sustains a grandeur of language enriched throughout with vivid word pictures and the subtle touches of diverse literary techniques.

For example, Enoch hears and describes the personified soul of the earth alliteratively as the "mother of men" agonizing from the bowels of the earth that she is "weary" of "wickedness." The tension of the drama resolves itself as the voice uses assonance in pleading for "righteousness" to "abide" for a season (Moses 7:48).

Also remarkable is the artistic control of tone throughout the narrative of JOSEPH SMITH—HISTORY. Despite his having been the victim of severe persecution, Joseph objectively selects connotative words that allow the readers to discover for themselves the abuse he had suffered. In describing the deep schisms among the sects in his village, he skillfully calls into question the "great love" and "great zeal" of the clergy in their efforts to have everybody "converted," as they were "pleased to call it." The irony of tone remains dignified but becomes incrementally more poignant as he next refers to their "seemingly good feelings" being "more pretended than real"; he finalizes his deep disappointment by leaving no doubt regarding the irony: "So that all their good feelings one for another, if they ever had any, were entirely lost in a strife of words and a contest about opinions" (JS—H 1:6).

The final verse in the Pearl of Great Price addresses the value of artistry not only in writing but also in all aspects of life. Referring to the literarily beautiful writings of Paul, it affirms Joseph Smith's conviction that the Latter-day Saints must search the handiwork of God for all that is "virtuous, lovely, or of good report" (A of F 13).

O. GLADE HUNSAKER

---

PEARL OF GREAT PRICE, JESUS CHRIST IN

See: Jesus Christ in the Scriptures: Pearl of Great Price

---

"PECULIAR" PEOPLE

Latter-day Saints consider themselves a peculiar people in the biblical sense of being a covenant people with the Lord. Their lifestyle, stemming from the doctrines and practices of the Church, also makes them a different or peculiar people. In any dispensation, followers of Jesus Christ produce a distinct culture:

Is there a gospel culture? . . . Is there a gospel community or society? . . . Zion has always been described as a city, an organized society, set apart from the world. If the community preserves its integrity for any length of time, it is bound to emerge as a separate culture. The earliest reference to the culture I have in mind is Israel as the "peculiar people." Moses and Aaron disengaged the children of Israel from the culture of Egypt, the most distinctive culture of its time. The Lord tells them: "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people" [Ex. 19:4–5; Nibley, pp. 22–23].

James E. Talmage, later a member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, under assignment of the FIRST PRESIDENCY, divided the work into chapters and verses, added some titles (such as "The Book of Moses"), and eliminated some portions, such as the materials also published in the Doctrine and Covenants. These changes were formally approved by Church membership at the October conference of 1902.

At general conference on April 3, 1976, Joseph Smith's vision of the CELESTIAL KINGDOM received in the Kirtland Temple on January 21, 1836, and President Joseph F. SMITH's vision of the redemption of the dead (October 3, 1918) were added to the Pearl of Great Price. In 1979 these two revelations were transferred to the Doctrine and Covenants as sections 137 and 138.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Clark, James R. The Story of the Pearl of Great Price. Salt Lake City, 1955.
- Millet, Robert L., and Kent P. Jackson, eds. Studies in Scripture, Vol. 2. Salt Lake City, 1985.
- Peterson, H. Donl, and Charles D. Tate, Jr., eds. The Pearl of Great Price: Revelations from God. Provo, Utah, 1989.

KENNETH W. BALDRIDGE

LITERATURE

Drawing the effective metaphor of its title from the literary treasures of the Savior's parables (Matt. 13:45), this book of scripture—despite its diversity of sections—consistently sustains a grandeur of language enriched throughout with vivid word pictures and the subtle touches of diverse literary techniques.

For example, Enoch hears and describes the personified soul of the earth alliteratively as the "mother of men" agonizing from the bowels of the earth that she is "weary" of "wickedness." The tension of the drama resolves itself as the voice uses assonance in pleading for "righteousness" to "abide" for a season (Moses 7:48).

Also remarkable is the artistic control of tone throughout the narrative of JOSEPH SMITH—HISTORY. Despite his having been the victim of severe persecution, Joseph objectively selects connotative words that allow the readers to discover for themselves the abuse he had suffered. In describing the deep schisms among the sects in his village, he skillfully calls into question the "great love" and "great zeal" of the clergy in their efforts to have everybody "converted," as they were "pleased to call it." The irony of tone remains dignified but becomes incrementally more poignant as he next refers to their "seemingly good feelings" being "more pretended than real"; he finalizes his deep disappointment by leaving no doubt regarding the irony: "So that all their good feelings one for another, if they ever had any, were entirely lost in a strife of words and a contest about opinions" (JS—H 1:6).

The final verse in the Pearl of Great Price addresses the value of artistry not only in writing but also in all aspects of life. Referring to the literarily beautiful writings of Paul, it affirms Joseph Smith's conviction that the Latter-day Saints must search the handiwork of God for all that is "virtuous, lovely, or of good report" (A of F 13).

O. GLADE HUNSAKER

---

PEARL OF GREAT PRICE, JESUS CHRIST IN

See: Jesus Christ in the Scriptures: Pearl of Great Price

---

"PECULIAR" PEOPLE

Latter-day Saints consider themselves a peculiar people in the biblical sense of being a covenant people with the Lord. Their lifestyle, stemming from the doctrines and practices of the Church, also makes them a different or peculiar people. In any dispensation, followers of Jesus Christ produce a distinct culture:

Is there a gospel culture? . . . Is there a gospel community or society? . . . Zion has always been described as a city, an organized society, set apart from the world. If the community preserves its integrity for any length of time, it is bound to emerge as a separate culture. The earliest reference to the culture I have in mind is Israel as the "peculiar people." Moses and Aaron disengaged the children of Israel from the culture of Egypt, the most distinctive culture of its time. The Lord tells them: "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people" [Ex. 19:4–5; Nibley, pp. 22–23].

But to the extent that a covenant people do not honor their allegiance to God, they become more like the cultures they are raised in and are indistinguishable from those who know not God (see Smith, W., 1959). Nevertheless, when a people honor their commitment to God, there are evidences that distinguish them and make them peculiar to the population at large. "By their fruits ye shall know them" (Matt. 7:20; see also 1 Jn. 3:10-18; Moro. 7:5-17).

Large comparisons of LDS behavior patterns with those of the general population are not extensive in the research literature, but because Latter-day Saints comprise 70 percent of the population of Utah, comparisons of Utah data with regional and national samples give a reliable estimate of how Latter-day Saints differ from the general population. And demographers who have compared Utah Latter-day Saints with those living elsewhere in the United States find more similarities than differences, and conclude that "Utah Mormons are not distinctive compared to Mormons elsewhere" (Heaton, "Demography," p. 193).

Latter-day Saints are taught to live by a health code requiring abstention from alcohol, tobacco, tea, and coffee (see WORD OF WISDOM). Utah ranks lowest of the fifty states in the consumption of all types of alcoholic beverages. Utah's mortality rate from diseases related to alcohol and tobacco use (heart disease/stroke and cancer) is very low (Smith, James E., p. 69).

Latter-day Saints value education highly, and the percentage of the Utah population completing up to three years of high school ranks first in the nation (93 percent), and Utah is seventh in the nation in both graduation rates from high school (80 percent) and from four-year colleges (20 percent) (Van Mondfrans, Smith, and Moss, pp. 198-99). Moreover, the relationship between education and religiosity among Latter-day Saints is the opposite of the national trend, with the most educated Mormons being the most actively involved in the Church (Albrecht).

For Latter-day Saints married in a temple, family commitments are not only for mortality but for eternity, and divorce rates among temple-married Latter-day Saints have traditionally been much lower than for those who marry by civil authority or marry non-Latter-day Saints (Thomas, p. 49). Also, premarital sexual involvement is a sin in LDS doctrine, and Utah unmarried teenagers report substantially lower rates of sexual intercourse than either the regional or national averages. Moreover, higher rates of sexual abstinence among unmarried adolescents in Utah are positively correlated with religious affiliation and attendance (especially LDS membership) and with the following characteristics, which reflect LDS counsel: living with both biological parents, educational aspirations, the avoidance of early and steady dating, abstention from drug and alcohol use, and personal belief in premarital abstinence (Governor's Task Force on Teenage Pregnancy Prevention, "Preventing Teenage Pregnancy in Utah," Oct. 3, 1988, p. 39; see LIFESTYLE; see also Miller, McCoy, and Olson).

Many of the "peculiar" features of LDS lives reflect faith in the counsel of modern prophets who offer revelation about how followers of Jesus Christ should operate in the world without becoming of the world. This counsel has included among many other things encouraging the observance of FAMILY HOME EVENING, keeping JOURNALS, planting gardens, avoiding debt, not dating until the age of sixteen, and preparing food and resources to meet emergencies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Albrecht, Stan L. "The Consequential Dimension of Mormon Religiosity." BYU Studies 29 (Spring 1989):57-108.
- Chadwick, Bruce A. "Teenage Pregnancy and Out-of-Wedlock Births." In Utah in Demographic Perspective, ed. T. Martin, T. Heaton, and S. Bahr, pp. 23-36. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Heaton, Tim B. "The Demography of Utah Mormons." In Utah in Demographic Perspective, ed. T. Martin, T. Heaton, and S. Bahr, pp. 181-93. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- . "Four C's of the Mormon Family: Chastity, Conjugal-ity, Children, and Chauvinism." In The Religion and Family Connection: Social Science Perspectives, ed. Darwin L. Thomas, pp. 107-24. Provo, Utah, 1988.
- Miller, Brent C.; J. Kelly McCoy; and Terrance D. Olson. "Dating Age and Stage as Correlates of Adolescent Sexual Attitudes and Behavior." Journal of Adolescent Research 1 No. 3 (1986):361-71.
- Nibley, Hugh W. "Comments, Hugh [W.] Nibley." In Mormonism: A Faith for All Cultures, ed. F. LaMond Tullis, pp. 22-28. Provo, Utah, 1978.
- Smith, James E. "Mortality." In Utah in Demographic Perspective, ed. T. Martin, T. Heaton, and S. Bahr, pp. 59-69. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Smith, Wilford E. "The Urban Threat to Mormon Norms." Rural Sociology 24 (1959):355-61.
- . "Mormon Sex Standards on College Campuses, or Deal Us Out of the Sexual Revolution!" Dialogue 10 (1976):76-81.
- Thomas, Darwin L. "Do Early Marriages Tend to End in Disaster?" New Era 3 (Mar. 1973):48-50.

Van Mondfrans, Adrian; Ralph B. Smith; and Vanessa Moss. "Education." In Utah in Demographic Perspective, ed. T. Martin, T. Heaton, and S. Bahr, pp. 195–215. Salt Lake City, 1986.

WILFORD E. SMITH

---

PERDITION, SONS OF

See: Sons of Perdition

---

PERFECTION

Through all generations, God has commanded his children to be perfect. His mandates to Abraham, "Walk before me, and be thou perfect" (Gen. 17:1), and to the Israelites, "Thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God" (Deut. 18:13), were one with his charge, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48; cf. 3 Ne. 12:48).

Although the Savior's injunction is an unequivocal call to perfection, Latter-day Saints recognize that only he was totally without blemish or stain and was perfect in an infinite and absolute sense. "And being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him" (Heb. 5:9).

Human beings are required to seek perfection in certain respects that are attainable in mortality only through Christ. The New Testament refers to "them that are perfect" (1 Cor. 2:6; cf. Matt. 19:21; James 3:2; Heb. 12:23), and the Greek word teleios, meaning "perfect," also means "complete, whole, fully initiated, mature." Such maturity and completeness consist of receiving the fulness of the gospel, walking by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, repenting of one's sins, receiving necessary ordinances, being faithful to covenants with the Lord, obeying the Lord and submitting to his will, seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and having charity, "the bond of perfectness and peace" (D&C 88:125).

Latter-day prophets have taught that men and women can become perfect "in the spheres in which [they] are called to act . . . [and that] we may become as perfect in our sphere as God is perfect in his higher and more exalted sphere" (Smith, p. 252; cf. JD 6:99; 2:129; 10:223). Mortal beings have the comforting assurance that God "giveth no commandments unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them" (1 Ne. 3:7).

Mormons believe that Jesus Christ provides the means for all humans to become perfect. He is "the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by [him]" (John 14:6). Through his atoning sacrifice all men and women can repent and become perfected by having their sins and errors and the desire for sin removed. Ultimately, eternal life and godly perfection are gifts of God (D&C 14:7), rooted in the grace of God, redemption, individual righteousness, and being born of God. Human effort falls short; God's gift of grace compensates for this shortcoming, "for we know that it is by grace that we are saved, after all we can do" (2 Ne. 25:23).

The process by which faithful Saints advance toward perfection is gradual, made step by step. Just as the Savior "continued from grace to grace, until he received a fulness" (D&C 93:13), so God gives his children milk before meat (1 Cor. 3:2; Heb. 5:12; D&C 19:22). "It is not requisite that a man should run faster than he has strength" (Mosiah 4:27). This process is variously described as a "ladder" (TPJS, p. 348), a "road" (DS 2:18–19), and a "process to be pursued throughout one's lifetime" (Kimball, p. 6). In 1831 the Lord admonished the Saints to "continue in patience until ye are perfected" (D&C 67:13).

Although to many the goal of perfection seems overwhelming, Christ promised, "My yoke is easy, and my burden is light" (Matt. 11:30). While obedience to the commandments is essential, the spirit of perfection is contrary to ever-lengthening checklists of outward acts visible to others. Rather, prophets invite all to "come unto Christ, and be perfected in him, and deny yourselves of all ungodliness; . . . and love God with all your might, mind and strength, then is his grace sufficient for you" (Moro. 10:32). Therein lies the power to overcome sin and discouragement.

The man or woman who seeks the perfection of the Redeemer participates in the Father's work of saving and exalting mankind: "He proceeds to help his frail fellow men in their attempts to progress; thus becoming a partner with God in working out the plan of salvation" (Widtsoe, p. 180). Latter-day Saints believe that they must become perfected and one in spirit, as individuals and as a body (Eph. 4:12), in order to inherit the kingdom of God.

[See also HOLINESS; SANCTIFICATION.]

Van Mondfrans, Adrian; Ralph B. Smith; and Vanessa Moss. "Education." In Utah in Demographic Perspective, ed. T. Martin, T. Heaton, and S. Bahr, pp. 195–215. Salt Lake City, 1986.

WILFORD E. SMITH

---

PERDITION, SONS OF

See: Sons of Perdition

---

PERFECTION

Through all generations, God has commanded his children to be perfect. His mandates to Abraham, "Walk before me, and be thou perfect" (Gen. 17:1), and to the Israelites, "Thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God" (Deut. 18:13), were one with his charge, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48; cf. 3 Ne. 12:48).

Although the Savior's injunction is an unequivocal call to perfection, Latter-day Saints recognize that only he was totally without blemish or stain and was perfect in an infinite and absolute sense. "And being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him" (Heb. 5:9).

Human beings are required to seek perfection in certain respects that are attainable in mortality only through Christ. The New Testament refers to "them that are perfect" (1 Cor. 2:6; cf. Matt. 19:21; James 3:2; Heb. 12:23), and the Greek word teleios, meaning "perfect," also means "complete, whole, fully initiated, mature." Such maturity and completeness consist of receiving the fulness of the gospel, walking by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, repenting of one's sins, receiving necessary ordinances, being faithful to covenants with the Lord, obeying the Lord and submitting to his will, seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and having charity, "the bond of perfectness and peace" (D&C 88:125).

Latter-day prophets have taught that men and women can become perfect "in the spheres in which [they] are called to act . . . [and that] we may become as perfect in our sphere as God is perfect in his higher and more exalted sphere" (Smith, p. 252; cf. JD 6:99; 2:129; 10:223). Mortal beings have the comforting assurance that God "giveth no commandments unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them" (1 Ne. 3:7).

Mormons believe that Jesus Christ provides the means for all humans to become perfect. He is "the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by [him]" (John 14:6). Through his atoning sacrifice all men and women can repent and become perfected by having their sins and errors and the desire for sin removed. Ultimately, eternal life and godly perfection are gifts of God (D&C 14:7), rooted in the grace of God, redemption, individual righteousness, and being born of God. Human effort falls short; God's gift of grace compensates for this shortcoming, "for we know that it is by grace that we are saved, after all we can do" (2 Ne. 25:23).

The process by which faithful Saints advance toward perfection is gradual, made step by step. Just as the Savior "continued from grace to grace, until he received a fulness" (D&C 93:13), so God gives his children milk before meat (1 Cor. 3:2; Heb. 5:12; D&C 19:22). "It is not requisite that a man should run faster than he has strength" (Mosiah 4:27). This process is variously described as a "ladder" (TPJS, p. 348), a "road" (DS 2:18–19), and a "process to be pursued throughout one's lifetime" (Kimball, p. 6). In 1831 the Lord admonished the Saints to "continue in patience until ye are perfected" (D&C 67:13).

Although to many the goal of perfection seems overwhelming, Christ promised, "My yoke is easy, and my burden is light" (Matt. 11:30). While obedience to the commandments is essential, the spirit of perfection is contrary to ever-lengthening checklists of outward acts visible to others. Rather, prophets invite all to "come unto Christ, and be perfected in him, and deny yourselves of all ungodliness; . . . and love God with all your might, mind and strength, then is his grace sufficient for you" (Moro. 10:32). Therein lies the power to overcome sin and discouragement.

The man or woman who seeks the perfection of the Redeemer participates in the Father's work of saving and exalting mankind: "He proceeds to help his frail fellow men in their attempts to progress; thus becoming a partner with God in working out the plan of salvation" (Widtsoe, p. 180). Latter-day Saints believe that they must become perfected and one in spirit, as individuals and as a body (Eph. 4:12), in order to inherit the kingdom of God.

[See also HOLINESS; SANCTIFICATION.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- "Becoming Justified and Sanctified." In Relief Society Personal Study Guide, pp. 63–69. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Kimball, Spencer W. "Hold Fast to the Iron Rod." Ensign 8 (Nov. 1978):4–6.
- Lund, Gerald N. "Are We Expected to Achieve Perfection in this Life?" Ensign 16 (Aug. 1986):39–41.
- Smith, Joseph F. Gospel Doctrine, p. 252. Salt Lake City, 1939.
- Widtsoe, John A. Evidences and Reconciliations, p. 180. Salt Lake City, 1960.

CAROL LEE HAWKINS

PERPETUAL EMIGRATING FUND (PEF)

To assist Latter-day Saints in the eastern United States and Europe to gather to Church headquarters in the West (see GATHERING), the Church inaugurated the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company in 1849. It is probable that before its demise in 1887, the Emigrating Company assisted more than 30,000 individuals to travel to Utah.

The PEF used Church assets and private contributions to assist individuals commensurate with their inability to pay. With limited funds, fewer individuals could be assisted than wished to participate. Those receiving priority included individuals with skills urgently needed in the West, those whose relatives or friends had contributed to the PEF, and those with longest membership in the Church. Cost-cutting measures, including group contracting, doubling up families in wagons, and organizing HANDCART COMPANIES, were also adopted to make the available funds stretch as far as possible.

PEF assistance was always extended as a loan rather than as a gift. Sponsored emigrants signed a note obligating themselves to repay the PEF as they were able. Though it sometimes required years, and some never fully retired their debt, many repaid their loan in cash, commodities, or labor. In 1880, on the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Church, President John TAYLOR, in the tradition of the Israelite jubilee year, forgave half of the outstanding debt owed by the poor to the fund, while those who were able to pay were still expected to do so. In late 1887, under provisions of the Edmunds-Tucker Act (see ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION), the U.S. government dissolved both the Corporation of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company.

[See also Immigration and Emigration.]

Monarch of the Sea, the largest sailing vessel to transport LDS immigrants from Europe to America, carried the two largest companies of 955 and 974 people, in 1861 and 1864 respectively. Immigration to Utah was made possible for many more by borrowing from the Perpetual Emigrating Fund. Courtesy Peabody Museum, Salem, Massachusetts.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- "Becoming Justified and Sanctified." In Relief Society Personal Study Guide, pp. 63–69. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Kimball, Spencer W. "Hold Fast to the Iron Rod." Ensign 8 (Nov. 1978):4–6.
- Lund, Gerald N. "Are We Expected to Achieve Perfection in this Life?" Ensign 16 (Aug. 1986):39–41.
- Smith, Joseph F. Gospel Doctrine, p. 252. Salt Lake City, 1939.
- Widtsoe, John A. Evidences and Reconciliations, p. 180. Salt Lake City, 1960.

CAROL LEE HAWKINS

PERPETUAL EMIGRATING FUND (PEF)

To assist Latter-day Saints in the eastern United States and Europe to gather to Church headquarters in the West (see GATHERING), the Church inaugurated the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company in 1849. It is probable that before its demise in 1887, the Emigrating Company assisted more than 30,000 individuals to travel to Utah.

The PEF used Church assets and private contributions to assist individuals commensurate with their inability to pay. With limited funds, fewer individuals could be assisted than wished to participate. Those receiving priority included individuals with skills urgently needed in the West, those whose relatives or friends had contributed to the PEF, and those with longest membership in the Church. Cost-cutting measures, including group contracting, doubling up families in wagons, and organizing HANDCART COMPANIES, were also adopted to make the available funds stretch as far as possible.

PEF assistance was always extended as a loan rather than as a gift. Sponsored emigrants signed a note obligating themselves to repay the PEF as they were able. Though it sometimes required years, and some never fully retired their debt, many repaid their loan in cash, commodities, or labor. In 1880, on the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Church, President John TAYLOR, in the tradition of the Israelite jubilee year, forgave half of the outstanding debt owed by the poor to the fund, while those who were able to pay were still expected to do so. In late 1887, under provisions of the Edmunds-Tucker Act (see ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION), the U.S. government dissolved both the Corporation of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company.

[See also Immigration and Emigration.]

Monarch of the Sea, the largest sailing vessel to transport LDS immigrants from Europe to America, carried the two largest companies of 955 and 974 people, in 1861 and 1864 respectively. Immigration to Utah was made possible for many more by borrowing from the Perpetual Emigrating Fund. Courtesy Peabody Museum, Salem, Massachusetts.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. Great Basin Kingdom. Cambridge, Mass, 1958.
- Jensen, Richard J. "The British Gathering to Zion." In Truth Will Prevail: The Rise of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the British Isles, 1837–1987, pp. 165–98. Cambridge, England, 1987.

DAVID F. BOONE

PERSECUTION

Jesus told his followers that they would be persecuted, but promised them a great reward in heaven (Matt. 5:11–12). Latter-day Saints believe that righteously enduring persecution can bring blessings in both this life and the next. Although suffering is as unwelcome to Latter-day Saints as to any other people, they strive to respond with patience and faith and to avoid bitterness or revenge (Matt. 5:43–47; D&C 101:35; cf. 98:23–27).

Although Latter-day Saints claim no greater suffering than many others who have also been persecuted for their religious beliefs through the ages, many Latter-day Saints have been persecuted, beginning with Joseph SMITH (see JS—H 1:33). As the Church grew, persecutions increased; the Latter-day Saints faced threats, murder, rape, mayhem, property damage, and revilement in Kirtland, Ohio (1831–1838), in Missouri (1831–1839), and in the area of Nauvoo, Illinois (1839–1846), culminating in the assassinations of Joseph and Hyrum Smith at Carthage, Illinois, in 1844 (Hull, pp. 643–52).

The isolation and safety of the Great Basin in the American West, to which the main body of the Church fled beginning in 1846–1847, lasted only a few years before persecutions were renewed. The Great Basin area became part of the United States in 1848 after the Mexican-American War, and soon federal laws against the practice of plural marriage forced many Latter-day Saints into hiding or to settlements in Mexico and Canada. More than one thousand Latter-day Saints, mostly polygamous husbands, were fined and imprisoned. Ultimately, ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION disenfranchised the Saints and disincorporated the Church, allowing confiscation of Church property. After the 1890 MANIFESTO enjoining plural marriage, anti-Mormon persecution declined substantially, but other hostilities persisted.

Anti-Mormon literature has often incited and precipitated persecution, from early attempts to discredit Joseph Smith and the Book of Mormon, to recent films misrepresenting LDS doctrine. LDS missionaries have sometimes especially been persecuted. Some missionaries sent to England and Scandinavia in the 1830s and 1850s were confronted by mobs, threats, imprisonment, and physical harm. Several missionaries and potential converts were murdered in the United States at the height of antipolygamy agitation during the 1870s. As recently as 1990, two LDS missionaries were killed in Huancayo, Peru, by anti-American terrorists, and Church property was vandalized or destroyed in several South American countries.

Scriptural examples provide comfort and perspective to Latter-day Saints by showing that in God's eternal plan persecutions are sometimes allowed, with blessings then coming to the persecuted (Ivins, pp. 408–413). The biblical stories of Joseph (Gen. 37–46) and Esther (Esth. 2–9) demonstrate that faith can overcome persecution and bring honor to the persecuted. In the Book of Mormon, the Ammonites provide a poignant example of a people who became dedicated to righteousness, willing to suffer persecution and death rather than break their covenants (Alma 24). Many have also been comforted by the Lord's words to Joseph Smith when he was falsely accused and wrongfully imprisoned. Despite his many trials, the Lord reminded Joseph that the Savior had endured even more, and promised him, "All these things shall give thee experience, and shall be for thy good" (D&C 122:7). He expanded the Prophet's perspective to eternity with the statement "Fear not what man can do, for God shall be with you forever and ever" (D&C 122:9).

The LDS response to persecution is to temper sorrow and anger in accordance with scriptural counsel. The Savior's admonition to turn the other cheek (Matt. 5:39–42) is expanded in the Doctrine and Covenants: Great rewards are promised to those who do not seek retribution and retaliate, but the persecuted may seek for justice after they have suffered repeated offenses and given their adversaries adequate prior warnings (D&C 98:23–31). Patience and tolerance are admonished in the Book of Mormon (Alma 1:21) and in Articles of Faith 11 and 13. A true Latter-day Saint hopes to be reconciled to, and perhaps even to convert, an enemy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. Great Basin Kingdom. Cambridge, Mass, 1958.
- Jensen, Richard J. "The British Gathering to Zion." In Truth Will Prevail: The Rise of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the British Isles, 1837–1987, pp. 165–98. Cambridge, England, 1987.

DAVID F. BOONE

PERSECUTION

Jesus told his followers that they would be persecuted, but promised them a great reward in heaven (Matt. 5:11–12). Latter-day Saints believe that righteously enduring persecution can bring blessings in both this life and the next. Although suffering is as unwelcome to Latter-day Saints as to any other people, they strive to respond with patience and faith and to avoid bitterness or revenge (Matt. 5:43–47; D&C 101:35; cf. 98:23–27).

Although Latter-day Saints claim no greater suffering than many others who have also been persecuted for their religious beliefs through the ages, many Latter-day Saints have been persecuted, beginning with Joseph SMITH (see JS—H 1:33). As the Church grew, persecutions increased; the Latter-day Saints faced threats, murder, rape, mayhem, property damage, and revilement in Kirtland, Ohio (1831–1838), in Missouri (1831–1839), and in the area of Nauvoo, Illinois (1839–1846), culminating in the assassinations of Joseph and Hyrum Smith at Carthage, Illinois, in 1844 (Hull, pp. 643–52).

The isolation and safety of the Great Basin in the American West, to which the main body of the Church fled beginning in 1846–1847, lasted only a few years before persecutions were renewed. The Great Basin area became part of the United States in 1848 after the Mexican-American War, and soon federal laws against the practice of plural marriage forced many Latter-day Saints into hiding or to settlements in Mexico and Canada. More than one thousand Latter-day Saints, mostly polygamous husbands, were fined and imprisoned. Ultimately, ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION disenfranchised the Saints and disincorporated the Church, allowing confiscation of Church property. After the 1890 MANIFESTO enjoining plural marriage, anti-Mormon persecution declined substantially, but other hostilities persisted.

Anti-Mormon literature has often incited and precipitated persecution, from early attempts to discredit Joseph Smith and the Book of Mormon, to recent films misrepresenting LDS doctrine. LDS missionaries have sometimes especially been persecuted. Some missionaries sent to England and Scandinavia in the 1830s and 1850s were confronted by mobs, threats, imprisonment, and physical harm. Several missionaries and potential converts were murdered in the United States at the height of antipolygamy agitation during the 1870s. As recently as 1990, two LDS missionaries were killed in Huancayo, Peru, by anti-American terrorists, and Church property was vandalized or destroyed in several South American countries.

Scriptural examples provide comfort and perspective to Latter-day Saints by showing that in God's eternal plan persecutions are sometimes allowed, with blessings then coming to the persecuted (Ivins, pp. 408–413). The biblical stories of Joseph (Gen. 37–46) and Esther (Esth. 2–9) demonstrate that faith can overcome persecution and bring honor to the persecuted. In the Book of Mormon, the Ammonites provide a poignant example of a people who became dedicated to righteousness, willing to suffer persecution and death rather than break their covenants (Alma 24). Many have also been comforted by the Lord's words to Joseph Smith when he was falsely accused and wrongfully imprisoned. Despite his many trials, the Lord reminded Joseph that the Savior had endured even more, and promised him, "All these things shall give thee experience, and shall be for thy good" (D&C 122:7). He expanded the Prophet's perspective to eternity with the statement "Fear not what man can do, for God shall be with you forever and ever" (D&C 122:9).

The LDS response to persecution is to temper sorrow and anger in accordance with scriptural counsel. The Savior's admonition to turn the other cheek (Matt. 5:39–42) is expanded in the Doctrine and Covenants: Great rewards are promised to those who do not seek retribution and retaliate, but the persecuted may seek for justice after they have suffered repeated offenses and given their adversaries adequate prior warnings (D&C 98:23–31). Patience and tolerance are admonished in the Book of Mormon (Alma 1:21) and in Articles of Faith 11 and 13. A true Latter-day Saint hopes to be reconciled to, and perhaps even to convert, an enemy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B. "Why Did People Act That Way? Some Observations on Religious Intolerance and Persecution in the American Past." Ensign 8 (Dec. 1978):21-24.
- Arrington, Leonard J., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience, chaps. 3-5, 9. New York, 1979.
- The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, ed. My Kingdom Shall Roll Forth, chap. 8. Salt Lake City, 1979.
- Hull, T. "Persecution: The Heritage of the Saints." IE 4 (July 1901):643-52.
- Ivins, A. "Is Persecution a Result of Transgression or Righteousness." IE 27 (Mar. 1924):408-413.

LISA BOLIN HAWKINS

PERSONAL ANCESTRAL FILE®

Personal Ancestral File® is a genealogical software package produced by the Church for IBM-compatible, Macintosh, and Apple personal computers that enables users to organize, store, and search genealogical information; contribute genealogies to ANCESTRAL FILE™; and match and merge information from other genealogical data bases with their own files.

The package consists of three major programs: Family Records, Research Data Filer, and Genealogical Information Exchange. The Family Records program enables users to assemble pedigrees; group families together, showing relationships between family members for each generation; search pedigree lines; add, modify, and delete information about individuals; and display information on the screen and print it on genealogical forms. Research Data Filer helps users manage original research, including searching, sorting, and printing information by event, place, date, name of person, or relationship to others. Genealogical Information Exchange enables users to send Family Records data to another Personal Ancestral File user, prepare diskette submissions of names for LDS temple ordinance processing or contribution to Ancestral File, and copy data from one diskette to another.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Long, Jack. "Personal Ancestral File 2.1." MacWorld (Sept. 1989):242-44.
- Trivette, Donald B. "Personal Ancestral File Helps Organize Facts of Family History." PC Magazine (June 13, 1989):452.

DAVID M. MAYFIELD

PETER

Simon bar-Jona, later known as Cephas or Peter, became the senior and chief apostle of Jesus Christ. He was evidently the presiding officer over the ancient Church after Christ's death. In the present dispensation, as a resurrected being, he restored apostolic authority to the Prophet Joseph SMITH and Oliver COWDERY.

The New Testament contains more information about Peter than about any of the other apostles. This provides some indication of his ministry, his character, and his relationship to the Savior. In contrast to the sometimes impetuous younger Peter portrayed in the Gospels, the apostle's later ministry and epistles bespeak a mature leader of patient faith whose sincere concern is for the spiritual well-being of the flock that Jesus entrusted to him (John 21:15-17). Differences persist, however, in the portraits of Peter derived from the various biblical accounts, and these are extrapolated in scholarly analyses of the role and theology of Peter. Recourse to later Christian writings from the second and third centuries reveals other views about Peter's position in the pristine Church. It cannot be presumed, therefore, that all that is written about him is clearly factual.

Originally from Bethsaida, a small fishing port somewhere on the north shore of the Sea of Galilee, Peter resided in the town of Capernaum with his wife and mother-in-law at the time of his apostolic call. Peter's given name was Simon and his patronymic, bar-Jona, identifies him as the son of Jonah (Matt. 16:17). The name Simon (Simōn) and that of his brother Andrew (Andreas) are derived from the Greek renditions of their names. Living in a region where, in addition to the native Aramaic, Greek was widely used as a language of business and trade, Peter may have been conversant with the tongue in which his scriptural writings were later penned. Although Peter was a fisherman by occupation, and despite the description of Peter and John by the elders of the Sanhedrin as being "without learning" (Acts 4:13), the Galilean apostles were literate men, probably without normal rabbinical training but with broad general understanding and capability.

Peter was among the first of Jesus' disciples. To him, then called Simon, was extended a special call, marked by the reception of a new name, which in Jewish tradition "denoted the conferring of a special divine mission" (Winter, p. 5). John

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B. "Why Did People Act That Way? Some Observations on Religious Intolerance and Persecution in the American Past." Ensign 8 (Dec. 1978):21-24.
- Arrington, Leonard J., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience, chaps. 3-5, 9. New York, 1979.
- The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, ed. My Kingdom Shall Roll Forth, chap. 8. Salt Lake City, 1979.
- Hull, T. "Persecution: The Heritage of the Saints." IE 4 (July 1901):643-52.
- Ivins, A. "Is Persecution a Result of Transgression or Righteousness." IE 27 (Mar. 1924):408-413.

LISA BOLIN HAWKINS

PERSONAL ANCESTRAL FILE®

Personal Ancestral File® is a genealogical software package produced by the Church for IBM-compatible, Macintosh, and Apple personal computers that enables users to organize, store, and search genealogical information; contribute genealogies to ANCESTRAL FILE™; and match and merge information from other genealogical data bases with their own files.

The package consists of three major programs: Family Records, Research Data Filer, and Genealogical Information Exchange. The Family Records program enables users to assemble pedigrees; group families together, showing relationships between family members for each generation; search pedigree lines; add, modify, and delete information about individuals; and display information on the screen and print it on genealogical forms. Research Data Filer helps users manage original research, including searching, sorting, and printing information by event, place, date, name of person, or relationship to others. Genealogical Information Exchange enables users to send Family Records data to another Personal Ancestral File user, prepare diskette submissions of names for LDS temple ordinance processing or contribution to Ancestral File, and copy data from one diskette to another.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Long, Jack. "Personal Ancestral File 2.1." MacWorld (Sept. 1989):242-44.
- Trivette, Donald B. "Personal Ancestral File Helps Organize Facts of Family History." PC Magazine (June 13, 1989):452.

DAVID M. MAYFIELD

PETER

Simon bar-Jona, later known as Cephas or Peter, became the senior and chief apostle of Jesus Christ. He was evidently the presiding officer over the ancient Church after Christ's death. In the present dispensation, as a resurrected being, he restored apostolic authority to the Prophet Joseph SMITH and Oliver COWDERY.

The New Testament contains more information about Peter than about any of the other apostles. This provides some indication of his ministry, his character, and his relationship to the Savior. In contrast to the sometimes impetuous younger Peter portrayed in the Gospels, the apostle's later ministry and epistles bespeak a mature leader of patient faith whose sincere concern is for the spiritual well-being of the flock that Jesus entrusted to him (John 21:15-17). Differences persist, however, in the portraits of Peter derived from the various biblical accounts, and these are extrapolated in scholarly analyses of the role and theology of Peter. Recourse to later Christian writings from the second and third centuries reveals other views about Peter's position in the pristine Church. It cannot be presumed, therefore, that all that is written about him is clearly factual.

Originally from Bethsaida, a small fishing port somewhere on the north shore of the Sea of Galilee, Peter resided in the town of Capernaum with his wife and mother-in-law at the time of his apostolic call. Peter's given name was Simon and his patronymic, bar-Jona, identifies him as the son of Jonah (Matt. 16:17). The name Simon (Simōn) and that of his brother Andrew (Andreas) are derived from the Greek renditions of their names. Living in a region where, in addition to the native Aramaic, Greek was widely used as a language of business and trade, Peter may have been conversant with the tongue in which his scriptural writings were later penned. Although Peter was a fisherman by occupation, and despite the description of Peter and John by the elders of the Sanhedrin as being "without learning" (Acts 4:13), the Galilean apostles were literate men, probably without normal rabbinical training but with broad general understanding and capability.

Peter was among the first of Jesus' disciples. To him, then called Simon, was extended a special call, marked by the reception of a new name, which in Jewish tradition "denoted the conferring of a special divine mission" (Winter, p. 5). John

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B. "Why Did People Act That Way? Some Observations on Religious Intolerance and Persecution in the American Past." Ensign 8 (Dec. 1978):21-24.
- Arrington, Leonard J., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience, chaps. 3-5, 9. New York, 1979.
- The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, ed. My Kingdom Shall Roll Forth, chap. 8. Salt Lake City, 1979.
- Hull, T. "Persecution: The Heritage of the Saints." IE 4 (July 1901):643-52.
- Ivins, A. "Is Persecution a Result of Transgression or Righteousness." IE 27 (Mar. 1924):408-413.

LISA BOLIN HAWKINS

PERSONAL ANCESTRAL FILE®

Personal Ancestral File® is a genealogical software package produced by the Church for IBM-compatible, Macintosh, and Apple personal computers that enables users to organize, store, and search genealogical information; contribute genealogies to ANCESTRAL FILE™; and match and merge information from other genealogical data bases with their own files.

The package consists of three major programs: Family Records, Research Data Filer, and Genealogical Information Exchange. The Family Records program enables users to assemble pedigrees; group families together, showing relationships between family members for each generation; search pedigree lines; add, modify, and delete information about individuals; and display information on the screen and print it on genealogical forms. Research Data Filer helps users manage original research, including searching, sorting, and printing information by event, place, date, name of person, or relationship to others. Genealogical Information Exchange enables users to send Family Records data to another Personal Ancestral File user, prepare diskette submissions of names for LDS temple ordinance processing or contribution to Ancestral File, and copy data from one diskette to another.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Long, Jack. "Personal Ancestral File 2.1." MacWorld (Sept. 1989):242-44.
- Trivette, Donald B. "Personal Ancestral File Helps Organize Facts of Family History." PC Magazine (June 13, 1989):452.

DAVID M. MAYFIELD

PETER

Simon bar-Jona, later known as Cephas or Peter, became the senior and chief apostle of Jesus Christ. He was evidently the presiding officer over the ancient Church after Christ's death. In the present dispensation, as a resurrected being, he restored apostolic authority to the Prophet Joseph SMITH and Oliver COWDERY.

The New Testament contains more information about Peter than about any of the other apostles. This provides some indication of his ministry, his character, and his relationship to the Savior. In contrast to the sometimes impetuous younger Peter portrayed in the Gospels, the apostle's later ministry and epistles bespeak a mature leader of patient faith whose sincere concern is for the spiritual well-being of the flock that Jesus entrusted to him (John 21:15-17). Differences persist, however, in the portraits of Peter derived from the various biblical accounts, and these are extrapolated in scholarly analyses of the role and theology of Peter. Recourse to later Christian writings from the second and third centuries reveals other views about Peter's position in the pristine Church. It cannot be presumed, therefore, that all that is written about him is clearly factual.

Originally from Bethsaida, a small fishing port somewhere on the north shore of the Sea of Galilee, Peter resided in the town of Capernaum with his wife and mother-in-law at the time of his apostolic call. Peter's given name was Simon and his patronymic, bar-Jona, identifies him as the son of Jonah (Matt. 16:17). The name Simon (Simōn) and that of his brother Andrew (Andreas) are derived from the Greek renditions of their names. Living in a region where, in addition to the native Aramaic, Greek was widely used as a language of business and trade, Peter may have been conversant with the tongue in which his scriptural writings were later penned. Although Peter was a fisherman by occupation, and despite the description of Peter and John by the elders of the Sanhedrin as being "without learning" (Acts 4:13), the Galilean apostles were literate men, probably without normal rabbinical training but with broad general understanding and capability.

Peter was among the first of Jesus' disciples. To him, then called Simon, was extended a special call, marked by the reception of a new name, which in Jewish tradition "denoted the conferring of a special divine mission" (Winter, p. 5). John describes Christ's bestowal upon Simon bar-Jona of the title "Cephas, which is by interpretation, A stone" (John 1:42). The Aramaic kepha and its Greek equivalent, petros, are common nouns and prior to that time were unused as proper names. A dispute of long duration continues among Catholic and Protestant scholars (Winter, pp. 6–25; Horsley, pp. 29–41) concerning the definition of petros, "a rock or stone," and petra, "a large mass of rock," as these words pertain to Peter's name and its connection to Christ's wordplay "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16:18). LDS doctrine holds that revelation was the rock denoted by Jesus and that Peter's call to become the prophet to lead the early Church is here foretold. Relevant to this passage, Joseph Smith applied the term "seer" to define cephas (JST John 1:42), and Bruce R. McConkie (pp. 133, 380–83) relates this to the seership, or power of continuing revelation, which he further connects to the KEYS of the kingdom (Matt. 16:19) bestowed on Peter, the chief apostle, upon the MOUNT OF TRANSFIGURATION, an account of which immediately follows in Matt. 17:1–13.

Peter's primacy in the ancient Church derived from apostolic authority. His first place among the twelve apostles is clear in a number of contexts: all New Testament lists of the apostles mention Peter first; the phrase "Peter and they that are with him" describes the apostles (e.g., Luke 8:45); and Peter acts as their spokesman in posing questions to Jesus (e.g., Luke 12:41). Miracles, teaching incidents, and special events (e.g., Matt. 14:25–31; Mark 14:26–42; Luke 5:1–10) center around Peter alone or on him as the key apostle involved (Muren, p. 150). After the trial of Jesus before Caiaphas, Peter stayed nearby in the dark and the cold. Although during Jesus' trial he denied certain allegations about association or affiliations with the disciples, and acquaintance with Jesus, Peter was the first apostle to whom the resurrected Christ appeared (Luke 24:33–35; 1 Cor. 15:5).

Peter's leading position is perceived by Latter-day Saints as one of presidency. Two LDS Church Presidents have likened Peter's office to that of the President of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES (McKay, p. 20; Kimball).

The apostles JAMES and JOHN occupied a position second to that of Peter. Together these three were privileged to attend Jesus on three most sacred occasions: at Jesus' raising of Jairus' daughter from the dead (Mark 5:35–43), at his glorification on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17:1–13; Mark 9:2–9), and at his suffering in the garden of Gethsemane (Mark 14:26–42). Latter-day Saints attribute the presence of Peter, James, and John on these occasions to the priesthood office that they held among the apostles. Joseph Smith taught that the Savior, Moses, and Elias, when transfigured before them, gave the keys of the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD to Peter, James, and John (TPJS, p. 158; see MOUNT OF TRANSFIGURATION).

Through this authority, Peter, James, and John directed the Church in the name of Jesus Christ after his death. Peter presided over the selection of a new apostle to replace Judas (Acts 1:15–26) and over the ministry on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2). Peter confronted the Sanhedrin, performed miracles, and preached the gospel of Christ (Acts 3–4). In many of these activities John was Peter's companion, but Peter took the lead. Through important revelations pertaining to the extension of the gospel to the Gentiles (Acts 10), Peter's calling as prophet, seer, and revelator is evident (Muren, pp. 150–52). Although modern revelation provides much clarification of information in this regard, Peter's role of presiding over Church councils and directing the general apostolic effort is patently demonstrable through examination of the New Testament and other early Christian sources (Brown, pp. 9–16, 1973).

Because of his ancient office, it was Peter who, with the assistance of James and John, was commissioned to restore apostolic authority to a new gospel dispensation and to endow Joseph Smith with the same priesthood keys that Christ had given to Peter, thereby reauthorizing the performance of the ordinances of salvation by the authority of the priesthood (see MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF).

Peter's two epistles in the New Testament contain an abundance of inspired and inspiring teachings and exhortations. Throughout 1 and 2 Peter, concern is expressed for the salvation and sanctification of the flock, reminding the faithful that this can be obtained only through knowledge of Jesus Christ and performance of the ordinances of the priesthood (cf. TPJS, pp. 297, 303–305; Muren, pp. 153–56). Peter also provides information about the salvation of the dead (1 Pet. 3:18–22; 4:6), and he exhorts all members of the Church to be holy, to feed the flock, to be humble, and to secure salvation through making their calling and election sure (1 Pet. 4–5; 2 Pet. 1). A final concern is expressed for the spiritual welfare of the Church, which Peter warns will soon experience the teaching of false doctrines that will threaten individual salvation (2 Pet. 2–3). Of these epistles Joseph Smith remarked, “Peter penned the most sublime language of any of the apostles” (TPJS, p. 301).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brown, Raymond E.; Karl Donfried; and John Reumann, eds. Peter in the New Testament. Minneapolis, Minn., 1973.
- Brown, S. Kent. “James the Just and the Question of Peter’s Leadership in the Light of New Sources.” In Sperry Lecture Series, pp. 9–16. Provo, Utah, 1973.
- Horsley, A. Burt. Peter and the Popes. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Kimball, Spencer W. “Peter, My Brother.” In BYU Speeches of the Year. Provo, Utah, 1971.
- McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, Vol. 1. Salt Lake City, 1978.
- McKay, David O. Ancient Apostles. Salt Lake City, 1964.
- Muren, Joseph C. “Peter.” In A Symposium on the New Testament. Salt Lake City, 1980.
- Winter, Michael M. Saint Peter and the Popes. Westport, Conn., 1960.

JOHN FRANKLIN HALL

PHILOSOPHY

Philosophy (the “love of wisdom”) originated in the Western world in ancient Greece. The attempt to find wisdom by ancient thinkers such as Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle led them also to investigate the world (nature), the unseen world (METAPHYSICS), and how we know (EPISTEMOLOGY). Wonder about nature through progressively refined epistemological procedures led through the centuries to modern scientific methods. As philosophers developed standards for accurate description and generalization, new sciences were born and detached themselves from philosophy: the first was physics, and the latest is linguistics. But the basic problems of epistemology, metaphysics, and ethics (including aesthetics and the philosophy of religion) dominate present philosophy as much as they did in ancient times. Although the solutions are more varied now, the basic issues remain the same.

Latter-day scriptures do not present a philosophical system, but they do contain answers to many classic philosophical issues. These scriptures preclude ex nihilo creation, idealism (immaterialism), a chance theory of causation, and absolute determinism. They affirm the eternality and agency of the individual person, the necessary existence of evil apart from God, a nonrelativistic good (righteousness), and the doctrine that all mortals are the offspring and heirs of God. God is affirmed as a perfected physical being who governs all things in pure love and who continues to communicate with his children on earth by personal revelation.

Observers of the LDS position have ascribed philosophical labels and tendencies to it, but that position usually will not fit neatly into the stock answers. It is empirical, yet rational; pragmatic, yet idealistic; oriented toward eternity, yet emphasizing the importance of the here and now. Affinities are found with the Cartesian certainty of personal existence, the positivist insistence on sensory evidence, the Enlightenment emphasis on elimination of paradox, and the postmodern respect for the “other.” The ultimate standard for all being, truth, and good is Christ himself.

Contemporary analytic and existential movements in philosophy have had little impact on LDS thought, not because it is not aware of them, but because it has different answers to the questions they pose. The knowledge of God is established through careful experimentation with God’s promises, which results in tangible consequences, culminating in the possibility of seeing God face to face. Existential angst is recognized and met by personal guidance from God to establish a path to righteousness and fulfillment, the general features of which each person must follow, but with individual parameters. The relativism of situational ethics is answered in spiritual assurance and power to do those things that are eternally worthwhile. Mind-body dualism is answered by the material nature of spirit (more refined matter) (D&C 131:7).

Answers to the questions How may I know? What is the seen world? What is the unseen world? and How shall I be wise? are all answered personally for every fully participating Latter-day Saint. The equivalent of epistemology in an LDS frame is the ORDINANCES, focusing on the ordinance of PRAYER. Through the ordinances and in connection with other epistemologies come all of the light and knowledge sufficient to live a spiritually successful life. Questions about the natural world are answered by one’s culture as corrected by personal revelation. One must have some guidance on questions of metaphysics, and such is found in holy scripture and confirmed to each individual through election sure (1 Pet. 4–5; 2 Pet. 1). A final concern is expressed for the spiritual welfare of the Church, which Peter warns will soon experience the teaching of false doctrines that will threaten individual salvation (2 Pet. 2–3). Of these epistles Joseph Smith remarked, “Peter penned the most sublime language of any of the apostles” (TPJS, p. 301).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brown, Raymond E.; Karl Donfried; and John Reumann, eds. Peter in the New Testament. Minneapolis, Minn., 1973.
- Brown, S. Kent. “James the Just and the Question of Peter’s Leadership in the Light of New Sources.” In Sperry Lecture Series, pp. 9–16. Provo, Utah, 1973.
- Horsley, A. Burt. Peter and the Popes. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Kimball, Spencer W. “Peter, My Brother.” In BYU Speeches of the Year. Provo, Utah, 1971.
- McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, Vol. 1. Salt Lake City, 1978.
- McKay, David O. Ancient Apostles. Salt Lake City, 1964.
- Muren, Joseph C. “Peter.” In A Symposium on the New Testament. Salt Lake City, 1980.
- Winter, Michael M. Saint Peter and the Popes. Westport, Conn., 1960.

JOHN FRANKLIN HALL

PHILOSOPHY

Philosophy (the “love of wisdom”) originated in the Western world in ancient Greece. The attempt to find wisdom by ancient thinkers such as Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle led them also to investigate the world (nature), the unseen world (METAPHYSICS), and how we know (EPISTEMOLOGY). Wonder about nature through progressively refined epistemological procedures led through the centuries to modern scientific methods. As philosophers developed standards for accurate description and generalization, new sciences were born and detached themselves from philosophy: the first was physics, and the latest is linguistics. But the basic problems of epistemology, metaphysics, and ethics (including aesthetics and the philosophy of religion) dominate present philosophy as much as they did in ancient times. Although the solutions are more varied now, the basic issues remain the same.

Latter-day scriptures do not present a philosophical system, but they do contain answers to many classic philosophical issues. These scriptures preclude ex nihilo creation, idealism (immaterialism), a chance theory of causation, and absolute determinism. They affirm the eternality and agency of the individual person, the necessary existence of evil apart from God, a nonrelativistic good (righteousness), and the doctrine that all mortals are the offspring and heirs of God. God is affirmed as a perfected physical being who governs all things in pure love and who continues to communicate with his children on earth by personal revelation.

Observers of the LDS position have ascribed philosophical labels and tendencies to it, but that position usually will not fit neatly into the stock answers. It is empirical, yet rational; pragmatic, yet idealistic; oriented toward eternity, yet emphasizing the importance of the here and now. Affinities are found with the Cartesian certainty of personal existence, the positivist insistence on sensory evidence, the Enlightenment emphasis on elimination of paradox, and the postmodern respect for the “other.” The ultimate standard for all being, truth, and good is Christ himself.

Contemporary analytic and existential movements in philosophy have had little impact on LDS thought, not because it is not aware of them, but because it has different answers to the questions they pose. The knowledge of God is established through careful experimentation with God’s promises, which results in tangible consequences, culminating in the possibility of seeing God face to face. Existential angst is recognized and met by personal guidance from God to establish a path to righteousness and fulfillment, the general features of which each person must follow, but with individual parameters. The relativism of situational ethics is answered in spiritual assurance and power to do those things that are eternally worthwhile. Mind-body dualism is answered by the material nature of spirit (more refined matter) (D&C 131:7).

Answers to the questions How may I know? What is the seen world? What is the unseen world? and How shall I be wise? are all answered personally for every fully participating Latter-day Saint. The equivalent of epistemology in an LDS frame is the ORDINANCES, focusing on the ordinance of PRAYER. Through the ordinances and in connection with other epistemologies come all of the light and knowledge sufficient to live a spiritually successful life. Questions about the natural world are answered by one’s culture as corrected by personal revelation. One must have some guidance on questions of metaphysics, and such is found in holy scripture and confirmed to each individual through personal REVELATION. The ultimate question as to how to be wise is answered both in general and in particular. The general answer is that to be wise is to love God with all of one's heart, might, mind, and strength, and to love our neighbor as God loves us (D&C 59:5). The particular answer is to repent of sinning and to live by the whisperings of the Holy Spirit and the counsels of the living prophet (Isa. 50:10–11).

While LDS culture does not encourage philosophizing directly, every LDS person is encouraged to become a profound theologian. Becoming such necessitates a heavy commitment to active study “in theory, in principle, in doctrine” to search out the weighty matters of time and eternity (D&C 97:14), which include the basic questions of the philosophers. The imperative “study it out in your mind” (D&C 9:7–8) is a standard for all LDS persons, not just for academics. “Time, and experience and careful and ponderous and solemn thought” (TPJS, p. 37) are not inimical to but are the preface to and foundation for personal revelation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Madsen, Truman G. “Joseph Smith and the Ways of Knowing,” pp. 25–63. BYU Extension Publications, Seminar on the Prophet Joseph Smith, 1962.
- Oaks, Dallin H. “Ethics, Morality, and Professional Responsibility.” In Perspectives in Mormon Ethics, ed. Donald G. Hill, Jr., pp. 193–200. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- Yarn, David H., Jr. “Some Metaphysical Reflections on the Gospel of John.” BYU Studies 3 (Autumn 1960):3–10.

CHAUNCEY C. RIDDLE

---

PHYSICAL BODY

Latter-day Saints believe that the physical human body was created by God in his express image, and that one of the most important purposes of earth life is for the spirit children of God to obtain a physical body and grow through the experience of MORTALITY.

The physical body, with all its structures and physiological systems, appetites and passions, strengths and frailties, serves as the mortal housing of the spirit. Before BIRTH, the spirit leaves God's presence and comes to this world to take up a physical body. In mortality, the body is imperfect and will eventually die. In due time, the physical body of every human will be resurrected in its “proper and perfect frame” (Alma 40:23) and the spirit will be restored to it in a state of immortality.

Together, the physical body and the spirit constitute the SOUL (D&C 88:15). The salvation of the soul requires PERFECTION of both body and spirit. GOD THE FATHER and JESUS CHRIST, both perfected and glorified beings, possess tangible resurrected bodies of flesh and bone (D&C 130:22). The Prophet Joseph SMITH stated, “No person can have this salvation except through a tabernacle” (TPJS, p. 297; see also D&C 93:35). To become like God, his children, too, must obtain physical bodies. “We came to this earth that we might have a body and present it pure before God in the celestial kingdom. The great principle of happiness consists in having a body” (TPJS, p. 181).

These beliefs are crucial to LDS understanding of the importance of the physical body. Many religions view the human corporeal nature as a state of constant conflict between the righteous enticings of the spirit and the vices of the flesh, ending only when death frees the spirit from the body. In contrast, Latter-day Saints strive for righteous harmony between the two, seeking perfection and discipline of the spirit along with training and health of the body. Health includes both physical and moral hygiene. The WORD OF WISDOM and other scriptural admonitions concerning health are intended to be followed to ensure a clear and clear mind and vigorous longevity “unto the renewing of their bodies” (D&C 84:33). CHASTITY, in both deed and thought, and physical and moral health are conditions essential for spiritual sensitivity, receiving a TESTIMONY, and personal REVELATION.

Latter-day Saints view the possession of a body as an eternal privilege and a blessing. The righteous decision to accept the plan of God the Father and come into this world was rewarded with the gift of a human body. Humans are free to choose their actions while in the flesh, and they are privileged to experience the pleasures and pains of being alive. This is a blessing not enjoyed by those who followed Satan's lead and were cast out of God's presence, never to have a mortal body. During Christ's ministry, he found several occasions to cast out DEVILS. In the most notable incident, the spirits requested that Christ not cast them out entirely, but that he allow them to enter the bodies of nearby swine (Mark 5:6–13). For Latter-day Saints this suggests how much the followers of Satan desire a physical body. RESURRECTION, the ultimate personal REVELATION. The ultimate question as to how to be wise is answered both in general and in particular. The general answer is that to be wise is to love God with all of one's heart, might, mind, and strength, and to love our neighbor as God loves us (D&C 59:5). The particular answer is to repent of sinning and to live by the whisperings of the Holy Spirit and the counsels of the living prophet (Isa. 50:10–11).

While LDS culture does not encourage philosophizing directly, every LDS person is encouraged to become a profound theologian. Becoming such necessitates a heavy commitment to active study “in theory, in principle, in doctrine” to search out the weighty matters of time and eternity (D&C 97:14), which include the basic questions of the philosophers. The imperative “study it out in your mind” (D&C 9:7–8) is a standard for all LDS persons, not just for academics. “Time, and experience and careful and ponderous and solemn thought” (TPJS, p. 37) are not inimical to but are the preface to and foundation for personal revelation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Madsen, Truman G. “Joseph Smith and the Ways of Knowing,” pp. 25–63. BYU Extension Publications, Seminar on the Prophet Joseph Smith, 1962.
- Oaks, Dallin H. “Ethics, Morality, and Professional Responsibility.” In Perspectives in Mormon Ethics, ed. Donald G. Hill, Jr., pp. 193–200. Salt Lake City, 1983.
- Yarn, David H., Jr. “Some Metaphysical Reflections on the Gospel of John.” BYU Studies 3 (Autumn 1960):3–10.

CHAUNCEY C. RIDDLE

---

PHYSICAL BODY

Latter-day Saints believe that the physical human body was created by God in his express image, and that one of the most important purposes of earth life is for the spirit children of God to obtain a physical body and grow through the experience of MORTALITY.

The physical body, with all its structures and physiological systems, appetites and passions, strengths and frailties, serves as the mortal housing of the spirit. Before BIRTH, the spirit leaves God's presence and comes to this world to take up a physical body. In mortality, the body is imperfect and will eventually die. In due time, the physical body of every human will be resurrected in its “proper and perfect frame” (Alma 40:23) and the spirit will be restored to it in a state of immortality.

Together, the physical body and the spirit constitute the SOUL (D&C 88:15). The salvation of the soul requires PERFECTION of both body and spirit. GOD THE FATHER and JESUS CHRIST, both perfected and glorified beings, possess tangible resurrected bodies of flesh and bone (D&C 130:22). The Prophet Joseph SMITH stated, “No person can have this salvation except through a tabernacle” (TPJS, p. 297; see also D&C 93:35). To become like God, his children, too, must obtain physical bodies. “We came to this earth that we might have a body and present it pure before God in the celestial kingdom. The great principle of happiness consists in having a body” (TPJS, p. 181).

These beliefs are crucial to LDS understanding of the importance of the physical body. Many religions view the human corporeal nature as a state of constant conflict between the righteous enticings of the spirit and the vices of the flesh, ending only when death frees the spirit from the body. In contrast, Latter-day Saints strive for righteous harmony between the two, seeking perfection and discipline of the spirit along with training and health of the body. Health includes both physical and moral hygiene. The WORD OF WISDOM and other scriptural admonitions concerning health are intended to be followed to ensure a clear and clear mind and vigorous longevity “unto the renewing of their bodies” (D&C 84:33). CHASTITY, in both deed and thought, and physical and moral health are conditions essential for spiritual sensitivity, receiving a TESTIMONY, and personal REVELATION.

Latter-day Saints view the possession of a body as an eternal privilege and a blessing. The righteous decision to accept the plan of God the Father and come into this world was rewarded with the gift of a human body. Humans are free to choose their actions while in the flesh, and they are privileged to experience the pleasures and pains of being alive. This is a blessing not enjoyed by those who followed Satan's lead and were cast out of God's presence, never to have a mortal body. During Christ's ministry, he found several occasions to cast out DEVILS. In the most notable incident, the spirits requested that Christ not cast them out entirely, but that he allow them to enter the bodies of nearby swine (Mark 5:6–13). For Latter-day Saints this suggests how much the followers of Satan desire a physical body. RESURRECTION, the ultimate and perfect unification of body and spirit, gives spirits the power to overcome SPIRITUAL DEATH: "For behold, if the flesh should rise no more our spirits must become subject to that angel who fell from before the presence of the Eternal God, and became the devil, to rise no more" (2 Ne. 9:8).

For Latter-day Saints the physical body, in all its developmental, anatomical, and physiological complexities and functions, is evidence of God's creative hand. It is, in itself, miraculous. Furthermore, the day-to-day vitality of the body can be attributed to divine regulation; as expressed by King BENJAMIN, it is God who "has created you from the beginning, and is preserving you from day to day, by lending you breath, that ye may live and move and do according to your own will, and even supporting you from one moment to another" (Mosiah 2:21).

The upkeep and maintenance of the body are important in LDS belief. Disease is a natural condition that disturbs the normal function of the body's physical processes. When ill or injured, Latter-day Saints exercise faith toward recovery. Worthy priesthood holders, by administering a BLESSING of health, may call upon the power of God to aid in the healing process. At the same time, Latter-day Saints are encouraged to take full advantage of modern medicine and technology in the prevention and cure of sickness and do not find this inconsistent with accepting the blessings of the priesthood, for they see an ultimate unity between SPIRIT and MATTER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Lockhart, Barbara. "The Body: A Burden or a Blessing." Ensign 15 (Feb. 1985):56-60.
- Madsen, Truman G. Eternal Man, pp. 43-51. Salt Lake City, 1966.
- Nelson, Russell M. "Self Mastery." Ensign 15 (Nov. 1985):30-32.

KENT M. VAN DE GRAAFF

PHYSICAL FITNESS AND RECREATION

The Church has always endorsed recreation and fitness as desirable and worthy of promotion. Recreational activities can strengthen social connections and a sense of community. Proper physical activities are any that are "clean, beneficial to health, conducive to true happiness and in harmony with the highest moral standards" ("Wholesome Recreation," p. 430). A latter-day apostle stated, "Recreation—good Latter-day Saint recreation—is one of the devices by which we may help the young people of this Church to learn and love the gospel of the Lord, Jesus Christ, and thereby learn to live righteously" (Petersen, p. 554).

During the nineteenth century, when most religions were condemning play as sinful (T.D., p. 178), Joseph SMITH and Brigham YOUNG advocated recreation as part of their religious teaching. Both men participated in recreational activities and sanctioned wholesome amusements. Moreover, it was noted of Brigham Young that "he not only enjoyed recreational pursuits himself, but some of his august religious speeches were on this subject" (Skidmore, p. 25). In the early days of the Church, recreation also provided respite from work, drudgery, hardship, and persecution. It is likely that the large number of converts from many nationalities and cultures, although they were drawn together by a testimony of Christ and the restoration of the gospel, were more easily assimilated into the new community of Saints when recreational activities were a common denominator (Skidmore, p. 9). According to one researcher on recreation, the Church was the first religious organization to construct halls adjacent to, or adjoining, chapels for the formal promotion of such activities as games and sports, music, drama, speech, and dance (Brinley, pp. 43, 104-105).

The PHYSICAL BODY is viewed as a temple of God that the individual has stewardship from God to care for properly: "I speak of the religious doctrine which teaches that the human body is sacred, the veritable tabernacle of the divine spirit which inhabits it, and that it is a solemn duty of mankind to protect and preserve it from pollutions and unnecessary wastage and weakness" (Richards, p. 208). Isaiah recorded a promise to those who are willing to "wait upon the Lord" that they would "run and not be weary; and . . . walk, and not faint" (40:31). This promise is affirmed in the revelation to Joseph Smith known as the WORD OF WISDOM (D&C 89:20). Physical and spiritual health is promised as a consequence of obedience to spiritual law and observance of specific dietary and health habits.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brinley, Eldon D. "The Recreational Life of the Mormon People." Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1943.

and perfect unification of body and spirit, gives spirits the power to overcome SPIRITUAL DEATH: "For behold, if the flesh should rise no more our spirits must become subject to that angel who fell from before the presence of the Eternal God, and became the devil, to rise no more" (2 Ne. 9:8).

For Latter-day Saints the physical body, in all its developmental, anatomical, and physiological complexities and functions, is evidence of God's creative hand. It is, in itself, miraculous. Furthermore, the day-to-day vitality of the body can be attributed to divine regulation; as expressed by King BENJAMIN, it is God who "has created you from the beginning, and is preserving you from day to day, by lending you breath, that ye may live and move and do according to your own will, and even supporting you from one moment to another" (Mosiah 2:21).

The upkeep and maintenance of the body are important in LDS belief. Disease is a natural condition that disturbs the normal function of the body's physical processes. When ill or injured, Latter-day Saints exercise faith toward recovery. Worthy priesthood holders, by administering a BLESSING of health, may call upon the power of God to aid in the healing process. At the same time, Latter-day Saints are encouraged to take full advantage of modern medicine and technology in the prevention and cure of sickness and do not find this inconsistent with accepting the blessings of the priesthood, for they see an ultimate unity between SPIRIT and MATTER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Lockhart, Barbara. "The Body: A Burden or a Blessing." Ensign 15 (Feb. 1985):56-60.
- Madsen, Truman G. Eternal Man, pp. 43-51. Salt Lake City, 1966.
- Nelson, Russell M. "Self Mastery." Ensign 15 (Nov. 1985):30-32.

KENT M. VAN DE GRAAFF

PHYSICAL FITNESS AND RECREATION

The Church has always endorsed recreation and fitness as desirable and worthy of promotion. Recreational activities can strengthen social connections and a sense of community. Proper physical activities are any that are "clean, beneficial to health, conducive to true happiness and in harmony with the highest moral standards" ("Wholesome Recreation," p. 430). A latter-day apostle stated, "Recreation—good Latter-day Saint recreation—is one of the devices by which we may help the young people of this Church to learn and love the gospel of the Lord, Jesus Christ, and thereby learn to live righteously" (Petersen, p. 554).

During the nineteenth century, when most religions were condemning play as sinful (T.D., p. 178), Joseph SMITH and Brigham YOUNG advocated recreation as part of their religious teaching. Both men participated in recreational activities and sanctioned wholesome amusements. Moreover, it was noted of Brigham Young that "he not only enjoyed recreational pursuits himself, but some of his august religious speeches were on this subject" (Skidmore, p. 25). In the early days of the Church, recreation also provided respite from work, drudgery, hardship, and persecution. It is likely that the large number of converts from many nationalities and cultures, although they were drawn together by a testimony of Christ and the restoration of the gospel, were more easily assimilated into the new community of Saints when recreational activities were a common denominator (Skidmore, p. 9). According to one researcher on recreation, the Church was the first religious organization to construct halls adjacent to, or adjoining, chapels for the formal promotion of such activities as games and sports, music, drama, speech, and dance (Brinley, pp. 43, 104-105).

The PHYSICAL BODY is viewed as a temple of God that the individual has stewardship from God to care for properly: "I speak of the religious doctrine which teaches that the human body is sacred, the veritable tabernacle of the divine spirit which inhabits it, and that it is a solemn duty of mankind to protect and preserve it from pollutions and unnecessary wastage and weakness" (Richards, p. 208). Isaiah recorded a promise to those who are willing to "wait upon the Lord" that they would "run and not be weary; and . . . walk, and not faint" (40:31). This promise is affirmed in the revelation to Joseph Smith known as the WORD OF WISDOM (D&C 89:20). Physical and spiritual health is promised as a consequence of obedience to spiritual law and observance of specific dietary and health habits.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brinley, Eldon D. "The Recreational Life of the Mormon People." Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1943.

Evans, Richard L. "Great Miracle: Housing for Body and Mind." Church News (Aug. 26, 1967):16.

McKay, David O. "The Whole Man." IE 55 (Apr. 1952):221–22.

Petersen, Mark E. "Building Spirituality Through Recreation." IE 51 (Sept. 1948):554–55, 598.

Richards, Stephen L. Where Is Wisdom. Salt Lake City, 1955.

Skidmore, Rex A. Mormon Recreation In Theory and Practice: A Study of Social Change. Philadelphia, 1941.

T.D. "Repose." Nation 2 (Feb. 1866):178.

"Wholesome Recreation: Ward Teacher's Message for August, 1939." IE 42 (July 1939):430.

CLARK T. THORSTENSON

PIONEER DAY

July 24, Pioneer Day, is celebrated yearly in "Mormon Country" and increasingly on an international scale among Latter-day Saints. On this date in 1847, the first Mormon pioneers (143 men, 3 women, 2 children) led by Brigham YOUNG, entered the uninhabited Salt Lake Valley. They began the pioneer settlement of more than 400 communities in the intermountain West, Canada, and Mexico. Before the completion of the transcontinental railroad in 1869, 80,000 Mormon refugees and converts went west in perpetual immigration. Six thousand lost their lives and were buried along the way.

"In the annals of the American Frontier," wrote historian Parnell H. Benson, there is "no more thrilling story" (p. 423). On July 24 this story is commemorated annually by a huge parade in Salt Lake City and is also celebrated frequently in drama (e.g., the Promised Valley musical), poetry, and song. The holiday is typically marked by sunrise services and, throughout LDS communities,

A Pioneer Day parade in Eureka, Utah. Traditionally, Latter-day Saints dress in pioneer costume and reenact the entry of the Mormon pioneers into the Salt Lake Valley in 1847. Paneake breakfasts, picnics, and pageantry mark Pioneer Day, even outside the Intermountain West. Courtesy Utah State Historical Society.

Evans, Richard L. "Great Miracle: Housing for Body and Mind." Church News (Aug. 26, 1967):16.

McKay, David O. "The Whole Man." IE 55 (Apr. 1952):221–22.

Petersen, Mark E. "Building Spirituality Through Recreation." IE 51 (Sept. 1948):554–55, 598.

Richards, Stephen L. Where Is Wisdom. Salt Lake City, 1955.

Skidmore, Rex A. Mormon Recreation In Theory and Practice: A Study of Social Change. Philadelphia, 1941.

T.D. "Repose." Nation 2 (Feb. 1866):178.

"Wholesome Recreation: Ward Teacher's Message for August, 1939." IE 42 (July 1939):430.

CLARK T. THORSTENSON

PIONEER DAY

July 24, Pioneer Day, is celebrated yearly in "Mormon Country" and increasingly on an international scale among Latter-day Saints. On this date in 1847, the first Mormon pioneers (143 men, 3 women, 2 children) led by Brigham YOUNG, entered the uninhabited Salt Lake Valley. They began the pioneer settlement of more than 400 communities in the intermountain West, Canada, and Mexico. Before the completion of the transcontinental railroad in 1869, 80,000 Mormon refugees and converts went west in perpetual immigration. Six thousand lost their lives and were buried along the way.

"In the annals of the American Frontier," wrote historian Parnell H. Benson, there is "no more thrilling story" (p. 423). On July 24 this story is commemorated annually by a huge parade in Salt Lake City and is also celebrated frequently in drama (e.g., the Promised Valley musical), poetry, and song. The holiday is typically marked by sunrise services and, throughout LDS communities,

A Pioneer Day parade in Eureka, Utah. Traditionally, Latter-day Saints dress in pioneer costume and reenact the entry of the Mormon pioneers into the Salt Lake Valley in 1847. Pancake breakfasts, picnics, and pageantry mark Pioneer Day, even outside the Intermountain West. Courtesy Utah State Historical Society.

by Old West reenactments. In Church programs, commemorative addresses are given and family journals and reminiscences are revived. The close conjunction of the festivities of July 4 and 24 tends to focus on the Mormon exodus as a quest for religious freedom. But like the Puritan movement and the Jewish aliyah, it was at root a quest for the sacred. It grew out of the vision of a consecrated community, the KINGDOM OF GOD on earth. The festivities of July 24 attempt to regain and extend that vision.

[See also Celebrations.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Purnell H. Religion in Contemporary Culture, pp. 420–27. New York, 1960.
 Shipps, Jan. Mormonism: The Story of a New Religious Tradition, pp. 64, 129. Urbana, Ill., 1985.

D. JAMES CANNON

---

PIONEER ECONOMY

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was the major force contributing to the economic development of the Great Basin region in the nineteenth century. This was true until the completion of the transcontinental railroad in 1869, and to a large extent even through the remainder of the century. Though the railroad ended the isolation of the Great Basin and brought both economic benefits and new challenges to HOME INDUSTRIES, the Church's economic role did not decline significantly until the end of the pioneer period (see ECONOMIC HISTORY OF THE CHURCH).

Church involvement in the economy was rooted in theology. According to LDS belief, building up the KINGDOM OF GOD on earth—developing it and beautifying it for the return of the Savior—is a prime task of God's people. LDS pioneers believed that the Church was the agent of God and his people in building the kingdom. The responsibility to promote its progress and perfection rested upon Church officials. It thus became a religious duty to produce, to build, and to prepare for the MILLENNIUM. Digging canals, tending herds, cultivating crops, and constructing telegraph lines, railroads, and factories were all viewed as acts of religious devotion similar to prayer, worship, and other strictly religious activities.

Partly because economic activity had religious significance, it was clearly understood that all such was to be conducted in harmony with gospel principles. Precious-metal mining and other economic activities that did not contribute to basic production and stable communities were not endorsed. Individualism, profiteering, and speculation were eschewed. Instead, the individual member was enjoined to be "one with his brethren." Not only were they to work together in harmony, but Latter-day Saints were also expected to maintain relative equality in the possession and enjoyment of this world's goods.

President Brigham Young recognized early on the economic importance of women in making a harsh land productive. Not only were women partners with men in agriculture and home production—the more so with many men called away on missions—but they were also specifically encouraged by President Young to be involved as telegraph operators and shopkeepers, and he enlisted them throughout the territory to work in SILK CULTURE.

Building the pioneer kingdom required the creation of a "two-decker" economy—a foundation of agricultural and handicraft production to satisfy the most pressing wants of the settlers and the steady increment of immigrants, along with a superstructure of investment to provide for future growth. In general, programs were concerned with three types of activities. First, leaders sought to increase the agents of production by a widespread missionary program and by promotion and organization of emigration (see IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION; PERPETUAL EMIGRATING FUND). Between 1847 and 1880 more than 70,000 converts immigrated to the Great Basin to work on farms, in factories, and to participate in COLONIZATION projects.

Second, Church leaders sought to aid capital formation. This they did by sending out exploration parties to discover new resources, by developing these resources under Church sponsorship, by mobilizing the savings of its members in the Great Basin and in Europe, and by diverting resources from the production of consumables to the production of reproducible wealth. Sizable groups were sent to southern Utah to mine and manufacture iron, to southern Nevada to mine silver and lead, to northern and central Utah to mine coal, to southern California to establish an entrepôt, to southern Utah to raise cotton and other semitropi-

by Old West reenactments. In Church programs, commemorative addresses are given and family journals and reminiscences are revived. The close conjunction of the festivities of July 4 and 24 tends to focus on the Mormon exodus as a quest for religious freedom. But like the Puritan movement and the Jewish aliyah, it was at root a quest for the sacred. It grew out of the vision of a consecrated community, the KINGDOM OF GOD on earth. The festivities of July 24 attempt to regain and extend that vision.

[See also Celebrations.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Purnell H. Religion in Contemporary Culture, pp. 420–27. New York, 1960.
- Shipps, Jan. Mormonism: The Story of a New Religious Tradition, pp. 64, 129. Urbana, Ill., 1985.

D. JAMES CANNON

---

PIONEER ECONOMY

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was the major force contributing to the economic development of the Great Basin region in the nineteenth century. This was true until the completion of the transcontinental railroad in 1869, and to a large extent even through the remainder of the century. Though the railroad ended the isolation of the Great Basin and brought both economic benefits and new challenges to HOME INDUSTRIES, the Church's economic role did not decline significantly until the end of the pioneer period (see ECONOMIC HISTORY OF THE CHURCH).

Church involvement in the economy was rooted in theology. According to LDS belief, building up the KINGDOM OF GOD on earth—developing it and beautifying it for the return of the Savior—is a prime task of God's people. LDS pioneers believed that the Church was the agent of God and his people in building the kingdom. The responsibility to promote its progress and perfection rested upon Church officials. It thus became a religious duty to produce, to build, and to prepare for the MILLENNIUM. Digging canals, tending herds, cultivating crops, and constructing telegraph lines, railroads, and factories were all viewed as acts of religious devotion similar to prayer, worship, and other strictly religious activities.

Partly because economic activity had religious significance, it was clearly understood that all such was to be conducted in harmony with gospel principles. Precious-metal mining and other economic activities that did not contribute to basic production and stable communities were not endorsed. Individualism, profiteering, and speculation were eschewed. Instead, the individual member was enjoined to be "one with his brethren." Not only were they to work together in harmony, but Latter-day Saints were also expected to maintain relative equality in the possession and enjoyment of this world's goods.

President Brigham Young recognized early on the economic importance of women in making a harsh land productive. Not only were women partners with men in agriculture and home production—the more so with many men called away on missions—but they were also specifically encouraged by President Young to be involved as telegraph operators and shopkeepers, and he enlisted them throughout the territory to work in SILK CULTURE.

Building the pioneer kingdom required the creation of a "two-decker" economy—a foundation of agricultural and handicraft production to satisfy the most pressing wants of the settlers and the steady increment of immigrants, along with a superstructure of investment to provide for future growth. In general, programs were concerned with three types of activities. First, leaders sought to increase the agents of production by a widespread missionary program and by promotion and organization of emigration (see IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION; PERPETUAL EMIGRATING FUND). Between 1847 and 1880 more than 70,000 converts immigrated to the Great Basin to work on farms, in factories, and to participate in COLONIZATION projects.

Second, Church leaders sought to aid capital formation. This they did by sending out exploration parties to discover new resources, by developing these resources under Church sponsorship, by mobilizing the savings of its members in the Great Basin and in Europe, and by diverting resources from the production of consumables to the production of reproducible wealth. Sizable groups were sent to southern Utah to mine and manufacture iron, to southern Nevada to mine silver and lead, to northern and central Utah to mine coal, to southern California to establish an entrepôt, to southern Utah to raise cotton and other semitropi-

eal products, to various places in northern Utah and southern Idaho to utilize grazing lands, and to hundreds of irrigable areas throughout the Great Basin to establish colonies, construct irrigation systems, and engage in farming (see also AGRICULTURE; CITY PLANNING).

In mobilizing savings to support these developmental projects, the basic organizational device was the office of the trustee-in-trust. Usually the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH, as trustee-in-trust, held, bought, and sold property; collected donations and expended them; and in general used the common fund of the community in constructing the infrastructure of communications, transportation, merchandising, and education. This was sometimes done by chartered companies such as the Deseret Iron Company, the Deseret Sugar Manufacturing Company, and the Deseret Telegraph Company. The President of the Church could also direct regionwide economic initiatives such as the 1850s CONSECRATION movement, the 1860s cooperative movement, and the 1870s UNITED ORDERS.

A second organizational device was the network of tithing houses, that received contributions in kind of butter, eggs, calves, chickens, hay, wheat, and other produce that were then used to support workers on school buildings, tanneries, woolen factories, gristmills, roads, and other projects. In the largely cashless pioneer economy, the tithing house system also made it possible to spend credit earned for labor or goods in one community in another. Tithing Office script and credits, ultimately controlled and reconciled through the books of the trustee-in-trust, thus helped to grease the wheels of commerce in the Great Basin.

Third, pioneer Church leaders also sought to overcome an adverse balance of trade for the region. They solicited investments by members wherever they were located and promoted sales outside the region of livestock, grain, salt, cotton, dried fruits, wool products, and other exportables. In this connection, the Church was able to turn to advantage the discovery of gold in California in 1848. The Church acquired about $150,000 in gold dust during the 1850s from returning miners, from contributions of its members in California, and from men assigned to California expressly for the purpose of obtaining specie to help boost the Utah economy.

The balance of payments problem was one reason the Church discouraged the importation of unnecessary consumables. Leaders urged Latter-day Saints to refrain from using imported tea, coffee, tobacco, liquor, or "fashionable" clothing from the East (homemade was considered more saintly). In order to prevent "outside" merchants from becoming wealthy in this trade, Church leaders bought out most of them, imposed a boycott on trading with others, and channeled the bulk of the territory's imports through the Church-controlled Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institution (ZCMI).

The Church assumed much of the burden of promoting economic activity that, under different circumstances, might have been assumed by eastern capitalists or the federal government. By influencing the movement of population and new investment, and by controlling community pricing through the tithing houses, the Church regulated the allocation of resources to maximize the gross product. By continuously funneling new families into the various settlements and valleys, the Church also prevented the creation of a class system and contributed to a greater equality of income. In so doing, LDS leaders expressed greater confidence in the efficacy of their own administered economy than in the ability of an impersonal price system to optimally allocate resources and induce rapid and diversified economic development.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. Great Basin Kingdom: An Economic History of the Latter-day Saints, 1830-1900. Cambridge, Mass., 1958.
- . "Religion and Planning in the Great Basin, 1847-1900." Proceedings of the Thirty-second Annual Conference of the Western Economic Association, pp. 37-41. Salt Lake City, 1957.

LEONARD J. ARRINGTON

---

PIONEER LIFE AND WORSHIP

The first members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints worshiped like the converts of many new religions: their devotions were democratic, fervent, local, and spontaneous. "High Church" priestly gowns, sacerdotal objects, or complicated liturgy were not used—then or later. Equally remote were the formal creeds and confessions of the frontier sects. Only as Church growth eal products, to various places in northern Utah and southern Idaho to utilize grazing lands, and to hundreds of irrigable areas throughout the Great Basin to establish colonies, construct irrigation systems, and engage in farming (see also AGRICULTURE; CITY PLANNING).

In mobilizing savings to support these developmental projects, the basic organizational device was the office of the trustee-in-trust. Usually the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH, as trustee-in-trust, held, bought, and sold property; collected donations and expended them; and in general used the common fund of the community in constructing the infrastructure of communications, transportation, merchandising, and education. This was sometimes done by chartered companies such as the Deseret Iron Company, the Deseret Sugar Manufacturing Company, and the Deseret Telegraph Company. The President of the Church could also direct regionwide economic initiatives such as the 1850s CONSECRATION movement, the 1860s cooperative movement, and the 1870s UNITED ORDERS.

A second organizational device was the network of tithing houses, that received contributions in kind of butter, eggs, calves, chickens, hay, wheat, and other produce that were then used to support workers on school buildings, tanneries, woolen factories, gristmills, roads, and other projects. In the largely cashless pioneer economy, the tithing house system also made it possible to spend credit earned for labor or goods in one community in another. Tithing Office script and credits, ultimately controlled and reconciled through the books of the trustee-in-trust, thus helped to grease the wheels of commerce in the Great Basin.

Third, pioneer Church leaders also sought to overcome an adverse balance of trade for the region. They solicited investments by members wherever they were located and promoted sales outside the region of livestock, grain, salt, cotton, dried fruits, wool products, and other exportables. In this connection, the Church was able to turn to advantage the discovery of gold in California in 1848. The Church acquired about $150,000 in gold dust during the 1850s from returning miners, from contributions of its members in California, and from men assigned to California expressly for the purpose of obtaining specie to help boost the Utah economy.

The balance of payments problem was one reason the Church discouraged the importation of unnecessary consumables. Leaders urged Latter-day Saints to refrain from using imported tea, coffee, tobacco, liquor, or "fashionable" clothing from the East (homemade was considered more saintly). In order to prevent "outside" merchants from becoming wealthy in this trade, Church leaders bought out most of them, imposed a boycott on trading with others, and channeled the bulk of the territory's imports through the Church-controlled Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institution (ZCMI).

The Church assumed much of the burden of promoting economic activity that, under different circumstances, might have been assumed by eastern capitalists or the federal government. By influencing the movement of population and new investment, and by controlling community pricing through the tithing houses, the Church regulated the allocation of resources to maximize the gross product. By continuously funneling new families into the various settlements and valleys, the Church also prevented the creation of a class system and contributed to a greater equality of income. In so doing, LDS leaders expressed greater confidence in the efficacy of their own administered economy than in the ability of an impersonal price system to optimally allocate resources and induce rapid and diversified economic development.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J. Great Basin Kingdom: An Economic History of the Latter-day Saints, 1830-1900. Cambridge, Mass., 1958.
- . "Religion and Planning in the Great Basin, 1847-1900." Proceedings of the Thirty-second Annual Conference of the Western Economic Association, pp. 37-41. Salt Lake City, 1957.

LEONARD J. ARRINGTON

---

PIONEER LIFE AND WORSHIP

The first members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints worshiped like the converts of many new religions: their devotions were democratic, fervent, local, and spontaneous. "High Church" priestly gowns, sacerdotal objects, or complicated liturgy were not used—then or later. Equally remote were the formal creeds and confessions of the frontier sects. Only as Church growth brought the need for orderly administration, toward the last third of the nineteenth century, did the Latter-day Saints gain a measure of formal devotion.

The early Saints were not left without direction. As early as June 1829, ten months prior to the formal ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH, Joseph SMITH and Oliver COWDERY sought guidance about Church performances. "The church shall meet together oft for prayer & supplication," read an early copy of the manuscript that resulted. "Each member shall speak & tell the church of their progress in the way of Eternal life" (Oliver Cowdery, "Articles of the Church of Christ," 1829, LDS Library Archives). The document, which drew on previous revelations and Book of Mormon injunctions, later became the Church's "Articles and Covenants." The first revelation to be canonized, it became, arguably, the Church's single most important statement on religious WORSHIP and procedure (see DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTIONS 20–21).

It defined a simple structure. There were three sacramental ORDINANCES: BAPTISM by immersion, confirmation of the spirit, and the bread and the cup of the Lord's Supper (see SACRAMENTS). Routines were equally modest, prescribing prayer, frequent MEETINGS, home visits by teachers, local PRIESTHOOD governance, and quarterly CONFERENCES to regulate Churchwide business. Traveling elders took this blueprint to the early, scattered congregations.

KIRTLAND, OHIO, one of the Church's early centers, typified the resulting system. There were many meetings. Leaders might hold frequent "councils" and "schools" at the Newel K. Whitney store. They joined members in private homes on Sundays and on weekdays for prayer and worship meetings, often with millennial singing and testifying accompanied by the display of pentecostal gifts. Fast and testimony meetings might be held on Thursdays, with attention given to the needs of the poor (see FASTING). Abstinence from food brought piety to worshipers, and what was saved assisted the needy. Kirtland members also attempted wider, congregational assemblies. With no other gathering place at first available, they met in the open air or in Kirtland's sixteen-by-twenty-four-foot schoolhouse. After the completion of the KIRTLAND TEMPLE in 1836, meetings were held there with as many as several hundred people in attendance.

These routines set the pattern for Latter-day Saint worship as the Church moved from Ohio to Missouri, Illinois, and Nebraska. While leaders might organize and direct meetings, individual Saints could also do so. Prayer meetings, often the redoubt of women, proceeded at times without ecclesiastical direction. General Church meetings were often as democratic. Members simply summoned others by ringing the community bell. Content was also unstructured. "We shall devote this day to preaching—exhortation—singing—praying and blessing children," promised a Church leader prior to the start of the Church's April general conference in 1845 (T&S, 6:953–57). With congregational sessions still held in open air, some might chat on the perimeters while the more centrally situated struggled to hear.

NAUVOO brought the innovation of ward worship. At first a political division as in other American cities, wards in Nauvoo became religious units. Church-appointed BISHOPS presided over the jurisdictions, levying quotas for Church building projects, conducting neighborhood (block) or ward teaching (see HOME TEACHING), and overseeing the needs of the poor and, increasingly, the holding of meetings. Here began, for the first time, Church-directed neighborhood worship. The system was regularized at WINTER QUARTERS, Nebraska, during the exodus west. Brigham YOUNG instructed bishops to "organize and watch over their wards, have weekly meetings therein; also see that those under their charge have work and that none suffer through want, also [they should] instruct their wards to establish schools" (Manuscript History of Brigham Young, 1846, p. 474, Church Archives).

The Saints' propensity for "going to meeting," as they called congregational worship, increased after they settled in the Great Basin. Community meetings were first held in the Salt Lake City fort, with a haystack affording shade and a small cannon serving as a podium. Later a "bowery" was built within the fort by erecting posts, interlacing them with beams, and covering the affair with boughs and leaves. Boweries became a staple of Salt Lake and outlying community worship—in some communities they were not replaced by tabernacles for several decades. After the abandonment of the fort bowery, Salt Lake City settlers erected another on TEMPLE SQUARE, eventually giving it adobe walls and a ceiling of debris and soil. Still bigger boweries followed, largely to attend to the needs of the Church's general conferences when no community building could seat the flood of the people who attended.

During the pioneer period the most prominent building on Temple Square was the Tabernacle (later called the "Old Tabernacle" to differentiate it from the present-day TABERNACLE built in the 1860s). Unlike the stopgap adobe and soil bowery, it boasted stone walls and had no interior posts. "The Tabernacle on the inside is built quite in the form of a Theatre," wrote a traveler, "benches rising one behind another until the outer row is a great way from the pulpit. The building is executed on the inside so that it is one story under ground and in entering its steps descend" (Reminiscence of Addison Moses Crane, Huntington Library, San Marino, California). While lacking architectural distinction, it answered practical purposes. Finished in 1852, its 60-by-120-foot expanse provided 2,500 unobstructed seats and fairly good acoustical quality.

At first Temple Square community worship services were most important. The entire settlement was expected to gather each Sunday, usually at ten in the morning and two in the afternoon. A brass band might begin the preliminaries, followed by the "crying out" of the recently arrived post, notices of lost and found articles, or the announcement of upcoming political, social, and religious events. These newsy routines generally ended with the establishment of the DESERET NEWS in 1850.

During opening exercises, leaders might enter the hall to assume positions on the "stand," while followers drifted to their unassigned benches (increasingly members were asked not to occupy the rostrum without invitation). The lack of prepared sermons sometimes brought problems. Without a seasoned speaker present, authorities might summon a Church officer from other activity. The afternoon meeting was occupied by the administration of the Lord's Supper and a continuation of impromptu sermonizing, often by members of the congregation. Each meeting usually lasted for two hours or more.

There was variety and sometimes even theater. Leaders might invite LDS preachers, Indian chiefs, or, more frequently, returning missionaries to speak. Church leaders often preached gospel "discourses" that mixed spiritual and temporal themes—and sometimes the serious and the humorous. Elder Joseph Young, President of the First Quorum of Seventy, "got up lively & spirited & caused much merriment," recorded the minutes on one occasion. "Pres[iden]t [Brigham] Young followed—on Charity—amusingly" (September 9, 1855, Minutes of Meetings, Church Archives). Speakers might preach, dialogue with the congregation, issue reproof and correction, and on occasion disfellowship or excommunicate wayward members.

With Temple Square meetings disadvantaged by a growing lack of intimacy due to increased membership and uncomfortable conditions during inclement weather, emphasis slowly shifted to local and ward activity. There, "blessing meetings" were held to confirm the baptized or rebaptized, and to bless. One ward boasted a "singing school." Thursday fast and testimony meetings continued in most neighborhoods, and bishops also held youth meetings. While the male priesthood quorums generally met on a multiward basis, special men's meetings were held in wards to aid immigration, levy taxes, or oversee road, canal, school, and chapel construction. Women continued their prayer meetings, RELIEF SOCIETY meetings in the 1850s for Indian relief, and restructured Relief Society gatherings in the 1870s for instruction, testimony, and relief for the unfortunate.

The most important ward gathering was the Sunday evening worship service, held usually an hour or two after the Temple Square afternoon service. "Meeting at E. M. Saunder's house," read the minutes of one. "Filled to overflowing. Pres John Young opened the meeting by singing and prayer. [He] made some remarks, ex[h]orted the brothern to use their privelages in occupying the time. Was followed by the Brotheren in quick succession. Brotheren and sisters delivered their testimony concerning the work of the Lord. [Many] spake in touns, and prophesied" (Jan. 18, 1852, Nineteenth Ward Book A, Church Archives). The meeting began at 6 P.M. and ended three and one-half hours later.

MUSIC played an important part in any LDS service. "My soul delighteth in the song of the heart," read an early revelation; "yea, the song of the righteous is a prayer unto me" (D&C 25:12). Emma SMITH, Joseph's wife, collected and published in 1835 the first hymnal, which was actually a diminutive volume of poetry (music was borrowed from popular or favorite melodies). The settlers continued their musical tradition in the intermountain West. Only two weeks after their arrival, the nucleus of what would become the TABERNACLE CHOIR formed around a group of English and Welsh singers. As pioneering progressed, President Young insisted that each colonizing party have a music leader, called "musical missionaries," to sing, lead choirs, and play instruments in outlying settlements. He personally subsidized the Nauvoo Brass Band, which became a prototype. By the 1860s there were at least forty bands in the territory; by 1875 there were twice that number. Travelers Jules Remy and Julius Benchley were impressed. "Mormons have a feeling for sacred music," they concluded. "Their women [particularly] sing with soul" (A Journey to Great-Salt-Lake City, 1861, 2:56, 374–75).

Latter-day Saints also expressed their devotions in sacramental ordinances. COMMUNION, or "the sacrament," as Latter-day Saints call it, was a primary means. Occasionally suspended due to the unworthiness or insouciance of partakers, the SACRAMENT generally was a weekly ritual on Temple Square and at least a monthly one in local wards. Forms varied. Sometimes speakers stopped in mid-discourse to bless the emblems, which priesthood teachers then passed to the congregation's men, women, children, and even non-Mormon visitors as the preaching resumed. On other occasions bishops or young men consecrated the bread and water, which increasingly was substituted for wine. For Latter-day Saints the ordinance was a symbolic remembrance of Christ's flesh and blood and a renewal of the covenant of discipleship. Simple and unadorned, avoiding complex formulations such as transubstantiation, it was the central LDS public act of worship.

There were others. During a pioneer's lifetime, baptism might be administered several times as a token of special covenant. In addition to the original baptismal vow, accepting Christ and establishing Church membership, Saints were baptized on such special occasions as the dedication of the Nauvoo Temple, the exodus west, arrival in the SALT LAKE VALLEY, and during the Churchwide reformations of 1856–1857 (see REBAPTISM; REFORMATION OF 1856–1857) and 1875–1876, when "reconfirmations" were also administered. Moreover, members used rebaptism in the process of personal repentance and faith healing, and they also performed proxy baptisms in behalf of deceased ancestry. At a time when the acceptance of the restored gospel often severed a convert's ties to family, neighborhood, and vocation, the outward sign of baptism provided powerful emotional and psychological reconfirmation. With weekly meeting attendance figures starkly low, it was the means by which many Latter-day Saints expressed their continuing religious commitment.

The temple ENDOWMENT was another way of uniting pioneer life with the sacred. With no temple completed during the pioneer period, members received their endowments on hills or mountaintops or in an upper room, but more frequently, after its dedication in 1855, in the Salt Lake ENDOWMENT HOUSE. Here they were instructed on mankind's spiritual journey through the eternities and performed ordinances pertaining to ETERNAL LIFE. Without the opportunity for doing frequent proxy endowments, a ritual that became common in the twentieth century, these ceremonies entered everyday pioneer life in two ways. Members wore temple garments or marked shirts as a sign of their temple commitments, and many joined a PRAYER CIRCLE. Salt Lake City had more than seven of these groups, at least one scheduled for each night of the week, and outlying settlements had at least one. At these gatherings, members bore testimony, discussed doctrine, consecrated oil for anointing the sick, reviewed personal and group needs, and united in temple ritual and prayer.

There were broader, community devotions as well. In the early years, quorums of SEVENTY held jubilees, which united dance, exhortation, music, socializing, and general celebration. Starting in 1849 annual, communitywide Pioneer Day fetes used similar activities to mark the coming of the first pioneers. Reminiscent of the community worship and socializing of the biblical feast days, general conferences twice each year gathered thousands to Salt Lake City for worship and mingling. Finally, the Saints often united for "reform." While most often a local phenomenon, at times the "spirit of reformation" spread through the territory or was officially initiated and sanctioned. During these periods, Latter-day Saints subjected themselves to preaching, religious catechizing, confession, and the cleansing of sin, followed by a renewal of the sacramental ordinances.

There was a final expression of LDS worship. Beyond their traditional expressions and devotions, nineteenth-century Saints acted on their religious feeling by seeking to establish the temporal KINGDOM OF GOD. They "gathered to Zion" (see GATHERING; ZION), settled, had children, built homes and communities, and refined themselves. Leaders might complain of their wayward meeting attendance or inattention to detail. Yet their community building, at least in a broad sense, was a sacral experience that revealed their formidable religious energy and devotion.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Though no comprehensive survey of nineteenth-century Latter-day Saint worship exists, several narrower studies are especially helpful. Consult Leonard J. Arrington and Davis Bitton, "The Nineteenth Century Ward," in The Mormon Experience, pp. 206–219, New York, 1979; Joseph Heinerman, "The Mormon Meetinghouse: Reflections of Pioneer Religious and Social Life in Salt Lake City," Utah Historical Quarterly 50 (Fall 1982):340–53; and Ronald W. Walker, "'Going to Meeting' in Salt Lake City's Thirteenth Ward, 1849–1881: A Microanalysis," in New Views of Mormon History, ed. Davis Bitton and Maurcen Ursenbach Beecher, pp. 138–61, Salt Lake City, 1987. For an example of Temple Square preaching rhetoric, see Ronald W. Walker, "Raining Pitchforks: Brigham Young as Preacher," Sunstone 8 (May–June 1983):4–9.

RONALD W. WALKER

---

PLAN OF SALVATION, PLAN OF REDEMPTION

Latter-day Saints believe that eons ago, GOD, in his infinite wisdom and never-ending mercy, formulated a plan whereby his children could experience a physical existence, including mortality, and then return to live in his presence in eternal felicity and glory. This plan, alternately called "the plan of salvation" (Jarom 1:2; Alma 42:5; Moses 6:62), "the plan of redemption" (Jacob 6:8; Alma 12:25; 42:11), and the "great plan of happiness" (Alma 42:8), provided both the way and the means for everyone to receive SALVATION and gain ETERNAL LIFE. Eternal life is God's greatest gift to his children (D&C 6:13), and the plan of salvation is his way of making it available to them. Although the term "plan of salvation" is used repeatedly in latter-day scripture, it does not occur in the Bible, though the doctrines pertaining to it are discoverable in its pages.

The Father is the author of the plan of salvation; JESUS CHRIST is its chief advocate; the HOLY SPIRIT helps carry it out, communicating God's will to men and helping them live properly.

THE PREMORTAL EXISTENCE. Latter-day Saints believe that all humans are spirit children of heavenly parents (see GOD THE FATHER; MOTHER IN HEAVEN), and they dwelt with them prior to BIRTH on this earth (Heb. 12:9; cf. Jer. 1:5; Eph. 1:4). In that PREMORTAL LIFE, or FIRST ESTATE, those spirit children could not progress fully. They needed a PHYSICAL BODY in order to have a fulness of joy (D&C 93:33–34), and the spirits also needed to be placed in an environment where, by the exercise of AGENCY, they could prove their willingness to keep God's commandments (Abr. 3:25). On the other hand, if they succumbed to TEMPTATION, they would be shut out from God's presence, for "no unclean thing can dwell with God" (1 Ne. 10:21; Eph. 5:5). To bring those who yielded to temptation back into God's presence, a plan of redemption had to be set in place, and this required a redeemer.

A COUNCIL IN HEAVEN was held of all the spirits, and two individuals volunteered to serve as the redeemer. One was Lucifer, a son of the morning (Isa. 14:12; D&C 76:26), who said he would "redeem all mankind, that one soul shall not be lost," but they would have no choice in the matter. Their agency would be destroyed (Moses 4:1–3). Such a proposal was out of harmony with the plan of the Father, for the agency of mankind is an absolute prerequisite to progress. JEHOVAH, the premortal Jesus Christ, had first stepped forward and volunteered to give his life as payment for all SINS. He set no plan or conditions of his own, but said, "Father, thy will be done, and the glory be thine forever" (Moses 4:2). He was selected by the Father.

When Lucifer would not accept the Father's choice, a WAR IN HEAVEN ensued, and he was cast out for rebellion (Moses 4:3; D&C 76:25), along with those who followed him, numbering about a third of the spirits (Rev. 12:4, 7–9; D&C 29:36–38). After Satan's expulsion, the Father's plan was carried forward. Three events ordained and instituted by God before the creation of the Earth constitute the foundation stones upon which the plan of salvation rests. These are the CREATION, the FALL OF ADAM, and the ATONEMENT OF JESUS CHRIST. "These three divine events—the three pillars of eternity—are inseparably woven together into one grand tapestry known as the eternal plan of salvation" (McConkie, p. 81).

THE CREATION. One of the purposes for creating this earth was for God's spirit children to obtain homes and communities, and refined themselves. Leaders might complain of their wayward meeting attendance or inattention to detail. Yet their community building, at least in a broad sense, was a sacral experience that revealed their formidable religious energy and devotion.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Though no comprehensive survey of nineteenth-century Latter-day Saint worship exists, several narrower studies are especially helpful. Consult Leonard J. Arrington and Davis Bitton, "The Nineteenth Century Ward," in The Mormon Experience, pp. 206–219, New York, 1979; Joseph Heinerman, "The Mormon Meetinghouse: Reflections of Pioneer Religious and Social Life in Salt Lake City," Utah Historical Quarterly 50 (Fall 1982):340–53; and Ronald W. Walker, "'Going to Meeting' in Salt Lake City's Thirteenth Ward, 1849–1881: A Microanalysis," in New Views of Mormon History, ed. Davis Bitton and Maurcen Ursenbach Beecher, pp. 138–61, Salt Lake City, 1987. For an example of Temple Square preaching rhetoric, see Ronald W. Walker, "Raining Pitchforks: Brigham Young as Preacher," Sunstone 8 (May–June 1983):4–9.

RONALD W. WALKER

---

PLAN OF SALVATION, PLAN OF REDEMPTION

Latter-day Saints believe that eons ago, GOD, in his infinite wisdom and never-ending mercy, formulated a plan whereby his children could experience a physical existence, including mortality, and then return to live in his presence in eternal felicity and glory. This plan, alternately called "the plan of salvation" (Jarom 1:2; Alma 42:5; Moses 6:62), "the plan of redemption" (Jacob 6:8; Alma 12:25; 42:11), and the "great plan of happiness" (Alma 42:8), provided both the way and the means for everyone to receive SALVATION and gain ETERNAL LIFE. Eternal life is God's greatest gift to his children (D&C 6:13), and the plan of salvation is his way of making it available to them. Although the term "plan of salvation" is used repeatedly in latter-day scripture, it does not occur in the Bible, though the doctrines pertaining to it are discoverable in its pages.

The Father is the author of the plan of salvation; JESUS CHRIST is its chief advocate; the HOLY SPIRIT helps carry it out, communicating God's will to men and helping them live properly.

THE PREMORTAL EXISTENCE. Latter-day Saints believe that all humans are spirit children of heavenly parents (see GOD THE FATHER; MOTHER IN HEAVEN), and they dwelt with them prior to BIRTH on this earth (Heb. 12:9; cf. Jer. 1:5; Eph. 1:4). In that PREMORTAL LIFE, or FIRST ESTATE, those spirit children could not progress fully. They needed a PHYSICAL BODY in order to have a fulness of joy (D&C 93:33–34), and the spirits also needed to be placed in an environment where, by the exercise of AGENCY, they could prove their willingness to keep God's commandments (Abr. 3:25). On the other hand, if they succumbed to TEMPTATION, they would be shut out from God's presence, for "no unclean thing can dwell with God" (1 Ne. 10:21; Eph. 5:5). To bring those who yielded to temptation back into God's presence, a plan of redemption had to be set in place, and this required a redeemer.

A COUNCIL IN HEAVEN was held of all the spirits, and two individuals volunteered to serve as the redeemer. One was Lucifer, a son of the morning (Isa. 14:12; D&C 76:26), who said he would "redeem all mankind, that one soul shall not be lost," but they would have no choice in the matter. Their agency would be destroyed (Moses 4:1–3). Such a proposal was out of harmony with the plan of the Father, for the agency of mankind is an absolute prerequisite to progress. JEHOVAH, the premortal Jesus Christ, had first stepped forward and volunteered to give his life as payment for all SINS. He set no plan or conditions of his own, but said, "Father, thy will be done, and the glory be thine forever" (Moses 4:2). He was selected by the Father.

When Lucifer would not accept the Father's choice, a WAR IN HEAVEN ensued, and he was cast out for rebellion (Moses 4:3; D&C 76:25), along with those who followed him, numbering about a third of the spirits (Rev. 12:4, 7–9; D&C 29:36–38). After Satan's expulsion, the Father's plan was carried forward. Three events ordained and instituted by God before the creation of the Earth constitute the foundation stones upon which the plan of salvation rests. These are the CREATION, the FALL OF ADAM, and the ATONEMENT OF JESUS CHRIST. "These three divine events—the three pillars of eternity—are inseparably woven together into one grand tapestry known as the eternal plan of salvation" (McConkie, p. 81).

THE CREATION. One of the purposes for creating this earth was for God's spirit children to obtain physical bodies and learn to walk by FAITH. Earth life is the SECOND ESTATE. The scriptures teach that by the power of his Only Begotten Son, the Father has created “worlds without number” (Moses 1:33; cf. John 1:3; Heb. 1:2), but the Lord has revealed to us detailed information only about this world (Moses 1:40).

Ecclesiastes states that “whatsoever God doeth, it shall be forever” (Eccl. 3:14). God does not work for temporal ends (D&C 29:34–35). The scriptures specify that when God created the earth, it was in a paradisiacal and deathless state. If ADAM and EVE had not transgressed and fallen, “all things which were created must have remained in the same state in which they were after they were created; and they must have remained for ever, and had no end” (2 Ne. 2:22; cf. Moses 3:9; DS, pp. 75–77).

THE FALL. An earth in a deathless and paradisiacal state did not fulfill conditions needed for the progression of God’s children (see PURPOSE OF EARTH LIFE). The Book of Mormon gives some reasons why the Fall was part of the foreordained plan of God. Agency is of paramount importance in the proving process. Critical to agency are choices or alternatives. LEHI taught that “there must needs be an opposition in all things” (2 Ne. 2:11). But in the state in which Adam and Eve found themselves, there was no such opposition. They had physical bodies, but were in a state of innocence. There was no death, sin, sorrow, or pain. Furthermore, in that state they would have had no children (2 Ne. 2:22–23). It appears that a major reason Lucifer and his followers had access to those on earth is the necessity that everyone be enticed by both good and evil (2 Ne. 2:16).

Eve was beguiled by Satan to partake of the forbidden fruit, exercised her agency and did so. Adam also chose to partake, realizing that if he did not, Eve and he would be separated and the command to multiply and replenish the earth would be thwarted. Therefore, “Adam fell that men might be” (2 Ne. 2:25). “With the eating of the ‘forbidden fruit,’ Adam and Eve became mortal, sin entered, blood formed in their bodies, and death became a part of life. . . . After Adam fell, the whole creation fell and became mortal. Adam’s fall brought both physical and spiritual death into the world upon all mankind” (Bible Dictionary, p. 670; DS 1:77; Hel. 14:16–17; see also SPIRITUAL DEATH). Later, both Adam and Eve rejoiced in the opportunities that had come to them because of the fall (Moses 5:10–11).

The Fall was part of God’s plan for mankind and came as no surprise. “All things have been done in the wisdom of him who knoweth all things” (2 Ne. 2:24). Latter-day Saints affirm that Adam and Eve were actual beings, the first parents, and that the Fall was a literal event both in time and place. Elder Joseph Fielding SMITH explained, “If Adam did not fall, there was no Christ, because the atonement of Jesus Christ is based on the fall of Adam” (DS 1:120). Elder James E. Talmage wrote, “It has become a common practice with mankind to heap reproaches on the progenitors of the family, and to picture the supposedly blessed state in which we would be living but for the fall; whereas our first parents are entitled to our deepest gratitude for their legacy to posterity” (AF, p. 70).

THE ATONEMENT. The Atonement is the crowning phase of the plan of salvation, without which all else would have been without purpose and all would have been lost. Atonement literally means “at-one-ment” and carries the idea of reconciliation, or the reuniting, of the human family with Heavenly Father. Understanding reconciliation necessitates an examination of the operation of the laws of JUSTICE AND MERCY.

God’s perfect love, patience, long-suffering, and care for humanity’s eternal welfare are the manifestations of his mercy. God is also just and so cannot look upon sin with the “least degree of allowance” (Alma 45:16). Perfect justice requires that every violation of God’s law be punished and every act of obedience to the law be rewarded or blessed (D&C 130:20–21). Mercy and justice are basic to God’s nature, and neither can be ignored. If the demands of justice were the only consideration and mercy ignored, no one could come back into God’s presence, for “all have sinned and come short of the glory of God” (Rom. 3:23). If God were to excuse sin, then mercy would rob justice. Such cannot be. “What, do ye suppose that mercy can rob justice? I say unto you, Nay; not one whit. If so, God would cease to be God” (Alma 42:25).

In the atonement of Jesus Christ, justice and mercy are combined to bring about the plan of redemption. As the Only Begotten Son of a divine Father and a mortal mother (see MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS), Jesus was subject to the effects of the fall of Adam (mortality, temptation, pain, etc.), but had the power to live a perfect, sinless life (Heb.

3:15; D&C 45:4) and to lay down his life and take it up again (John 5:26; 10:17). In LDS doctrine, the miraculous conception and VIRGIN BIRTH of Jesus Christ are accepted as literally true and absolutely essential to the working of the plan of salvation. Because of his sinless life, justice had no claim on him. Because of his infinite, divine power, he could pay the price of sin for all of God's children and satisfy justice in their behalf (D&C 45:3–5). His was not a human sacrifice, but an infinite, eternal sacrifice (Alma 34:40). He atoned not only for the fall of Adam but also for the individual sins of every person. He extends forgiveness to everyone upon the condition of repentance.

In Gethsemane, Christ took upon himself the burden of the sins of the world and suffered for them in a way that is incomprehensible to mortals. “He suffereth the pains of all men, yea, the pains of every living creature, both men, women, and children, who belong to the family of Adam” (2 Ne. 9:21). This incomprehensible agony was so intense that it caused Jesus, “even God, the greatest of all, to tremble because of pain, and to bleed at every pore, and to suffer both body and spirit” (D&C 19:18; Mosiah 3:7; cf. Luke 22:42). Because he had power over death, Jesus endured (JC, p. 613). The shame, suffering, trials, scourging, and crucifixion were such that a mortal, finite being cannot fathom the price required before the Redeemer could say, “It is finished!” (John 19:30). God's great plan of redemption was implemented, and justice was not robbed by mercy, but rather was paid in full by the atoning blood of Jesus Christ. This payment for everyone's sins is called the grace of Jesus Christ. Without it, all stand condemned to eternal damnation. Hence, NEPHI<sup>1</sup> declared, “It is by grace that we are saved, after all we can do” (2 Ne. 25:23). Paul also taught the doctrine of salvation by grace (Eph. 2:8–9)—that is, without Christ's atonement, nothing any mortal could do would suffice.

Some aspects of Christ's atonement are unconditional. All mortal beings will be resurrected and brought back into the presence of God for the judgment regardless of the kind of lives they have lived (1 Cor. 15:22; 2 Ne. 9:12–15; Hcl. 14:16–17), thus redeeming all humankind from both the mortal and spiritual deaths occasioned by the fall of Adam. Another unconditional aspect of Christ's mercy applies to young children who are not capable of understanding the difference between good and evil and therefore are not accountable. They cannot sin or be tempted of Satan (D&C 29:47; Moro. 8:8). “They are all alive in [Christ] because of his mercy” (Moro. 8:19; cf. D&C 29:46). LDS doctrine states that all children who die before the age of ACCOUNTABILITY (age eight) are saved in the CELESTIAL KINGDOM (D&C 137:10). Mercy extends also to those who through mental handicaps do not reach the mental age of eight, the level of accountability (D&C 29:50).

However, for those who are mentally accountable, part of their estrangement from God is the direct result of their own sins, in addition to Adam's transgression. Unless something is done in their behalf, they will not be allowed to return to the presence of God after their judgment, for no unclean thing can enter there (1 Ne. 10:21). The Lord has set in place certain principles and ORDINANCES called the gospel, which must be followed to have Christ's full atoning power applied to one's own sins: (1) FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST, (2) REPENTANCE, (3) BAPTISM by immersion for the remission of sins by one having AUTHORITY, and (4) the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST by the LAYING ON of hands (see ARTICLES OF FAITH). Paul and others emphasized that humans are saved by GRACE and not by their own WORKS (Eph. 2:8). This is true because no mortals can work perfectly enough to save themselves. No mortals have, or can have, the power to overcome the effects of the fall of Adam, or even their own sins. Everyone must depend on the atoning blood of the Savior for salvation. With equal clarity and firmness, the Savior and his servants have taught that how people live is a condition for bringing the power of the Atonement to bear in their own lives. “Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of the Father” (Matt. 5:21). “The hearers of the law are [not] just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified” (Rom. 1:18; 2:13). “They which do [the works of the flesh] shall not inherit the kingdom of God” (Gal. 5:21). “Behold, [Christ] offereth himself a sacrifice for sin, to answer the ends of the law, unto all those who have a broken heart and contrite spirit; and unto none else can the ends of the law be answered” (2 Ne. 2:7).

THE SPIRIT WORLD AND THE THREE DEGREES OF GLORY. When mortals complete their sojourn on earth and pass through the portal called death, they enter the postmortal SPIRIT WORLD. As part of the plan of salvation, the Lord set a time between death and the RESURRECTION when men and women can continue their progression and further learn principles of perfection before they are brought to the final judgment (Alma 40:6–21). Jesus Christ went to the postmortal spirit world while his body lay in the tomb to preach the gospel to them (1 Pet. 3:19–20; 4:6; D&C 138:11–37) so that those spirits in the postmortal spirit world could hear and accept or reject the gospel. Since baptism, the gift of the Holy Ghost, temple endowment, and SEALING are earthly ordinances, Latter-day Saints perform the ordinances vicariously for the dead in their temples (see SALVATION FOR THE DEAD). Because individuals differ so widely in their obedience to God's commandments, LDS theology rejects the traditional Christian concepts of the single option of heaven or hell in explaining the final destiny of souls (see SOUL). Through a vision given to the Prophet Joseph Smith (D&C 76), the Lord has shown, as he also revealed to Paul, that there are several DEGREES OF GLORY in mankind's eternal reward (D&C 76; cf. 1 Cor. 15:42).

The plan of salvation was created by the Father, brought into reality by the atoning sacrifice of his Beloved Son, and facilitated by the gifts of the Holy Ghost. It embraces the Creation, the Fall, and the Atonement, including the Resurrection, and sweeps across all time from the premortal existence to the final state of IMMORTALITY and eternal life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- McConkie, Bruce R. A New Witness for the Articles of Faith, pp. 81–104, 144–59. Salt Lake City, 1985.
 Packer, Boyd K. Our Father's Plan. Salt Lake City, 1984.
 Taylor, John. The Mediation and Atonement of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Salt Lake City, 1882.

GERALD N. LUND

PLATES, METAL

[The Book of Mormon mentions several records, most of which were inscribed on metal plates. The text of the Book of Mormon was inscribed on metal plates; see Book of Mormon Plates and Records; Book of Mormon: The Words of Mormon; and Gold Plates. In addition, the scriptural record possessed by the Book of Mormon colony that fled Jerusalem and came to the Americas under the leadership of the prophet Lehi was engraved on plates of brass; see Book of Mormon: An Overview. This colony continued to prepare metal plates, which were then used to inscribe records both sacred and secular; see Book of Mormon Economy and Technology. It is also known that a prophet named Ether inscribed on metal leaves the record of his people, the earliest Book of Mormon group to migrate to the Western Hemisphere; see Book of Mormon: Book of Ether and Jaredites. The final set of plates abridged by Mormon were seen by the Book of Mormon Witnesses. For information about the major writers or abridgers of these plates, see Mormon; Moroni<sub>2</sub>; Mosiah<sub>2</sub>; and Nephi<sub>1</sub>.]

PLURAL MARRIAGE

Plural marriage was the nineteenth-century LDS practice of a man marrying more than one wife. Popularly known as polygamy, it was actually polygyny. Although polygamy had been practiced for much of history in many parts of the world, to do so in “enlightened” America in the nineteenth century was viewed by most as incomprehensible and unacceptable, making it the Church's most controversial and least understood practice. Though the principle was lived for a relatively brief period, it had profound impact on LDS self-definition, helping to establish the Latter-day Saints as a “people apart.” The practice also caused many nonmembers to distance themselves from the Church and see Latter-day Saints more negatively than would otherwise have been the case.

Rumors of plural marriage among the members of the Church in the 1830s and 1840s led to persecution, and the public announcement of the practice after August 29, 1852, in Utah gave enemies a potent weapon to fan public hostility against the Church. Although Latter-day Saints believed that their religiously-based practice of plural marriage was protected by the U.S. Constitution, opponents used it to delay Utah statehood until 1896. Ever harsher ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION stripped Latter-day Saints of their rights as citizens, disincorporated the Church, and permitted the seizure of Church property before the MANIFESTO OF 1890 announced the discontinuance of the practice.

Plural marriage challenged those within the Church, too. Spiritual descendants of the Puritans and sexually conservative, early participants in plural marriage first wrestled with the prospect and then embraced the principle only after receiving personal spiritual confirmation that they should do so.

and women can continue their progression and further learn principles of perfection before they are brought to the final judgment (Alma 40:6–21). Jesus Christ went to the postmortal spirit world while his body lay in the tomb to preach the gospel to them (1 Pet. 3:19–20; 4:6; D&C 138:11–37) so that those spirits in the postmortal spirit world could hear and accept or reject the gospel. Since baptism, the gift of the Holy Ghost, temple endowment, and SEALING are earthly ordinances, Latter-day Saints perform the ordinances vicariously for the dead in their temples (see SALVATION FOR THE DEAD). Because individuals differ so widely in their obedience to God's commandments, LDS theology rejects the traditional Christian concepts of the single option of heaven or hell in explaining the final destiny of souls (see SOUL). Through a vision given to the Prophet Joseph Smith (D&C 76), the Lord has shown, as he also revealed to Paul, that there are several DEGREES OF GLORY in mankind's eternal reward (D&C 76; cf. 1 Cor. 15:42).

The plan of salvation was created by the Father, brought into reality by the atoning sacrifice of his Beloved Son, and facilitated by the gifts of the Holy Ghost. It embraces the Creation, the Fall, and the Atonement, including the Resurrection, and sweeps across all time from the premortal existence to the final state of IMMORTALITY and eternal life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- McConkie, Bruce R. A New Witness for the Articles of Faith, pp. 81–104, 144–59. Salt Lake City, 1985.
 Packer, Boyd K. Our Father's Plan. Salt Lake City, 1984.
 Taylor, John. The Mediation and Atonement of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Salt Lake City, 1882.

GERALD N. LUND

PLATES, METAL

[The Book of Mormon mentions several records, most of which were inscribed on metal plates. The text of the Book of Mormon was inscribed on metal plates; see Book of Mormon Plates and Records; Book of Mormon: The Words of Mormon; and Gold Plates. In addition, the scriptural record possessed by the Book of Mormon colony that fled Jerusalem and came to the Americas under the leadership of the prophet Lehi was engraved on plates of brass; see Book of Mormon: An Overview. This colony continued to prepare metal plates, which were then used to inscribe records both sacred and secular; see Book of Mormon Economy and Technology. It is also known that a prophet named Ether inscribed on metal leaves the record of his people, the earliest Book of Mormon group to migrate to the Western Hemisphere; see Book of Mormon: Book of Ether and Jaredites. The final set of plates abridged by Mormon were seen by the Book of Mormon Witnesses. For information about the major writers or abridgers of these plates, see Mormon; Moroni<sub>2</sub>; Mosiah<sub>2</sub>; and Nephi<sub>1</sub>.]

PLURAL MARRIAGE

Plural marriage was the nineteenth-century LDS practice of a man marrying more than one wife. Popularly known as polygamy, it was actually polygyny. Although polygamy had been practiced for much of history in many parts of the world, to do so in “enlightened” America in the nineteenth century was viewed by most as incomprehensible and unacceptable, making it the Church's most controversial and least understood practice. Though the principle was lived for a relatively brief period, it had profound impact on LDS self-definition, helping to establish the Latter-day Saints as a “people apart.” The practice also caused many nonmembers to distance themselves from the Church and see Latter-day Saints more negatively than would otherwise have been the case.

Rumors of plural marriage among the members of the Church in the 1830s and 1840s led to persecution, and the public announcement of the practice after August 29, 1852, in Utah gave enemies a potent weapon to fan public hostility against the Church. Although Latter-day Saints believed that their religiously-based practice of plural marriage was protected by the U.S. Constitution, opponents used it to delay Utah statehood until 1896. Ever harsher ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION stripped Latter-day Saints of their rights as citizens, disincorporated the Church, and permitted the seizure of Church property before the MANIFESTO OF 1890 announced the discontinuance of the practice.

Plural marriage challenged those within the Church, too. Spiritual descendants of the Puritans and sexually conservative, early participants in plural marriage first wrestled with the prospect and then embraced the principle only after receiving personal spiritual confirmation that they should do so.

and women can continue their progression and further learn principles of perfection before they are brought to the final judgment (Alma 40:6–21). Jesus Christ went to the postmortal spirit world while his body lay in the tomb to preach the gospel to them (1 Pet. 3:19–20; 4:6; D&C 138:11–37) so that those spirits in the postmortal spirit world could hear and accept or reject the gospel. Since baptism, the gift of the Holy Ghost, temple endowment, and SEALING are earthly ordinances, Latter-day Saints perform the ordinances vicariously for the dead in their temples (see SALVATION FOR THE DEAD). Because individuals differ so widely in their obedience to God's commandments, LDS theology rejects the traditional Christian concepts of the single option of heaven or hell in explaining the final destiny of souls (see SOUL). Through a vision given to the Prophet Joseph Smith (D&C 76), the Lord has shown, as he also revealed to Paul, that there are several DEGREES OF GLORY in mankind's eternal reward (D&C 76; cf. 1 Cor. 15:42).

The plan of salvation was created by the Father, brought into reality by the atoning sacrifice of his Beloved Son, and facilitated by the gifts of the Holy Ghost. It embraces the Creation, the Fall, and the Atonement, including the Resurrection, and sweeps across all time from the premortal existence to the final state of IMMORTALITY and eternal life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- McConkie, Bruce R. A New Witness for the Articles of Faith, pp. 81–104, 144–59. Salt Lake City, 1985.
 Packer, Boyd K. Our Father's Plan. Salt Lake City, 1984.
 Taylor, John. The Mediation and Atonement of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Salt Lake City, 1882.

GERALD N. LUND

PLATES, METAL

[The Book of Mormon mentions several records, most of which were inscribed on metal plates. The text of the Book of Mormon was inscribed on metal plates; see Book of Mormon Plates and Records; Book of Mormon: The Words of Mormon; and Gold Plates. In addition, the scriptural record possessed by the Book of Mormon colony that fled Jerusalem and came to the Americas under the leadership of the prophet Lehi was engraved on plates of brass; see Book of Mormon: An Overview. This colony continued to prepare metal plates, which were then used to inscribe records both sacred and secular; see Book of Mormon Economy and Technology. It is also known that a prophet named Ether inscribed on metal leaves the record of his people, the earliest Book of Mormon group to migrate to the Western Hemisphere; see Book of Mormon: Book of Ether and Jaredites. The final set of plates abridged by Mormon were seen by the Book of Mormon Witnesses. For information about the major writers or abridgers of these plates, see Mormon; Moroni<sub>2</sub>; Mosiah<sub>2</sub>; and Nephi<sub>1</sub>.]

PLURAL MARRIAGE

Plural marriage was the nineteenth-century LDS practice of a man marrying more than one wife. Popularly known as polygamy, it was actually polygyny. Although polygamy had been practiced for much of history in many parts of the world, to do so in “enlightened” America in the nineteenth century was viewed by most as incomprehensible and unacceptable, making it the Church's most controversial and least understood practice. Though the principle was lived for a relatively brief period, it had profound impact on LDS self-definition, helping to establish the Latter-day Saints as a “people apart.” The practice also caused many nonmembers to distance themselves from the Church and see Latter-day Saints more negatively than would otherwise have been the case.

Rumors of plural marriage among the members of the Church in the 1830s and 1840s led to persecution, and the public announcement of the practice after August 29, 1852, in Utah gave enemies a potent weapon to fan public hostility against the Church. Although Latter-day Saints believed that their religiously-based practice of plural marriage was protected by the U.S. Constitution, opponents used it to delay Utah statehood until 1896. Ever harsher ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION stripped Latter-day Saints of their rights as citizens, disincorporated the Church, and permitted the seizure of Church property before the MANIFESTO OF 1890 announced the discontinuance of the practice.

Plural marriage challenged those within the Church, too. Spiritual descendants of the Puritans and sexually conservative, early participants in plural marriage first wrestled with the prospect and then embraced the principle only after receiving personal spiritual confirmation that they should do so.

The family of Alvin F. Heaton and his two wives Sarah Jane Carroll (married in 1880) and Luey Spencer (married in 1882), in Moeceasin Springs, Arizona (1907). In 1890 the Manifesto announced that no new plural marriages were to be authorized.

In 1843, one year before his death, the Prophet Joseph Smith dictated a lengthy revelation on the doctrine of marriage for eternity (D&C 132; see MARRIAGE: ETERNAL MARRIAGE). This revelation also taught that under certain conditions a man might be authorized to have more than one wife. Though the revelation was first committed to writing on July 12, 1843, considerable evidence suggests that the principle of plural marriage was revealed to Joseph Smith more than a decade before in connection with his study of the Bible (see JOSEPH SMITH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE), probably in early 1831. Passages indicating that revered patriarchs and prophets of old were polygamists raised questions that prompted the Prophet to inquire of the Lord about marriage in general and about plurality of wives in particular. He then learned that when the Lord commanded it, as he had with the patriarchs anciently, a man could have more than one living wife at a time and not be condemned for adultery. He also understood that the Church would one day be required to live the law (D&C 132:1-4, 28-40).

Evidence for the practice of plural marriage during the 1830s is scant. Only a few knew about the still unwritten revelation, and perhaps the only known plural marriage was that between Joseph Smith and Fanny Alger. Nonetheless there were rumors, harbingers of challenges to come.

In April 1839, Joseph Smith emerged from six months' imprisonment in LIBERTY JAIL with a sense of urgency about completing his mission (see HISTORY OF THE CHURCH: C. 1831-1844). Since receiving the SEALING key from ELIJAH in the KIRTLAND TEMPLE (D&C 110:13–16) in April 1836, the Prophet had labored to prepare the Saints for additional teachings and ordinances, including plural marriage.

Joseph Smith realized that the introduction of plural marriage would inevitably invite severe criticism. After the Kirtland experience, he knew the tension it would create in his own family; even though Emma, with faith in his prophetic calling, accepted the revelation as being from God and not of his own doing, she could not reconcile herself to the practice. Beyond that, it had the potential to divide the Church and increase hostilities from outside. Still, he felt obligated to move ahead. “The object with me is to obey & teach others to obey God in just what he tells us to do,” he taught several months before his death. “It mattereth not whether the principle is popular or unpopular. I will always maintain a true principle even if I stand alone in it” (TPJS, p. 332).

Although certain that God would require it of him and of the Church, Joseph Smith would not have introduced it when he did except for the conviction that God required it then. Several close confidants later said that he proceeded with plural marriage in Nauvoo only after both internal struggle and divine warning. Lorenzo Snow later remembered vividly a conversation in 1843 in which the Prophet described the battle he waged “in overcoming the repugnance of his feelings” regarding plural marriage.

He knew the voice of God—he knew the commandment of the Almighty to him was to go forward—to set the example, and establish Celestial plural marriage. He knew that he had not only his own prejudices and pre-possessions to combat and to overcome, but those of the whole Christian world . . . ; but God . . . had given the commandment [The Biography and Family Record of Lorenzo Snow, pp. 69–70 (Salt Lake City, 1884)].

Even so, Snow and other confidants agreed that Joseph Smith proceeded in Nauvoo only after an angel declared that he must or his calling would be given to another (Bachman, pp. 74–75). After this, Joseph Smith told Brigham Young that he was determined to press ahead though it would cost him his life, for “it is the work of God, and He has revealed this principle, and it is not my business to control or dictate it” (Brigham Young Discourse, Oct. 8, 1866, Church Archives).

Nor did others enter into plural marriage blindly or simply because Joseph Smith had spoken, despite biblical precedents. Personal accounts document that most who entered plural marriage in Nauvoo faced a crisis of faith that was resolved only by personal spiritual witness. Those who participated generally did so only after they had obtained reassurance and saw it as religious duty.

Even those closest to Joseph Smith were challenged by the revelation. After first learning of plural marriage, Brigham Young said he felt to envy the corpse in a funeral cortege and “could hardly get over it for a long time” (JD 3:266). The Prophet’s brother Hyrum Smith stubbornly resisted the very possibility until circumstances forced him to go to the Lord for understanding. Both later taught the principle to others. Emma Smith vacillated, one day railing in opposition against it and the next giving her consent for Joseph to be sealed to another wife (see comments by Orson Pratt, JD 13:194).

Teaching new marriage and family arrangements where the principles could not be openly discussed compounded the problems. Those authorized to teach the doctrine stressed the strict covenants, obligations and responsibilities associated with it—the antithesis of license. But those who heard only rumors, or who chose to distort and abuse the teaching, often envisioned and sometimes practiced something quite different. One such was John C. Bennett, mayor of Nauvoo and adviser to Joseph Smith, who twisted the teaching to his own advantage. Capitalizing on rumors and lack of understanding among general Church membership, he taught a doctrine of “spiritual wifery.” He and associates sought to have illicit sexual relationships with women by telling them that they were married “spiritually,” even if they had never been married formally, and that the Prophet approved the arrangement. The Bennett scandal resulted in his excommunication and the disaffection of several others. Bennett then toured the country speaking against the Latter-day Saints and published a bitter anti-Mormon exposé charging the Saints with licentiousness.

The Bennett scandal elicited several public statements aimed at arming the Saints against the abuses. Two years later enemies and dissenters, some of whom had been associated with Bennett, published the NAUVOO EXPOSITOR, to expose, among other things, plural marriage, thus setting in motion events leading to Joseph Smith’s death (see MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH).

Far from involving license, however, plural marriage was a carefully regulated and ordered system. Order, mutual agreements, regulation, and covenants were central to the practice. As Elder Parley P. Pratt wrote in 1845,

These holy and sacred ordinances have nothing to do with whoredoms, unlawful connections, confusion or crime; but the very reverse. They have laws, limits, and bounds of the strictest kind, and none but the pure in heart, the strictly virtuous, or those who repent and become such, are worthy to partake of them. And . . . [a] dreadful weight of condemnation await those who pervert, or abuse them [The Prophet, May 24, 1845; cf. D&C 132:7].

The Book of Mormon makes clear that, though the Lord will command men through his prophets to live the law of plural marriage at special times for his purposes, monogamy is the general standard (Jacob 2:28-30); unauthorized polygamy was and is viewed as adultery. Another safeguard was that authorized plural marriages could be performed only through the sealing power controlled by the presiding authority of the Church (D&C 132:19).

Once the Saints left Nauvoo, plural marriage was openly practiced. In WINTER QUARTERS, for example, discussion of the principle was an "open secret" and plural families were acknowledged. As early as 1847, visitors to Utah commented on the practice. Still, few new plural marriages were authorized in Utah before the completion of the ENDOWMENT HOUSE in Salt Lake City in 1855.

With the Saints firmly established in the Great Basin, Brigham Young announced the practice publicly and published the revelation on eternal marriage. Under his direction, on Sunday, August 29, 1852, Elder Orson Pratt publicly discussed and defended the practice of plural marriage in the Church. After examining the biblical precedents (Abraham, Jacob, David, and others), Elder Pratt argued that the Church, as heir of the keys required anciently for plural marriages to be sanctioned by God, was required to perform such marriages as part of the RESTORATION. He offered reasons for the practice and discussed several possible benefits (see JD 1:53-66), a precedent followed later by others. But such discussions were after the fact and not the justification. Latter-day Saints practiced plural marriage because they believed God commanded them to do so.

Generally plural marriage involved only two wives and seldom more than three; larger families like those of Brigham Young or Heber C. KIMBALL were exceptions. Sometimes the wives simply shared homes, each with her own bedroom, or lived in a "duplex" arrangement, each with a mirror-image half of the house. In other cases, husbands established separate homes for their wives, sometimes in separate towns. Although circumstances and the mechanics of family life varied, in general the living style was simply an adaptation of the nineteenth century American family. Polygamous marriages were similar to national norms in fertility and divorce rates as well. Wives of one husband often developed strong bonds of sisterly love; however, strong antipathies could also arise between wives.

Faced with a national antipolygamy campaign, LDS women startled their eastern sisters, who equated polygamy with oppression of women, by publicly demonstrating in favor of their right to live plural marriage as a religious principle. Judging from the preaching, women were at least as willing to enter plural marriage as men. Instead of public admonitions urging women to enter plural marriage, one finds many urging worthy men to "do their duty" and undertake to care for a plural wife and additional children. Though some were reluctant to accept such responsibility, many responded and sought another wife. It was not unheard of for a wife to take the lead and insist that her husband take another wife; yet, in other cases, a first marriage dissolved over the husband's insistence on marrying again.

As with families generally, some plural families worked better than others. Anecdotal evidence and the healthy children that emerged from many plural households witness that some worked very well. But some plural wives disliked the arrangement. The most common complaint of second and third wives resulted from a husband's displaying too little sensitivity to the needs of plural families or not treating them equally. Not infrequently, wives complained that husbands spent too little time with them. But where husbands provided conscientiously even time and wives developed deep love and respect for each other, children grew up as members of large, well-adjusted extended families.

Plural marriage helped mold the Church's attitude toward DIVORCE in pioneer Utah. Though Brigham Young disliked divorce and discouraged it, when women sought divorce he generally granted it. He felt that a woman trapped in an unworkable relationship with no alternatives deserved a chance to improve her life. But when a husband sought relief from his familial responsibilities, President Young consistently counseled him to do his duty and not seek divorce from any wife willing to put up with him.

Contrary to the caricatures of a hostile world press, plural marriage did not result in offspring of diminished capacity. Normal men and women came from plural households, and their descendants are prominent throughout the Intermountain West. Some observers feel that the added responsibility that fell early upon some children in such households contributed to their exceptional record of achievement. Plural marriage also aided many wives. The flexibility of plural households contributed to the large number of accomplished LDS women who were pioneers in medicine, politics and other public careers. In fact, plural marriage made it possible for wives to have professional careers that would not otherwise have been available to them.

The exact percentage of Latter-day Saints who participated in the practice is not known, but studies suggest a maximum of from 20% to 25% of LDS adults were members of polygamous households. At its height, plural marriage probably involved only a third of the women reaching marriageable age—though among Church leadership plural marriage was the norm for a time. Public opposition to polygamy led to the first law against the practice in 1862, and, by the 1880s, laws were increasingly punitive. The Church contested the constitutionality of those laws, but the Supreme Court sustained the legislation (see REYNOLDS v. UNITED STATES), leading to a harsh and effective federal antipolygamy campaign known by the Latter-day Saints as “the Raid.” Wives and husbands went on the “underground” and hundreds were arrested and sentenced to jail terms in Utah and several federal prisons. This campaign severely affected the families involved, and the related attack on Church organization and properties greatly inhibited its ability to function (see HISTORY OF THE CHURCH: C. 1877–1898). Following a vision showing him that continuing plural marriage endangered the temples and the mission of the Church, not just statehood, President Wilford WOODRUFF issued the Manifesto in October 1890, announcing an official end to new plural marriages and facilitating an eventual peaceful resolution of the conflict.

Earlier polygamous families continued to exist well into the twentieth century, causing further political problems for the Church, and new plural marriages did not entirely cease in 1890. After having lived the principle at some sacrifice for half a century, many devout Latter-day Saints found ending plural marriage a challenge almost as complex as was its beginning in the 1840s. Some new plural marriages were contracted in the 1890s in LDS settlements in Canada and northern Mexico, and a few elsewhere. With national attention again focused on the practice in the early 1900s during the House hearings on Representative-elect B. H. Roberts and Senate hearings on Senator-elect Reed Smoot (see SMOOT HEARINGS), President Joseph F. SMITH issued his “Second Manifesto” in 1904. Since that time, it has been uniform Church policy to excommunicate any member either practicing or openly advocating the practice of polygamy. Those who do so today, principally members of FUNDAMENTALIST groups, do so outside the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bachman, Daniel W. “A Study of the Mormon Practice of Plural Marriage before the Death of Joseph Smith.” M.A. thesis, Purdue University, 1975.
- Bashore, Melvin L. “Life Behind Bars: Mormon Cohabs of the 1880s.” Utah Historical Quarterly 47 (Winter 1979): 22–41.
- Bennion, Lowell (“Ben”). “The Incidence of Mormon Polygamy in 1880: ‘Dixie’ versus Davis Stake.” Journal of Mormon History 11 (1984): 27–42.
- Bitton, Davis. “Mormon Polygamy: A Review Article.” Journal of Mormon History 4 (1977): 101–118.
- Embry, Jessie L. Mormon Polygamous Families: Life in the Principle. Salt Lake City, 1987.
- Foster, Lawrence. Religion and Sexuality: The Shakers, The Mormons, and the Oneida Community. Oxford, 1981.
- James, Kimberly Jensen. “‘Between Two Fires’: Women on the ‘Underground’ of Mormon Polygamy.” Journal of Mormon History 8 (1981): 49–61.
- Van Wagoner, Richard S. Mormon Polygamy: A History. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Whittaker, David J. “Early Mormon Polygamy Defenses.” Journal of Mormon History 11 (1984): 43–63.

DANIEL W. BACHMAN
RONALD K. ESPLIN

---

POLICIES, PRACTICES, AND PROCEDURES

The FIRST PRESIDENCY and the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES have developed policies, practices, and procedures to give order and continuity throughout the units of the Church and to provide guidelines for its leaders. These guidelines, polihusband sought relief from his familial responsibilities, President Young consistently counseled him to do his duty and not seek divorce from any wife willing to put up with him.

Contrary to the caricatures of a hostile world press, plural marriage did not result in offspring of diminished capacity. Normal men and women came from plural households, and their descendants are prominent throughout the Intermountain West. Some observers feel that the added responsibility that fell early upon some children in such households contributed to their exceptional record of achievement. Plural marriage also aided many wives. The flexibility of plural households contributed to the large number of accomplished LDS women who were pioneers in medicine, politics and other public careers. In fact, plural marriage made it possible for wives to have professional careers that would not otherwise have been available to them.

The exact percentage of Latter-day Saints who participated in the practice is not known, but studies suggest a maximum of from 20% to 25% of LDS adults were members of polygamous households. At its height, plural marriage probably involved only a third of the women reaching marriageable age—though among Church leadership plural marriage was the norm for a time. Public opposition to polygamy led to the first law against the practice in 1862, and, by the 1880s, laws were increasingly punitive. The Church contested the constitutionality of those laws, but the Supreme Court sustained the legislation (see REYNOLDS v. UNITED STATES), leading to a harsh and effective federal antipolygamy campaign known by the Latter-day Saints as “the Raid.” Wives and husbands went on the “underground” and hundreds were arrested and sentenced to jail terms in Utah and several federal prisons. This campaign severely affected the families involved, and the related attack on Church organization and properties greatly inhibited its ability to function (see HISTORY OF THE CHURCH: C. 1877–1898). Following a vision showing him that continuing plural marriage endangered the temples and the mission of the Church, not just statehood, President Wilford WOODRUFF issued the Manifesto in October 1890, announcing an official end to new plural marriages and facilitating an eventual peaceful resolution of the conflict.

Earlier polygamous families continued to exist well into the twentieth century, causing further political problems for the Church, and new plural marriages did not entirely cease in 1890. After having lived the principle at some sacrifice for half a century, many devout Latter-day Saints found ending plural marriage a challenge almost as complex as was its beginning in the 1840s. Some new plural marriages were contracted in the 1890s in LDS settlements in Canada and northern Mexico, and a few elsewhere. With national attention again focused on the practice in the early 1900s during the House hearings on Representative-elect B. H. Roberts and Senate hearings on Senator-elect Reed Smoot (see SMOOT HEARINGS), President Joseph F. SMITH issued his “Second Manifesto” in 1904. Since that time, it has been uniform Church policy to excommunicate any member either practicing or openly advocating the practice of polygamy. Those who do so today, principally members of FUNDAMENTALIST groups, do so outside the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bachman, Daniel W. “A Study of the Mormon Practice of Plural Marriage before the Death of Joseph Smith.” M.A. thesis, Purdue University, 1975.
- Bashore, Melvin L. “Life Behind Bars: Mormon Cohabs of the 1880s.” Utah Historical Quarterly 47 (Winter 1979): 22–41.
- Bennion, Lowell (“Ben”). “The Incidence of Mormon Polygamy in 1880: ‘Dixie’ versus Davis Stake.” Journal of Mormon History 11 (1984): 27–42.
- Bitton, Davis. “Mormon Polygamy: A Review Article.” Journal of Mormon History 4 (1977): 101–118.
- Embry, Jessie L. Mormon Polygamous Families: Life in the Principle. Salt Lake City, 1987.
- Foster, Lawrence. Religion and Sexuality: The Shakers, The Mormons, and the Oneida Community. Oxford, 1981.
- James, Kimberly Jensen. “‘Between Two Fires’: Women on the ‘Underground’ of Mormon Polygamy.” Journal of Mormon History 8 (1981): 49–61.
- Van Wagoner, Richard S. Mormon Polygamy: A History. Salt Lake City, 1986.
- Whittaker, David J. “Early Mormon Polygamy Defenses.” Journal of Mormon History 11 (1984): 43–63.

DANIEL W. BACHMAN
RONALD K. ESPLIN

---

POLICIES, PRACTICES, AND PROCEDURES

The FIRST PRESIDENCY and the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES have developed policies, practices, and procedures to give order and continuity throughout the units of the Church and to provide guidelines for its leaders. These guidelines, policies, and procedures have been formalized in the GENERAL HANDBOOK OF INSTRUCTIONS, which is distributed to priesthood leaders of the Church. The handbook is revised and brought up to date from time to time to keep instructions current. The following statements have been selected as samples from the latest edition of that handbook (1989), and references are to section and page numbers in that edition.

MORAL ISSUES

Abortion. “Abortion is one of the most revolting and sinful practices of this day. Members must not submit to, be a party to, or perform an abortion. The only exceptions are when—

1. Pregnancy has resulted from incest or rape;
2. The life or health of the woman is in jeopardy, in the opinion of competent medical authority;
3. The fetus is known, by competent medical authority, to have severe defects that will not allow the baby to survive beyond birth” (11-4).

As far as has been revealed, a person may repent and be forgiven for the sin of abortion (see ABORTION).

Abuse and Cruelty. “Members who abuse or are cruel to their spouses, children, or other family members violate the laws of God and man” (11-4; see ABUSE, SPOUSE AND CHILD).

Artificial Insemination. “Artificial insemination with semen from anyone but the husband is discouraged. . . . Artificial insemination of single sisters is not approved” (11-4; see ARTIFICIAL INSEMINATION).

Chastity and Fidelity. “God’s standard for sexual morality has always been clear: ‘Thou shalt not commit adultery’ (Ex. 20:14). In modern and . . . ancient times God has commanded all of his children to lead strictly [chaste] lives before and after marriage—intimate relations being permissible only between a man and a woman legally and lawfully married. Accordingly, intimate relations outside of marriage are out of harmony with God’s eternal plan for his children. To be morally clean, a person must refrain from adultery and fornication, from homosexual or lesbian relations, and from every other unholy, unnatural, or impure practice” (11-4; see CHASTITY, LAW OF; MARRIAGE).

Donation of Sperm. “The donation of sperm is discouraged” (11-4).

In Vitro Fertilization. “In vitro fertilization using semen other than that of the husband or an egg [from anyone] other than the wife is discouraged. However, this is a personal matter that ultimately must be left to the judgment of the husband and wife” (11-4).

Rape or Sexual Abuse Victims. “Victims of the evil acts of others are not guilty of sin.” Church officers should help victims of rape and other sexual abuse “regain their sense of innocence and overcome any feelings of guilt” (11-5).

Sex Education. “Parents have primary responsibility for the sex education of their children. Teaching this subject honestly and plainly in the home greatly improves the chance that young people will avoid serious problems. . . . Where schools have undertaken sex education, it is appropriate for parents to seek to ensure that the instructions given their children are consistent with sound moral and ethical values” (11-5; see MARRIAGE; SEX EDUCATION; SEXUALITY).

Suicide. People who take their own lives “may not be responsible for [their] acts. Only God can judge such a matter” (11-5; see SUICIDE).

Surgical Sterilization (Including Vasectomy). “Surgical sterilization should only be considered (1) where medical conditions seriously jeopardize life or health, or (2) where birth defects or serious trauma have rendered a person mentally incompetent and not responsible for his or her actions. Such conditions must be determined by competent medical judgment and in accordance with law. Even then, the person or persons responsible for this decision should consult with each other and with their bishop (or branch president) and receive divine confirmation through prayer” (11-5).

Surrogate Motherhood. The Church discourages surrogate motherhood (11-5).

MEDICAL AND HEALTH ISSUES

Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS). “Local leaders should encourage members with AIDS to consult competent medical authority. Leaders and members should treat a member who has AIDS with dignity and compassion. Though AIDS can afflict innocent victims, the principal guides to safety are chastity before marriage, total fidelity in marriage, abstinence from any homosexual relations, avoidance of illegal drugs, and reverence and care for the body” (11-5; see AIDS).

Euthanasia. “A person who participates in euthanasia—deliberately putting to death a person suffering from incurable conditions or diseases—violates the commandments of God” (11-5; see PROLONGING LIFE).

Organ Transplants. The decision of whether to will one's personal body organs or authorize "the transplant of organs from a deceased family member [rests with] the individual or the deceased person's family. The decision to receive a donated organ should be made with competent medical counsel and confirmation through prayer" (11-6; see ORGAN TRANSPLANTS AND DONATIONS).

Prolonging Life. "When severe illness strikes, Church members should exercise faith in the Lord and seek competent medical assistance. However, when dying becomes inevitable, it should be looked upon as a blessing and a purposeful part of eternal existence. Members should not feel obligated to extend mortal life by means that are unreasonable" (11-6; see PROLONGING LIFE; PURPOSE OF EARTH LIFE, LDS PERSPECTIVE).

Stillborn Children. "Although temple ordinances are not performed for stillborn children, no loss of eternal blessings or family unity is implied. The family may record the name of a stillborn child on the family group record followed by the word stillborn in parentheses. Memorial or graveside services may or may not be held as determined by the parents" (11-6; see STILLBORN CHILDREN).

Word of Wisdom. In addition to avoiding the use of tea, coffee, and alcoholic beverages, members should not misuse legal drugs and "should not use any substance that contains illegal drugs or other harmful or habit-forming ingredients" (11-6; see ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES; COFFEE; DRUG ABUSE; TEA; WORD OF WISDOM).

ADMINISTRATIVE ISSUES

Church Discipline. "The purposes of Church discipline are to (1) save the souls of transgressors; (2) protect the innocent; and (3) safeguard the purity, integrity, and good name of the Church. [It] includes giving cautions in private interviews, imposing restrictions in probations, and withdrawing fellowship or membership" (10-1). Church discipline is administered by leaders of local congregations; it can affect only a person's standing in the Church. "A person who is disfellowshipped is still a member of the Church, but is no longer in good standing. . . . A person who is excommunicated is no longer a member of the Church and cannot enjoy any membership privileges" (10-5). "All persons who are excommunicated, disfellowshipped, or placed on formal probation by a disciplinary council have a right to appeal the decision" (10-8).

The bishop, or another appropriate priesthood leader, should continue to help a disciplined person return to full fellowship in the Church (see DISCIPLINARY PROCEDURES).

Funerals. "When a funeral service is held in a Church building or conducted by a Church officer, it is a Church meeting. A member of the bishopric conducts the service. . . . Bishops may offer the use of Church meetinghouses for the funeral services of nonmembers. Such services may be held in the manner prescribed by the deceased person's church and, if the family desires, may be conducted by a clergyman of that church, provided the service is dignified and appropriate" (2-7; see BURIAL; CREMATION; DEATH AND DYING).

Income Taxes. Church members in any nation are to obey applicable tax laws. "If a member disapproves of tax laws, he may attempt to have them changed by legislation or constitutional amendment, or, if he has a well-founded legal objection, he may attempt to challenge them in the courts. A member who refuses to file a tax return, to pay required income taxes, or to comply with a final judgment in a tax case is in direct conflict with the law and with the teachings of the Church" (11-2; see CIVIC DUTIES; CIVIC RIGHTS; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW; LAW).

Political Action. "The Church does not endorse political parties or candidates. Branch, ward, or stake meetinghouses and other Church facilities, and Church directories or mailing lists must not be used in any way for political purposes." (11-2; see CHURCH AND STATE; CIVIC DUTIES; CIVIC RIGHTS; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW).

Prayers. "Both men and women may offer prayers in Church meetings" (11-3; see MEETINGS, MAJOR CHURCH; PRAYER).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

General Handbook of Instructions. Salt Lake City, 1989.

FRANK O. MAY, JR.

---

POLITICS

[Included in this entry are four articles:

- Political History
- Political Teachings
- Political Culture
- Contemporary American Politics

The first article traces the history of the political issues in which The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

Organ Transplants. The decision of whether to will one's personal body organs or authorize "the transplant of organs from a deceased family member [rests with] the individual or the deceased person's family. The decision to receive a donated organ should be made with competent medical counsel and confirmation through prayer" (11-6; see ORGAN TRANSPLANTS AND DONATIONS).

Prolonging Life. "When severe illness strikes, Church members should exercise faith in the Lord and seek competent medical assistance. However, when dying becomes inevitable, it should be looked upon as a blessing and a purposeful part of eternal existence. Members should not feel obligated to extend mortal life by means that are unreasonable" (11-6; see PROLONGING LIFE; PURPOSE OF EARTH LIFE, LDS PERSPECTIVE).

Stillborn Children. "Although temple ordinances are not performed for stillborn children, no loss of eternal blessings or family unity is implied. The family may record the name of a stillborn child on the family group record followed by the word stillborn in parentheses. Memorial or graveside services may or may not be held as determined by the parents" (11-6; see STILLBORN CHILDREN).

Word of Wisdom. In addition to avoiding the use of tea, coffee, and alcoholic beverages, members should not misuse legal drugs and "should not use any substance that contains illegal drugs or other harmful or habit-forming ingredients" (11-6; see ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES; COFFEE; DRUG ABUSE; TEA; WORD OF WISDOM).

ADMINISTRATIVE ISSUES

Church Discipline. "The purposes of Church discipline are to (1) save the souls of transgressors; (2) protect the innocent; and (3) safeguard the purity, integrity, and good name of the Church. [It] includes giving cautions in private interviews, imposing restrictions in probations, and withdrawing fellowship or membership" (10-1). Church discipline is administered by leaders of local congregations; it can affect only a person's standing in the Church. "A person who is disfellowshipped is still a member of the Church, but is no longer in good standing. . . . A person who is excommunicated is no longer a member of the Church and cannot enjoy any membership privileges" (10-5). "All persons who are excommunicated, disfellowshipped, or placed on formal probation by a disciplinary council have a right to appeal the decision" (10-8).

The bishop, or another appropriate priesthood leader, should continue to help a disciplined person return to full fellowship in the Church (see DISCIPLINARY PROCEDURES).

Funerals. "When a funeral service is held in a Church building or conducted by a Church officer, it is a Church meeting. A member of the bishopric conducts the service. . . . Bishops may offer the use of Church meetinghouses for the funeral services of nonmembers. Such services may be held in the manner prescribed by the deceased person's church and, if the family desires, may be conducted by a clergyman of that church, provided the service is dignified and appropriate" (2-7; see BURIAL; CREMATION; DEATH AND DYING).

Income Taxes. Church members in any nation are to obey applicable tax laws. "If a member disapproves of tax laws, he may attempt to have them changed by legislation or constitutional amendment, or, if he has a well-founded legal objection, he may attempt to challenge them in the courts. A member who refuses to file a tax return, to pay required income taxes, or to comply with a final judgment in a tax case is in direct conflict with the law and with the teachings of the Church" (11-2; see CIVIC DUTIES; CIVIC RIGHTS; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW; LAW).

Political Action. "The Church does not endorse political parties or candidates. Branch, ward, or stake meetinghouses and other Church facilities, and Church directories or mailing lists must not be used in any way for political purposes." (11-2; see CHURCH AND STATE; CIVIC DUTIES; CIVIC RIGHTS; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW).

Prayers. "Both men and women may offer prayers in Church meetings" (11-3; see MEETINGS, MAJOR CHURCH; PRAYER).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

General Handbook of Instructions. Salt Lake City, 1989.

FRANK O. MAY, JR.

---

POLITICS

[Included in this entry are four articles:

- Political History
- Political Teachings
- Political Culture
- Contemporary American Politics

The first article traces the history of the political issues in which The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has been involved since the restoration of the gospel. The second article examines the official teachings of LDS scriptures and prophets on political questions. The third article examines the perception of a political subculture in the membership of the Church. The last article examines the participation of the Church and its members in contemporary politics throughout the world.

The Church has on occasion been involved in political issues. Specific political controversies can be found organized by time periods in the series of articles entitled History of the Church and organized geographically in articles on particular communities, such as Kirtland, Ohio.

Several articles take up specific political issues. Missouri Conflict and Nauvoo Politics detail two major political experiences of the young LDS community that ended in forcible expulsion and loss of life and property. To see the unfolding political connection of the Mormons to the United States after the 1848 move west, read the following articles in this order: Utah Territory; Utah Expedition; Antipolygamy Legislation; Reynolds v. United States; Manifesto of 1890; Utah Statehood; and the Smoot Hearings.

The extent to which the Constitution of the United States of America will protect distinctive religious practices is a question brought in many forms to American courts. The experience of the Church and its members in the courts is summarized in Legal and Judicial History. The efforts of the Church to gain recognition and religious freedoms through direct negotiations with governments throughout the world are described in Diplomatic Relations. The attitudes and teachings of the Church derived from its scriptures and these experiences in law and politics are described in articles on Church and State; Civil Rights; Constitutional Law; Politics: Political Teachings; and War and Peace.]

POLITICAL HISTORY

LDS involvement in American politics began with the conflicts between Mormons and non-Mormons in the 1830s and 1840s that led to the founding of a religious and political community in the Great Basin, organized by the U.S. Congress as UTAH TERRITORY. Mormonism emerged as a national political issue in the presidential election of 1856 with the Republican platform's condemnation of the "twin relics of barbarism"—southern slavery and Mormon polygamy. Political involvement continued in the social and political order of the state of Utah where, because of the high number of Latter-day Saints, there is identification between the political community and the dominant religion.

From its inception in western New York in 1830, the LDS Church was politically controversial. The deepest cause of conflict directly or indirectly affecting political relationships between Latter-day Saints and others was the belief in continuing REVELATION. Non-Mormons viewed the claim of continuing revelation and the social and political forms built on that claim as threats to democratic self-government. While the Book of Mormon was being printed, a mass meeting of Palmyra residents pledged to boycott it. The Prophet Joseph SMITH was arrested several times on charges brought, according to his accusers, "to open the eyes and understanding of those who blindly follow" him. When the Church was hardly large enough to "man a farm, or meet a woman with a milk-pail," recalled Sidney RIGDON, non-Mormons were already accusing them of wanting "to upset the Government" (HC 6:289).

The turmoil of the New York period was only a harbinger of intense conflicts to follow. As the practical implications of belief in new revelation and obedience to a new prophet became clear, anti-Mormon opposition intensified. For the Prophet and his followers, divine calling made possible—indeed, morally incumbent—the effort to create a just society, which the revelations called ZION. For non-Mormon neighbors, these efforts constituted challenges that they determined to resist.

Belief in continuing revelation had profound implications for the organization of political society among the Latter-day Saints. The establishment of Zion required the unity of the LDS community in RIGHTEOUSNESS. The effort brought social, economic, and political innovations, including the GATHERING of the Saints, CONSECRATION and stewardship, the UNITED ORDER, and PLURAL MARRIAGE. In all matters relevant to building Zion, the LDS community looked to the Prophet for guidance, concentrating power, even against his own inclinations, in his hands.

Efforts to establish Zion excited fear and animosity. Made uneasy by ever-increasing numbers of Latter-day Saints and shocked or bemused by their economic and social experiments, many non-Mormons viewed the Saints as alien and hostile, even as a threat to their freedoms as Americans. Because the Church seemed to erase the distinction between CHURCH AND STATE—in American liberal political thought an important pillar of liberty—some felt that it portended the rise of religious despotism. The result was recurring political conflict, which time and again threatened the LDS community.

The efforts to build a NEW JERUSALEM in America began in 1831 with the gathering to Ohio and the designation of Zion in Jackson County, Missouri. As Church members built these new communities, differences with neighbors, and resulting tensions, were immediately evident. In Ohio, Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were tarred and feathered by a mob. Random acts of violence threatened the young LDS community (see KIRTLAND, OHIO; OHIO, LDS COMMUNITIES IN).

Matters were still worse in Missouri, where, in 1833, citizens of Jackson County banded together to remove the Latter-day Saints from the county, "peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must" (HC 1:374). They were justified, they claimed, because Mormonism was an evil for which the laws made no provision. Missourians saw these newcomers as "deluded fanatics" or "designing knaves" who claimed "to hold personal communication and converse face to face with the Most High God" and who threatened to take political control of the county (HC 1:375; see also HISTORY OF THE CHURCH: C. 1831–1844; MISSOURI: LDS COMMUNITIES IN JACKSON AND CLAY COUNTIES).

By late fall of 1833, the Latter-day Saints had been driven from Jackson County. Most found temporary refuge in Clay County, where they were at first kindly received. Eventually, however, antagonisms developed there as well when it became apparent that Saints would not be going back to their homes and lands in Jackson County. Before violence erupted, Church members abandoned Clay County in 1836 for the newly organized Caldwell County, created by the legislature specifically as a home for Mormons (see MISSOURI: LDS COMMUNITIES IN CALDWELL AND DAVIESS COUNTIES).

By the summer of 1838, trouble had erupted again. In Kirtland, economic failure associated with the Panic of 1837 contributed to dissent. Some criticized Joseph Smith's exercise of authority and charged him with "Popery," or the combining of spiritual authority and temporal power. As tensions escalated, Joseph Smith and most of the faithful left Ohio for Missouri. In Caldwell County, critics within the Church also soon took up the cry, creating such profound consternation that the community forced them out. Dissenters then stirred up non-Mormons who were already fearful of growing LDS strength. In this situation of rising tensions, Sidney Rigdon defiantly declared independence from mob depredations and vowed that the Saints would meet future force with force. All that was required for a violent conflagration was a tiny spark.

Not surprisingly, political rivalry provided the spark. On August 6, 1838, non-Mormons in Daviess County, into which the rapidly increasing LDS population had spilled, attempted to prevent Latter-day Saints from voting at Gallatin, Missouri. A brawl resulted, and exaggerated accounts of the incident soon mobilized armed bands on both sides. After several skirmishes, a pitched battle occurred, with both sides suffering casualties. Following exaggerated reports of this battle, Governor Lilburn Boggs ordered the state militia to treat the Mormons as enemies to be exterminated or driven from the state (see EXTERMINATION ORDER; MISSOURI CONFLICT). After Joseph Smith and other leaders were imprisoned, the Latter-day Saints were disarmed and then were forced from Missouri. After months of imprisonment, jailed Church leaders eventually escaped or were released.

Moving to Illinois, the Latter-day Saints built a new city, NAUVOO, along the banks of the Mississippi River. Apparently convinced that there would be no peace as long as Church members were politically at the mercy of non-Mormons, Joseph Smith sought and obtained political power for the new city. In the NAUVOO CHARTER, the Illinois legislature empowered the city to make any ordinances not prohibited by the CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES or that of Illinois and to organize a militia with power to execute said laws.

While Nauvoo flourished under the protection of the new city government and its own militia, the NAUVOO LEGION, trouble soon developed. Non-Mormons resented Nauvoo's political power, which was based on increasing LDS numbers and on their willingness to vote as a bloc to reward political friends and punish political enemies (see NAUVOO POLITICS). Bloc voting was both a reflection of the social unity of the LDS community and a defensive reaction to the abuses suffered in Missouri. Yet critics condemned the Saints for "yielding implicit obedience" to a "pretended prophet of the Lord" who, they charged, was a dangerous character entertaining "the most absolute contempt for the laws of man" (HC 6:4–5).

Even within the Church there was again restiveness, for the private introduction of plural marriage and Joseph Smith's increasing political power contributed to dissent. Dissidents established a newspaper, the NAUVOO EXPOSITOR, and attacked Joseph Smith for supposed moral imperfections and poor leadership. Declaring the Expositor a public nuisance, the Nauvoo City Council authorized Mayor Joseph Smith to order city police to destroy its press. In the resulting furor, the anti-Mormon Warsaw Signal called on the citizens of Illinois to take direct military action against the Prophet. Others spoke of extermination. With violence clearly a possibility, Joseph Smith allowed himself to be arrested on charges stemming from the Expositor incident and was imprisoned in Carthage, the county seat, where on June 27, 1844, he was murdered by a mob (see CARTHAGE JAIL; MARTYRDOM OF JOSEPH AND HYRUM SMITH).

The Prophet's death brought a lull in hostilities, which provided time to complete the NAUVOO TEMPLE and to make preparations to move to a new home in the West. When conflict broke out again in September 1845, Church leaders announced their intention to leave Illinois in the spring. By the summer of 1846, most Latter-day Saints had departed. Those remaining were forced out by an anti-Mormon attack on the city in September 1846.

The Missouri and Illinois cataclysms convinced Brigham YOUNG and other Church leaders that the Latter-day Saints needed not just political power but political autonomy. According to the prevailing constitutional interpretation of states' rights, the federal government was largely prohibited from interfering with a state's domestic institutions (slavery, for example). To obtain such autonomy, Latter-day Saints did not necessarily have to remove themselves from the boundaries of the United States but only from existing states and territories. As the first settlers in a new area, they could possibly obtain the political autonomy necessary for protection within the federal Union.

As the Latter-day Saints embarked on their westward migration, some dreamed of an independent LDS nation, while others envisioned the establishment of a territory or state within the United States. When Church leaders selected the Great Basin as their probable destination, it was legally a remote part of Mexico. The MORMON BATTALION contributed, at least marginally, to the effort by which the United States obtained title to the Southwest, including the Great Basin.

The first LDS pioneers entered the valley of the Great Salt Lake in July 1847. Until late 1848, when the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles established themselves in the valley, the settlement was governed by the Salt Lake Stake presidency and HIGH COUNCIL. President Brigham Young charged these local officials to "observe those principles which have been instituted in the Stakes of Zion for the government of the Church, and to pass such laws and ordinances as shall be necessary for the peace and prosperity of the city for the time being" (Morgan, p. 69). In December 1848, Church leaders petitioned Congress for a territorial organization. Later, they drafted a constitution for a proposed STATE OF DESERET, with a bill of rights containing a strongly worded guarantee of religious liberty, and applied for admission to the Union. Brigham Young was elected governor of the would-be state.

In Congress, this hoped-for admission became enmeshed in the political maelstrom over slavery in U.S. territories raised by the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. In the Compromise of 1850, Congress organized the Latter-day Saints as the Territory of Utah. The compromise, adopting the principle of popular sovereignty, allowed settlers in the newly acquired territories to decide whether they would have slavery. Utah, attempting to remain aloof from the dispute over slavery, offended both anti- and proslavery congressmen by ignoring the matter in its constitution.

From the beginning of Utah's territorial period, relations between the LDS community and the federal government were tense. The first non-Mormon territorial officials became embroiled in controversy within days of their arrival and soon returned to the East, spreading inflammatory reports that deeply influenced congressional and public opinion. Later federal appointees were also critical. And the Church deeply agitated public opinion when it officially avowed plural marriage in 1852.

In the presidential election of 1856, the Republican party used public antipolygamy feeling to attack the Democratic party for its stand on slavery in the territories. Democrats in Congress had passed the 1854 Kansas-Nebraska Act, which, by repealing the Missouri Compromise, removed the last legal restraints on the spread of slavery to U.S. territories and established popular sovereignty as the political principle governing slavery in the territories. The Republican party, intent on restoring the Missouri Compromise by repudiating popular sovereignty, inserted the "twin relics" plank in the 1856 Republican platform in an effort to tar the Democratic party with Mormon polygamy. The point was that if the Democrats truly believed that the citizens of the territories alone had the power to legislate on slavery, logically they must also accept that the citizens of the territories should have the sole power to legislate on matrimony. Polygamy and slavery, according to the author of the "twin relics" plank, "rested precisely on the same Constitutional basis," and so "to make war upon polygamy, and at the same time strengthen the case against slavery as much as possible," he linked them together (Poll, p. 127).

The Republican strategy succeeded. Democratic party leaders concluded that to protect popular sovereignty as it related to slavery, they had to take a firm stand against polygamy. Senator Stephen Douglas, popular sovereignty's chief patron, attacked the Mormons as subversive aliens who recognized the authority of Brigham Young "and the government of which he is the head" above that of the United States. He accused Latter-day Saints of prosecuting "a system of robbery and murders upon American citizens" (see DANITES) and called for the application of "the knife" to "this pestiferous, disgusting cancer" of Mormonism, "which is gnawing at the very vitals of the body politic" (CHC 4:221–22). It is possible that embarrassment over the linkage of polygamy and popular sovereignty contributed to U.S. President James Buchanan's decision, on the basis of vague and unsubstantiated reports, to take the extraordinary step of sending an army to Utah in 1857 to enforce federal law (see UTAH EXPEDITION). The ostensible purpose of the army was to ensure that the territory accepted the replacement of Brigham Young as governor, but it had also been suggested to Buchanan that he might be able to upstage the commotion over slavery in the territories with the excitement of an anti-Mormon crusade.

A Republican-controlled Congress passed the first ANTIPOLYGAMY LEGISLATION in 1862. The Morrill Act outlawed polygamy and overturned certain acts of the Utah legislature, including one incorporating the Church, which shielded the practice of polygamy. The Civil War delayed enforcement, and when the federal government returned to the Utah situation after the war, it found that the act was unenforceable because territorial courts were in LDS hands. To remedy this situation, Congress passed the Poland Act of 1874, transferring control over criminal proceedings—including cases involving polygamy—from local courts to federally appointed officials. This act marked the transformation of the confrontation over plural marriage into a struggle over political power in Utah. The 1882 Edmunds Act prohibited polygamists (including virtually all Church leaders) from voting or holding office. It also established a federally appointed commission to control territorial elections, including voter registration. Utah women were among the first in the nation to vote, and WOMAN SUFFRAGE was now also under attack. The most sweeping legislation, the 1887 Edmunds-Tucker Act, required an antipolygamy test oath for voting and holding office, disfranchised women, disbanded the territorial militia, took control of public schools, abolished the Church's PERPETUAL EMIGRATING FUND, dissolved the Church as a legal entity, and seized much of its property. In the late 1880s, demands were made in Congress for even more stringent measures.

Latter-day Saints vigorously protested that this legislation violated their constitutionally protected right of the free exercise of religion, and in a series of cases, they challenged the antipolygamy legislation in the courts. REYNOLDS V. UNITED STATES was decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1879. The appeal attacked the Morrill Act for failing to acknowledge the religious motivation behind plural marriage. A unanimous Court held, however, that to allow Latter-day Saints' religious beliefs to excuse them from obeying the law would be to "make the professed doctrines of religious belief superior to the law of the land, and in effect to permit every citizen to become a law unto himself" (98 U.S. [1879]). The Reynolds decision distinguished between religious opinions and religious practices, leaving the former free while allowing for government regulation of the latter (see CIVIL RIGHTS; LEGAL AND JUDICIAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH).

Decisions in later polygamy cases undermined that distinction, allowing for the direct or indirect regulation of religious opinion. The Court upheld the disfranchisement provisions of the Edmunds Act in Murphy v. Ramsey. Congress, according to the Court, was responsible for preparing the territories for statehood and self-government. In Utah this required curbing the political power of polygamists because nothing was more important in the founding of a self-governing commonwealth than "the idea of family, as consisting in and springing from the union for life of one man and one woman in the holy estate of matrimony" (114 U.S. 15 [1885]). The Court in Davis v. Beason upheld an Idaho test oath that disfranchised any member of any organization that taught its members "to commit the crime" of polygamy. According to the Court, the free exercise clause of the First Amendment did not protect individuals in advocating "any form of worship" and "any tenets, however destructive of society," merely by asserting them to be a part of their religious beliefs (133 U.S. 333 [1890]). In The Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. United States, the Supreme Court sustained the disincorporation and escheat provisions of the Edmunds-Tucker Act. The opinion described the Church corporation as a contumacious organization that, in defiance of the authority of the government, continued to encourage polygamy, "a crime against the laws, and abhorrent to the sentiments and feelings of the civilized world" (136 U.S. 1 [1890]). With plenary authority over the political affairs of territories, Congress had the power to abolish the Church corporation and the government could dispose of its property.

The Poland, Edmunds, and Edmunds-Tucker laws curtailed LDS political power. An all-out attack on plural marriage came in the late 1880s, in what Latter-day Saints called "the Raid." The thrust against the Church struck deeper than the practice of polygamy, however: it struck at the heart of the LDS community and threatened its survival in a world that, since the 1830s, had shown itself hostile. The deeper threat was reflected in the massive economic, social, and political dislocations occasioned by the Raid. Finally, facing even the loss of its TEMPLES, in 1890 Church President Wilford WOODRUFF concluded that "for the temporal salvation of the church" it was necessary to end the practice of plural marriage. In his MANIFESTO OF 1890, he announced his intention to submit to the antipolygamy laws and to use his influence to induce Church members to do the same.

The Manifesto was only the beginning of the changes introduced by Church leaders in the 1890s to accommodate the Latter-day Saint community to the social, economic, and political forms of the larger society. They dissolved the local People's party, which had dominated electoral politics in Utah from its organization in the early 1870s, and encouraged members to affiliate with the Republican and Democratic national parties. They supported the development of a public school system. Finally, leaders reduced direct Church involvement in the economic life of the territory by selling off most business interests (see ECONOMIC HISTORY OF THE CHURCH; PIONEER ECONOMY). The reward for their willingness to accommodate themselves to the forms of American liberalism came in 1896 with UTAH STATEHOOD. Latter-day Saints relinquished important elements of the social, economic, and political order that they had established in the Great Basin in exchange for a measure of the political power and autonomy that decades of confrontation and conflict had demonstrated were necessary for their survival as a community.

The modus vivendi that Church leaders worked out with the American political community as the prerequisite for statehood reduced, but by no means ended, direct Church involvement in politics. In the first years after statehood, Church leaders quietly supported and participated in a system of power sharing between Mormons and non-Mormons, Democrats and Republicans. For example, the state's two seats in the U.S. Senate were divided between Latter-day Saints and non-Mormons until the election of 1916, when the Seventeenth Amendment (ratified 1913), providing for direct popular election of senators, removed the matter from the control of party or Church leaders.

Church leaders signaled their intention to curb their own political activity in the so-called Political Manifesto of 1896, which emphasized the importance of the religious duties of Church officers and required them to obtain approval of ecclesiastical superiors before seeking public office. This rule was applied more stringently for Democratic- than Republican-inclined Church officials. Church authorities in the 1890s encouraged the development of the Republican party among Church members, many of whom had avoided the party because of its harsh opposition to plural marriage.

Church leaders since 1896, with only a few exceptions, have avoided taking stands that by either identifying the Church with, or casting the Church in opposition to, either major political party would encourage a religious polarization of the parties. But they have been willing to take an official stand on such issues as public welfare and the repeal of PROHIBITION in the 1930s, Sunday closing laws in the 1950s, right-to-work laws and liquor by the drink in the 1960s, the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) in the 1970s, and ABORTION in the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s. While the Church by no means inevitably has its way in Utah politics, it is a pervasive influence in the state. Latter-day Saints help shape the political agenda of Utah, in large part determining the issues that are or are not live, and dictating the terms in which issues accepted as live are debated. Generally, the overwhelming majority of all officeholders, both Republican and Democratic, are LDS.

What the Latter-day Saints relinquished in order to secure statehood for Utah indicates what was really at stake in the nineteenth-century political conflicts. Both sides were well aware that the struggle was over more than a "peculiar institution." For Latter-day Saints, plural marriage symbolized obedience to the will of God revealed through latter-day prophets. For anti-Mormons, polygamy symbolized the potential for theocratic control, rooted in the religion's belief in continuing revelation. Territorial governor Caleb West told the Mormons in 1888 that the cause of their woes was their belief that "God governs them immediately, not alone in faith and morals, but in all affairs and relations of life, and that the counsel of the priesthood is the Supreme Voice of God and must be obeyed" (governor to Territorial Assembly, Jan. 9, 1888). The tenet of continuing revelation, an issue since the beginning, largely accounted for the struggles between the Latter-day Saints and the federal government over political power in early Utah. It generated continuing tensions in the politics of Utah, and containing them required the exercise of prudent statesmanship by leaders of both church and state. At the same time, the vitality of Utah as a democratic political community in the early twentieth century was the foundation for the relative peace that Latter-day Saints have enjoyed since then. That such peace remained somewhat precarious was evident when well-organized LDS lobbying efforts in several states against the ERA in the 1970s threatened to reawaken major apprehensions of priesthood influence on LDS voters.

Outside the United States, LDS efforts for legal recognition and freedom of operation under restrictive regimes were remarkably successful by 1990, precisely because Church leaders convinced government leaders that priesthood directives would not promote political activity that confronted constituted authority—would not, in fact, promote political activity in any particular direction. The fact that LDS political behavior both in Utah and in U.S. government service was observably stable and responsible was thus significant for the functioning and expansion of the Church in an international setting.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Alexander, Thomas G. Mormonism in Transition: A History of the Latter-day Saints, 1890–1930. Urbana and Chicago, 1986.
- Firmage, Edwin Brown, and Richard Collin Mangrum. Zion in the Courts: A Legal History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1830–1900. Urbana and Chicago, 1988.
- Hill, Marvin S. Quest for Refuge: The Mormon Flight from American Pluralism. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Lyman, Edward Leo. Political Deliverance: The Mormon Quest for Utah Statehood. Urbana and Chicago, 1986.
- Morgan, Dale L. "The State of Deseret." Utah Historical Quarterly 8 (Apr., July, Oct. 1940):65–239.
- Poll, Richard D. "The Mormon Question Enters National Politics, 1850–1856." Utah Historical Quarterly 25 (1957):117–31.

ROGER M. BARRUS

POLITICAL TEACHINGS

Concerning the general duties of government and citizen, latter-day scriptures and the prophets of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints teach that governments should protect freedoms and provide for the public interest and that citizens should honor and uphold laws and governments. LDS theology endorses aspects of both individualism and communitarianism, and harmonizes these conflicting ideas by teaching that community members can share and promote ideals and principles but should never use force to achieve such conditions. Church leaders encourage members to be participants in public affairs even as they emphasize the separation of the management of CHURCH AND STATE. The Church rarely gives official counsel to its members regarding political issues. As with other religions, various opinions exist among Latter-day Saints as to how political teachings and principles should be applied.

Section 134 of the Doctrine and Covenants is a useful starting point for examining the major beliefs of members of the LDS Church concerning politics and government. In an 1835 meeting to discuss plans for publishing the Doctrine and Covenants, Church leaders prepared a declaration to the world concerning "earthly governments and law." Some members of the Church had been accused of being opposed to law and order, and were subsequently victimized by mobbings and violence. The declaration provided guidelines for the Saints in rebutting the charges of their enemies. Penned by Oliver Cowdery, with the possible participation of W. W. Phelps, this is one of the few sections of the Doctrine and Covenants not given by revelation to Joseph Smith.

Two central themes run throughout this section and related passages. First, the duty of government is to provide for the public interest in general and to protect freedom of conscience and religious belief in particular. Governments “were instituted of God for the benefit of man.” Laws are to be enacted “for the good and safety of society” and to “secure to each individual the free exercise of conscience, the right and control of property, and the protection of life.” Government officials are to make laws that are “best calculated to secure the public interest; at the same time, however, holding sacred the freedom of conscience” (D&C 134:1–2, 5). The separation of church and state is imperative: it is not “just to mingle religious influence with civil government, whereby one religious society is fostered and another proscribed in its spiritual privileges” (D&C 134:9). Governments do not have the right “to interfere in prescribing rules of worship, to bind the consciences of men, nor dictate forms for public or private devotion.” They “should restrain crime, but never control conscience; should punish guilt, but never suppress the freedom of the soul.” Governments have an affirmative duty to protect citizens “in the free exercise of their religious belief,” but they do not have the right to “deprive citizens of this privilege, or proscribe them in their opinions,” as long as such citizens do not promote sedition (D&C 134:4–7).

Second, the duty of citizens is to honor and sustain laws and governments. All people are “bound to sustain and uphold the respective governments in which they reside, while protected in their inherent and inalienable rights.” Governments are responsible “for the protection of the innocent and the punishment of the guilty”; citizens are to “step forward and use their ability in bringing offenders against good laws to punishment” (D&C 134:5–6, 8).

Other passages in LDS scripture reflect these themes of governmental and citizenship duties. Members of the Church are to befriend the “constitutional law of the land” that supports the “principle of freedom in maintaining rights and privileges” (D&C 98:5–6). Church leaders have regularly indicated their belief that the CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA is an inspired document. Citizens are to seek and uphold honest, wise, and good government leaders (D&C 98:10). Book of Mormon writers emphasize that every person is to enjoy “rights and privileges alike” and that political decisions are to be made “by the voice of the people” (Mosiah 29:25–27, 32).

New Testament admonitions to “render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar’s” (Matt. 22:21), to “be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates” (Titus 3:1), and to “submit yourselves to every ordinance of man” (1 Pet. 2:13) also provide guidance to members of the Church concerning their obligations as citizens. In all nations, Latter-day Saints are encouraged to support their lawful governments; to participate actively in politics, civic affairs, and public service; and to support and promote just and righteous causes.

Because of its emphasis on free AGENCY, individual ACCOUNTABILITY, and freedom of belief and conscience, LDS theology is quite compatible with Western traditions of liberal democracy that champion individual and minority rights, personal freedom, and religious pluralism. Laws are to ensure “the rights and protection of all” so that every person “may act in doctrine and principle pertaining to futurity, according to the moral agency which [God has] given unto him, that every man may be accountable for his own sins in the day of judgment” (D&C 101:77–78).

From a broader view of politics, however, Latter-day Saints have much greater expectations for collective action. Their theology includes a strong commitment to achieve a unified, cooperative society, characterized by spiritual convictions, strong social bonds, collective responsibilities, and material EQUALITY. Joseph Smith taught that “the greatest temporal and spiritual blessings which always come from faithfulness and concerted effort, never attended individual exertion or enterprise” (TPJS, p. 183). UNITY and cooperation in temporal affairs are preconditions for spiritual progress: “If ye are not one ye are not mine” (D&C 38:27); “If ye are not equal in earthly things ye cannot be equal in obtaining heavenly things” (D&C 78:6; see also ZION).

Respect for individual rights and a strong commitment to collective action come together in the belief that communities can be built on shared principles and ideals, but force can never be employed to achieve those ends. Unity and cooperation cannot be attained by coercion, but only through love: power is to be exercised by “persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned” (D&C 121:41). The goals of individual RIGHTEOUSNESS and COMMUNITY are well captured in this description of the city of Enoch from the Pearl of Great Price: “And the Lord called his people ZION, because they were of one heart and one mind, and dwelt in righteousness; and there was no poor among them” (Moses 7:18).

While Latter-day Saints aspire to such a community of the faithful, they have been encouraged throughout their history to participate in public affairs even under other conditions. “It is our duty,” said Joseph Smith, “to concentrate all our influence to make popular that which is sound and good, and unpopular that which is unsound. ’Tis right, politically, for a man who has influence to use it” (HC 5:286). Brigham Young charged members of the Church, “Let every man and woman be industrious, prudent, and economical in their acts and feelings, and while gathering to themselves, let each one strive to identify his or her interests with the interests of this community, with those of their neighbor and neighborhood, let them seek their happiness and welfare in that of all” (JD 3:330).

In 1903 the First Presidency of the Church issued a statement emphasizing the separation of religious and political activity:

The Church . . . instructs in things temporal as well as things spiritual. . . . But it does not infringe upon . . . the domain of the state. . . . Every member of the organization in every place is absolutely free as a citizen. . . . In proclaiming “the kingdom of heaven’s at hand,” we have the most intense and fervent conviction of our mission and calling. . . . But we do not and will not attempt to force them upon others, or to control or dominate any of their affairs, individual or national [MFP 4:79, 82].

In 1968, the First Presidency issued a statement concerning the obligations of citizenship:

We urge our members to do their civic duty and to assume their responsibilities as individual citizens in seeking solutions to the problems which beset our cities and communities.

With our wide ranging mission, so far as mankind is concerned, Church members cannot ignore the many practical problems that require solution if our families are to live in an environment conducive to spirituality. . . .

Individual Church members cannot, of course, represent or commit the Church, but should, nevertheless, be “anxiously engaged” in good causes, using the principles of the Gospel of Jesus Christ as their constant guide [see Appendix, “Doctrinal Expositions of the First Presidency”].

There are differing views among Church members concerning how to put these principles into practice. From one view, government intervention ought to be minimal in order to encourage VOLUNTEERISM, freedom of choice, and individual responsibility. Others believe governments should pursue a wide range of collective purposes and promote shared values. There are also differences concerning the role of religious ideas in political discourse. Some believe, much like those in other churches who have not hesitated to mix politics and religion in issues such as CIVIL RIGHTS, abortion, and environmental pollution (see EARTH), that religious principles having corresponding secular purposes should be part of public debate and be enacted into law if they can gain sufficient support in the political system. Others favor a more distinct separation between religious belief and public discourse, where public debate is limited to issues and values that can be defended on “rational” grounds, so that religious beliefs do not influence the making of laws (see POLITICS: POLITICAL CULTURE).

Brigham Young stated clearly the LDS commitment to a broad conception of collective effort in working toward a vision of a celestial community, while expressing ambivalence about earthly politics: “As for politics, we care nothing about them one way or the other, although we are a political people. . . . It is the Kingdom of God or nothing with us” (Millennial Star 31 [1869]:573).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Cannon, Donald Q. “Church and State.” In Insights into the Doctrine and Covenants: The Capstone of our Religion, ed. R. Millet and L. Dahl, pp. 183–96. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Firmage, Edwin Brown. “Eternal Principles of Government: A Theological Approach.” Ensign 6 (June 1976):11–16.
- Nibley, Hugh. “Beyond Politics.” In Nibley on the Timely and the Timeless: Classic Essays of Hugh W. Nibley, ed. T. Madison, pp. 279–305. Provo, Utah, 1978.

GARY C. BRYNER

POLITICAL CULTURE

Contrary to some popular characterizations, Latter-day Saints do not all think or vote alike on political matters and do not share a distinctive political subculture. American Latter-day Saints tend to be slightly more pragmatic, less cynical, more optimistic, and less alienated than the average American citizen, but only in minor variations from the broad national political culture. The earliest Latter-day Saints were Americans before they became Latter-day Saints. If Latter-day Saints as a group were markedly less or more optimistic or less or more cynical than the average U.S. citizen, that might indicate the presence of a distinctive political subculture, but there is no evidence for this.

A political culture is generally understood to be a patterned set of ways of thinking about how politics and governing ought to be carried out, and a subculture is a somewhat differing view peculiar to a smaller area or group. During the nineteenth century, when Latter-day Saints “gathered” together in well-structured communities throughout the intermountain West, there was a distinctive Mormon political subculture. It was based on a model of consensus politics and a deference to ecclesiastical AUTHORITY, which set it apart from the dominant American political culture of the time. This subculture slowly dissipated as the intermountain LDS commonwealth was integrated into the larger political and economic patterns of the United States, despite the continued majority status of Latter-day Saints in many communities.

In a strict sense, there is no such thing today as “a Mormon political culture.” The mark of such a subculture is the frequency and likelihood of certain political behaviors observable over time and in well-defined situations, not the source of the ideas that it expresses. While various tenets of their faith may predispose many Latter-day Saints to one side of some political disputes in the United States, such a predisposition is not sufficient to indicate the presence of a unique political subculture.

In the late twentieth century, Latter-day Saints are found in many different countries, living under many different political systems. That which ties them together is a set of religious beliefs, not an identifiable set of habits of thinking or acting about politics. Were a cross-polity survey to be taken, the empirical beliefs, likes and dislikes, values, and priorities of Latter-day Saints in political matters would be polity-specific. German Latter-day Saints, for example, would resemble other Germans more than they would Mexican, French, or Samoan Latter-day Saints.

Some maintain, nonetheless, that there is an identifiable LDS political subculture in America, or at least in Utah. This perspective may confuse a regional pattern of attitudes and behaviors with a religious one. It also reflects the ubiquitous disagreements between minorities and the majority in any population. Latter-day Saints in Utah (the only state where they constitute a majority of the population) are no more sensitive to the feelings of alienation and oppression perceived by members of other denominations than are other religious or cultural majorities in other parts of the world.

Since statehood in 1896, Utah has been in the mainstream of American politics. In the twenty-two presidential elections between 1904 and 1988, Utah gave its electoral (and majority) votes to the national winner all but three times. The partisan preferences of Utah voters are essentially the same as those of other intermountain and western voters in presidential and congressional elections. Divisions between voters are essentially partisan, not ecclesiastical, even in strongly LDS areas.

Belief in the LDS worldview does not produce predictable or demonstrable similarities in political habits of thought and expectations, regardless of geographical, economic, or social differences. The often fervent divisions among LDS voters over political issues and candidates cast serious doubt on the existence of any unifying, religiously determined political behaviors.

Latter-day Saints’ attitudinal orientations are generally intensifications of typically American attitudes. For example, the idea of political efficacy—the feeling citizens have that they can influence what the government does and the belief that government listens to what ordinary citizens say—is a key indicator of the type of political culture a country has. In all cross-polity surveys, U.S. citizens demonstrate significantly higher levels of political efficacy than citizens of any other country. Perhaps because of the stress in LDS theology on the value of individual effort and the right of individual agency, Latter-day Saints demonstrate higher levels of efficacy than most other groups in American political life. How directly related to religious beliefs such attitudes may be is difficult to establish empirically. However, there may be some overlap or holdover from earlier times.

Latter-day Saints also ascribe a higher level of legitimacy to political leaders, possibly a holdover from the mingling of ecclesiastical and political authority in nineteenth-century Utah. Finally, voting participation statistics indicate that the growing political alienation in America has made few inroads in strongly LDS areas.

A crucial determinant of a community's or a nation's political stability and governmental effectiveness is the extent to which its citizens give their primary political loyalties to it rather than to a particular region, tribe, or religion. Although Latter-day Saints are deeply attached to their religion, for this attachment to affect their political behavior has been the exception rather than the rule. For example, during the 1930s and 1940s the President of the Church and at least one of his counselors were implacably opposed to the policies of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and expressed their views publicly and privately. Nevertheless, Utah voters joined decisively with national majorities voting for the Democratic candidates from 1932 through 1948. In the ten presidential elections since 1952, only in 1964 did Utah vote Democratic, again joining an overwhelming national majority. This Republican hegemony is found not only in LDS areas but also nearly all the western states.

There is no detectable pattern or set of political behaviors common to Latter-day Saints. Appearances of a unique LDS political homogeneity disappear when regional and national trends are taken into account. No institutional or doctrinal mechanism exists for passing on a political culture, especially in light of the high percentage of converts. The growing international character of the Church and its membership will no doubt produce even greater political heterogeneity among Latter-day Saints in the future.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Poll, Richard D., et al. Utah's History, pp. 97–112, 153–73, 243–74, 387–404, 409–428, 481–96, 515–30, 669–80. Provo, Utah, 1978.

WM. CLAYTON KIMBALL

CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN POLITICS

Latter-day Saints are an integral part of the politics of the intermountain West of the United States. They play important roles in U.S. politics and government, and members have held high positions in all three branches of the federal government and in many state and local governments. The Church encourages its members throughout the world to be involved in government and civic affairs (see CIVIC DUTIES). Official Church statements on such matters as the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) and the MX missile have been important in the politics of these issues.

On most issues and in most elections, the Church has remained neutral, admonishing its members to study the issues and vote according to their conscience. A member of the First Presidency said in 1951:

The Church, while reserving the right to advocate principles of good government underlying equity, justice, and liberty, the political integrity of officials, and the active participation of its members, and the fulfillment of their obligations in civic affairs, exercises no constraint on the freedom of individuals to make their own choices and affiliations. . . . Any man who makes representation to the contrary does so without authority and justification in fact [Richards, p. 878].

The Church encourages individual choice in elections, although through the 1960 election Church leaders often publicly endorsed or indicated their personal preference for U.S. presidential candidates (Jonas, p. 335). Despite any corporate interest it may have in Utah (see BUSINESS: CHURCH PARTICIPATION IN), the Church has not become directly involved in elections in those jurisdictions for many years.

While many non-LDS candidates have been elected to public office in Utah, Church membership and affiliation do appear to be important to political success in Utah, as well as in some surrounding areas of the intermountain West with large LDS populations. Candidates for office sometimes advertise their Church affiliation, Church leadership positions, and family size as part of their political campaigns. Local Church officials sometimes become involved in politics either as candidates or as supporters of candidates. Some voters incorrectly infer an implicit Church endorsement of candidates or issues in these situations.

While the Church rarely takes an official stand on candidates or issues, it does possess substantial political power. Its membership constitutes an overwhelming majority (70 percent) in the state of Utah and significant portions of the population in Idaho, Arizona, and Nevada. It also exercises political influence through its corporate and business interests. The Church's business interests and its print and broadcast media (BONNEVILLE INTERNATIONAL) give it a means to participate in politics. Editorials from these media are often considered to reflect the views of the Church.

Church members in the late twentieth century are generally Republicans, often strong Republicans, though in earlier generations Democratic influence prevailed. Data on Utah indicate that 69 percent of the Latter-day Saints are Republicans, a figure higher than the 57 percent of Utahans who are Republicans and the 47 percent of western Americans who are Republicans. Increased Church activity is even more strongly correlated to Republican partisan identification. This relationship between Church activity and attachment to the Republican party is also related to age; younger, very active Latter-day Saints are most likely to classify themselves Republicans. Party identification among members of the Church has the same behavioral consequences as it does among non-Mormons nationwide. Most members of the Church are politically conservative, both by self-classification and in attitudes toward economic, social, and lifestyle issues. The conservatism of many Church members reinforces their partisan preferences, especially with regard to the national political parties. Little is known about the partisan or ideological predispositions of LDS members outside the United States.

Recent nationally prominent LDS political figures also tend to be disproportionately Republican, although for all of U.S. history, LDS congressmen and senators have been only about 50 percent Republican. LDS congressmen tend to come from Utah and surrounding states, but include several California members of the U.S. House of Representatives. Utah, Idaho, Michigan, and Arizona have all had LDS governors. LDS-elected gubernatorial officials and national legislators represent an even partisan balance.

Several Latter-day Saints have played key roles in recent Republican administrations. President Eisenhower's cabinet included apostle and later President of the Church Ezra Taft Benson as secretary of agriculture. President Nixon's cabinet included David M. Kennedy as secretary of the treasury, and George Romney as secretary of housing and urban development. The Ford, Reagan, and Bush administrations also had several members of the Church as key staff. Church members played a generally less visible role in the Democratic administrations of Kennedy, Johnson, and Carter.

Church members have been important participants in the judicial branch as well. While no member of the Church has been appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court, several Latter-day Saints have served as court of appeals, district court, and state supreme court judges.

The Church has been most visible politically in discussion of moral issues. In 1976, after years of silence on political issues, the Church issued a statement opposing the ERA: "We recognize men and women as equally important before the Lord, but with differences biologically, emotionally, and in other ways. ERA, we believe, does not recognize these differences. There are better means for giving women, and men, the rights they deserve" ("First Presidency Issues Statement Opposing Equal Rights Amendment," Ensign 6 [Dec. 1976]:79). This formal institutional opposition sparked significant local organizing by private Church members acting on their own accord against the amendment in Florida, Illinois, Maryland, Nevada, and Virginia. Not all Church members opposed the amendment. Some had spoken publicly in support of the amendment before the Church position was announced.

During the early 1980s the Church took a position on the MX missile controversy. Many Church leaders had long been critical of war and armaments. But others were in favor of preparations for defense. Thus, elected officials could find Church authorities either favoring or opposing defense spending, new weapons systems, and foreign military activities. Utah representatives in Washington tend to promote defense spending, and Utah has a large defense industry.

In 1981, Church President Spencer W. Kimball and his counselors issued a strongly worded letter opposing the deployment of the MX missile in the desert of western Utah and neighboring eastern Nevada. The statement criticized not only the MX missile but also the form of warfare it exemplified: "With the most serious concern over the pressing moral question of possible nuclear conflict, we plead with our national leaders to marshal the genius of the nation to find viable alternatives which will secure at an earlier date and with fewer hazards the protection from possible enemy aggression, which is our common concern" ("First Presidency Statement on Basing of MX Missile," Ensign 11 [June 1981]:76).

The Church has also opposed legalized GAMBLING, including state-run lotteries ("Church Opposes Government-Sponsored Gambling," Ensign 16 [Nov. 1986]:104–105), and has made moral arguments against liberalizing access to alcoholic beverages.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience: A History of the Latter-day Saints, pp. 243–307. New York, 1979.
- Jonas, Frank. "Utah: The Different State." In Politics in the American West, ed. F. Jonas. Salt Lake City, 1969.
- Richards, Stephen L. "Awake, Ye Defenders of Zion." IE 54 (Dec. 1951):877–80.

DAVID B. MAGLEBY

POLYGAMY

[The main article on this subject is Plural Marriage. Under the direction of the Prophet Joseph Smith, some members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints began to practice plural marriage, also referred to as "celestial marriage." This was viewed as a divine commandment to "raise up seed unto" God (Jacob 2:30). The revelation of God concerning eternal marriage is D&C 132. See Doctrine and Covenants: Sections 131–32. The latter also contains strong warnings against marital infidelity. See Adultery; Chastity; Marriage; Eternal; and Sexuality.]

On the federal and public opposition to Mormon polygamy, see Antipolygamy Legislation; Legal and Judicial History of the Church; Mormons, Image of; and Reynolds v. United States. On attitudes of Mormon women toward polygamy, see Retrenchment Association and Woman's Exponent.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints officially discontinued the practice of plural marriage in 1890. See Manifesto of 1890.

Some schismatic groups have not accepted the revelation of God to Wilford Woodruff, fourth President of the Church, ending Church-sanctioned plural marriage and therefore continue the practice today. See Fundamentalists.

See generally History of the Church: c. 1844–1877 and c. 1878–1898; Smith, Emma; Smith, Joseph; Teachings of; Snow, Eliza R.; Woodruff, Wilford; and Young, Brigham.]

POLYNESIAN CULTURAL CENTER

The Polynesian Cultural Center is located in Laie, Hawaii, on the north shore of the island of Oahu. It is a 42-acre visitor attraction owned and operated by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for the purpose of preserving and sharing the heritage of Pacific island cultures while providing employment, scholarships, and grants to students at the adjacent BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY—HAWAII.

In seven authentically recreated villages, representative dwellings, furniture, and artifacts from Fiji, old Hawaii, Samoa, Tonga, Tahiti, Maori New Zealand, and the Marquesas Islands are featured in a landscape of island foliage and lagoons. Visitors may observe or participate in demonstrations of arts, crafts, dances, music, games, and food preparation presented by villagers and performers, many of whom come from the cultures they portray. Various kinds of island cuisine are available in restaurants and snack bars. Daytime and evening shows and concerts are held on the grounds and in the 2,773-seat amphitheater. An IMAX theater with an ultra-large screen shows cultural and educational films shot on locations in the South Pacific.

Precursors to the present production consisted mainly of a hukilau—a fishing festival with luau and entertainment. That production was begun by Church members in the 1940s and continued for several years in Laie. In 1959 students and faculty at the Church College of Hawaii (now Brigham Young University—Hawaii) organized "Polynesian Panorama," a production of songs and dances that played regularly to audiences in Waikiki.

In 1962 Church President David O. MCKAY authorized construction of the present center. Special "labor missionaries" donated their skills, using building materials from Hawaii and the other islands represented. The original 12-acre center opened on October 12, 1963. Hugh B. Brown, a counselor to President McKay in the Church's FIRST PRESIDENCY, presided at the opening ceremonies. In 1975–1976 the center was redesigned and greatly enlarged.

The labor missionaries helped realize the dream of Matthew Cowley, an apostle who worked for years with the Latter-day Saints in New Zealand, when he said, "I hope to see the day when my Maori people will have a little village at Laie Presidency Statement on Basing of MX Missile," Ensign 11 [June 1981]:76).

The Church has also opposed legalized GAMBLING, including state-run lotteries ("Church Opposes Government-Sponsored Gambling," Ensign 16 [Nov. 1986]:104–105), and has made moral arguments against liberalizing access to alcoholic beverages.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience: A History of the Latter-day Saints, pp. 243–307. New York, 1979.
- Jonas, Frank. "Utah: The Different State." In Politics in the American West, ed. F. Jonas. Salt Lake City, 1969.
- Richards, Stephen L. "Awake, Ye Defenders of Zion." IE 54 (Dec. 1951):877–80.

DAVID B. MAGLEBY

POLYGAMY

[The main article on this subject is Plural Marriage. Under the direction of the Prophet Joseph Smith, some members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints began to practice plural marriage, also referred to as "celestial marriage." This was viewed as a divine commandment to "raise up seed unto" God (Jacob 2:30). The revelation of God concerning eternal marriage is D&C 132. See Doctrine and Covenants: Sections 131–32. The latter also contains strong warnings against marital infidelity. See Adultery; Chastity; Marriage; Eternal; and Sexuality.]

On the federal and public opposition to Mormon polygamy, see Antipolygamy Legislation; Legal and Judicial History of the Church; Mormons, Image of; and Reynolds v. United States. On attitudes of Mormon women toward polygamy, see Retrenchment Association and Woman's Exponent.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints officially discontinued the practice of plural marriage in 1890. See Manifesto of 1890.

Some schismatic groups have not accepted the revelation of God to Wilford Woodruff, fourth President of the Church, ending Church-sanctioned plural marriage and therefore continue the practice today. See Fundamentalists.

See generally History of the Church: c. 1844–1877 and c. 1878–1898; Smith, Emma; Smith, Joseph; Teachings of; Snow, Eliza R.; Woodruff, Wilford; and Young, Brigham.]

POLYNESIAN CULTURAL CENTER

The Polynesian Cultural Center is located in Laie, Hawaii, on the north shore of the island of Oahu. It is a 42-acre visitor attraction owned and operated by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for the purpose of preserving and sharing the heritage of Pacific island cultures while providing employment, scholarships, and grants to students at the adjacent BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY—HAWAII.

In seven authentically recreated villages, representative dwellings, furniture, and artifacts from Fiji, old Hawaii, Samoa, Tonga, Tahiti, Maori New Zealand, and the Marquesas Islands are featured in a landscape of island foliage and lagoons. Visitors may observe or participate in demonstrations of arts, crafts, dances, music, games, and food preparation presented by villagers and performers, many of whom come from the cultures they portray. Various kinds of island cuisine are available in restaurants and snack bars. Daytime and evening shows and concerts are held on the grounds and in the 2,773-seat amphitheater. An IMAX theater with an ultra-large screen shows cultural and educational films shot on locations in the South Pacific.

Precursors to the present production consisted mainly of a hukilau—a fishing festival with luau and entertainment. That production was begun by Church members in the 1940s and continued for several years in Laie. In 1959 students and faculty at the Church College of Hawaii (now Brigham Young University—Hawaii) organized "Polynesian Panorama," a production of songs and dances that played regularly to audiences in Waikiki.

In 1962 Church President David O. MCKAY authorized construction of the present center. Special "labor missionaries" donated their skills, using building materials from Hawaii and the other islands represented. The original 12-acre center opened on October 12, 1963. Hugh B. Brown, a counselor to President McKay in the Church's FIRST PRESIDENCY, presided at the opening ceremonies. In 1975–1976 the center was redesigned and greatly enlarged.

The labor missionaries helped realize the dream of Matthew Cowley, an apostle who worked for years with the Latter-day Saints in New Zealand, when he said, "I hope to see the day when my Maori people will have a little village at Laie Presidency Statement on Basing of MX Missile," Ensign 11 [June 1981]:76).

The Church has also opposed legalized GAMBLING, including state-run lotteries ("Church Opposes Government-Sponsored Gambling," Ensign 16 [Nov. 1986]:104–105), and has made moral arguments against liberalizing access to alcoholic beverages.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arrington, Leonard J., and Davis Bitton. The Mormon Experience: A History of the Latter-day Saints, pp. 243–307. New York, 1979.
- Jonas, Frank. "Utah: The Different State." In Politics in the American West, ed. F. Jonas. Salt Lake City, 1969.
- Richards, Stephen L. "Awake, Ye Defenders of Zion." IE 54 (Dec. 1951):877–80.

DAVID B. MAGLEBY

POLYGAMY

[The main article on this subject is Plural Marriage. Under the direction of the Prophet Joseph Smith, some members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints began to practice plural marriage, also referred to as "celestial marriage." This was viewed as a divine commandment to "raise up seed unto" God (Jacob 2:30). The revelation of God concerning eternal marriage is D&C 132. See Doctrine and Covenants: Sections 131–32. The latter also contains strong warnings against marital infidelity. See Adultery; Chastity; Marriage; Eternal; and Sexuality.]

On the federal and public opposition to Mormon polygamy, see Antipolygamy Legislation; Legal and Judicial History of the Church; Mormons, Image of; and Reynolds v. United States. On attitudes of Mormon women toward polygamy, see Retrenchment Association and Woman's Exponent.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints officially discontinued the practice of plural marriage in 1890. See Manifesto of 1890.

Some schismatic groups have not accepted the revelation of God to Wilford Woodruff, fourth President of the Church, ending Church-sanctioned plural marriage and therefore continue the practice today. See Fundamentalists.

See generally History of the Church: c. 1844–1877 and c. 1878–1898; Smith, Emma; Smith, Joseph; Teachings of; Snow, Eliza R.; Woodruff, Wilford; and Young, Brigham.]

POLYNESIAN CULTURAL CENTER

The Polynesian Cultural Center is located in Laie, Hawaii, on the north shore of the island of Oahu. It is a 42-acre visitor attraction owned and operated by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for the purpose of preserving and sharing the heritage of Pacific island cultures while providing employment, scholarships, and grants to students at the adjacent BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY—HAWAII.

In seven authentically recreated villages, representative dwellings, furniture, and artifacts from Fiji, old Hawaii, Samoa, Tonga, Tahiti, Maori New Zealand, and the Marquesas Islands are featured in a landscape of island foliage and lagoons. Visitors may observe or participate in demonstrations of arts, crafts, dances, music, games, and food preparation presented by villagers and performers, many of whom come from the cultures they portray. Various kinds of island cuisine are available in restaurants and snack bars. Daytime and evening shows and concerts are held on the grounds and in the 2,773-seat amphitheater. An IMAX theater with an ultra-large screen shows cultural and educational films shot on locations in the South Pacific.

Precursors to the present production consisted mainly of a hukilau—a fishing festival with luau and entertainment. That production was begun by Church members in the 1940s and continued for several years in Laie. In 1959 students and faculty at the Church College of Hawaii (now Brigham Young University—Hawaii) organized "Polynesian Panorama," a production of songs and dances that played regularly to audiences in Waikiki.

In 1962 Church President David O. MCKAY authorized construction of the present center. Special "labor missionaries" donated their skills, using building materials from Hawaii and the other islands represented. The original 12-acre center opened on October 12, 1963. Hugh B. Brown, a counselor to President McKay in the Church's FIRST PRESIDENCY, presided at the opening ceremonies. In 1975–1976 the center was redesigned and greatly enlarged.

The labor missionaries helped realize the dream of Matthew Cowley, an apostle who worked for years with the Latter-day Saints in New Zealand, when he said, "I hope to see the day when my Maori people will have a little village at Laie with a beautiful carved house. . . . The Tongans will have a little village out there, and the Tahitians and Samoans—all those islanders of the sea!” (O’Brien, p. 73).

The center is a nonprofit organization that attracts almost a million visitors a year. It is administered locally by a president and governed by a board of directors chaired by a member of the Church’s QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

O’Brien, Robert. Hands Across the Water: The Story of the Polynesian Cultural Center. Laie, Hawaii, 1983.

CHARLES JAY FOX

POLYNESIANS

Polynesia is most frequently identified as those Pacific islands lying within an enormous triangle extending from New Zealand in the south to Hawaii in the north and the Easter Islands in the extreme east. The major Polynesian ethnic groups include Hawaiians, New Zealand Maoris, Samoans, Tongans, and Tahitians.

A basic view held in the Church is that Polynesians have ancestral connections with the Book of Mormon people who were descendants of Abraham and that among them are heirs to the blessings promised Abraham’s descendants (see ABRAHAMIC COVENANT). Since 1843, the Church has undertaken extensive missionary efforts in the Pacific islands, and large numbers of Polynesians have joined the Church (see NEW ZEALAND; OCEANIA).

The belief that Polynesian ancestry includes Book of Mormon people can be traced back at least to 1851, when George Q. Cannon taught it as a missionary in Hawaii (he was later a counselor in the First Presidency). President Brigham YOUNG detailed the belief in a letter to King Kamehameha V in 1865. Other Church leaders have since affirmed the belief, some indicating that among Polynesian ancestors were the people of Hagoth, who set sail from Nephite lands in approximately 54

Primary officers, teachers, and children of the French Polynesia Mission (now the Tahiti Papeete Mission) in the early 1970s. LDS missionaries arrived in the Society Islands in 1844. Local members customarily fill leadership positions as soon as possible. Many Pacific Islands have a high percentage of Latter-day Saints in their total populations.

with a beautiful carved house. . . . The Tongans will have a little village out there, and the Tahitians and Samoans—all those islanders of the sea!” (O’Brien, p. 73).

The center is a nonprofit organization that attracts almost a million visitors a year. It is administered locally by a president and governed by a board of directors chaired by a member of the Church’s QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

O’Brien, Robert. Hands Across the Water: The Story of the Polynesian Cultural Center. Laie, Hawaii, 1983.

CHARLES JAY FOX

POLYNESIANS

Polynesia is most frequently identified as those Pacific islands lying within an enormous triangle extending from New Zealand in the south to Hawaii in the north and the Easter Islands in the extreme east. The major Polynesian ethnic groups include Hawaiians, New Zealand Maoris, Samoans, Tongans, and Tahitians.

A basic view held in the Church is that Polynesians have ancestral connections with the Book of Mormon people who were descendants of Abraham and that among them are heirs to the blessings promised Abraham’s descendants (see ABRAHAMIC COVENANT). Since 1843, the Church has undertaken extensive missionary efforts in the Pacific islands, and large numbers of Polynesians have joined the Church (see NEW ZEALAND; OCEANIA).

The belief that Polynesian ancestry includes Book of Mormon people can be traced back at least to 1851, when George Q. Cannon taught it as a missionary in Hawaii (he was later a counselor in the First Presidency). President Brigham YOUNG detailed the belief in a letter to King Kamehameha V in 1865. Other Church leaders have since affirmed the belief, some indicating that among Polynesian ancestors were the people of Hagoth, who set sail from Nephite lands in approximately 54

Primary officers, teachers, and children of the French Polynesia Mission (now the Tahiti Papeete Mission) in the early 1970s. LDS missionaries arrived in the Society Islands in 1844. Local members customarily fill leadership positions as soon as possible. Many Pacific Islands have a high percentage of Latter-day Saints in their total populations.

This Maori “rangatira” (chief) and family were members of the Church in New Zealand (c. 1917). Courtesy Edith W. Morgan.

B.C. (cf. Alma 63:5–8). In a statement to the Maoris of New Zealand, for instance, President Joseph F. SMITH said, “I would like to say to you brethren and sisters . . . you are some of Hagoth’s people, and there is NO PERHAPS about it!” (Cole and Jensen, p. 388.) In the prayer offered at the dedication of the Hawaii Temple, President Heber J. GRANT referred to the “descendants of Lehi” in Hawaii (IE 23 [Feb. 1920]:283).

Among scholars, the exact ancestry of the Polynesian peoples is a matter of debate. While some non-LDS scientists have insisted on their Western Hemisphere origins, the prevailing scientific opinion from anthropological, archaeological, and linguistic evidence argues a west-to-east migratory movement from Southeast Asia that began as early as 1200 B.C.

What seems clear from the long-standing debate is that considerable interaction was maintained over the centuries from many directions. The island peoples had both the vessels and the skill to sail with or against ocean currents. It would be as difficult to say that no group could have migrated from east to west as to argue the opposite in absolute terms. Church leaders, who have attested to Polynesian roots in the Nephite peoples, have not elaborated on the likelihood of other migrating groups in the Pacific or of social mixing and intermarriage.

Throughout the Church’s history in the islands, Polynesian members have demonstrated spiritual receptivity, maturity, and leadership. In 1990, more than 100,000 Polynesians, including approximately 30 percent of the Tongans and 20 percent of the Samoans, were members of the Church. In all areas of Polynesia, local leaders preside over organized stakes and wards. Missionary work continues, much of it under the direction of local mission presidents and missionaries. In Tonga and Samoa, for example, almost the entire force of missionaries is made up of local youth, and hundreds of others have been called to serve missions elsewhere in the world.

Some Polynesian Latter-day Saints have left their homelands and established communities abroad. Honolulu, Auckland, and Los Angeles have extensive LDS Polynesian populations. Thousands of LDS Polynesians have also migrated to Utah’s Wasatch Front area and to Missouri, California, and Texas.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Britsch, R. Lanier. Moramona. Laie, Hawaii, 1989.
- . Unto the Islands of the Sea. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Clement, Russell T. "Polynesian Origins: More Word on the Mormon Perspective." Dialogue 13 (Winter 1980):88–89.
- Cole, W. A., and E. W. Jensen. Israel in the Pacific. Salt Lake City, 1961.
- Loveland, Jerry. "Hagoth and the Polynesian Tradition." BYU Studies 17 (Autumn 1976):59–73.

ERIC B. SHUMWAY

---

 PORNOGRAPHY

Pornography refers to explicit depictions of sexual activity in written or pictorial form in an exploitive style. The purpose of these presentations is erotic arousal for commercial gain. Most of it presents highly inaccurate, unscientific, and distorted information about human SEXUALITY. It is, in a sense, sex miseducation marketed for financial gain in a variety of formats, including books, magazines, motion pictures, television, videotapes, and even telephone. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints condemns all forms of pornography.

The Church views sexuality positively—as a sacred gift from God with the primary purposes of reproducing life upon the earth and bonding the husband and wife together in an eternal, affectionate, committed relationship. High standards of personal morality and sexual conduct, including CHASTITY before marriage and fidelity in marriage, are taught as norms for Church members. These standards are perceived as reflecting God's will and counsel for his earthly children.

Pornography is seen as degrading sex and creating an unhealthy extramarital sexual interest in individuals, thereby contributing to a weakening of the marital relationship. Much of this filmed, photographed, or written "prostitution" is actually antisexual because it gives a great deal of false information about human sexuality. Also, since much pornography depicts violence and aggression against females, it raises risks of conditioning viewers to sanction these as acceptable behavior. The best evidence suggests that all sexual deviations are learned, and pornography appears to be a major facilitator in the acquisition of these deviations.

Introducing immoral or inappropriate sexual stimuli into the mind of those who view it can create fantasies that may never be erased. It has the potential for corrupting the values of, and degrading, those who indulge. It suggests behaviors that could negatively affect or even destroy one's marriage and family. Pornography, in a sense, is an attack on the family and the marriage covenant as well as on the bonds of affection or trust that hold a marriage and family together.

Additionally, involvement in pornography promotes a voyeuristic interest in sex, one form of sexual illness. This is a regressive fantasy approach to sexuality with major health risks. These various hazards have been documented at length by the U.S. Pornography Commission, convened under the sponsorship of the U.S. Department of Justice.

The experience of many men and adolescent males who repeatedly experiment with, or voluntarily expose themselves to, pornography suggests four possible consequences. First, there is a risk of addiction. Once involved with it, many get "hooked," as with a highly addictive drug, and keep coming back in a compulsive fashion for more. Second, they desire increasingly deviant material. In time, they need rougher and more explicit material to get the same kicks, arousal, and excitement as initially. Third, they become desensitized to the inappropriateness or abnormality of the behavior portrayed, eventually accepting and embracing what at first had shocked and offended them. Fourth, with appetite whetted and conscience anesthetized, they tend to act out sexually what they have witnessed. This almost always disturbs the most intimate aspects of marital and family relationships and attacks the participants' spiritual nature. As an individual acts out his desires and appetites, there is a significant risk of venereal infections, some of which are incurable and life-threatening. When this occurs, the health and life of the marital partner is also jeopardized.

The Church strongly counsels its members to avoid involvement with pornography for the many reasons cited above. An important additional reason is that involvement with it is also perceived as leading to a loss of contact with, and consciousness of, God and the Holy Spirit. It can lead to a psychological, sexual, and spiritual regression. Becoming addicted to pornography can lead to a loss of control and eventually to the loss of moral agency.

The Church counsels its members to be responsible citizens in the communities where they live, to join organizations that attempt to improve

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Britsch, R. Lanier. Moramona. Laie, Hawaii, 1989.
- . Unto the Islands of the Sea. Salt Lake City, 1989.
- Clement, Russell T. "Polynesian Origins: More Word on the Mormon Perspective." Dialogue 13 (Winter 1980):88–89.
- Cole, W. A., and E. W. Jensen. Israel in the Pacific. Salt Lake City, 1961.
- Loveland, Jerry. "Hagoth and the Polynesian Tradition." BYU Studies 17 (Autumn 1976):59–73.

ERIC B. SHUMWAY

---

 PORNOGRAPHY

Pornography refers to explicit depictions of sexual activity in written or pictorial form in an exploitive style. The purpose of these presentations is erotic arousal for commercial gain. Most of it presents highly inaccurate, unscientific, and distorted information about human SEXUALITY. It is, in a sense, sex miseducation marketed for financial gain in a variety of formats, including books, magazines, motion pictures, television, videotapes, and even telephone. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints condemns all forms of pornography.

The Church views sexuality positively—as a sacred gift from God with the primary purposes of reproducing life upon the earth and bonding the husband and wife together in an eternal, affectionate, committed relationship. High standards of personal morality and sexual conduct, including CHASTITY before marriage and fidelity in marriage, are taught as norms for Church members. These standards are perceived as reflecting God's will and counsel for his earthly children.

Pornography is seen as degrading sex and creating an unhealthy extramarital sexual interest in individuals, thereby contributing to a weakening of the marital relationship. Much of this filmed, photographed, or written "prostitution" is actually antisexual because it gives a great deal of false information about human sexuality. Also, since much pornography depicts violence and aggression against females, it raises risks of conditioning viewers to sanction these as acceptable behavior. The best evidence suggests that all sexual deviations are learned, and pornography appears to be a major facilitator in the acquisition of these deviations.

Introducing immoral or inappropriate sexual stimuli into the mind of those who view it can create fantasies that may never be erased. It has the potential for corrupting the values of, and degrading, those who indulge. It suggests behaviors that could negatively affect or even destroy one's marriage and family. Pornography, in a sense, is an attack on the family and the marriage covenant as well as on the bonds of affection or trust that hold a marriage and family together.

Additionally, involvement in pornography promotes a voyeuristic interest in sex, one form of sexual illness. This is a regressive fantasy approach to sexuality with major health risks. These various hazards have been documented at length by the U.S. Pornography Commission, convened under the sponsorship of the U.S. Department of Justice.

The experience of many men and adolescent males who repeatedly experiment with, or voluntarily expose themselves to, pornography suggests four possible consequences. First, there is a risk of addiction. Once involved with it, many get "hooked," as with a highly addictive drug, and keep coming back in a compulsive fashion for more. Second, they desire increasingly deviant material. In time, they need rougher and more explicit material to get the same kicks, arousal, and excitement as initially. Third, they become desensitized to the inappropriateness or abnormality of the behavior portrayed, eventually accepting and embracing what at first had shocked and offended them. Fourth, with appetite whetted and conscience anesthetized, they tend to act out sexually what they have witnessed. This almost always disturbs the most intimate aspects of marital and family relationships and attacks the participants' spiritual nature. As an individual acts out his desires and appetites, there is a significant risk of venereal infections, some of which are incurable and life-threatening. When this occurs, the health and life of the marital partner is also jeopardized.

The Church strongly counsels its members to avoid involvement with pornography for the many reasons cited above. An important additional reason is that involvement with it is also perceived as leading to a loss of contact with, and consciousness of, God and the Holy Spirit. It can lead to a psychological, sexual, and spiritual regression. Becoming addicted to pornography can lead to a loss of control and eventually to the loss of moral agency.

The Church counsels its members to be responsible citizens in the communities where they live, to join organizations that attempt to improve community values, to let their voices be heard, and to work for, in legal ways, limits being placed on the dissemination, broadcast, sale, and rental of illegal pornographic materials.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- "Church Leaders Suggest Ways to Fight Pornography." Ensign 14 (Apr. 1984):37-39.
- Cline, Victor B. "Obscenity: How It Affects Us, How We Can Deal with It." Ensign 14 (Apr. 1984):32-37.
- , ed. Where Do You Draw the Line? Provo, Utah, 1974.
- Monson, Thomas S. "Pornography—The Deadly Carrier." Ensign 9 (Nov. 1979):66-67.
- Shapiro, Gary R. "Leave the Obscene Unseen." Ensign 19 (Aug. 1989):27-29.

VICTOR B. CLINE

---

POSTEARTH LIFE

See: Afterlife

---

POVERTY, ATTITUDES TOWARD

For Latter-day Saints, as for all Christians, attending to the needs of the poor is service to God (Matt. 25:31-40; Mosiah 2:17; D&C 42:38) and an expression of the greatest spiritual gift, the attitude of charity (1 Cor. 13:13). King BENJAMIN explained in the Book of Mormon that, as a result of true repentance, people are filled with the love of God and the desire to administer to those in need (Mosiah 4:16). It is no excuse that "the man has brought upon himself his misery," for all are beggars dependent upon God, who gives generously (Mosiah 4:17-23). Benjamin required that the poor also carry this attitude and covet not—those who cannot give are to say in their hearts, "I give not because I have not, but if I had I would give" (Mosiah 4:24-25). Giving to the poor is essential to retaining a remission of one's sins and walking guiltless before God (Mosiah 4:26). Anyone who cries unto God sends up a petition in vain without giving "to those who stand in need" (Alma 34:28).

In 1935 the Church established an extensive welfare services program to assist those in need. In addition, all members of the Church are encouraged to give their time and resources wherever possible. Efforts to help the poor are designed to relieve suffering by supplying immediate needs

(cf. Luke 10:29-42; 16:19-39), to build self-sufficiency through employment, and to teach people to give willingly (D. McKay, CR [Oct. 1941]:54; see WELFARE SERVICES). Widows or orphans are to be provided for (James 1:27; D&C 83:6), especially those destitute because of persecution (D&C 42:30, 39; 52:40; 104:14-18). Indolence on the part of those who are able to work is condemned (Prov. 20:4; 1 Tim. 5:8, 13; D&C 42:42); the poor are to contribute their own labor, whenever possible (Deut. 15:7-11; 24:19; 2 Thes. 3:10). Through the efforts of all living the gospel law in an ideal society worthy of the presence of the Lord, there are "no poor among them" (Moses 7:18; Acts 4:32-35; 4 Ne. 1:2-3; D&C 42:30-33; see ZION).

Those who willingly give to the poor are promised many blessings, including eternal life (Luke 18:18-23; Matt. 25:31-40), deliverance (Ps. 41:1), forgiveness (Alma 4:13-14), happiness (Prov. 14:21), material rewards (Prov. 19:17; 28:27; Jacob 2:17-19; Deut. 24:19), and answers to prayers (Alma 34:28). Strong condemnations are repeated against those who refuse to share with the poor (2 Ne. 9:30; D&C 56:16). Caring for the poor is a significant moral challenge and obligation (Deut. 15:11; CWHN 9:193).

Under the LAW OF MOSES, the poor were to be treated generously (Epsztein, pp. 108-134). The corners of fields were left for them to reap (Lev. 19:9-10; Deut. 24:19-21); the produce of the land every seventh year was given first to the poor and the stranger (Ex. 23:10-11; Lev. 25:3-7); loans to the poor were interest free (Lev. 25:35-37; Ex. 22:25-27); Hebrews sold into bondage to other Hebrews were emancipated and generously supplied after six years of service (Ex. 21:2-6; Deut. 15:12-15); and the tithes not used by the Levites were given to the poor (Deut. 14:28-29; 26:12-13). Still, this did not absolve the responsibility to do more if another remained in need (Deut. 15:11).

The law of CONSECRATION, revealed to Joseph Smith in 1831 (D&C 42), invited the members to give all they possessed to the Church, receive back what they needed (their stewardships), use what they received to provide for themselves, and give their surplus to the Church. These surpluses and the residues of their inheritances were held in the BISHOP'S STOREHOUSE and used first to help the poor (Cook, 1985). Latter-day scriptures speak warnings equally to the rich and to the poor: "Wo unto you rich men, that will not give your sub-community values, to let their voices be heard, and to work for, in legal ways, limits being placed on the dissemination, broadcast, sale, and rental of illegal pornographic materials.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- "Church Leaders Suggest Ways to Fight Pornography." Ensign 14 (Apr. 1984):37-39.
- Cline, Victor B. "Obscenity: How It Affects Us, How We Can Deal with It." Ensign 14 (Apr. 1984):32-37.
- , ed. Where Do You Draw the Line? Provo, Utah, 1974.
- Monson, Thomas S. "Pornography—The Deadly Carrier." Ensign 9 (Nov. 1979):66-67.
- Shapiro, Gary R. "Leave the Obscene Unseen." Ensign 19 (Aug. 1989):27-29.

VICTOR B. CLINE

---

POSTEARTH LIFE

See: Afterlife

---

POVERTY, ATTITUDES TOWARD

For Latter-day Saints, as for all Christians, attending to the needs of the poor is service to God (Matt. 25:31-40; Mosiah 2:17; D&C 42:38) and an expression of the greatest spiritual gift, the attitude of charity (1 Cor. 13:13). King BENJAMIN explained in the Book of Mormon that, as a result of true repentance, people are filled with the love of God and the desire to administer to those in need (Mosiah 4:16). It is no excuse that "the man has brought upon himself his misery," for all are beggars dependent upon God, who gives generously (Mosiah 4:17-23). Benjamin required that the poor also carry this attitude and covet not—those who cannot give are to say in their hearts, "I give not because I have not, but if I had I would give" (Mosiah 4:24-25). Giving to the poor is essential to retaining a remission of one's sins and walking guiltless before God (Mosiah 4:26). Anyone who cries unto God sends up a petition in vain without giving "to those who stand in need" (Alma 34:28).

In 1935 the Church established an extensive welfare services program to assist those in need. In addition, all members of the Church are encouraged to give their time and resources wherever possible. Efforts to help the poor are designed to relieve suffering by supplying immediate needs

(cf. Luke 10:29-42; 16:19-39), to build self-sufficiency through employment, and to teach people to give willingly (D. McKay, CR [Oct. 1941]:54; see WELFARE SERVICES). Widows or orphans are to be provided for (James 1:27; D&C 83:6), especially those destitute because of persecution (D&C 42:30, 39; 52:40; 104:14-18). Indolence on the part of those who are able to work is condemned (Prov. 20:4; 1 Tim. 5:8, 13; D&C 42:42); the poor are to contribute their own labor, whenever possible (Deut. 15:7-11; 24:19; 2 Thes. 3:10). Through the efforts of all living the gospel law in an ideal society worthy of the presence of the Lord, there are "no poor among them" (Moses 7:18; Acts 4:32-35; 4 Ne. 1:2-3; D&C 42:30-33; see ZION).

Those who willingly give to the poor are promised many blessings, including eternal life (Luke 18:18-23; Matt. 25:31-40), deliverance (Ps. 41:1), forgiveness (Alma 4:13-14), happiness (Prov. 14:21), material rewards (Prov. 19:17; 28:27; Jacob 2:17-19; Deut. 24:19), and answers to prayers (Alma 34:28). Strong condemnations are repeated against those who refuse to share with the poor (2 Ne. 9:30; D&C 56:16). Caring for the poor is a significant moral challenge and obligation (Deut. 15:11; CWHN 9:193).

Under the LAW OF MOSES, the poor were to be treated generously (Epszstein, pp. 108-134). The corners of fields were left for them to reap (Lev. 19:9-10; Deut. 24:19-21); the produce of the land every seventh year was given first to the poor and the stranger (Ex. 23:10-11; Lev. 25:3-7); loans to the poor were interest free (Lev. 25:35-37; Ex. 22:25-27); Hebrews sold into bondage to other Hebrews were emancipated and generously supplied after six years of service (Ex. 21:2-6; Deut. 15:12-15); and the tithes not used by the Levites were given to the poor (Deut. 14:28-29; 26:12-13). Still, this did not absolve the responsibility to do more if another remained in need (Deut. 15:11).

The law of CONSECRATION, revealed to Joseph Smith in 1831 (D&C 42), invited the members to give all they possessed to the Church, receive back what they needed (their stewardships), use what they received to provide for themselves, and give their surplus to the Church. These surpluses and the residues of their inheritances were held in the BISHOP'S STOREHOUSE and used first to help the poor (Cook, 1985). Latter-day scriptures speak warnings equally to the rich and to the poor: "Wo unto you rich men, that will not give your substance to the poor, for your riches will canker your souls. . . . Wo unto you poor men, whose hearts are not broken, whose spirits are not contrite, and whose bellies are not satisfied, and whose hands are not stayed from laying hold upon other men's goods, whose eyes are full of greediness, and who will not labor with your own hands!" (D&C 56:16–17).

Most fundamental, however, is the generosity of individuals. As a minimum, most Latter-day Saints believe they should fast for two meals (twenty-four hours) each month and give the equivalent of these two meals, or more, as a FAST OFFERING. In addition, many believe they are expected to do more, to contribute to organized charities and to give personal assistance in the form of money, training, and encouragement (see ECONOMIC AID; HUMANITARIAN SERVICE).

[See also Wealth, Attitudes Toward.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Cook, L. W. Joseph Smith and the Law of Consecration. Provo, Utah, 1985.
- Epsztein, Leon. Social Justice in the Ancient Near East and the People of the Bible. London, 1986.
- Nibley, Hugh W. Approaching Zion. Salt Lake City, 1990.

DAVID J. CHERRINGTON

---

PRATT, ORSON

As a member of the first QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES of the modern dispensation, Orson Pratt participated in almost every phase of the Church's history from 1830 until his death in 1881. As a missionary, editor, pioneer, and pamphleteer, he was one of the most influential leaders of the Church in the nineteenth century.

Pratt was born September 19, 1811, at Hartford, Washington County, New York. At the age of eighteen he began seeking a RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE, and within a year he had been taught the gospel by his brother Parley P. PRATT, who had himself recently joined the Church. On his nineteenth birthday, Orson was baptized into the Church by his brother.

Orson Pratt spent his first years in the Church on a variety of short-term missions in the eastern United States and Canada. He also attended the SCHOOL OF THE PROPHETS in Kirtland, Ohio, marched to Missouri with ZION'S CAMP in 1834, was ordained one of the Standing High Council in Missouri (July 1834), and in February 1835 was chosen as a member of the newly organized Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.

From 1839 to 1841 he participated in the very successful MISSION OF THE TWELVE TO THE BRITISH ISLES, spending much of his time in Scotland. At Edinburgh in September 1840, he published his first missionary tract, A[n] Interesting Account of Several Remarkable Visions. An important pamphlet, it contained the first public recording of Joseph SMITH'S FIRST VISION and also summarized basic LDS beliefs, a list that bears some resemblance to the 1842 ARTICLES OF FAITH in the WENTWORTH LETTER of Joseph Smith.

Orson Pratt's return to America in 1841 thrust him into a maelstrom of rumors and gossip in Nauvoo: that the Prophet Joseph Smith was teaching PLURAL MARRIAGE. His reactions to the situation led to his excommunication in August 1842. However, after several months of seeking the truth regarding both Joseph Smith's revelations and the newly introduced practice of plural marriage, Pratt accepted both with such assurance that he spent the rest of his life in their defense. He was rein-stance to the poor, for your riches will canker your souls. . . . Wo unto you poor men, whose hearts are not broken, whose spirits are not contrite, and whose bellies are not satisfied, and whose hands are not stayed from laying hold upon other men's goods, whose eyes are full of greediness, and who will not labor with your own hands!" (D&C 56:16–17).

Orson Pratt (1811–1881), apostle, pioneer, author, scientist (pictured here c. 1865). Photographer: G. Wunsch.

Most fundamental, however, is the generosity of individuals. As a minimum, most Latter-day Saints believe they should fast for two meals (twenty-four hours) each month and give the equivalent of these two meals, or more, as a FAST OFFERING. In addition, many believe they are expected to do more, to contribute to organized charities and to give personal assistance in the form of money, training, and encouragement (see ECONOMIC AID; HUMANITARIAN SERVICE).

[See also Wealth, Attitudes Toward.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Cook, L. W. Joseph Smith and the Law of Consecration. Provo, Utah, 1985.
- Epsztein, Leon. Social Justice in the Ancient Near East and the People of the Bible. London, 1986.
- Nibley, Hugh W. Approaching Zion. Salt Lake City, 1990.

DAVID J. CHERRINGTON

---

PRATT, ORSON

As a member of the first QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES of the modern dispensation, Orson Pratt participated in almost every phase of the Church's history from 1830 until his death in 1881. As a missionary, editor, pioneer, and pamphleteer, he was one of the most influential leaders of the Church in the nineteenth century.

Pratt was born September 19, 1811, at Hartford, Washington County, New York. At the age of eighteen he began seeking a RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE, and within a year he had been taught the gospel by his brother Parley P. PRATT, who had himself recently joined the Church. On his nineteenth birthday, Orson was baptized into the Church by his brother.

Orson Pratt spent his first years in the Church on a variety of short-term missions in the eastern United States and Canada. He also attended the SCHOOL OF THE PROPHETS in Kirtland, Ohio, marched to Missouri with ZION'S CAMP in 1834, was ordained one of the Standing High Council in Missouri (July 1834), and in February 1835 was chosen as a member of the newly organized Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.

From 1839 to 1841 he participated in the very successful MISSION OF THE TWELVE TO THE BRITISH ISLES, spending much of his time in Scotland. At Edinburgh in September 1840, he published his first missionary tract, A[n] Interesting Account of Several Remarkable Visions. An important pamphlet, it contained the first public recording of Joseph SMITH'S FIRST VISION and also summarized basic LDS beliefs, a list that bears some resemblance to the 1842 ARTICLES OF FAITH in the WENTWORTH LETTER of Joseph Smith.

Orson Pratt's return to America in 1841 thrust him into a maelstrom of rumors and gossip in Nauvoo: that the Prophet Joseph Smith was teaching PLURAL MARRIAGE. His reactions to the situation led to his excommunication in August 1842. However, after several months of seeking the truth regarding both Joseph Smith's revelations and the newly introduced practice of plural marriage, Pratt accepted both with such assurance that he spent the rest of his life in their defense. He was reinstated in the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles in January 1843.

Orson Pratt (1811–1881), apostle, pioneer, author, scientist (pictured here c. 1865). Photographer: G. Wunsch.

Following Joseph Smith's death in 1844, Pratt supported the right and responsibility of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles to preside over the Church. In 1847 he was a member of the Pioneer Company traveling to the Great Basin. On July 21 of that year he and Erastus Snow were the first of that company to enter the Salt Lake Valley. Several days later he preached the first sermon there. His journals are an important source for pioneer history.

From 1848 to 1851 Pratt presided over the Church in Europe. In addition to his many responsibilities regarding proselytizing, immigration, and editing the LDS MILLENNIAL STAR, he wrote and published sixteen pamphlets in defense of LDS doctrines. These include his treatises Divine Authority, or the Question, Was Joseph Smith Sent of God? (1848); The Kingdom of God (1848–1849); and Divine Authenticity of the Book of Mormon (1850–1851).

When he returned to Salt Lake City, Elder Pratt was assigned by President Brigham YOUNG to publicly preach a sermon announcing the doctrine of plural marriage at a special missionary conference in August 1852. Following the meetings he was assigned by Brigham Young to publish in Washington, D.C., a periodical in defense of plural marriage. The twelve-month run of The Seer in 1853 provides the most detailed defense of the doctrine in LDS literature.

In 1856, again presiding over the European Mission, Elder Pratt produced additional pamphlets on specific gospel principles. Eight tracts were issued separately, then bound together in 1857 under the title Tracts by Orson Pratt. . . . After Brigham Young's death in 1877, Pratt was assigned by John TAYLOR to help prepare new editions of the modern LDS scriptures. He had provided much of the critical work for the 1876 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, and he did the same for the 1879 edition of the Book of Mormon (dividing it into chapters and verses and adding references), and for the 1879 American edition of the Pearl of Great Price.

Throughout his life Orson Pratt pursued his strong interest in mathematics and astronomy. In 1866 he published his major mathematical work, New and Easy Method of Solution of the Cubic and Biquadratic Equations, and in 1879 issued Key to the Universe. In these works and in various lectures to many early LDS audiences, he was a positive force in the scientific education of the American pioneers. By the time his last scientific work was published, he was suffering from diabetes. He preached his last public discourse on September 18, 1881, and died on October 3 in Salt Lake City. He had married seven wives and fathered forty-five children.

Elder Pratt's greatest impact upon the Church came through his precisely written theological studies. Within each work he moved carefully from one axiom to the next, developing his position with the same exactness he used in presenting a mathematical proof. His concern for definitiveness and his ability to simplify, to reduce things to their lowest common denominator, made his written works valuable to missionaries defending the faith in mission fields throughout the world.

Orson Pratt's religious pamphlets grew out of a missionary context. Their importance lies partly in the extended arguments and "proofs" for the central tenets of LDS theology. In most of his writing, however, he was an elaborator, a systematizer, and a popularizer of LDS thought, rather than an innovator or an originator. In almost every area he learned the substance either directly from the Prophet Joseph Smith or indirectly from his dynamic and visionary older brother Parley, also an LDS apostle and author. Orson Pratt was at his best in developing the ideas of others and expanding them into fully elaborated statements.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- England, Breck. The Life and Thought of Orson Pratt. Salt Lake City, 1985.
- Hogan, Edward R. "Orson Pratt as a Mathematician." Utah Historical Quarterly 41 (Winter 1973):59–68.
- Lyon, T. Edgar. "Orson Pratt—Early Mormon Leader." Master's thesis, University of Chicago, 1932.
- . "Orson Pratt, Pioneer and Proselyter." Utah Historical Quarterly 24 (July 1956):261–73.
- Skabelund, Donald. "Cosmology on the American Frontier: Orson Pratt's Key to the Universe." Centaurus: International Magazine of the History of Mathematics, Science, and Technology 11 (1965):190–204.
- Whittaker, David J. "Orson Pratt: Prolific Pamphleteer." Dialogue 15 (Autumn 1982):27–41.
- . "The Bone in the Throat: Orson Pratt and the Public Announcement of Plural Marriage." Western Historical Quarterly 18 (July 1987):293–314.

DAVID J. WHITTAKER

PRATT, PARLEY PARKER

One of the most significant LDS missionaries, writers, poets, and thinkers to emerge during the early years of the LDS Restoration was Parley Parker Pratt (1807–1857). He was a central figure in expounding the doctrines of the gospel, and his publications set a standard for future pamphleteers. He was a member of the original Quorum of the Twelve Apostles in this dispensation and a leader in the migration to the Great Basin.

Pratt was born April 12, 1807, in Burlington, Otsego County, New York, the third son of Jared and Charity Pratt. He married Thankful Halsey on September 9, 1827, at Canaan, New York, and they made their home in Amherst township, Lorain County, Ohio. In Ohio, Parley became a member of the Reformed Baptist Society (Campbellite) through the preaching of Sidney RIGDON.

Parley P. Pratt (1807–1857), converted through the Book of Mormon in 1830, became one of the Church's leading writers and early apostles. His writings are spirited and open-ended, holding continuous revelation to be the key in the science of theology. He was killed in Arkansas in 1857. Daguerreotype, c. 1853, attributed to Marsena Cannon.

While traveling on the Erie Canal in western New York, Parley came in contact with a Baptist deacon named Hamblin, who introduced him to a copy of the Book of Mormon. He then investigated the LDS Church and was baptized in Seneca Lake by Oliver COWDERY on September 1, 1830. In turn, he converted his younger brother, Orson PRATT, and baptized him on September 19, 1830.

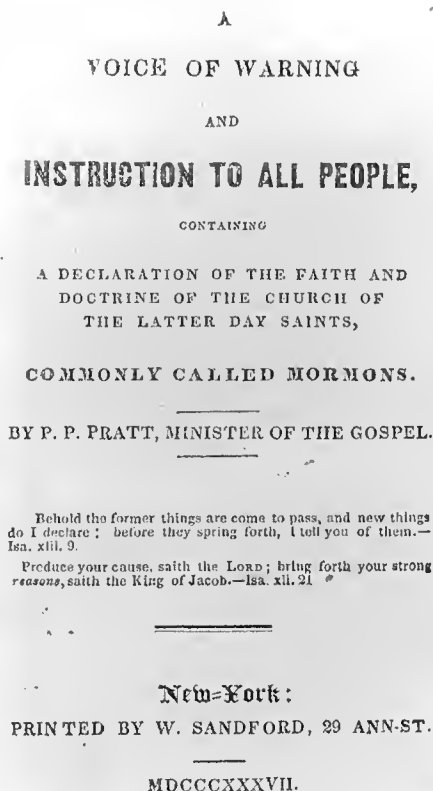

From 1830 to 1857, Parley P. Pratt was constantly engaged in a variety of missionary assignments. Of special note was a 1,500-mile journey from Fayette, New York, to the western boundaries of Missouri with Oliver Cowdery, Peter Whitmer, Jr., and Ziba Peterson (D&C 32:1–2) on a mission to the Lamanites, beginning in October 1830 (see LAMANITE MISSION). En route, these missionaries converted some 130 persons in the Kirtland–Mentor area, including Sidney Rigdon and Frederick G. Williams, future members of the First Presidency. Upon reaching Missouri, Pratt was among the first members of the Church to stand upon the land later designated for the City of Zion, Independence, Jackson County (cf. D&C 57:2–3).

Parley Pratt was ordained an apostle on February 21, 1835, and sustained as a member of the Quorum of the Twelve. The first LDS hymnal (1835) included three hymns he had written. During a mission to the eastern states with the Twelve in the summer of 1835, Parley published eleven more hymns in conjunction with a long narrative poem in six chapters entitled The Millennium, A Poem. This volume became the first book of LDS poetry.

Pratt proselytized extensively in Upper Canada, leading to the conversion of John TAYLOR and his wife Leonora, Joseph Fielding, and Joseph's sisters, Mary and Mersey Fielding (see SMITH, MARY FIELDING). In 1838, he suffered persecution with the Saints in Missouri and spent nine months imprisoned in Richmond and Columbia before escaping to Illinois in July 1839.

Parley and Orson Pratt left Nauvoo, Illinois, on August 19, 1839, on an apostolic mission to the British Isles (see MISSIONS OF THE TWELVE TO THE BRITISH ISLES). At a conference in Preston, England, Parley was named editor of the newly created Latter-day Saints' Millennial Star (see MILLENNIAL STAR), which became the Church's longest continuous periodical—1840 to 1970.

Upon his return to Nauvoo, Parley was called to preside over the branches of the Church in New Parley P. Pratt's A Voice of Warning and Instruction to All People (1837) was the first Latter-day Saint book, other than the Book of Mormon, the Book of Commandments, the Doctrine and Covenants, and the 1835 hymnal. Widely used by missionaries in proclaiming the message of the gospel, it was very popular throughout the nineteenth century. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

England and the Mid-Atlantic states with headquarters in New York City. Here he published a periodical entitled The Prophet.

February 1846 found Parley and his family crossing the territory of Iowa on a forced move from Illinois. During the summer and autumn of 1847, he traveled with his household to the Salt Lake Valley.

In 1851 the First Presidency called Elder Pratt to preside over a "General Mission to the Pacific" with headquarters in San Francisco. Sensing a duty to the peoples of Latin America, he, with his wife Phebe Soper, and Elder Rufus Allen, sailed to Valparaiso, Chile, in September 1851. Frustrated by language difficulties, poverty, the death of an infant son, and the ecclesiastical and political conditions in Chile, the missionaries returned to San Francisco in March 1852.

His publication A Voice of Warning (1837) became a model for other writers. The format, which employed descriptions of basic LDS doctrines and biblical references, arguments, and examples, was used by most Church writers for the next century. It was the first use of a book, other than the standard works, to spread the gospel message (Crawley, 1982, p. 15). His contributions to the dissemination of doctrine were extensive, and among his most significant works are Late Persecutions of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints . . . With a Sketch of Their Rise, Progress and Doctrine (1840); Key to the Science of Theology (1855); The Millennium and Other Poems: To Which is Annexed, a Treatise on the Regeneration of Matter (1840); and the Autobiography of Parley Parker Pratt (1874). (For additional publications, see Crawley, 1990; Robison, 1952.)

In 1856 Elder Pratt was called to another mission to the Eastern states. While returning to the West on May 13, 1857, he was killed by a man who had been seeking to murder him. This occurred about twelve miles northeast of Van Buren, Arkansas (S. Pratt, 1975). A monument now marks the site of his burial. Through the enduring legacy of his doctrinal writings, hymns, and poems, Parley Parker Pratt continues to instruct and inspire each new generation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Crawley, Peter L. "Parley P. Pratt: Father of Mormon Pamphleteering." Dialogue 15 (Autumn 1982):13-26.
- . The Essential Parley P. Pratt. Salt Lake City, 1990.
- Pratt, Parley P. Autobiography of Parley P. Pratt, ed. Parley P. Pratt, Jr. Salt Lake City, 1874 and 1938.
- Pratt, Steven. "Eleanor McLean and the Murder of Parley P. Pratt." BYU Studies 15 (Winter 1975):225-56.
- Robison, Parley Parker. The Writings of Parley Parker Pratt. Salt Lake City, 1952.

LARRY C. PORTER

PRAYER

Prayer marked the beginning of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints when God the Father and his son Jesus Christ appeared in answer

Parley P. Pratt's A Voice of Warning and Instruction to All People (1837) was the first Latter-day Saint book, other than the Book of Mormon, the Book of Commandments, the Doctrine and Covenants, and the 1835 hymnal. Widely used by missionaries in proclaiming the message of the gospel, it was very popular throughout the nineteenth century. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

England and the Mid-Atlantic states with headquarters in New York City. Here he published a periodical entitled The Prophet.

February 1846 found Parley and his family crossing the territory of Iowa on a forced move from Illinois. During the summer and autumn of 1847, he traveled with his household to the Salt Lake Valley.

In 1851 the First Presidency called Elder Pratt to preside over a "General Mission to the Pacific" with headquarters in San Francisco. Sensing a duty to the peoples of Latin America, he, with his wife Phebe Soper, and Elder Rufus Allen, sailed to Valparaiso, Chile, in September 1851. Frustrated by language difficulties, poverty, the death of an infant son, and the ecclesiastical and political conditions in Chile, the missionaries returned to San Francisco in March 1852.

His publication A Voice of Warning (1837) became a model for other writers. The format, which employed descriptions of basic LDS doctrines and biblical references, arguments, and examples, was used by most Church writers for the next century. It was the first use of a book, other than the standard works, to spread the gospel message (Crawley, 1982, p. 15). His contributions to the dissemination of doctrine were extensive, and among his most significant works are Late Persecutions of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints . . . With a Sketch of Their Rise, Progress and Doctrine (1840); Key to the Science of Theology (1855); The Millennium and Other Poems: To Which is Annexed, a Treatise on the Regeneration of Matter (1840); and the Autobiography of Parley Parker Pratt (1874). (For additional publications, see Crawley, 1990; Robison, 1952.)

In 1856 Elder Pratt was called to another mission to the Eastern states. While returning to the West on May 13, 1857, he was killed by a man who had been seeking to murder him. This occurred about twelve miles northeast of Van Buren, Arkansas (S. Pratt, 1975). A monument now marks the site of his burial. Through the enduring legacy of his doctrinal writings, hymns, and poems, Parley Parker Pratt continues to instruct and inspire each new generation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Crawley, Peter L. "Parley P. Pratt: Father of Mormon Pamphleteering." Dialogue 15 (Autumn 1982):13-26.
- . The Essential Parley P. Pratt. Salt Lake City, 1990.
- Pratt, Parley P. Autobiography of Parley P. Pratt, ed. Parley P. Pratt, Jr. Salt Lake City, 1874 and 1938.
- Pratt, Steven. "Eleanor McLean and the Murder of Parley P. Pratt." BYU Studies 15 (Winter 1975):225-56.
- Robison, Parley Parker. The Writings of Parley Parker Pratt. Salt Lake City, 1952.

LARRY C. PORTER

PRAYER

Prayer marked the beginning of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints when God the Father and his son Jesus Christ appeared in answer to the Prophet Joseph SMITH's plea to know which of the neighboring churches he should join. Young Joseph Smith had followed JAMES's invitation: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally. . . . But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering" (James 1:5–6). God answered the boy's sincere and earnest plea (JS—H 1:5–20). And this FIRST VISION shows prayer as the way to commune with God and receive REVELATION from him. Faith, sincerity, obedience, and seeking are attributes that lift the soul to God; this is the essential character of prayer for the Latter-day Saint.

Adam and Eve began praying to God after they were cast out of the Garden of Eden. "And Adam and Eve, his wife, called upon the name of the Lord, and they heard the voice of the Lord from the way toward the Garden of Eden, speaking unto them, and they saw him not" (Moses 5:4). Though they were separated from God, communication with him was possible and important, for the Lord commanded, "Thou shalt repent and call upon God in the name of the Son forevermore" (Moses 5:8).

Among Latter-day Saints, this commandment to pray still applies. The Lord instructs, "Ask, and ye shall receive; knock, and it shall be opened unto you" (D&C 4:7; cf. Matt. 7:7). Home teachers, for instance, are to "visit the house of each member, and exhort them to pray vocally and in secret" (D&C 20:47). Other scriptures emphasize these important commandments: "Pray always lest that wicked one have power in you, and remove you out of your place" (D&C 93:49). "Pray always, lest you enter into temptation and lose your reward" (D&C 31:12). "For if ye would hearken unto the Spirit which teacheth a man to pray ye would know that ye must pray; for the evil spirit teacheth not a man to pray, but teacheth him that he must not pray. But behold . . . ye must pray always, and not faint; . . . ye must not perform any thing unto the Lord save in the first place ye shall pray unto the Father in the name of Christ, that he will condescend thy performance unto thee, that thy performance may be for the welfare of thy soul" (2 Ne. 32:8–9). Thus, the scriptures make clear that prayer is a commandment as well as an opportunity to communicate with God and to receive blessings and direction from him.

The Church uses set prayers only in temple ORDINANCES, in the two SACRAMENT prayers, and in the BAPTISMAL PRAYER. "By revelation the Lord has given the Church . . . set prayers for use in our sacred ordinances. . . . [These] relate to the atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ, his crucifixion, and his burial and resurrection. All of the ordinances in which we use these prayers place us under solemn covenants of obedience to God" (Kimball et al., p. 56). In all other instances, Latter-day Saints express themselves in their own words.

Although few set prayers occur in their worship, Latter-day Saints follow a pattern when praying. Prayers are addressed to the Father in Heaven, following the example set by Christ when instructing his disciples how to pray (Matt. 6:9; 3 Ne. 13:9). His prayer serves as a pattern: Disciples are to praise and thank God, ask for daily physical needs, and plead for the spiritual power to forgive, be forgiven, and resist temptation. Jesus used simple, expressive language in his prayers, avoiding vain repetition and flowery phrases (Matt. 6:5–13; 3 Ne. 13:5–13; 19:20–23, 28–29; cf. 3 Ne. 17:14–17; 19:31–34). More important than the words is the feeling that accompanies prayer. Christ reiterated a clear, prophetic warning: "This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me" (Matt. 15:8; cf. Isa. 29:13). In praising God, in offering thanks, in asking for needs—remembering to pray that God's will be done—language is to be reverent, humble, and sincere.

Mother and three children praying. This picture was sent to their father who was away serving a mission. Courtesy Rare Books and Manuscripts, Brigham Young University.

President Spencer W. KIMBALL commented, “In all our prayers, it is well to use the pronouns thee, thou, thy, and thine instead of you, your, and yours inasmuch as they have come to indicate respect” (p. 201). Unnecessary repetition of God’s name is avoided, as are idle clichés. Prayers close by stating that the prayer is offered in the name of Jesus Christ, concluding with amen. When someone prays in behalf of a group, the members customarily repeat the final “amen” aloud, expressing acceptance of what has been said. In private, the individual or family members kneel with bowed heads and closed eyes. In public, the one praying usually stands, but also observes behavior appropriate to prayer. A prayer’s length is determined somewhat by the occasion, but generally prayers are reasonably concise, expressing thanks and petitioning God for what the group needs, avoiding a sermon or display of verbal skills. For both invocations and benedictions the Church teaches that the one praying should express worship rather than make a display or preach a sermon.

Prayer is both an individual and a family form of worship. Usually, the day begins and ends with prayer. At least once daily, LDS families should pray together (see FAMILY PRAYER). The father, or the mother in his absence, calls on one member to pray for the family. As days pass, each family member has the opportunity to lead family prayer. A blessing on the food that offers thanks to God also precedes each meal, the younger children often offering this simple prayer, at first with the help of a parent. In addition, one is encouraged to pray whenever the desire or need occurs: to give thanks for a special blessing, to ask for help in difficult circumstances, or to speak with God on any matter of concern. Prayers begin and end all formal Church meetings and often begin other occasions for which Latter-day Saints have responsibility, such as Church-sponsored athletic contests, concerts, and plays.

Another practice associated with prayer is the fast observed on the first Sunday of the month. Latter-day Saints abstain from two consecutive meals, ending their FASTING with a FAST AND TESTIMONY MEETING, bearing public testimony of God and Christ and giving thanks for God’s goodness and blessings. In addition, whenever circumstances dictate, special pleas to God are combined with fasting, occasionally observed by a whole congregation to petition for special blessings outside the ordinary course of events (see D&C 27:18).

The comprehensive scope of prayer has been outlined by the Book of Mormon prophet ALMA<sub>2</sub>: “I would that ye should be humble, . . . asking for whatsoever things ye stand in need, both spiritual and temporal; always returning thanks unto God for whatsoever things ye do receive” (Alma 7:23). Amulek, a noted Book of Mormon teacher, followed these essential qualities of prayer when he counseled men and women to pray about physical needs: “Gry unto [God] when ye are in your fields, yea, over all your flocks. Gry unto him in your houses, yea, over all your household, both morning, mid-day, and evening . . . Cry unto him over the crops of your fields, that ye may prosper in them. Gry over the flocks of your fields, that they may increase” (Alma 34:20–21, 24–25). Thus, a student may pray about studies, a merchant about business, a mother and father about the welfare of their children. Although prayer may be for physical needs, spiritual results may also occur, and vice versa. A student who prays about studies is not likely to cheat on examinations; a merchant who prays about business is not likely to be dishonest.

Alma<sub>2</sub> sought still other spiritual blessings:

O Lord, my heart is exceedingly sorrowful; wilt thou comfort my soul in Christ. O Lord, wilt thou grant unto me that I may have strength, that I may suffer with patience these afflictions which shall come upon me, because of the iniquity of this people. . . . O Lord, wilt thou grant unto us [Alma and fellow missionaries] that we may have success in bringing [our brethren] again unto thee in Christ. Behold, O Lord, their souls are precious, . . . therefore, give unto us, O Lord, power and wisdom that we may bring these, our brethren, again unto thee [Alma 31:31–35].

The intent of Alma’s prayer underlies the missionary program of the Church. Alma’s disciple Amulek also told his people to “cry unto [God] against the devil, who is an enemy to all righteousness” (Alma 34:23). The spiritual blessings one might pray for include comfort when sorrowing, strength to resist temptation, wisdom to discern good and evil, compassion to forgive others, and understanding of God’s will for one’s life. An important purpose of prayer is to thank God for life itself and for all that makes life valuable. Ingratitude is an offense against God because it is a failure to recognize his power and love (D&C 59:14–21). Giving thanks is a way of praising God by acknowledging his ever-present hand.

Latter-day Saints are taught that preparation is necessary if one is to communicate effectively with God. A tranquil time and place allow quiet contemplation on the specific requests one may make. Joseph Smith went to a nearby grove to pray for an answer to his question, and received his glorious vision. Job was told, "Prepare thine heart, and stretch out thine hands toward him" (Job 11:13). Alma<sub>2</sub> listed the qualities of a heart prepared for prayer: "I would that ye should be humble, and be submissive and gentle; easy to be entreated; full of patience and long-suffering . . . being diligent in keeping the commandments of God. . . . And see that ye have faith, hope, and charity, and then ye will always abound in good works" (Alma 7:23–24). MORONI<sub>2</sub> stressed the need for "a sincere heart, . . . real intent, . . . [and] faith in Christ" (Moro. 10:4).

Latter-day Saints believe that relationships with others must also harmonize with Christ's teachings. Christ taught that God's forgiveness could not be obtained unless the sinner were willing to forgive those who had sinned against him (Matt. 6:14–15; Mark 11:25–26). A prepared heart is also a giving heart. Amulek spoke of this quality: "I say unto you, do not suppose that [praying] is all; for . . . if ye turn away the needy, and the naked, and visit not the sick and afflicted, and impart of your substance, if ye have, to those who stand in need—I say unto you, if ye do not any of these things, behold, your prayer is vain, and availeth you nothing" (Alma 34:28).

When one's heart is prepared, God promises answers. The elders of the early Church were promised that "if ye are purified and cleansed from all sin, ye shall ask whatsoever you will in the name of Jesus and it shall be done" (D&C 50:29). In even stronger terms this assurance is repeated to all who pray: "I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say; but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise" (D&C 82:10). However, it is wise to pray that God's will be done, even if it means denial of a request. God warns that asking for what "is not expedient" will turn to one's "condemnation" (D&C 88:64–65).

One answer to a faithful prayer is illustrated through the experience of Oliver COWDERY, an early elder of the Church, when he attempted to help with translating the Book of Mormon. He was told to "study it out in [his] mind" and, if his translation were right, it would be confirmed with a burning in his bosom; if wrong, a "stupor of thought" would come (D&C 9:8–9). When prayers are answered, one experiences peace of mind and assurance that God has heard, even though the answer may be no. The Savior's submissiveness as he prayed in GETHSEMANE shows the way: "Nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done" (Luke 22:42).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W. Faith Precedes the Miracle, pp. 21–58. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- . The Teachings of Spencer W. Kimball, ed. Edward L. Kimball, pp. 115–27. Salt Lake City, 1982.
- Kimball, Spencer W., Prayer. Salt Lake City, 1977.
- McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, Vol. 1, pp. 233–37. Salt Lake City, 1975.

MAE BLANCH

---

PRAYER CIRCLE

The prayer circle is a part of Latter-day Saint TEMPLE WORSHIP, usually associated with the ENDOWMENT ceremony. Participants, an equal number of men and women dressed in temple clothing, surround an altar in a circle formation to participate unitedly in prayer.

The circle is an ancient and universal symbol of perfection. In a public discourse, Joseph SMITH once used a ring as an image of eternity, "one eternal round," without beginning or end (TPJS, p. 354). The formation of the prayer circle suggests wholeness and eternity, and the participants, having affirmed that they bear no negative feelings toward other members of the circle (cf. Matt. 5:23–24), evoke communal harmony in collective prayer—a harmony underscored by the linked formation, uniformity of dress, and the unison repetition of the words of the leader. The prayer has no set text, but is, among other things, an occasion for seeking the Lord's blessing upon those with particular needs whose names have been submitted for collective entreaty.

Prayer in circle formation can be traced to many early Christian sources. In the apocryphal Acts of John, for example, participants are bidden to "make as it were a ring, holding one another's hands, and [Jesus] standing in the midst" led the prayer (James, p. 253). Other texts require the participants to prepare by washing or reconciling

Latter-day Saints are taught that preparation is necessary if one is to communicate effectively with God. A tranquil time and place allow quiet contemplation on the specific requests one may make. Joseph Smith went to a nearby grove to pray for an answer to his question, and received his glorious vision. Job was told, "Prepare thine heart, and stretch out thine hands toward him" (Job 11:13). Alma<sub>2</sub> listed the qualities of a heart prepared for prayer: "I would that ye should be humble, and be submissive and gentle; easy to be entreated; full of patience and long-suffering . . . being diligent in keeping the commandments of God. . . . And see that ye have faith, hope, and charity, and then ye will always abound in good works" (Alma 7:23–24). MORONI<sub>2</sub> stressed the need for "a sincere heart, . . . real intent, . . . [and] faith in Christ" (Moro. 10:4).

Latter-day Saints believe that relationships with others must also harmonize with Christ's teachings. Christ taught that God's forgiveness could not be obtained unless the sinner were willing to forgive those who had sinned against him (Matt. 6:14–15; Mark 11:25–26). A prepared heart is also a giving heart. Amulek spoke of this quality: "I say unto you, do not suppose that [praying] is all; for . . . if ye turn away the needy, and the naked, and visit not the sick and afflicted, and impart of your substance, if ye have, to those who stand in need—I say unto you, if ye do not any of these things, behold, your prayer is vain, and availeth you nothing" (Alma 34:28).

When one's heart is prepared, God promises answers. The elders of the early Church were promised that "if ye are purified and cleansed from all sin, ye shall ask whatsoever you will in the name of Jesus and it shall be done" (D&C 50:29). In even stronger terms this assurance is repeated to all who pray: "I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say; but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise" (D&C 82:10). However, it is wise to pray that God's will be done, even if it means denial of a request. God warns that asking for what "is not expedient" will turn to one's "condemnation" (D&C 88:64–65).

One answer to a faithful prayer is illustrated through the experience of Oliver COWDERY, an early elder of the Church, when he attempted to help with translating the Book of Mormon. He was told to "study it out in [his] mind" and, if his translation were right, it would be confirmed with a burning in his bosom; if wrong, a "stupor of thought" would come (D&C 9:8–9). When prayers are answered, one experiences peace of mind and assurance that God has heard, even though the answer may be no. The Savior's submissiveness as he prayed in GETHSEMANE shows the way: "Nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done" (Luke 22:42).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W. Faith Precedes the Miracle, pp. 21–58. Salt Lake City, 1972.
- . The Teachings of Spencer W. Kimball, ed. Edward L. Kimball, pp. 115–27. Salt Lake City, 1982.
- Kimball, Spencer W., Prayer. Salt Lake City, 1977.
- McConkie, Bruce R. Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, Vol. 1, pp. 233–37. Salt Lake City, 1975.

MAE BLANCH

---

PRAYER CIRCLE

The prayer circle is a part of Latter-day Saint TEMPLE WORSHIP, usually associated with the ENDOWMENT ceremony. Participants, an equal number of men and women dressed in temple clothing, surround an altar in a circle formation to participate unitedly in prayer.

The circle is an ancient and universal symbol of perfection. In a public discourse, Joseph SMITH once used a ring as an image of eternity, "one eternal round," without beginning or end (TPJS, p. 354). The formation of the prayer circle suggests wholeness and eternity, and the participants, having affirmed that they bear no negative feelings toward other members of the circle (cf. Matt. 5:23–24), evoke communal harmony in collective prayer—a harmony underscored by the linked formation, uniformity of dress, and the unison repetition of the words of the leader. The prayer has no set text, but is, among other things, an occasion for seeking the Lord's blessing upon those with particular needs whose names have been submitted for collective entreaty.

Prayer in circle formation can be traced to many early Christian sources. In the apocryphal Acts of John, for example, participants are bidden to "make as it were a ring, holding one another's hands, and [Jesus] standing in the midst" led the prayer (James, p. 253). Other texts require the participants to prepare by washing or reconciling themselves, or to receive secret words and signs, or to dress in special clothing; some suggest a ritual ring dance.

"Prayer rings" were also common in nineteenth-century Protestant revivals, and Freemasons of the period arranged themselves in circular formation around an altar, repeating in unison the received Masonic signs (see FREEMASONRY AND THE TEMPLE).

Despite these analogues, the LDS prayer circle is a distinctive ceremony, integrally connected with temple worship. The ceremony may have been introduced in May 1842, when Joseph Smith taught the endowment to several of his closest associates; and a prayer circle group was formed on May 26, 1843, with Joseph Smith as its leader. This prayer circle, referred to in many early records as the "Quorum of the Anointed," to which others (including women) were gradually initiated, met and prayed together regularly during the last year of Joseph Smith's life and continued after his martyrdom in June 1844 until endowments began to be performed in the Nauvoo Temple in December 1845.

Although deriving in all instances from temple worship, some prayer circles were formally organized apart from the endowment ceremony. Membership in these special prayer circles, which began in 1851 and continued until 1929, did not depend upon Church position. Other prayer circles were formed for priesthood groups: stake presidencies and high councils, priesthood quorums, ward bishoprics—all of them formed under the authority of the First Presidency and generally in response to specific requests. On May 3, 1978, the First Presidency announced that all prayer circles outside the temple were to be discontinued. Apart from the endowment ceremony, the only prayer circles still held are part of the weekly meeting of the First Presidency and Quorum of the Twelve and the monthly meeting of all General Authorities in the Salt Lake Temple.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- James, M. R. Apocryphal New Testament. Oxford, 1924.
 Nibley, Hugh. "The Early Christian Prayer Circle." BYU Studies 19 (Fall 1978):41–78; reprinted in CWIL 4:45–99.
 Quinn, D. Michael. "Latter-day Saint Prayer Circles." BYU Studies 19 (Fall 1978):79–105.

GEORGE S. TATE

PREACHING THE GOSPEL

Prior to his ascension, the resurrected Savior charged his apostles to "teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you" (Matt. 28:19–20). This charge reiterates the call of Abraham (Abr. 2:6, 9–11) and has been unequivocally renewed in the latter days (D&C 110:12): "And the voice of warning shall be unto all people" (D&C 1:4). "This calling and commandment give I unto you concerning all men . . . [they] shall be ordained and sent forth to preach the everlasting gospel among the nations" (D&C 36:4–5). "For, verily, the sound must go forth from this place unto all the world, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth—the gospel must be preached unto every creature, with signs following them that believe" (D&C 58:64). The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints responds to this charge by sending missionaries to people of all persuasions throughout the world (see MISSIONS).

The calling to preach the gospel has a distinctive meaning among Latter-day Saints. All who are in the Church are directly or indirectly indebted to missionaries for their introduction to the gospel. Historically, missionary labor has been carried out by members of the Church who have gone "two by two" (D&C 42:6; 52:10; cf. Luke 10:1; John 8:17) into every land and clime of the free world (see MISSIONARY, MISSIONARY LIFE). LDS missionary labor is not a profession or vocation. It is voluntary and unpaid. The majority of those who presently serve for an average of two years are young men and women, but many older couples of various professions or walks of life also serve. MISSION PRESIDENTS are themselves laymen called to serve usually for three years. At this writing (1991), some 40,000 LDS full-time missionaries are serving.

In addition, there are other modes of preaching the gospel. Members may be called to fulfill stake missions that are coordinated in time spent with their regular occupations or professions. They devote about ten hours per week (usually evenings) to missionary work in their own stake area. The "Every member a missionary" program emphasized by President David O. MCKAY involves members inviting friends or interested persons into their homes for discussions of gospel principles. A General Missionary Fund is maintained by member contributions, which help some persons themselves, or to receive secret words and signs, or to dress in special clothing; some suggest a ritual ring dance.

"Prayer rings" were also common in nineteenth-century Protestant revivals, and Freemasons of the period arranged themselves in circular formation around an altar, repeating in unison the received Masonic signs (see FREEMASONRY AND THE TEMPLE).

Despite these analogues, the LDS prayer circle is a distinctive ceremony, integrally connected with temple worship. The ceremony may have been introduced in May 1842, when Joseph Smith taught the endowment to several of his closest associates; and a prayer circle group was formed on May 26, 1843, with Joseph Smith as its leader. This prayer circle, referred to in many early records as the "Quorum of the Anointed," to which others (including women) were gradually initiated, met and prayed together regularly during the last year of Joseph Smith's life and continued after his martyrdom in June 1844 until endowments began to be performed in the Nauvoo Temple in December 1845.

Although deriving in all instances from temple worship, some prayer circles were formally organized apart from the endowment ceremony. Membership in these special prayer circles, which began in 1851 and continued until 1929, did not depend upon Church position. Other prayer circles were formed for priesthood groups: stake presidencies and high councils, priesthood quorums, ward bishoprics—all of them formed under the authority of the First Presidency and generally in response to specific requests. On May 3, 1978, the First Presidency announced that all prayer circles outside the temple were to be discontinued. Apart from the endowment ceremony, the only prayer circles still held are part of the weekly meeting of the First Presidency and Quorum of the Twelve and the monthly meeting of all General Authorities in the Salt Lake Temple.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- James, M. R. Apocryphal New Testament. Oxford, 1924.
 Nibley, Hugh. "The Early Christian Prayer Circle." BYU Studies 19 (Fall 1978):41–78; reprinted in CWII 4:45–99.
 Quinn, D. Michael. "Latter-day Saint Prayer Circles." BYU Studies 19 (Fall 1978):79–105.

GEORGE S. TATE

PREACHING THE GOSPEL

Prior to his ascension, the resurrected Savior charged his apostles to "teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you" (Matt. 28:19–20). This charge reiterates the call of Abraham (Abr. 2:6, 9–11) and has been unequivocally renewed in the latter days (D&C 110:12): "And the voice of warning shall be unto all people" (D&C 1:4). "This calling and commandment give I unto you concerning all men . . . [they] shall be ordained and sent forth to preach the everlasting gospel among the nations" (D&C 36:4–5). "For, verily, the sound must go forth from this place unto all the world, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth—the gospel must be preached unto every creature, with signs following them that believe" (D&C 58:64). The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints responds to this charge by sending missionaries to people of all persuasions throughout the world (see MISSIONS).

The calling to preach the gospel has a distinctive meaning among Latter-day Saints. All who are in the Church are directly or indirectly indebted to missionaries for their introduction to the gospel. Historically, missionary labor has been carried out by members of the Church who have gone "two by two" (D&C 42:6; 52:10; cf. Luke 10:1; John 8:17) into every land and clime of the free world (see MISSIONARY, MISSIONARY LIFE). LDS missionary labor is not a profession or vocation. It is voluntary and unpaid. The majority of those who presently serve for an average of two years are young men and women, but many older couples of various professions or walks of life also serve. MISSION PRESIDENTS are themselves laymen called to serve usually for three years. At this writing (1991), some 40,000 LDS full-time missionaries are serving.

In addition, there are other modes of preaching the gospel. Members may be called to fulfill stake missions that are coordinated in time spent with their regular occupations or professions. They devote about ten hours per week (usually evenings) to missionary work in their own stake area. The "Every member a missionary" program emphasized by President David O. MCKAY involves members inviting friends or interested persons into their homes for discussions of gospel principles. A General Missionary Fund is maintained by member contributions, which help some persons in undeveloped countries to supplement their savings and serve full-time missions. Whether laboring at home or abroad, Latter-day Saints are constantly admonished that the witness and testimony of the gospel are only effective if they reflect genuine and continual discipleship of Jesus Christ. The gospel is to be taught in mildness and in meekness, in demonstration of the Spirit, and in love unfeigned (D&C 38:41; 99:2; 121:41).

The command of the Lord to preach the gospel to all nations has a twofold purpose: to bring people to an understanding of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and also to sound the warning voice to leave mankind without excuse (see VOICE OF WARNING).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS 1:307–324.

MAX L. PINEGAR

PREDESTINATION

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints rejects the belief in predestination—that God predetermines the salvation or the damnation of every individual. The gospel teaches that genuine human freedom and genuine responsibility—individual AGENCY in both thought and action—are crucial in both the development and the outcome of a person's life. Church doctrine rejects the strict dual option providing only heaven or hell as an outcome, since people vary widely in their levels of spiritual attainment. At the same time, Latter-day Saints recognize both the indispensable need for the grace of God manifested through Jesus Christ and the effective spiritual guidance that comes through divine FOREORDINATION.

The LDS position is based in part on the teachings of Paul that God “will render to every man according to his deeds” and that “there is no in undeveloped countries to supplement their savings and serve full-time missions. Whether laboring at home or abroad, Latter-day Saints are constantly admonished that the witness and testimony of the gospel are only effective if they reflect genuine and continual discipleship of Jesus Christ. The gospel is to be taught in mildness and in meekness, in demonstration of the Spirit, and in love unfeigned (D&C 38:41; 99:2; 121:41).

California Mission meeting by the Cliff House, near San Francisco, May 1897, Mission President Ephraim H. Nye speaking. Latter-day Saints strive to preach the gospel in every land, in every place, and to every person.

The command of the Lord to preach the gospel to all nations has a twofold purpose: to bring people to an understanding of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and also to sound the warning voice to leave mankind without excuse (see VOICE OF WARNING).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS 1:307–324.

MAX L. PINEGAR

PREDESTINATION

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints rejects the belief in predestination—that God predetermines the salvation or the damnation of every individual. The gospel teaches that genuine human freedom and genuine responsibility—individual AGENCY in both thought and action—are crucial in both the development and the outcome of a person's life. Church doctrine rejects the strict dual option providing only heaven or hell as an outcome, since people vary widely in their levels of spiritual attainment. At the same time, Latter-day Saints recognize both the indispensable need for the grace of God manifested through Jesus Christ and the effective spiritual guidance that comes through divine FOREORDINATION.

The LDS position is based in part on the teachings of Paul that God “will render to every man according to his deeds” and that “there is no respect of persons with God” (Rom. 2:6, 11). These two principles provide a basis for understanding Paul’s use of the term “predestination.” The term apparently connoted “to be ordained beforehand for godly labor.” In the sense that one’s potential or calling has been recognized and declared, this interpretation conforms with the Greek term Paul used, proorizō, and does not denote an irreversible or irresistible predetermination.

California Mission meeting by the Cliff House, near San Francisco, May 1897, Mission President Ephraim H. Nye speaking. Latter-day Saints strive to preach the gospel in every land, in every place, and to every person.

Latter-day Saints are to “look unto God in every thought” (D&C 6:36), because no person can save himself. But neither can God redeem anyone without that person’s effort and collaboration. All are free to accept or reject God’s help and powers of redemption. It is clearly taught in scripture that with his help both justification and sanctification will be “just and true” (D&C 20:30). “But there is a possibility that man may fall from grace and depart from the living God; therefore let the church take heed, and pray always, lest they fall into temptation; yea, and even let those who are sanctified take heed also” (D&C 20:32, 33).

RICHARD D. DRAPER

---

PRE-EXISTENCE (PRE-EARTHLY EXISTENCE)

[The term “pre-existence,” or more accurately, “premortal existence,” refers to a period of individual conscious and accountable life before birth into mortality on this earth. It is Latter-day Saint doctrine that living things existed as individual spirit beings and possessed varying degrees of intelligence in an active, conscious spirit state before mortal birth and that the spirit continues to live and function in the mortal body. The revelations teach that premortal spirit bodies have general resemblance to their physical counterparts.]

Articles pertaining to the premortal existence are Animals; Birth; Council in Heaven; Devils; First Estate; Forcordination; God the Father; Intelligences; Jehovah; Jesus Christ: Firstborn in the Spirit; Mother in Heaven; Premortal Life; Soul; Spirit; Spirit Body; War in Heaven.]

---

PREMARITAL SEX

Throughout the centuries, the Lord has declared very clearly that sexual relations outside of marriage are sin (cf. Ex. 20:14; Deut. 5:18; 22:13–30; 2 Sam. 13:12; Matt. 5:27–30; 19:18; Acts 15:20; 21:25; 1 Cor. 5:1; 6:18–20; Alma 39:3–6; D&C 42:22–26). In like manner, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints teaches that premarital sex is sin and counsels its members to abstain from it. Recognizing that the “new morality,” which advocates that consenting partners may do whatever their appetites urge them to do, is nothing more than the “old immorality,” the Church rejects the popular view that sex before marriage is not sinful and is justifiable as “normal and natural.” Rather, the Church teaches that sex should be a sacred expression of love between a husband and wife and that both men and women should abstain from sexual activity until their marriage. It teaches that sex before marriage is an expression of lust, not love, and admonishes its members not to participate in it or in any other kinds of activities that excite sexual desires. The Church teaches that those who have participated in premarital sex may repent of their sin, reminding them that true repentance requires that they abstain from sexual relations except with their legal spouse.

[See also Chastity; Marriage; Repentance.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. The Miracle of Forgiveness, pp. 213–32. Salt Lake City, 1969.

H. REESE HANSEN

---

PREMORTAL LIFE

Prior to mortal BIRTH individuals existed as men and women in a spirit state and thus coexisted with both the Father and the Son. That period of life is also referred to as the FIRST ESTATE or PRE-EXISTENCE.

The Bible presents the concept that mankind had a preparation period prior to mortal birth. The Lord said to Jeremiah: “Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations” (Jer. 1:5), and the “Preacher” asserted “The spirit shall return unto God who gave it” (Eccl. 12:7). In other scriptures, such as Alma 13:3, it is written that priests were “called and prepared from the foundation of the world according to the foreknowledge of God, on account of their exceeding faith and good works.”

There is indeed indication that the INTELLIGENCE dwelling in each person is coeternal with God. It always existed and never was created or respect of persons with God" (Rom. 2:6, 11). These two principles provide a basis for understanding Paul's use of the term "predestination." The term apparently connoted "to be ordained beforehand for godly labor." In the sense that one's potential or calling has been recognized and declared, this interpretation conforms with the Greek term Paul used, proorizō, and does not denote an irreversible or irresistible predetermination.

Latter-day Saints are to "look unto God in every thought" (D&C 6:36), because no person can save himself. But neither can God redeem anyone without that person's effort and collaboration. All are free to accept or reject God's help and powers of redemption. It is clearly taught in scripture that with his help both justification and sanctification will be "just and true" (D&C 20:30). "But there is a possibility that man may fall from grace and depart from the living God; therefore let the church take heed, and pray always, lest they fall into temptation; yea, and even let those who are sanctified take heed also" (D&C 20:32, 33).

RICHARD D. DRAPER

---

PRE-EXISTENCE (PRE-EARTHLY EXISTENCE)

[The term "pre-existence," or more accurately, "premortal existence," refers to a period of individual conscious and accountable life before birth into mortality on this earth. It is Latter-day Saint doctrine that living things existed as individual spirit beings and possessed varying degrees of intelligence in an active, conscious spirit state before mortal birth and that the spirit continues to live and function in the mortal body. The revelations teach that premortal spirit bodies have general resemblance to their physical counterparts.]

Articles pertaining to the premortal existence are Animals; Birth; Council in Heaven; Devils; First Estate; Forcordination; God the Father; Intelligences; Jehovah; Jesus Christ: Firstborn in the Spirit; Mother in Heaven; Premortal Life; Soul; Spirit; Spirit Body; War in Heaven.]

---

PREMARITAL SEX

Throughout the centuries, the Lord has declared very clearly that sexual relations outside of marriage are sin (cf. Ex. 20:14; Deut. 5:18; 22:13–30; 2 Sam. 13:12; Matt. 5:27–30; 19:18; Acts 15:20; 21:25; 1 Cor. 5:1; 6:18–20; Alma 39:3–6; D&C 42:22–26). In like manner, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints teaches that premarital sex is sin and counsels its members to abstain from it. Recognizing that the "new morality," which advocates that consenting partners may do whatever their appetites urge them to do, is nothing more than the "old immorality," the Church rejects the popular view that sex before marriage is not sinful and is justifiable as "normal and natural." Rather, the Church teaches that sex should be a sacred expression of love between a husband and wife and that both men and women should abstain from sexual activity until their marriage. It teaches that sex before marriage is an expression of lust, not love, and admonishes its members not to participate in it or in any other kinds of activities that excite sexual desires. The Church teaches that those who have participated in premarital sex may repent of their sin, reminding them that true repentance requires that they abstain from sexual relations except with their legal spouse.

[See also Chastity; Marriage; Repentance.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. The Miracle of Forgiveness, pp. 213–32. Salt Lake City, 1969.

H. REESE HANSEN

---

PREMORTAL LIFE

Prior to mortal BIRTH individuals existed as men and women in a spirit state and thus coexisted with both the Father and the Son. That period of life is also referred to as the FIRST ESTATE or PRE-EXISTENCE.

The Bible presents the concept that mankind had a preparation period prior to mortal birth. The Lord said to Jeremiah: "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations" (Jer. 1:5), and the "Preacher" asserted "The spirit shall return unto God who gave it" (Eccl. 12:7). In other scriptures, such as Alma 13:3, it is written that priests were "called and prepared from the foundation of the world according to the foreknowledge of God, on account of their exceeding faith and good works."

There is indeed indication that the INTELLIGENCE dwelling in each person is coeternal with God. It always existed and never was created or respect of persons with God" (Rom. 2:6, 11). These two principles provide a basis for understanding Paul's use of the term "predestination." The term apparently connoted "to be ordained beforehand for godly labor." In the sense that one's potential or calling has been recognized and declared, this interpretation conforms with the Greek term Paul used, proorizō, and does not denote an irreversible or irresistible predetermination.

Latter-day Saints are to "look unto God in every thought" (D&C 6:36), because no person can save himself. But neither can God redeem anyone without that person's effort and collaboration. All are free to accept or reject God's help and powers of redemption. It is clearly taught in scripture that with his help both justification and sanctification will be "just and true" (D&C 20:30). "But there is a possibility that man may fall from grace and depart from the living God; therefore let the church take heed, and pray always, lest they fall into temptation; yea, and even let those who are sanctified take heed also" (D&C 20:32, 33).

RICHARD D. DRAPER

---

PRE-EXISTENCE (PRE-EARTHLY EXISTENCE)

[The term "pre-existence," or more accurately, "premortal existence," refers to a period of individual conscious and accountable life before birth into mortality on this earth. It is Latter-day Saint doctrine that living things existed as individual spirit beings and possessed varying degrees of intelligence in an active, conscious spirit state before mortal birth and that the spirit continues to live and function in the mortal body. The revelations teach that premortal spirit bodies have general resemblance to their physical counterparts.]

Articles pertaining to the premortal existence are Animals; Birth; Council in Heaven; Devils; First Estate; Forcordination; God the Father; Intelligences; Jehovah; Jesus Christ: Firstborn in the Spirit; Mother in Heaven; Premortal Life; Soul; Spirit; Spirit Body; War in Heaven.]

---

PREMARITAL SEX

Throughout the centuries, the Lord has declared very clearly that sexual relations outside of marriage are sin (cf. Ex. 20:14; Deut. 5:18; 22:13–30; 2 Sam. 13:12; Matt. 5:27–30; 19:18; Acts 15:20; 21:25; 1 Cor. 5:1; 6:18–20; Alma 39:3–6; D&C 42:22–26). In like manner, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints teaches that premarital sex is sin and counsels its members to abstain from it. Recognizing that the "new morality," which advocates that consenting partners may do whatever their appetites urge them to do, is nothing more than the "old immorality," the Church rejects the popular view that sex before marriage is not sinful and is justifiable as "normal and natural." Rather, the Church teaches that sex should be a sacred expression of love between a husband and wife and that both men and women should abstain from sexual activity until their marriage. It teaches that sex before marriage is an expression of lust, not love, and admonishes its members not to participate in it or in any other kinds of activities that excite sexual desires. The Church teaches that those who have participated in premarital sex may repent of their sin, reminding them that true repentance requires that they abstain from sexual relations except with their legal spouse.

[See also Chastity; Marriage; Repentance.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. The Miracle of Forgiveness, pp. 213–32. Salt Lake City, 1969.

H. REESE HANSEN

---

PREMORTAL LIFE

Prior to mortal BIRTH individuals existed as men and women in a spirit state and thus coexisted with both the Father and the Son. That period of life is also referred to as the FIRST ESTATE or PRE-EXISTENCE.

The Bible presents the concept that mankind had a preparation period prior to mortal birth. The Lord said to Jeremiah: "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations" (Jer. 1:5), and the "Preacher" asserted "The spirit shall return unto God who gave it" (Eccl. 12:7). In other scriptures, such as Alma 13:3, it is written that priests were "called and prepared from the foundation of the world according to the foreknowledge of God, on account of their exceeding faith and good works."

There is indeed indication that the INTELLIGENCE dwelling in each person is coeternal with God. It always existed and never was created or respect of persons with God” (Rom. 2:6, 11). These two principles provide a basis for understanding Paul’s use of the term “predestination.” The term apparently connoted “to be ordained beforehand for godly labor.” In the sense that one’s potential or calling has been recognized and declared, this interpretation conforms with the Greek term Paul used, proorizō, and does not denote an irreversible or irresistible predetermination.

Latter-day Saints are to “look unto God in every thought” (D&C 6:36), because no person can save himself. But neither can God redeem anyone without that person’s effort and collaboration. All are free to accept or reject God’s help and powers of redemption. It is clearly taught in scripture that with his help both justification and sanctification will be “just and true” (D&C 20:30). “But there is a possibility that man may fall from grace and depart from the living God; therefore let the church take heed, and pray always, lest they fall into temptation; yea, and even let those who are sanctified take heed also” (D&C 20:32, 33).

RICHARD D. DRAPER

---

PRE-EXISTENCE (PRE-EARTHLY EXISTENCE)

[The term “pre-existence,” or more accurately, “premortal existence,” refers to a period of individual conscious and accountable life before birth into mortality on this earth. It is Latter-day Saint doctrine that living things existed as individual spirit beings and possessed varying degrees of intelligence in an active, conscious spirit state before mortal birth and that the spirit continues to live and function in the mortal body. The revelations teach that premortal spirit bodies have general resemblance to their physical counterparts.]

Articles pertaining to the premortal existence are Animals; Birth; Council in Heaven; Devils; First Estate; Forcordination; God the Father; Intelligences; Jehovah; Jesus Christ: Firstborn in the Spirit; Mother in Heaven; Premortal Life; Soul; Spirit; Spirit Body; War in Heaven.]

---

PREMARITAL SEX

Throughout the centuries, the Lord has declared very clearly that sexual relations outside of marriage are sin (cf. Ex. 20:14; Deut. 5:18; 22:13–30; 2 Sam. 13:12; Matt. 5:27–30; 19:18; Acts 15:20; 21:25; 1 Cor. 5:1; 6:18–20; Alma 39:3–6; D&C 42:22–26). In like manner, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints teaches that premarital sex is sin and counsels its members to abstain from it. Recognizing that the “new morality,” which advocates that consenting partners may do whatever their appetites urge them to do, is nothing more than the “old immorality,” the Church rejects the popular view that sex before marriage is not sinful and is justifiable as “normal and natural.” Rather, the Church teaches that sex should be a sacred expression of love between a husband and wife and that both men and women should abstain from sexual activity until their marriage. It teaches that sex before marriage is an expression of lust, not love, and admonishes its members not to participate in it or in any other kinds of activities that excite sexual desires. The Church teaches that those who have participated in premarital sex may repent of their sin, reminding them that true repentance requires that they abstain from sexual relations except with their legal spouse.

[See also Chastity; Marriage; Repentance.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kimball, Spencer W. The Miracle of Forgiveness, pp. 213–32. Salt Lake City, 1969.

H. REESE HANSEN

---

PREMORTAL LIFE

Prior to mortal BIRTH individuals existed as men and women in a spirit state and thus coexisted with both the Father and the Son. That period of life is also referred to as the FIRST ESTATE or PRE-EXISTENCE.

The Bible presents the concept that mankind had a preparation period prior to mortal birth. The Lord said to Jeremiah: “Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations” (Jer. 1:5), and the “Preacher” asserted “The spirit shall return unto God who gave it” (Eccl. 12:7). In other scriptures, such as Alma 13:3, it is written that priests were “called and prepared from the foundation of the world according to the foreknowledge of God, on account of their exceeding faith and good works.”

There is indeed indication that the INTELLIGENCE dwelling in each person is coeternal with God. It always existed and never was created or made (D&C 93:29). In due time that intelligence was given a SPIRIT BODY, becoming the spirit child of God the Eternal Father and his beloved companion, the MOTHER IN HEAVEN. This spirit, inhabited by the eternal intelligence, took the form of its creators and is in their image (Ballard, p. 140).

To the Prophet Joseph SMITH it was revealed that we are all literal spirit sons and daughters of heavenly parents. He received a revelation of information once made known to Moses: "I [God] made the world, and men before they were in the flesh" (Moses 6:51). This likewise reflects the implication in Numbers 16:22 that God is the Father of all, and hence he is "the God of the spirits of all flesh."

Intelligences were organized before the world was, and among these were many great and noble ones, such as Abraham and Moses. God stood in their midst, saw that they were good, and chose them for responsibilities on earth and throughout eternity (Abr. 3:21–23). Jesus, the firstborn spirit, was preeminent among them. "Jesus . . . existed with the Father prior to birth in the flesh; and . . . in the pre-existent state He was chosen and ordained to be the one and only Savior and Redeemer of the human race" (JC, p. 6).

Revelation indicates that all things, even the earth itself, had a spirit existence before the physical creation. Elder Joseph Fielding SMITH wrote, "Not only has man a spirit, and is thereby a living soul, but likewise the beasts of the field, the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea have spirits, and hence are living souls. . . . The fish, the fowl, the beasts of the field lived before they were placed naturally in this earth, and so did the plants that are upon the face of the earth. The spirits that possess the bodies of the animals are in the similitude of their bodies" (DS 1:63–64). The biblical passage that says the Lord God made "every plant of the field before it was in this earth, and every herb of the field before it grew" (Gen. 2:5) is clarified in a parallel scripture with the words: "For I, the Lord God, created all things, of which I have spoken, spiritually before they were naturally upon the face of the earth . . . and I, the Lord God, had created all the children of men and not yet a man to till the ground; for in heaven created I them" (Moses 3:5).

The Prophet Joseph Smith taught that "God himself, finding he was in the midst of spirits and glory, because he was more intelligent, saw proper to institute laws whereby the rest [of the intelligences] could have a privilege to advance like himself" (TPJS, p. 354). His plan included sending his sons and daughters to earth (the SECOND ESTATE), to obtain a body of flesh and bones and learn by experience through earthly vicissitudes, with no memory of the first estate and with the agency to fail or succeed.

In a council in heaven to preview earth life, the Lord called before him his spirit children and presented the PLAN OF SALVATION by which they would come to this earth, partake of mortal life with physical bodies, pass through a probation in mortality, and progress to a higher exaltation. The matter was discussed as to how, and upon what principle, the salvation, exaltation, and eternal glory of God's sons and daughters would be brought about (cf. DS 1:58). The Firstborn of God volunteered to implement the plan of salvation (Abr. 3:27). Lucifer, who was also a son of the Father, came forward with a counterproposal: "Behold, send me, I will be thy Son, and I will redeem all mankind, that not one soul shall be lost and surely I will do it; wherefore, give me thine honor" (Moses 4:1). Already of exalted status, Lucifer sought to aggrandize himself without regard to the rights and agency of others, seeking to destroy the agency of man (JC, p. 7–8). The Father said, "I will send the first" (Abr. 3:27).

This decision led the hosts of heaven to take sides, and a third part rose in rebellion and, with Lucifer, were cast out of heaven. "They were denied the privilege of being born into this world and receiving mortal bodies. . . . The Lord cast them out into the earth, where they became the tempters of mankind" (DS 1:65; cf. Jude 1:6).

Elder James E. Talmage wrote, "The offer of the firstborn Son to establish through His own ministry among men the gospel of salvation, and to sacrifice himself, through labor, humiliation and suffering even unto death, was accepted and made the foreordained plan of man's redemption from death, of his eventual salvation from the effects of sin, and of his possible exaltation through righteous achievement" (JC, p. 18). Elder Joseph Fielding Smith explained, "God gave his children their free agency even in the spirit world, by which the individual spirits had the privilege, just as men have here, of choosing the good and rejecting the evil, or partaking of the evil to suffer the consequences of their sins" (p. 318–19).

The Book of Mormon prophet ALMA<sub>2</sub> further explains the opportunities presented to the spirit children of God in the premortal existence: "In the first place being left to choose good or evil; therefore they having chosen good and exercising exceedingly great faith, are called with a holy calling . . . on account of their faith, while others would reject the Spirit of God on account of the hardness of their hearts and blindness of their minds, while, if it had not been for this they might have had as great privilege as their brethren. Or in fine, in the first place they were on the same standing with their brethren; thus this holy calling being prepared from the foundation of the world for such as would not harden their hearts, being in and through the atonement of the Only Begotten Son" (Alma 13:3–5; emphasis added). The "first place" here refers to one's first estate or premortal existence.

The doctrine of FOREORDINATION suggested in the above passage is understood to mean that many may come to earth with preassigned callings and responsibilities. The Prophet Joseph Smith taught, "Every man who has a calling to minister to the inhabitants of the world was ordained to that very purpose in the Grand Council of heaven before this world was" (TPJS, p. 365). Abraham was shown the noble and great premortal spirits, and the Lord said to him, "Thou art one of them; thou wast chosen before thou wast born" (Abr. 3:22–23). The apocryphal book of Tobit also suggests the concept that in a premortal life there were assignments that could affect mortality (6:17). However, even though some may be foreordained to special missions on earth, Elder Joseph Fielding Smith stated that "no person was foreordained or appointed to sin or to perform a mission of evil" (DS 1:61). Foreordinations and appointments do not proscribe one's agency or free will.

The character of one's life in the SPIRIT WORLD probably influences disposition and desires in mortal life. From among those who were the noble and great ones in that former world, the Lord selected those to be his prophets and rulers on earth in the second estate, for he knew them before they were born, and he knows who will be likely to serve him in mortality. Characteristics of the spirit, which were developed during experiences of the former existence, may play an important part in man's progression through mortal life (cf. DS 1:60). "Even before they [the prophets] were born, they, with many others, received their first lessons in the world of spirits and were prepared to come forth in the due time of the Lord to labor in his vineyard for the salvation of souls of men" (D&C 138:56).

This concept that God's spirit children developed some characteristic capabilities, but yet come to earth in forgetfulness, is similar to that expressed in Wordsworth's "Ode, Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood": "Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting; . . . Trailing clouds of glory do we come from God, who is our home" (verses 58, 64–65). Elder Orson Hyde, an apostle, declared that lack of memory does not mean that mankind did not have a premortal life. He explained that many people leave their homeland to live in another country, yet after a number of years memory of that earlier country can be almost obliterated as though it never existed. "We have forgotten! . . . But our forgetfulness cannot alter the facts" (JD 7:315).

Thus, to Latter-day Saints premortal life is characterized by individuality, agency, intelligence, and opportunity for ETERNAL PROGRESSION. It is a central doctrine of the theology of the Church and provides understanding to the age-old question "Whence cometh man?"

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ballard, Melvin J. Sermons and Missionary Services of Melvin J. Ballard, comp. Bryant S. Hinckley, p. 140. Salt Lake City, 1949.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. "Is Man Immortal?" IE 19 (Feb. 1916):318–19.

GAYLE OBLAD BROWN

---

PRESIDENCY, CONCEPT OF

The administrative/leadership CALLING of presidency is part of the presiding structure at all levels in virtually every unit of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. A presidency generally consists of the president (or BISHOP) and two counselors, with assistance from secretaries and/or CLERKS. Presidencies are responsible for all members and programs within their organizational jurisdiction and range from the FIRST PRESIDENCY of the Church to a presidency of a small priesthood quorum or class.

Presidents are usually called by the next higher level in the ORGANIZATION, and their calling is "sustained" by COMMON CONSENT of the group over which they will preside. Counselors are children of God in the premortal existence: "In the first place being left to choose good or evil; therefore they having chosen good and exercising exceedingly great faith, are called with a holy calling . . . on account of their faith, while others would reject the Spirit of God on account of the hardness of their hearts and blindness of their minds, while, if it had not been for this they might have had as great privilege as their brethren. Or in fine, in the first place they were on the same standing with their brethren; thus this holy calling being prepared from the foundation of the world for such as would not harden their hearts, being in and through the atonement of the Only Begotten Son" (Alma 13:3–5; emphasis added). The "first place" here refers to one's first estate or premortal existence.

The doctrine of FOREORDINATION suggested in the above passage is understood to mean that many may come to earth with preassigned callings and responsibilities. The Prophet Joseph Smith taught, "Every man who has a calling to minister to the inhabitants of the world was ordained to that very purpose in the Grand Council of heaven before this world was" (TPJS, p. 365). Abraham was shown the noble and great premortal spirits, and the Lord said to him, "Thou art one of them; thou wast chosen before thou wast born" (Abr. 3:22–23). The apocryphal book of Tobit also suggests the concept that in a premortal life there were assignments that could affect mortality (6:17). However, even though some may be foreordained to special missions on earth, Elder Joseph Fielding Smith stated that "no person was foreordained or appointed to sin or to perform a mission of evil" (DS 1:61). Foreordinations and appointments do not proscribe one's agency or free will.

The character of one's life in the SPIRIT WORLD probably influences disposition and desires in mortal life. From among those who were the noble and great ones in that former world, the Lord selected those to be his prophets and rulers on earth in the second estate, for he knew them before they were born, and he knows who will be likely to serve him in mortality. Characteristics of the spirit, which were developed during experiences of the former existence, may play an important part in man's progression through mortal life (cf. DS 1:60). "Even before they [the prophets] were born, they, with many others, received their first lessons in the world of spirits and were prepared to come forth in the due time of the Lord to labor in his vineyard for the salvation of souls of men" (D&C 138:56).

This concept that God's spirit children developed some characteristic capabilities, but yet come to earth in forgetfulness, is similar to that expressed in Wordsworth's "Ode, Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood": "Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting; . . . Trailing clouds of glory do we come from God, who is our home" (verses 58, 64–65). Elder Orson Hyde, an apostle, declared that lack of memory does not mean that mankind did not have a premortal life. He explained that many people leave their homeland to live in another country, yet after a number of years memory of that earlier country can be almost obliterated as though it never existed. "We have forgotten! . . . But our forgetfulness cannot alter the facts" (JD 7:315).

Thus, to Latter-day Saints premortal life is characterized by individuality, agency, intelligence, and opportunity for ETERNAL PROGRESSION. It is a central doctrine of the theology of the Church and provides understanding to the age-old question "Whence cometh man?"

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ballard, Melvin J. Sermons and Missionary Services of Melvin J. Ballard, comp. Bryant S. Hinckley, p. 140. Salt Lake City, 1949.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. "Is Man Immortal?" IE 19 (Feb. 1916):318–19.

GAYLE OBLAD BROWN

---

PRESIDENCY, CONCEPT OF

The administrative/leadership CALLING of presidency is part of the presiding structure at all levels in virtually every unit of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. A presidency generally consists of the president (or BISHOP) and two counselors, with assistance from secretaries and/or CLERKS. Presidencies are responsible for all members and programs within their organizational jurisdiction and range from the FIRST PRESIDENCY of the Church to a presidency of a small priesthood quorum or class.

Presidents are usually called by the next higher level in the ORGANIZATION, and their calling is "sustained" by COMMON CONSENT of the group over which they will preside. Counselors are then nominated by the president, but are likewise approved and called by the higher level. They are designated first and second counselors to establish relative AUTHORITY and areas of responsibility. The president makes specific assignments to counselors, but in general they assist and support the president in gathering information, analyzing problems, making decisions, and implementing programs.

Decision making in a presidency is not a democratic voting process. The counselors sit in council with the president and give counsel, but the president is responsible to make decisions and to work for unanimity if it has not already been reached. Counselors are similar to a vice-president or assistant administrator except that they do not have independent decision-making power for organizational subunits. The two most common presidencies in the Church, the STAKE PRESIDENCY and the ward BISHOPRIC, call or release all individuals in positions under their jurisdiction, usually in consultation with the appropriate PRIESTHOOD QUORUM or AUXILIARY presidency. When a president is released, the counselors are automatically also released.

A statement representative of the responsibilities of a president contained in the DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS includes sitting in council with members, teaching them, edifying them, and presiding over the organization (D&C 107:79–95). The LDS presidency model ensures that no one administrator is responsible alone but always has others who share the burden and perspective of the office and in most matters can act in the president's absence. The authority of the president is clear, but the shared responsibility adds strength and assistance and provides an opportunity for individual development, which is helpful for future leadership.

J. BONNER RITCHIE

---

PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH

The President of the Church is the PROPHET, SEER, AND REVELATOR who is authorized to direct the affairs of the Church throughout the earth. He speaks and acts under divine guidance from Jesus Christ, who is the HEAD OF THE CHURCH. Presidents of the Church to 1991 have been Joseph SMITH, Brigham YOUNG, John TAYLOR, Wilford WOODRUFF, Lorenzo SNOW, Joseph F. SMITH,

Heber J. GRANT, George Albert SMITH, David O. MCKAY, Joseph Fielding SMITH, Harold B. LEE, Spencer W. KIMBALL, and Ezra Taft BENSON.

In principle and in practice, no other office or calling elicits the same love and respect from Church members as the President of the Church. The President is the PROPHET and, as such, is revered by the members of the Church. He is the only person in the Church who may direct and authorize all uses of the KEYS OF THE PRIESTHOOD. He is the chief administrative officer in the Church, assisted by his counselors in the FIRST PRESIDENCY and the members of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. They direct the work of other GENERAL AUTHORITIES and the lay leaders of the Church serving in hundreds of callings.

The Doctrine and Covenants specifies that the President's duty is "to be like unto Moses" (D&C 107:91–92; 28:2), relaying the will of God to his people and teaching them the gospel. His work is somewhat analogous to that of PETER, who presided over the APOSTLES and the early Christian Church. In response to Peter's affirmation that Jesus was the son of God, Jesus pointed out that the testimony had been divinely revealed to Peter, saying, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16:13–20). Latter-day Saints understand the "rock" to be the divine REVELATION through which ancient and modern prophets have directed the membership of Christ's Church (TPJS, p. 274).

Latter-day Saints believe that there is need for revealed knowledge from God to direct the affairs of the Church and provide insight into God's will today just as there was anciently. Revelations to the President of the Church may include declaration or clarification of doctrines or direction concerning theological issues, organizational matters, moral conduct, and practical administration. The unity of the Church worldwide is enhanced by the prophet of the Church as God's spokesperson. As such, the President may speak authoritatively on such matters as scriptural interpretation, spiritual concerns, and temporal issues. His official statements in his time may take precedence over revelations in scripture pertinent to other times or over statements by previous presidents of the Church, though in fact these rarely are in conflict (cf. Benson, pp. 27–28).

The President possesses the inspired capacity to discern between truth and error for the Church. Consequently, he may recognize and denounce then nominated by the president, but are likewise approved and called by the higher level. They are designated first and second counselors to establish relative AUTHORITY and areas of responsibility. The president makes specific assignments to counselors, but in general they assist and support the president in gathering information, analyzing problems, making decisions, and implementing programs.

Decision making in a presidency is not a democratic voting process. The counselors sit in council with the president and give counsel, but the president is responsible to make decisions and to work for unanimity if it has not already been reached. Counselors are similar to a vice-president or assistant administrator except that they do not have independent decision-making power for organizational subunits. The two most common presidencies in the Church, the STAKE PRESIDENCY and the ward BISHOPRIC, call or release all individuals in positions under their jurisdiction, usually in consultation with the appropriate PRIESTHOOD QUORUM or AUXILIARY presidency. When a president is released, the counselors are automatically also released.

A statement representative of the responsibilities of a president contained in the DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS includes sitting in council with members, teaching them, edifying them, and presiding over the organization (D&C 107:79–95). The LDS presidency model ensures that no one administrator is responsible alone but always has others who share the burden and perspective of the office and in most matters can act in the president's absence. The authority of the president is clear, but the shared responsibility adds strength and assistance and provides an opportunity for individual development, which is helpful for future leadership.

J. BONNER RITCHIE

---

PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH

The President of the Church is the PROPHET, SEER, AND REVELATOR who is authorized to direct the affairs of the Church throughout the earth. He speaks and acts under divine guidance from Jesus Christ, who is the HEAD OF THE CHURCH. Presidents of the Church to 1991 have been Joseph SMITH, Brigham YOUNG, John TAYLOR, Wilford WOODRUFF, Lorenzo SNOW, Joseph F. SMITH,

Heber J. GRANT, George Albert SMITH, David O. MCKAY, Joseph Fielding SMITH, Harold B. LEE, Spencer W. KIMBALL, and Ezra Taft BENSON.

In principle and in practice, no other office or calling elicits the same love and respect from Church members as the President of the Church. The President is the PROPHET and, as such, is revered by the members of the Church. He is the only person in the Church who may direct and authorize all uses of the KEYS OF THE PRIESTHOOD. He is the chief administrative officer in the Church, assisted by his counselors in the FIRST PRESIDENCY and the members of the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. They direct the work of other GENERAL AUTHORITIES and the lay leaders of the Church serving in hundreds of callings.

The Doctrine and Covenants specifies that the President's duty is "to be like unto Moses" (D&C 107:91–92; 28:2), relaying the will of God to his people and teaching them the gospel. His work is somewhat analogous to that of PETER, who presided over the APOSTLES and the early Christian Church. In response to Peter's affirmation that Jesus was the son of God, Jesus pointed out that the testimony had been divinely revealed to Peter, saying, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16:13–20). Latter-day Saints understand the "rock" to be the divine REVELATION through which ancient and modern prophets have directed the membership of Christ's Church (TPJS, p. 274).

Latter-day Saints believe that there is need for revealed knowledge from God to direct the affairs of the Church and provide insight into God's will today just as there was anciently. Revelations to the President of the Church may include declaration or clarification of doctrines or direction concerning theological issues, organizational matters, moral conduct, and practical administration. The unity of the Church worldwide is enhanced by the prophet of the Church as God's spokesperson. As such, the President may speak authoritatively on such matters as scriptural interpretation, spiritual concerns, and temporal issues. His official statements in his time may take precedence over revelations in scripture pertinent to other times or over statements by previous presidents of the Church, though in fact these rarely are in conflict (cf. Benson, pp. 27–28).

The President possesses the inspired capacity to discern between truth and error for the Church. Consequently, he may recognize and denounce mistaken beliefs and movements within the Church and in the world. While it is understood that he may at times speak or act as a private person outside his calling as prophet (TPJS, p. 278), the general view is that the counsel of the President of the Church is always to be taken seriously.

This painted tin sign (4" × 14") marked the office of Joseph Smith in his Red Brick Store in Nauvoo, Illinois, 1842–1844. It reads "Joseph Smith's Office. President of the church of JESUS Christ of LATTER day Saints." The Church President is trustee of the Church's worldwide activities, involving extensive Church services, charitable and missionary activities, financial interests, and concern for the well-being of all Church members.

Whenever new doctrines are to be introduced, they are first presented by the President to his counselors and then to the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles in a meeting of the COUNCIL OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY AND THE QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. If unanimously approved, they are then presented to the membership of the Church at a general conference for a sustaining vote.

Latter-day Saints are counseled that following the prophet is wise, even in personal matters (see FOLLOWING THE BRETHREN). The President of the Church, as prophet, will never be allowed by the Lord to lead members of the Church into apostasy or error (D&C, Official Declaration—1).

The President of the Church is the only person on earth who directs the use of all the keys of the priesthood, though these keys are held also by the ordained apostles and are directed by their quorum upon the death of the President and until a new First Presidency is organized. This means that the President holds the power and authority to govern and direct all of the Lord's affairs on earth in the Church. All worthy males in the Church who are twelve years of age or older may also be given privileges and powers appropriate to various offices of the priesthood, but every act performed under this AUTHORITY must be exercised in the proper way. The power to direct these acts at any level is called the keys of the priesthood. Although all the keys are exercised by the President alone, he delegates the use of some of them to other leaders under his direction. The authority to perform ordinances and teach the gospel comes from the Lord, but the orderly use thereof is regulated by those holding keys given to Joseph Smith and passed on to his successors (D&C 1:38; 28:2; see also MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF).

Instituted through revelation, the position or calling of President of the Church has developed together with the ORGANIZATION of the Church as a whole. Prior to the official ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH in 1830, Joseph Smith held the central leadership role as prophet of the RESTORATION. In a revelation given on May 15, 1829, Joseph Smith was instructed that he and Oliver COWDERY should be ordained the first and second ELDERS when the Church was formally organized (JS—H 1:72). This took place on April 6, 1830.

During the organizational meeting, Joseph Smith received a revelation in which he was given the titles of seer, translator, prophet, apostle of Jesus Christ, and elder of the Church of Jesus Christ. He was also told how to lay the foundation of the Church (D&C 21:1–2). Those present at the first meeting voted unanimously to accept Joseph Smith as first elder and prophet. At this meeting the fundamental precedent for Church government was established: Callings, including that of prophet, require that the mind and will of God be made manifest and that the will and consent of the people to abide by it be indicated through a sustaining vote (see COMMON CONSENT).

While the Church was in its early years, Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, and a small group of elders met quarterly and made basic policy decisions for the Church. In September 1830 the uniqueness of Joseph Smith's position in the Church was affirmed when Hiram Page, a member of the Church, claimed to have received revelations for the Church. Joseph Smith inquired of the Lord and received a clarifying revelation that he alone was to receive commandments and revelations for the entire Church (D&C 28:2, 11–14).

In January 1832, at a small conference of elders in Amherst, Ohio, Joseph Smith was sustained as President of the High Priesthood and ordained to that office by Sidney RIGDON. In March of that same year, the office of President of the Church was further elaborated by the announcement of the organization of a Presidency to consist of a President and counselors (D&C 81:1–3). On April 26, 1832, a general conference of the Church was held in Jackson County, Missouri, where Joseph Smith was sustained and acknowledged as President of the High Priesthood.

Presidents of the Church serve for life and are not released because of age or health. The authority to designate a successor, after receiving revelation from the Lord, rests in the hands of the Twelve, who meet for that purpose after the death of the President. Once a new president has been designated and approved by the unanimous vote of the apostles, he selects his counselors, who are also sustained by the Twelve. These actions are then sustained by the Church membership at the next general conference.

The procedures of SUCCESSION IN THE PRESIDENCY have developed gradually since the organization of the Church. After the Prophet Joseph Smith was assassinated, some members thought his counselor, or even his son, should be his successor; but the Twelve knew that they held the keys and that the senior apostle should preside. Accordingly, Brigham Young, the president of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, led the Church from that position for three and a half years until he was installed and sustained with counselors as a First Presidency. The next two Presidents were also ordained after about the same lapse of time; but since 1898 the succession process has been invoked without delay after the death of a President.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B., and Glen M. Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City, 1976.
- Benson, Ezra Taft. "Fourteen Fundamentals in Following the Prophet." In 1980 Devotional Speeches of the Year. Provo, Utah, 1981.
- Esplin, Ronald K. "Joseph, Brigham and the Twelve: A Succession of Continuity." BYU Studies 21 (Summer 1981):301–341.
- Kimball, Spencer W. "We Thank Thee, O God, for a Prophet: The Privilege of Sustaining the Leaders of the Church." Ensign 3 (Jan. 1973):33–35.
- Petersen, Mark E. "Follow the Prophets." Ensign 11 (Nov. 1981):64–66.
- Tanner, N. Eldon. "The Administration of the Church." Ensign 9 (Nov. 1979):42–48.

J. LYNN ENGLAND
W. KEITH WARNER

---

PRESIDING BISHOPRIC

The Presiding Bishopric consists of three men, the Presiding Bishop and his two counselors, who comprise one of the presiding councils of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. These GENERAL AUTHORITIES, who each hold the office of BISHOP, serve in their positions under the direct supervision of the FIRST PRESIDENCY. Since its formation, the Presiding Bishopric has been responsible for many of the temporal affairs of the Church. These have included involvement in receiving, distributing, and accounting for member tithes, offerings, and contributions; administration of programs to assist the poor and needy; design, construction, and maintenance of places of worship; and auditing and transferring records of membership (see BISHOP, HISTORY OF THE OFFICE; FINANCIAL CONTRIBUTIONS; RECORD KEEPING; WELFARE). Men chosen to be Presiding Bishops have been recognized for their business and management skills as well as their religious commitment. Historically, the Presiding Bishopric has presided over the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD. As General Authorities, members of the Presiding Bishopric regularly speak at general conferences, often specifically addressing the young men of the Church.

The Presiding Bishop is selected by the First Presidency and then approved by the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. He chooses two men to serve as his counselors, who are also approved by the First Presidency and the Quorum of the people to abide by it be indicated through a sustaining vote (see COMMON CONSENT).

While the Church was in its early years, Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, and a small group of elders met quarterly and made basic policy decisions for the Church. In September 1830 the uniqueness of Joseph Smith's position in the Church was affirmed when Hiram Page, a member of the Church, claimed to have received revelations for the Church. Joseph Smith inquired of the Lord and received a clarifying revelation that he alone was to receive commandments and revelations for the entire Church (D&C 28:2, 11–14).

In January 1832, at a small conference of elders in Amherst, Ohio, Joseph Smith was sustained as President of the High Priesthood and ordained to that office by Sidney RIGDON. In March of that same year, the office of President of the Church was further elaborated by the announcement of the organization of a Presidency to consist of a President and counselors (D&C 81:1–3). On April 26, 1832, a general conference of the Church was held in Jackson County, Missouri, where Joseph Smith was sustained and acknowledged as President of the High Priesthood.

Presidents of the Church serve for life and are not released because of age or health. The authority to designate a successor, after receiving revelation from the Lord, rests in the hands of the Twelve, who meet for that purpose after the death of the President. Once a new president has been designated and approved by the unanimous vote of the apostles, he selects his counselors, who are also sustained by the Twelve. These actions are then sustained by the Church membership at the next general conference.

The procedures of SUCCESSION IN THE PRESIDENCY have developed gradually since the organization of the Church. After the Prophet Joseph Smith was assassinated, some members thought his counselor, or even his son, should be his successor; but the Twelve knew that they held the keys and that the senior apostle should preside. Accordingly, Brigham Young, the president of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, led the Church from that position for three and a half years until he was installed and sustained with counselors as a First Presidency. The next two Presidents were also ordained after about the same lapse of time; but since 1898 the succession process has been invoked without delay after the death of a President.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Allen, James B., and Glen M. Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City, 1976.
- Benson, Ezra Taft. "Fourteen Fundamentals in Following the Prophet." In 1980 Devotional Speeches of the Year. Provo, Utah, 1981.
- Esplin, Ronald K. "Joseph, Brigham and the Twelve: A Succession of Continuity." BYU Studies 21 (Summer 1981):301–341.
- Kimball, Spencer W. "We Thank Thee, O God, for a Prophet: The Privilege of Sustaining the Leaders of the Church." Ensign 3 (Jan. 1973):33–35.
- Petersen, Mark E. "Follow the Prophets." Ensign 11 (Nov. 1981):64–66.
- Tanner, N. Eldon. "The Administration of the Church." Ensign 9 (Nov. 1979):42–48.

J. LYNN ENGLAND
W. KEITH WARNER

---

PRESIDING BISHOPRIC

The Presiding Bishopric consists of three men, the Presiding Bishop and his two counselors, who comprise one of the presiding councils of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. These GENERAL AUTHORITIES, who each hold the office of BISHOP, serve in their positions under the direct supervision of the FIRST PRESIDENCY. Since its formation, the Presiding Bishopric has been responsible for many of the temporal affairs of the Church. These have included involvement in receiving, distributing, and accounting for member tithes, offerings, and contributions; administration of programs to assist the poor and needy; design, construction, and maintenance of places of worship; and auditing and transferring records of membership (see BISHOP, HISTORY OF THE OFFICE; FINANCIAL CONTRIBUTIONS; RECORD KEEPING; WELFARE). Men chosen to be Presiding Bishops have been recognized for their business and management skills as well as their religious commitment. Historically, the Presiding Bishopric has presided over the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD. As General Authorities, members of the Presiding Bishopric regularly speak at general conferences, often specifically addressing the young men of the Church.

The Presiding Bishop is selected by the First Presidency and then approved by the QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. He chooses two men to serve as his counselors, who are also approved by the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve, and they are all then sustained by the Church membership. The Presiding Bishop and his counselors are set apart and empowered by the First Presidency and given the priesthood keys and authority to act in their respective offices. At first, Presiding Bishops held office for life, but in the twentieth century they have been released and replaced as circumstances and Church needs have dictated.

On February 4, 1831, the Prophet Joseph Smith called Edward Partridge to serve as the first bishop of the Church. Bishop Partridge was to spend the majority of his time managing the receipt, control, and disposition of the consecrated properties and of donations received by the Church (see CONSECRATION; FAST OFFERINGS; TITHING). He was to care for the poor and needy and to store surplus items for the future needs of the Church. After Bishop Partridge was called, it was revealed to Joseph Smith that other bishops would be chosen. On December 4, 1831, Newel K. Whitney was also called, by revelation (D&C 72:8), to serve as a bishop. The two bishops had different jurisdictions, Whitney in Ohio and Partridge in Missouri. In Nauvoo they both had a general jurisdiction but also supervised donations and the caring for the poor in a particular city WARD. In 1847, Newel K. Whitney was designated the first Presiding Bishop.

Throughout the history of the Church, the First Presidency has assigned Presiding Bishoprics extensive but varying responsibilities with the Aaronic Priesthood and the youth of the Church. In 1873 President Brigham Young assigned the Presiding Bishopric to organize full Aaronic PRIESTHOOD QUORUMS of priests, teachers, and deacons throughout the Church. In 1876 he clarified the Presiding Bishop's position as general president of the Aaronic Priesthood. In 1937 the Presiding Bishopric was assigned responsibility for the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association, and in 1946 for the Young Women's Mutual Improvement Association. These programs were designed to provide a balance of religious study, social skills, community awareness, and physical development for LDS youth (see YOUNG MEN; YOUNG WOMEN). Since 1977 the First Presidency has administered the Aaronic Priesthood programs directly through a Young Men's presidency called from the Quorums of the Seventy.

Prior to 1847, Bishops Partridge, Whitney, and Partridge's replacement, George Miller, served as general bishops to the Church. Presiding Bishops and their terms of service after 1847 have been Newel K. Whitney (1847–1851), Edward Hunter (1851–1883), William B. Preston (1884–1907), Charles W. Nibley (1907–1925), Sylvester Q. Cannon (1925–1938), LeGrand Richards (1938–1952), Joseph B. Wirthlin (1952–1961), John H. Vandenberg (1961–1972), Victor L. Brown (1972–1985), and Robert D. Hales (from 1985).

The Presiding Bishopric in 1947 (from left): first counselor Joseph L. Wirthlin, presiding bishop LeGrand Richards, and second counselor Thorpe B. Isaacson. Under the energetic leadership of Richards, the Presiding Bishopric improved record-keeping, youth programs, ward teaching, and management of Church properties and temporal affairs.

Until recent times, these men visited wards and stakes, conducted training sessions for bishops at general conferences, and published bulletins and training materials for bishops and local priesthood quorums. At the present time the Presiding Bishopric does not directly supervise other bishops or preside over local wards of the Church.

By scriptural designation the Presiding Bishopric, the First Presidency, and the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles constitute the Council on the Disposition of Tithes (D&C 120). This council monitors receipt of tithes and controls expenditure of funds. It meets periodically to consider matters of financial importance and to authorize budgets for Church organizations and departments (see FINANCES OF THE CHURCH). Members of the Presiding Bishopric, as appointed by the First Presidency, additionally serve on various other administrative, executive, and policy-determining committees and councils, such as the Appropriations Committee, General Welfare Services Committee, Priesthood Executive Council, Temple and Family History Executive Council, and the Missionary Executive Council (see ORGANIZATION: CONTEMPORARY).

In 1977 a major organizational restructuring took place within the Church under the direction of the First Presidency. With the significant growth in Church membership the Presiding Bishopric was assigned much broader responsibilities for temporal administration throughout the world. Under the direction of the Presiding Bishopric, directors for temporal affairs were sent to a number of international locations to supervise the administration of the construction of meetinghouses and temples, the maintenance of membership records, and the preparation and distribution of scriptures and other curriculum materials. Departments at Church headquarters responsible for temporal operations were also assigned to the Presiding Bishopric for their direction. Since that time, the Presiding Bishopric has appointed managing directors for the various departments that support activities of the directors of temporal affairs, which include finance and records, LDS FOUNDATION, printing services, distribution of curriculum materials, purchasing, scripture and curriculum translation, temple clothing production, transportation, information systems and communications, security, investments, temples and special project construction and remodeling, real estate acquisitions and sales, meetinghouse construction, welfare production and processing, LDS SOCIAL SERVICES, and property management.

In 1986 the First Presidency called AREA PRESIDENCIES to give supervision to ecclesiastical activities within defined geographical areas of the world. These area presidencies presently give direct supervision to directors for temporal affairs in international areas and to welfare and physical facilities activities in the United States and Canada. The Presiding Bishopric, along with headquarters departments, provides training, evaluation, manpower planning, technical support, and program design to assist area presidencies in their roles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cowan, Richard O. The Church in the Twentieth Century, pp. 140, 270, 297, 406–407, 420. Salt Lake City, 1985.

Palmer, Lee A. Aaronic Priesthood through the Ages, pp. 321–31. Salt Lake City, 1964.

Widtsoc, John A. Priesthood and Church Government, rev. ed., pp. 277–79. Salt Lake City, 1954.

H. DAVID BURTON
WM. GIBB DYER, JR.

---

PRESIDING HIGH PRIEST

“Presiding high priest” is a phrase sometimes used in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints to refer to the priesthood officer in charge of a particular unit of Church organization (e.g., D&C 106:1). When used without qualification, it ordinarily refers to the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH.

Local congregations or WARDS are presided over by a BISHOP, who may also be spoken of as the presiding high priest in his ward. Similarly, a STAKE PRESIDENT presides over a STAKE, and an AREA president presides over the stakes of a major geographical area. All of these preside as ordained high priests, even though the bishop and area president function on the basis of an additional ordination as a bishop or seventy, respectively.

Only the President of the Church, by right of his ordination to this office, is designated the presiding high priest of the whole Church (D&C 107:91). His calling includes being “President of the High Priesthood of the Church; or, in other words, the Presiding High Priest over the High Priesthood of the Church” (D&C 107:65–66). In 1832 the Prophet Joseph SMITH was sustained as President of the High Priesthood and ordained to that office by Sidney RIGDON. An 1835 revelation further directed that a FIRST PRESIDENCY of three men be chosen, “appointed and ordained to that office, and upheld by the confidence, faith, and prayer of the church” (D&C 107:22). The President’s counselors may preside in his absence, and are also called presiding high priests (D&C 107:22), but do not function independently in this role.

ROY W. DOXEY

---

PRESS, NEWS MEDIA, AND THE CHURCH

Early press coverage of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was shaped by the traditions of the partisan press. Some journalists treated the Latter-day Saints with a degree of fairness, but the dency, additionally serve on various other administrative, executive, and policy-determining committees and councils, such as the Appropriations Committee, General Welfare Services Committee, Priesthood Executive Council, Temple and Family History Executive Council, and the Missionary Executive Council (see ORGANIZATION: CONTEMPORARY).

In 1977 a major organizational restructuring took place within the Church under the direction of the First Presidency. With the significant growth in Church membership the Presiding Bishopric was assigned much broader responsibilities for temporal administration throughout the world. Under the direction of the Presiding Bishopric, directors for temporal affairs were sent to a number of international locations to supervise the administration of the construction of meetinghouses and temples, the maintenance of membership records, and the preparation and distribution of scriptures and other curriculum materials. Departments at Church headquarters responsible for temporal operations were also assigned to the Presiding Bishopric for their direction. Since that time, the Presiding Bishopric has appointed managing directors for the various departments that support activities of the directors of temporal affairs, which include finance and records, LDS FOUNDATION, printing services, distribution of curriculum materials, purchasing, scripture and curriculum translation, temple clothing production, transportation, information systems and communications, security, investments, temples and special project construction and remodeling, real estate acquisitions and sales, meetinghouse construction, welfare production and processing, LDS SOCIAL SERVICES, and property management.

In 1986 the First Presidency called AREA PRESIDENCIES to give supervision to ecclesiastical activities within defined geographical areas of the world. These area presidencies presently give direct supervision to directors for temporal affairs in international areas and to welfare and physical facilities activities in the United States and Canada. The Presiding Bishopric, along with headquarters departments, provides training, evaluation, manpower planning, technical support, and program design to assist area presidencies in their roles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cowan, Richard O. The Church in the Twentieth Century, pp. 140, 270, 297, 406–407, 420. Salt Lake City, 1985.

Palmer, Lee A. Aaronic Priesthood through the Ages, pp. 321–31. Salt Lake City, 1964.

Widtsoc, John A. Priesthood and Church Government, rev. ed., pp. 277–79. Salt Lake City, 1954.

H. DAVID BURTON
WM. GIBB DYER, JR.

---

PRESIDING HIGH PRIEST

“Presiding high priest” is a phrase sometimes used in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints to refer to the priesthood officer in charge of a particular unit of Church organization (e.g., D&C 106:1). When used without qualification, it ordinarily refers to the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH.

Local congregations or WARDS are presided over by a BISHOP, who may also be spoken of as the presiding high priest in his ward. Similarly, a STAKE PRESIDENT presides over a STAKE, and an AREA president presides over the stakes of a major geographical area. All of these preside as ordained high priests, even though the bishop and area president function on the basis of an additional ordination as a bishop or seventy, respectively.

Only the President of the Church, by right of his ordination to this office, is designated the presiding high priest of the whole Church (D&C 107:91). His calling includes being “President of the High Priesthood of the Church; or, in other words, the Presiding High Priest over the High Priesthood of the Church” (D&C 107:65–66). In 1832 the Prophet Joseph SMITH was sustained as President of the High Priesthood and ordained to that office by Sidney RIGDON. An 1835 revelation further directed that a FIRST PRESIDENCY of three men be chosen, “appointed and ordained to that office, and upheld by the confidence, faith, and prayer of the church” (D&C 107:22). The President’s counselors may preside in his absence, and are also called presiding high priests (D&C 107:22), but do not function independently in this role.

ROY W. DOXEY

---

PRESS, NEWS MEDIA, AND THE CHURCH

Early press coverage of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was shaped by the traditions of the partisan press. Some journalists treated the Latter-day Saints with a degree of fairness, but the

dency, additionally serve on various other administrative, executive, and policy-determining committees and councils, such as the Appropriations Committee, General Welfare Services Committee, Priesthood Executive Council, Temple and Family History Executive Council, and the Missionary Executive Council (see ORGANIZATION: CONTEMPORARY).

In 1977 a major organizational restructuring took place within the Church under the direction of the First Presidency. With the significant growth in Church membership the Presiding Bishopric was assigned much broader responsibilities for temporal administration throughout the world. Under the direction of the Presiding Bishopric, directors for temporal affairs were sent to a number of international locations to supervise the administration of the construction of meetinghouses and temples, the maintenance of membership records, and the preparation and distribution of scriptures and other curriculum materials. Departments at Church headquarters responsible for temporal operations were also assigned to the Presiding Bishopric for their direction. Since that time, the Presiding Bishopric has appointed managing directors for the various departments that support activities of the directors of temporal affairs, which include finance and records, LDS FOUNDATION, printing services, distribution of curriculum materials, purchasing, scripture and curriculum translation, temple clothing production, transportation, information systems and communications, security, investments, temples and special project construction and remodeling, real estate acquisitions and sales, meetinghouse construction, welfare production and processing, LDS SOCIAL SERVICES, and property management.

In 1986 the First Presidency called AREA PRESIDENCIES to give supervision to ecclesiastical activities within defined geographical areas of the world. These area presidencies presently give direct supervision to directors for temporal affairs in international areas and to welfare and physical facilities activities in the United States and Canada. The Presiding Bishopric, along with headquarters departments, provides training, evaluation, manpower planning, technical support, and program design to assist area presidencies in their roles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cowan, Richard O. The Church in the Twentieth Century, pp. 140, 270, 297, 406–407, 420. Salt Lake City, 1985.

Palmer, Lee A. Aaronic Priesthood through the Ages, pp. 321–31. Salt Lake City, 1964.

Widtsoc, John A. Priesthood and Church Government, rev. ed., pp. 277–79. Salt Lake City, 1954.

H. DAVID BURTON
WM. GIBB DYER, JR.

---

PRESIDING HIGH PRIEST

“Presiding high priest” is a phrase sometimes used in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints to refer to the priesthood officer in charge of a particular unit of Church organization (e.g., D&C 106:1). When used without qualification, it ordinarily refers to the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH.

Local congregations or WARDS are presided over by a BISHOP, who may also be spoken of as the presiding high priest in his ward. Similarly, a STAKE PRESIDENT presides over a STAKE, and an AREA president presides over the stakes of a major geographical area. All of these preside as ordained high priests, even though the bishop and area president function on the basis of an additional ordination as a bishop or seventy, respectively.

Only the President of the Church, by right of his ordination to this office, is designated the presiding high priest of the whole Church (D&C 107:91). His calling includes being “President of the High Priesthood of the Church; or, in other words, the Presiding High Priest over the High Priesthood of the Church” (D&C 107:65–66). In 1832 the Prophet Joseph SMITH was sustained as President of the High Priesthood and ordained to that office by Sidney RIGDON. An 1835 revelation further directed that a FIRST PRESIDENCY of three men be chosen, “appointed and ordained to that office, and upheld by the confidence, faith, and prayer of the church” (D&C 107:22). The President’s counselors may preside in his absence, and are also called presiding high priests (D&C 107:22), but do not function independently in this role.

ROY W. DOXEY

---

PRESS, NEWS MEDIA, AND THE CHURCH

Early press coverage of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was shaped by the traditions of the partisan press. Some journalists treated the Latter-day Saints with a degree of fairness, but the more common approach was ridicule and hostility. Outside media took a rather dim view of the Church, and when the LDS media were confrontational, non-Mormon media responded with a hostility that increased as the nineteenth century continued. Joseph SMITH's arrest and martyrdom grew partly out of the Nauvoo City Council's suppression of the Nauvoo Expositor, an opposition press. In the latter part of the century, developing technology and urbanization fostered unprecedented big-city newspaper circulation battles and the rise of yellow journalism. Among those vilified were the Latter-day Saints, particularly their practice of PLURAL MARRIAGE.

The press's perception of the Church began to change slowly after the practice of polygamy was officially suspended in 1890 and Utah was granted statehood in 1896. Then in the early twentieth century press coverage continued to improve as the Church began to be recognized as an influential American institution, and the public began listening to MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR BROADCASTS. Still later, Latter-day Saints in government and business such as George Romney, governor of Michigan; Ezra Taft BENSON, secretary of agriculture in the Eisenhower cabinet; and J. Willard Marriott, president of the Marriott Corporation, also helped the press view the Church with an air of greater approval and commendation. The creation of the Church's PUBLIC COMMUNICATIONS OFFICE in 1970 has further helped with media relations throughout the world. Although there are still occasional flare-ups of sensational news about the Church and individual members, the general view of Mormons provided by the mainstream media in the last decades of the twentieth century has been more accurate and better balanced.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mulder, William, and A. Russell Mortensen, eds. Among the Mormons: Historic Accounts by Contemporary Observers. New York, 1969.

Lythgoe, Dennis Leo. "The Changing Image of Mormonism in Periodical Literature." Ph.D. diss., University of Utah, 1969.

PAUL ALFRED PRATTE

PRESS AND PUBLICATIONS

[From its beginning, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was frequently attacked and abused by the press. For a concise statement on the relationship of the press and the Church, see Press, News Media and the Church. At the same time, the Church has used the printed word to convey its message to the world. For a fuller study of the Church's use of the printed word to produce books, pamphlets, broadsides, newspapers, and magazines, see Publications. For a listing of the periodicals and newspapers published by the Church, see Magazines; and Newspapers, LDS. For separate articles on several different publications see Almanacs; Bible, LDS Publication of; Bulletin; Conference Reports; Journal of Discourses; Juvenile Instructor; Liahona the Elders' Journal; Messenger and Advocate; Millennial Star; Nauvoo Neighbor; New Era; Relief Society Magazine; Times and Seasons; Utah Genealogical and Historical Magazine; Woman's Exponent; and Young Woman's Journal.]

PRIDE

In an address drawing together Book of Mormon and other scriptural teachings regarding pride, President Ezra Taft BENSON called it "the universal sin, the great vice" (1989, p. 6). He characterized its central feature as "enmity—enmity toward God and enmity toward our fellowmen" and defined "enmity" as "hatred toward, hostility to, or a state of opposition." He observed that "pride is essentially competitive in nature," arising when individuals pit their will against God's or their intellects, opinions, works, wealth, and talents against those of other people (p. 4). He warned that "pride is a damning sin in the true sense of that word," for "it limits or stops progression" and "adversely affects all our relationships" (p. 6).

The scriptures abound with admonitions against pride. "Pride goeth before destruction" (Prov. 16:18). Pride felled Lucifer (cf. Moses 4:1–3; 2 Ne. 24:12–15; D&C 29:36; 76:28) and destroyed the city of Sodom (Ezek. 16:49–50). In the closing chapters of the Book of Mormon, the prophet Mormon wrote, "Behold, the pride of this nation, or the people of the Nephites, hath proven their destruction" (Moro. 8:27). Three times in the Doctrine and Covenants the Lord uses the phrase "beware of pride," including warnings to Oliver COWDERY, the second elder of the Church, and to Emma SMITH, the wife of Joseph Smith (D&C 23:1; 25:14; 38:39). The Lord has said that when he cleanses the earth by fire, the proud shall burn as stubble (3 Ne. 25:1; D&C 29:9; Mal. 4:1).

While most consider pride a sin of the rich, gifted, or learned looking down on others, President Benson warned that it is also common among those looking up—"faultfinding, gossiping . . . liv-

more common approach was ridicule and hostility. Outside media took a rather dim view of the Church, and when the LDS media were confrontational, non-Mormon media responded with a hostility that increased as the nineteenth century continued. Joseph SMITH's arrest and martyrdom grew partly out of the Nauvoo City Council's suppression of the Nauvoo Expositor, an opposition press. In the latter part of the century, developing technology and urbanization fostered unprecedented big-city newspaper circulation battles and the rise of yellow journalism. Among those vilified were the Latter-day Saints, particularly their practice of PLURAL MARRIAGE.

The press's perception of the Church began to change slowly after the practice of polygamy was officially suspended in 1890 and Utah was granted statehood in 1896. Then in the early twentieth century press coverage continued to improve as the Church began to be recognized as an influential American institution, and the public began listening to MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR BROADCASTS. Still later, Latter-day Saints in government and business such as George Romney, governor of Michigan; Ezra Taft BENSON, secretary of agriculture in the Eisenhower cabinet; and J. Willard Marriott, president of the Marriott Corporation, also helped the press view the Church with an air of greater approval and commendation. The creation of the Church's PUBLIC COMMUNICATIONS OFFICE in 1970 has further helped with media relations throughout the world. Although there are still occasional flare-ups of sensational news about the Church and individual members, the general view of Mormons provided by the mainstream media in the last decades of the twentieth century has been more accurate and better balanced.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mulder, William, and A. Russell Mortensen, eds. Among the Mormons: Historic Accounts by Contemporary Observers. New York, 1969.

Lythgoe, Dennis Leo. "The Changing Image of Mormonism in Periodical Literature." Ph.D. diss., University of Utah, 1969.

PAUL ALFRED PRATTE

PRESS AND PUBLICATIONS

[From its beginning, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was frequently attacked and abused by the press. For a concise statement on the relationship of the press and the Church, see Press, News Media and the Church. At the same time, the Church has used the printed word to convey its message to the world. For a fuller study of the Church's use of the printed word to produce books, pamphlets, broadsides, newspapers, and magazines, see Publications. For a listing of the periodicals and newspapers published by the Church, see Magazines; and Newspapers, LDS. For separate articles on several different publications see Almanacs; Bible, LDS Publication of; Bulletin; Conference Reports; Journal of Discourses; Juvenile Instructor; Liahona the Elders' Journal; Messenger and Advocate; Millennial Star; Nauvoo Neighbor; New Era; Relief Society Magazine; Times and Seasons; Utah Genealogical and Historical Magazine; Woman's Exponent; and Young Woman's Journal.]

PRIDE

In an address drawing together Book of Mormon and other scriptural teachings regarding pride, President Ezra Taft BENSON called it "the universal sin, the great vice" (1989, p. 6). He characterized its central feature as "enmity—enmity toward God and enmity toward our fellowmen" and defined "enmity" as "hatred toward, hostility to, or a state of opposition." He observed that "pride is essentially competitive in nature," arising when individuals pit their will against God's or their intellects, opinions, works, wealth, and talents against those of other people (p. 4). He warned that "pride is a damning sin in the true sense of that word," for "it limits or stops progression" and "adversely affects all our relationships" (p. 6).

The scriptures abound with admonitions against pride. "Pride goeth before destruction" (Prov. 16:18). Pride felled Lucifer (cf. Moses 4:1–3; 2 Ne. 24:12–15; D&C 29:36; 76:28) and destroyed the city of Sodom (Ezek. 16:49–50). In the closing chapters of the Book of Mormon, the prophet Mormon wrote, "Behold, the pride of this nation, or the people of the Nephites, hath proven their destruction" (Moro. 8:27). Three times in the Doctrine and Covenants the Lord uses the phrase "beware of pride," including warnings to Oliver COWDERY, the second elder of the Church, and to Emma SMITH, the wife of Joseph Smith (D&C 23:1; 25:14; 38:39). The Lord has said that when he cleanses the earth by fire, the proud shall burn as stubble (3 Ne. 25:1; D&C 29:9; Mal. 4:1).

While most consider pride a sin of the rich, gifted, or learned looking down on others, President Benson warned that it is also common among those looking up—"faultfinding, gossiping . . . liv-

more common approach was ridicule and hostility. Outside media took a rather dim view of the Church, and when the LDS media were confrontational, non-Mormon media responded with a hostility that increased as the nineteenth century continued. Joseph SMITH's arrest and martyrdom grew partly out of the Nauvoo City Council's suppression of the Nauvoo Expositor, an opposition press. In the latter part of the century, developing technology and urbanization fostered unprecedented big-city newspaper circulation battles and the rise of yellow journalism. Among those vilified were the Latter-day Saints, particularly their practice of PLURAL MARRIAGE.

The press's perception of the Church began to change slowly after the practice of polygamy was officially suspended in 1890 and Utah was granted statehood in 1896. Then in the early twentieth century press coverage continued to improve as the Church began to be recognized as an influential American institution, and the public began listening to MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR BROADCASTS. Still later, Latter-day Saints in government and business such as George Romney, governor of Michigan; Ezra Taft BENSON, secretary of agriculture in the Eisenhower cabinet; and J. Willard Marriott, president of the Marriott Corporation, also helped the press view the Church with an air of greater approval and commendation. The creation of the Church's PUBLIC COMMUNICATIONS OFFICE in 1970 has further helped with media relations throughout the world. Although there are still occasional flare-ups of sensational news about the Church and individual members, the general view of Mormons provided by the mainstream media in the last decades of the twentieth century has been more accurate and better balanced.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mulder, William, and A. Russell Mortensen, eds. Among the Mormons: Historic Accounts by Contemporary Observers. New York, 1969.

Lythgoe, Dennis Leo. "The Changing Image of Mormonism in Periodical Literature." Ph.D. diss., University of Utah, 1969.

PAUL ALFRED PRATTE

PRESS AND PUBLICATIONS

[From its beginning, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was frequently attacked and abused by the press. For a concise statement on the relationship of the press and the Church, see Press, News Media and the Church. At the same time, the Church has used the printed word to convey its message to the world. For a fuller study of the Church's use of the printed word to produce books, pamphlets, broadsides, newspapers, and magazines, see Publications. For a listing of the periodicals and newspapers published by the Church, see Magazines; and Newspapers, LDS. For separate articles on several different publications see Almanacs; Bible, LDS Publication of; Bulletin; Conference Reports; Journal of Discourses; Juvenile Instructor; Liahona the Elders' Journal; Messenger and Advocate; Millennial Star; Nauvoo Neighbor; New Era; Relief Society Magazine; Times and Seasons; Utah Genealogical and Historical Magazine; Woman's Exponent; and Young Woman's Journal.]

PRIDE

In an address drawing together Book of Mormon and other scriptural teachings regarding pride, President Ezra Taft BENSON called it "the universal sin, the great vice" (1989, p. 6). He characterized its central feature as "enmity—enmity toward God and enmity toward our fellowmen" and defined "enmity" as "hatred toward, hostility to, or a state of opposition." He observed that "pride is essentially competitive in nature," arising when individuals pit their will against God's or their intellects, opinions, works, wealth, and talents against those of other people (p. 4). He warned that "pride is a damning sin in the true sense of that word," for "it limits or stops progression" and "adversely affects all our relationships" (p. 6).

The scriptures abound with admonitions against pride. "Pride goeth before destruction" (Prov. 16:18). Pride felled Lucifer (cf. Moses 4:1–3; 2 Ne. 24:12–15; D&C 29:36; 76:28) and destroyed the city of Sodom (Ezek. 16:49–50). In the closing chapters of the Book of Mormon, the prophet Mormon wrote, "Behold, the pride of this nation, or the people of the Nephites, hath proven their destruction" (Moro. 8:27). Three times in the Doctrine and Covenants the Lord uses the phrase "beware of pride," including warnings to Oliver COWDERY, the second elder of the Church, and to Emma SMITH, the wife of Joseph Smith (D&C 23:1; 25:14; 38:39). The Lord has said that when he cleanses the earth by fire, the proud shall burn as stubble (3 Ne. 25:1; D&C 29:9; Mal. 4:1).

While most consider pride a sin of the rich, gifted, or learned looking down on others, President Benson warned that it is also common among those looking up—"faultfinding, gossiping . . . living beyond our means, envying, coveting, withholding gratitude . . . and being unforgiving and jealous” (1989, p. 5).

God has commanded the Saints to “seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion” (D&C 6:6). When ZION is established, its people will be “of one heart and one mind” and will dwell together in righteousness (Moses 7:18). But “pride is the great stumbling block to Zion” (Benson, 1989, p. 7). Pride leads people to diminish others in the attempt to elevate themselves, resulting in selfishness and contention.

The proud love “the praise of men more than the praise of God” (John 12:42–43) and fear the judgment of men more than that of God (cf. D&C 3:6–7; 30:1–2; 60:2). They do not receive counsel or correction easily but justify and rationalize their frailties and failures, making it difficult for them to repent and receive the blessings of the Atonement. They have difficulty rejoicing in their blessings, because they are constantly comparing them to see whether they have more or less than someone else. Consequently, they are often ungrateful.

The antidote for pride is humility, “a broken heart and a contrite spirit” (3 Ne. 9:20, 12:19). Men can choose to do those things that will foster the growth of humility: they can choose to confess and forsake their sins, forgive others, receive counsel and chastisement, esteem others as themselves, render service, love God, and submit to his will (Benson, 1989, p. 7). By yielding “to the enticings of the Holy Spirit,” the prideful individual can become “a saint through the atonement of Christ” and become “as a child, submissive, meek, humble” (Mosiah 3:19; cf. Alma 13:28).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Ezra Taft. “Cleansing the Inner Vessel.” Ensign 16 (May 1986):4–7.
 ———. “Beware of Pride.” Ensign 19 (May 1989):4–7.
 Burton, Theodore M. “A Disease Called Pride.” Ensign 1 (Mar. 1971):26–29.

REED A. BENSON

PRIEST, AARONIC PRIESTHOOD

Priest is the highest office of the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD to which young male members of the Church may be ordained. To receive this office the candidate must be sixteen or older; most priests are between the ages of sixteen and nineteen.

Priests in the restored Church are empowered to “preach, teach, [and] expound” the doctrines and the covenants of the Church and to “visit the house of each member, and exhort them to pray . . . and attend to all family duties” (D&C 20:46–47). Priests fulfill these duties in Church meetings and in visits to members as HOME TEACHERS. They also have AUTHORITY to baptize, to administer the SACRAMENT, to ordain other priests, TEACHERS, and DEACONS under the direction of their BISHOP, to preside at meetings when no ELDER is present, and to perform all duties of deacons and teachers.

Historically the term “priest” has been used to describe a variety of offices and functions. From the time of AARON until the ministry of JOHN THE BAPTIST, priests in the Aaronic order taught the LAW OF MOSES, offered sacrifices, officiated or performed in numerous temple functions and priesthood ordinances, and thereby mediated between the people and God. Only the lineal descendants of Aaron could be priests. Christ’s sacrifice and atonement fulfilled the “law of carnal commandments,” thereby ending for Christians the priests’ role as officiators in Mosaic ordinances.

In the New Testament, Jesus Christ is named the great “high priest” and as such is seen as the everlasting mediator by whom all men may come unto God (Heb. 5:1–10; 9:24–26). For Latter-day Saints, HIGH PRIEST is an office in the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD. While most English-speaking Christian traditions use the word priest to refer both to the ancient Levitical roles and to the presbyters (elders) of the early Christian churches who had responsibilities to preside over and instruct congregations, the two offices are separated in the LDS Church in that priests are of the Aaronic Priesthood and perform basic ordinances and otherwise assist the elders and high priests of the Melchizedek Priesthood.

Because there were no descendants of Aaron among the Nephites or Lamanites, priests in the Book of Mormon held the Melchizedek Priesthood and thus engaged both in the sacrificial functions and in broader presiding and teaching functions (Alma 18:24; 45:22).

Joseph SMITH and Oliver COWDERY received the Aaronic Priesthood from John the Baptist on May 15, 1829 (see D&C 13; see AARONIC PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF). They subsequently ordained the first priests in this dispensation on June 9, 1830.

ing beyond our means, envying, coveting, withholding gratitude . . . and being unforgiving and jealous” (1989, p. 5).

God has commanded the Saints to “seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion” (D&C 6:6). When ZION is established, its people will be “of one heart and one mind” and will dwell together in righteousness (Moses 7:18). But “pride is the great stumbling block to Zion” (Benson, 1989, p. 7). Pride leads people to diminish others in the attempt to elevate themselves, resulting in selfishness and contention.

The proud love “the praise of men more than the praise of God” (John 12:42–43) and fear the judgment of men more than that of God (cf. D&C 3:6–7; 30:1–2; 60:2). They do not receive counsel or correction easily but justify and rationalize their frailties and failures, making it difficult for them to repent and receive the blessings of the Atonement. They have difficulty rejoicing in their blessings, because they are constantly comparing them to see whether they have more or less than someone else. Consequently, they are often ungrateful.

The antidote for pride is humility, “a broken heart and a contrite spirit” (3 Ne. 9:20, 12:19). Men can choose to do those things that will foster the growth of humility: they can choose to confess and forsake their sins, forgive others, receive counsel and chastisement, esteem others as themselves, render service, love God, and submit to his will (Benson, 1989, p. 7). By yielding “to the enticings of the Holy Spirit,” the prideful individual can become “a saint through the atonement of Christ” and become “as a child, submissive, meek, humble” (Mosiah 3:19; cf. Alma 13:28).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benson, Ezra Taft. “Cleansing the Inner Vessel.” Ensign 16 (May 1986):4–7.
 ———. “Beware of Pride.” Ensign 19 (May 1989):4–7.
 Burton, Theodore M. “A Disease Called Pride.” Ensign 1 (Mar. 1971):26–29.

REED A. BENSON

PRIEST, AARONIC PRIESTHOOD

Priest is the highest office of the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD to which young male members of the Church may be ordained. To receive this office the candidate must be sixteen or older; most priests are between the ages of sixteen and nineteen.

Priests in the restored Church are empowered to “preach, teach, [and] expound” the doctrines and the covenants of the Church and to “visit the house of each member, and exhort them to pray . . . and attend to all family duties” (D&C 20:46–47). Priests fulfill these duties in Church meetings and in visits to members as HOME TEACHERS. They also have AUTHORITY to baptize, to administer the SACRAMENT, to ordain other priests, TEACHERS, and DEACONS under the direction of their BISHOP, to preside at meetings when no ELDER is present, and to perform all duties of deacons and teachers.

Historically the term “priest” has been used to describe a variety of offices and functions. From the time of AARON until the ministry of JOHN THE BAPTIST, priests in the Aaronic order taught the LAW OF MOSES, offered sacrifices, officiated or performed in numerous temple functions and priesthood ordinances, and thereby mediated between the people and God. Only the lineal descendants of Aaron could be priests. Christ’s sacrifice and atonement fulfilled the “law of carnal commandments,” thereby ending for Christians the priests’ role as officiators in Mosaic ordinances.

In the New Testament, Jesus Christ is named the great “high priest” and as such is seen as the everlasting mediator by whom all men may come unto God (Heb. 5:1–10; 9:24–26). For Latter-day Saints, HIGH PRIEST is an office in the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD. While most English-speaking Christian traditions use the word priest to refer both to the ancient Levitical roles and to the presbyters (elders) of the early Christian churches who had responsibilities to preside over and instruct congregations, the two offices are separated in the LDS Church in that priests are of the Aaronic Priesthood and perform basic ordinances and otherwise assist the elders and high priests of the Melchizedek Priesthood.

Because there were no descendants of Aaron among the Nephites or Lamanites, priests in the Book of Mormon held the Melchizedek Priesthood and thus engaged both in the sacrificial functions and in broader presiding and teaching functions (Alma 18:24; 45:22).

Joseph SMITH and Oliver COWDERY received the Aaronic Priesthood from John the Baptist on May 15, 1829 (see D&C 13; see AARONIC PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF). They subsequently ordained the first priests in this dispensation on June 9, 1830.

Today, priests in each ward are organized into quorums of forty-eight or fewer members. The ward bishop presides over this quorum, with two priests called to assist him, and another as secretary. An adult adviser is also assigned by the bishopric to teach and assist quorum members. As in all of the offices of the Aaronic Priesthood, members of this PRIESTHOOD QUORUM receive instruction to prepare them for ordination as elders in the Melchizedek Priesthood and for missionary service. Each priest is expected to emulate the example of Jesus Christ.

In addition to performing their priesthood duties, priests participate together in a variety of educational, recreational, and social activities (see YOUNG MEN). For example, the priests in a ward in the United States participate as a group in the Explorer program of the Boy Scouts of America (see SCOUTING). In social and service activities they often join with the Laurels, who are sixteen- to eighteen-year-old members of the YOUNG WOMEN organization of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Abba, R. "Priests and Levites." In The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. 3, pp. 876–89. Nashville, Tenn., 1962.
- Palmer, Lee A. The Aaronic Priesthood Through the Centuries. Salt Lake City, 1964.
- Shepherd, M. H., Jr. "Priests in the New Testament." In The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. 3, pp. 889–91. Nashville, Tenn., 1962.

W. LADD HOLLIST

PRIESTCRAFT

The Book of Mormon says, "Priestcrafts are that men preach and set themselves up for a light unto the world, that they may get gain and praise of the world; but they seek not the welfare of Zion. . . . But the laborer in Zion shall labor for Zion; for if they labor for money they shall perish" (2 Ne. 26:29, 31). Inherent in this definition is the concern that Church leaders must labor to build ZION into the hearts of the people, and not for their personal aggrandizement or reward. When leaders "make merchandise" of men's souls (2 Pet. 2:3), they turn religion into a business, and pride, materialism, and unrighteous dominion follow.

Both in scripture and in literature priestcraft is condemned. Peter cursed Simon the sorcerer, who wanted to purchase the priesthood for money (Acts 8:14–24). Dante's Peter castigates several popes and priests for not serving freely and for making a sewer of the sepulcher of Peter by selling priesthood appointment (Paradiso 27:22–57). Chaucer observed that greed for personal gain and glory often replaced genuine priesthood service ("General Prologue" and "Introduction to the Pardoner's Tale," Canterbury Tales). Milton's lines from Lycidas condemning a clergy who "for their bellies' sake, / Creep and intrude, and climb into the fold" (ll. 114–15) sum up the evil of priestcraft: "The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed, / But swoln with wind and the rank mist they draw, / Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread" (ll. 125–27).

CHARLES D. TATE, JR.

PRIESTHOOD

[Other articles dealing with various aspects of the priesthood are Aaronic Priesthood; Authority; Brotherhood; Clergy; Godhood; Keys of the Priesthood; Lay Participation and Leadership; Levitical Priesthood; Magnifying One's Calling; Melchizedek Priesthood; Men, Roles of; Oath and Covenant of the Priesthood; Presidency, Concept of; Presiding High Priest; Priesthood Councils; and Priesthood Quorums.

On the specific offices of the priesthood, see Apostle; Bishop; Deacon, Aaronic Priesthood; Elder; High Priest; Patriarch; Priest, Aaronic Priesthood; Priesthood Offices; Prophet; Seventy; Teacher, Aaronic Priesthood.

For discussions of various priesthood ordinances, see Baptism; Baptismal Prayer; Children; Blessing of Children; Confirmation; Dedications; Father's Blessing; Laying on of Hands; Ordinances; Ordination to the Priesthood; Patriarchal Blessing; Priesthood Blessings; Rebaptism; Sacrament Prayers; Sealing; Setting Apart; Sick, Blessing the; Temple Ordinances.]

THE SOURCE OF PRIESTHOOD POWER. Jesus Christ is the great High Priest of God; Christ is therefore the source of all true priesthood authority and power on this earth (Heb. 5–10). Man does not take such priesthood power unto himself; it must be conferred by God through his servants (Heb. 5:4; D&C 1:38).

Before the world was created, Jesus Christ, the great JEHOVAH and firstborn of God the Father in the spirit world, covenanted to use the power he had obtained from the Father to implement God's program for the eternal happiness of all God's children (cf. TPJS, p. 190). The actual name of the

Today, priests in each ward are organized into quorums of forty-eight or fewer members. The ward bishop presides over this quorum, with two priests called to assist him, and another as secretary. An adult adviser is also assigned by the bishopric to teach and assist quorum members. As in all of the offices of the Aaronic Priesthood, members of this PRIESTHOOD QUORUM receive instruction to prepare them for ordination as elders in the Melchizedek Priesthood and for missionary service. Each priest is expected to emulate the example of Jesus Christ.

In addition to performing their priesthood duties, priests participate together in a variety of educational, recreational, and social activities (see YOUNG MEN). For example, the priests in a ward in the United States participate as a group in the Explorer program of the Boy Scouts of America (see SCOUTING). In social and service activities they often join with the Laurels, who are sixteen- to eighteen-year-old members of the YOUNG WOMEN organization of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Abba, R. "Priests and Levites." In The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. 3, pp. 876–89. Nashville, Tenn., 1962.
- Palmer, Lee A. The Aaronic Priesthood Through the Centuries. Salt Lake City, 1964.
- Shepherd, M. H., Jr. "Priests in the New Testament." In The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. 3, pp. 889–91. Nashville, Tenn., 1962.

W. LADD HOLLIST

PRIESTCRAFT

The Book of Mormon says, "Priestcrafts are that men preach and set themselves up for a light unto the world, that they may get gain and praise of the world; but they seek not the welfare of Zion. . . . But the laborer in Zion shall labor for Zion; for if they labor for money they shall perish" (2 Ne. 26:29, 31). Inherent in this definition is the concern that Church leaders must labor to build ZION into the hearts of the people, and not for their personal aggrandizement or reward. When leaders "make merchandise" of men's souls (2 Pet. 2:3), they turn religion into a business, and pride, materialism, and unrighteous dominion follow.

Both in scripture and in literature priestcraft is condemned. Peter cursed Simon the sorcerer, who wanted to purchase the priesthood for money (Acts 8:14–24). Dante's Peter castigates several popes and priests for not serving freely and for making a sewer of the sepulcher of Peter by selling priesthood appointment (Paradiso 27:22–57). Chaucer observed that greed for personal gain and glory often replaced genuine priesthood service ("General Prologue" and "Introduction to the Pardoner's Tale," Canterbury Tales). Milton's lines from Lycidas condemning a clergy who "for their bellies' sake, / Creep and intrude, and climb into the fold" (ll. 114–15) sum up the evil of priestcraft: "The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed, / But swoln with wind and the rank mist they draw, / Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread" (ll. 125–27).

CHARLES D. TATE, JR.

PRIESTHOOD

[Other articles dealing with various aspects of the priesthood are Aaronic Priesthood; Authority; Brotherhood; Clergy; Godhood; Keys of the Priesthood; Lay Participation and Leadership; Levitical Priesthood; Magnifying One's Calling; Melchizedek Priesthood; Men, Roles of; Oath and Covenant of the Priesthood; Presidency, Concept of; Presiding High Priest; Priesthood Councils; and Priesthood Quorums.

On the specific offices of the priesthood, see Apostle; Bishop; Deacon, Aaronic Priesthood; Elder; High Priest; Patriarch; Priest, Aaronic Priesthood; Priesthood Offices; Prophet; Seventy; Teacher, Aaronic Priesthood.

For discussions of various priesthood ordinances, see Baptism; Baptismal Prayer; Children; Blessing of Children; Confirmation; Dedications; Father's Blessing; Laying on of Hands; Ordinances; Ordination to the Priesthood; Patriarchal Blessing; Priesthood Blessings; Rebaptism; Sacrament Prayers; Sealing; Setting Apart; Sick, Blessing the; Temple Ordinances.]

THE SOURCE OF PRIESTHOOD POWER. Jesus Christ is the great High Priest of God; Christ is therefore the source of all true priesthood authority and power on this earth (Heb. 5–10). Man does not take such priesthood power unto himself; it must be conferred by God through his servants (Heb. 5:4; D&C 1:38).

Before the world was created, Jesus Christ, the great JEHOVAH and firstborn of God the Father in the spirit world, covenanted to use the power he had obtained from the Father to implement God's program for the eternal happiness of all God's children (cf. TPJS, p. 190). The actual name of the

Today, priests in each ward are organized into quorums of forty-eight or fewer members. The ward bishop presides over this quorum, with two priests called to assist him, and another as secretary. An adult adviser is also assigned by the bishopric to teach and assist quorum members. As in all of the offices of the Aaronic Priesthood, members of this PRIESTHOOD QUORUM receive instruction to prepare them for ordination as elders in the Melchizedek Priesthood and for missionary service. Each priest is expected to emulate the example of Jesus Christ.

In addition to performing their priesthood duties, priests participate together in a variety of educational, recreational, and social activities (see YOUNG MEN). For example, the priests in a ward in the United States participate as a group in the Explorer program of the Boy Scouts of America (see SCOUTING). In social and service activities they often join with the Laurels, who are sixteen- to eighteen-year-old members of the YOUNG WOMEN organization of the Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Abba, R. "Priests and Levites." In The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. 3, pp. 876–89. Nashville, Tenn., 1962.
- Palmer, Lee A. The Aaronic Priesthood Through the Centuries. Salt Lake City, 1964.
- Shepherd, M. H., Jr. "Priests in the New Testament." In The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. 3, pp. 889–91. Nashville, Tenn., 1962.

W. LADD HOLLIST

PRIESTCRAFT

The Book of Mormon says, "Priestcrafts are that men preach and set themselves up for a light unto the world, that they may get gain and praise of the world; but they seek not the welfare of Zion. . . . But the laborer in Zion shall labor for Zion; for if they labor for money they shall perish" (2 Ne. 26:29, 31). Inherent in this definition is the concern that Church leaders must labor to build ZION into the hearts of the people, and not for their personal aggrandizement or reward. When leaders "make merchandise" of men's souls (2 Pet. 2:3), they turn religion into a business, and pride, materialism, and unrighteous dominion follow.

Both in scripture and in literature priestcraft is condemned. Peter cursed Simon the sorcerer, who wanted to purchase the priesthood for money (Acts 8:14–24). Dante's Peter castigates several popes and priests for not serving freely and for making a sewer of the sepulcher of Peter by selling priesthood appointment (Paradiso 27:22–57). Chaucer observed that greed for personal gain and glory often replaced genuine priesthood service ("General Prologue" and "Introduction to the Pardoner's Tale," Canterbury Tales). Milton's lines from Lycidas condemning a clergy who "for their bellies' sake, / Creep and intrude, and climb into the fold" (ll. 114–15) sum up the evil of priestcraft: "The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed, / But swoln with wind and the rank mist they draw, / Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread" (ll. 125–27).

CHARLES D. TATE, JR.

---

PRIESTHOOD

[Other articles dealing with various aspects of the priesthood are Aaronic Priesthood; Authority; Brotherhood; Clergy; Godhood; Keys of the Priesthood; Lay Participation and Leadership; Levitical Priesthood; Magnifying One's Calling; Melchizedek Priesthood; Men, Roles of; Oath and Covenant of the Priesthood; Presidency, Concept of; Presiding High Priest; Priesthood Councils; and Priesthood Quorums.

On the specific offices of the priesthood, see Apostle; Bishop; Deacon, Aaronic Priesthood; Elder; High Priest; Patriarch; Priest, Aaronic Priesthood; Priesthood Offices; Prophet; Seventy; Teacher, Aaronic Priesthood.

For discussions of various priesthood ordinances, see Baptism; Baptismal Prayer; Children; Blessing of Children; Confirmation; Dedications; Father's Blessing; Laying on of Hands; Ordinances; Ordination to the Priesthood; Patriarchal Blessing; Priesthood Blessings; Rebaptism; Sacrament Prayers; Sealing; Setting Apart; Sick, Blessing the; Temple Ordinances.]

THE SOURCE OF PRIESTHOOD POWER. Jesus Christ is the great High Priest of God; Christ is therefore the source of all true priesthood authority and power on this earth (Heb. 5–10). Man does not take such priesthood power unto himself; it must be conferred by God through his servants (Heb. 5:4; D&C 1:38).

Before the world was created, Jesus Christ, the great JEHOVAH and firstborn of God the Father in the spirit world, covenanted to use the power he had obtained from the Father to implement God's program for the eternal happiness of all God's children (cf. TPJS, p. 190). The actual name of the priesthood is "the Holy Priesthood after the Order of the Son of God"; but to avoid the too-frequent repetition of the name of deity, it is called by other names, particularly the Melchizedek Priesthood; i.e., it is the same authority held by that righteous king and high priest (Gen. 14:18; Heb. 5:6; Alma 13:6, 17–19; D&C 107:1–4; 124:123).

Restoration of the Melchizedek Priesthood, by Gary E. Smith (1980, oil on canvas, 36" × 42"). The apostles Peter, James, and John bestowed the Melchizedek Priesthood upon Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery. Courtesy Blaine T. Hudson.

As the divine Savior, Mediator, and Redeemer, Jesus sets the example for all priesthood performance. "Therefore, what manner of men ought ye to be?" Jesus asked his Nephite disciples whom he had ordained: "Verily I say unto you, even as I am" (3 Ne. 27:27).

DEFINITIONS. Joseph SMITH defined priesthood as "an everlasting principle, [which has] existed with God from eternity, and will to eternity, without beginning of days or end of years, . . . holding the keys of power and blessings. In fact, [the Melchizedek] Priesthood is a perfect law of theocracy" (TPJS, pp. 157, 322). It is the power and AUTHORITY by which The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is organized and directed.

The word "priesthood" has several meanings for Latter-day Saints:

1. Priesthood is power, the power of God, a vital source of eternal strength and energy delegated to men to act in all things for the well-being of mankind, both in the world and out of it (DS 3:80; Romney, p. 43).
2. Priesthood is authority, the exclusive right to act in the name of God as his authorized agents and to perform ORDINANCES for the purpose of opening certain spiritual blessings to all individuals.
3. Priesthood is the right and responsibility to pre-serve within the organizational structure of the Church, but only in a manner consistent with the agency of others.
4. Sometimes the word priesthood is used to refer to the men of the Church in general (as in "the priesthood will meet in the chapel").

Priesthood power may be exercised only under the direction of the one holding the right, or KEYS, to authorize its use. Priesthood power functions in accord with the characteristics and attributes of God himself, namely persuasion, long-suffering, gentleness, meekness, love unfeigned, righteousness, virtue, knowledge, justice, judgment, mercy, and truth (D&C 121:41; Lectures on Faith 4). It ceases to exist in a man who uses it to obtain the honors of the world, or to gratify pride, or to cover sin or evil, or to exercise unrighteous dominion (D&C 121:33–37).

Priesthood embraces all forms of God's power. It is the power by which the cosmos was ordered, universes and worlds were organized, and the elements in all their varied structures and relationships were put into place. Through the priesthood, God governs all things. By this power, the gospel is preached and understood, and the ordinances of exaltation for both the living and the dead are performed (see PLAN OF SALVATION). Priesthood is the channel for obtaining REVELATION, the channel through which God reveals himself and his glory, his intents and his purposes, to mankind: The priesthood holds "the key of the mysteries of the kingdom, even the key of the knowledge of God" (D&C 84:19–20; cf. TPJS, pp. 166–67). It conveys the mind and will of God; and, when employed by his servants on his errand, it functions as if by the Lord's own mouth and hand (D&C 1:38).

Thus, the LDS doctrine of priesthood differs from all other views. Priesthood is not vocational or professional (see CLERGY). It is not hereditary, passed by inheritance from father to son (even the LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD was conferred by ordination). It is not offered for money (see PRIEST-CRAFT). It is not held by a group of specialists who are separated from the community (all worthy Latter-day Saint men are eligible to be ordained to the priesthood). And yet it is not a “priesthood of all believers,” as in the Protestant conception (ER 11:529).

HISTORY, ORDERS, AND OFFICES OF THE PRIESTHOOD. Whenever the government of God has existed on the earth, it has functioned through this priesthood power, held by righteous men chosen of God, as were Aaron (Heb. 5:4) and Joshua (Num. 27:18–19). In times of APOSTASY and wickedness, God has not permitted his servants to confer the priesthood on the unworthy, and it has been lost from the earth. When necessary, the priesthood has been restored with each new DISPENSATION of the gospel.

Following the ascension of Jesus Christ and the death of his apostles, apostasy occurred in the Christian church and priesthood authority was taken from the earth. However, after preparation by God through the lives of earnest and sincere reformers and seekers, mankind again received priesthood authority from angelic ministers who held the keys to this power. Beginning on May 15, 1829, heavenly messengers conferred priesthood authority upon Joseph Smith and Oliver COWDERY in a series of visitations (see AARONIC PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF; MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD: RESTORATION OF; DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: SECTION 110). These restorations included the Aaronic Priesthood (D&C 13), the Melchizedek Priesthood (D&C 27), the keys of the gathering of Israel (D&C 110:11), the keys of the fulfillment of the Abrahamic covenant (D&C 110:12), the keys of the binding and sealing power (D&C 110:13–16), and the keys of all dispensations of the gospel “from Michael or Adam down to the present time” (D&C 128:21). These keys of presiding authority have been in turn conferred upon each succeeding prophet and President of the Church. All priesthood power and authority function today under the direction of the PRESIDENT OF THE CHURCH, who holds all priesthood keys and powers (see FIRST PRESIDENCY; QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES; SUCCESSION IN THE PRESIDENCY).

“There are three grand orders of priesthood referred to [in the Epistle to the Hebrews]” (TPJS, p. 322–23; HC 5:554–55)—the Melchizedek, the Patriarchal, and the Aaronic:

1. The Melchizedek Priesthood is the “higher priesthood” that incorporates all priesthoods within itself (TPJS, p. 180). It holds “the right of presidency, and has power and authority over all the offices in the church in all ages of the world, to administer in spiritual things” (D&C 107:8). This order of ordination is an unchanging order that has been present in all dispensations (cf. Matt. 10:1; 16:19; John 20:23; Eph. 4:11; Heb. 7:24; see also HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE). From Adam to Moses, all major prophets held the Melchizedek Priesthood; Joseph Smith taught that the prophets after the death of Moses and before the time of Christ held this same priesthood and were “ordained by God himself” (TPJS, p. 181). This authority is superior to the lesser or Aaronic Priesthood that functioned under the law of Moses. The Nephites held the Melchizedek Priesthood and observed the law of Moses under that authority (cf. Alma 13:6–18).

2. The PATRIARCHAL ORDER OF THE PRIESTHOOD is the right of worthy priesthood-holding fathers to preside over their descendants through all ages; it includes the ordinances and blessings of the fulness of the priesthood shared by husbands and wives who are sealed in the temple (see SEALING: TEMPLE SEALINGS).

3. The Aaronic Priesthood, including the Levitical Priesthood, was instituted under the LAW OF MOSES at the time when Israel rejected the greater powers, blessings, and responsibilities of the Melchizedek Priesthood. God gave them a “lesser priesthood” comprising specific areas of authority dealing with sacrifices and temporal concerns of salvation (Ex. 20:19; JST Ex. 34:1–2). This authority was granted as a right to Aaron and his lineal descendants forever. Levitical Priesthood refers to certain duties within the Aaronic Priesthood that were delegated to worthy male members of the tribe of Levi (see PRIESTHOOD IN BIBLICAL TIMES).

Within the Melchizedek and Aaronic Priesthoods, men may be ordained to various offices. Those who hold certain offices may then be called and set apart to particular positions of Church service. Beginning at age twelve young men, if they are worthy and desire it, may have the Aaronic Priesthood conferred upon them and be ordained to the office of deacon; they may be ordained a teacher at age fourteen, and a priest at age sixteen. At the age of eighteen, they may have the Melchizedek Priesthood conferred upon them and be ordained to the office of elder. Later, as need and calling dictate, they may be ordained to other offices in the Melchizedek Priesthood. The office of BISHOP is an appendage to the Melchizedek Priesthood (D&C 84:29), but its function is to preside over the Aaronic Priesthood (D&C 107:87–88). The office of PATRIARCH is an office in the Melchizedek Priesthood.

First Presidency and Quorum of the Twelve Apostles (in 1884). Top Row: George Q. Cannon, President John Taylor, Joseph F. Smith. Apostles (second row) Wilford Woodruff, Lorenzo Snow, Erastus Snow, Franklin D. Richards, (third row) Brigham Young, Jr., Albert Carrington, Moses Thatcher, Francis Marion Lyman, (fourth row) John Henry Smith, George Teasdale, Heber J. Grant, John W. Taylor.

All faithful and worthy Latter-day Saint men may be ordained to the priesthood and be authorized to act and participate in any of the offices, powers, blessings, and authorities of priesthood (see ORDINATION TO THE PRIESTHOOD; DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS: OFFICIAL DECLARATION—2). Ordination to each different priesthood office is by the authority and under the direction of the presiding priesthood officer in the ward, branch, stake, or mission of the Church where the person resides, by the laying on of hands by one holding appropriate priesthood office and designated to so act.

For all holders of the Melchizedek or Aaronic Priesthood, activity, training, service, and fellowship occur in PRIESTHOOD QUORUMS, organized according to priesthood office with appropriate presiding officers (see D&C 20; 107).

PRIESTHOOD AND THE FAMILY. The priesthood achieves its highest function in the family. In the family, the husband and father presides in righteousness and uses his priesthood to bless the lives of his family members, teaching by example and by counsel, giving righteous advice and decisions, openly expressing love and concern, and bestowing priesthood blessings by the laying on of hands when appropriate for the direction, healing, and comfort of his family. As the presiding priesthood bearer in his home, he is accountable to the Lord: Both the husband and wife are accountable to God for their respective responsibilities over the spiritual and temporal well-being of their family.

Exaltation and eternal life in the highest degree of the CELESTIAL KINGDOM are achieved only as the fulness of the priesthood is attained through building and achieving an eternal marriage (see MARRIAGE: ETERNAL MARRIAGE). The highest intellectual and spiritual development of both male and female is to become as God is. Both male and female are in the image of God (Gen. 1:27); GODHOOD cannot be achieved by male or female alone. Everyone in the PREMORTAL LIFE was begotten as a spirit child of Heavenly Parents before being born into mortality by earthly parents, and life on earth is part of the progression of men and women toward becoming like their Heavenly Parents. Only through the sealing ordinances of the holy priesthood, performed in the temples of the Lord, and through faithful, righteous living can male and female join in an eternal marriage unit wherein they may attain a fulness of the priesthood and exaltation together.

Fulness of the priesthood, which is the highest order of priesthood, is attained only through an eternal union of male and female, sanctified by the sealing ordinances in a temple of the Lord and ratified by the HOLY SPIRIT OF PROMISE (D&C 132:18–19). Those so united, who honor their covenants with each other and the Lord, will in the Resurrection inherit EXALTATION and ETERNAL LIFE, consisting of an eternal union together and an eternal family, including ETERNAL INCREASE, spirit children, and the creation and possession of worlds and universes.

Thus, all blessings, benefits, and inheritances of the priesthood are equally shared and achieved by husband and wife alike if they carry out their respective responsibilities in faith, love, harmony, and cooperation in the Lord. The apostle Paul stated, “Neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord” (1 Cor. 11:11).

In the temples of the Lord, sacred priesthood ordinances (e.g., washings, anointings, clothings) are administered to men by men and to women by women who have received the endowments of the priesthood in the temple (TPJS, p. 337) and have been given that specific priesthood responsibility. Women thus may act in priesthood power when called, set apart, and authorized by those who hold the keys; however, women officiators are not ordained to the priesthood or to an office in the priesthood to do this work.

THE POWER OF GOD UNTO EXALTATION. Joseph Smith said: “I advise ali to go on to perfection. . . . A man can do nothing for himself unless God direct him in the right way; and the Priesthood is for that purpose” (TPJS, p. 364). Perfection is attained by obedience to the principles and ordinances of the gospel. Without priesthood authority, no ordinances—no matter how, when, where, or by whom performed—are valid, ratified by the Holy Ghost, or recorded in heaven (D&C 132:7). The sealing power, the power to bind on earth and in heaven (Matt. 16:19; 18:18; D&C 132:46), belongs solely to the priesthood of God; and proper BAPTISM, the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST, the holy ENDOWMENT, eternal marriage, and family sealings come only through the authorized servants of the Lord. Through these powers and authorities of the holy priesthood, the work of salvation proceeds as it was planned in the grand councils of heaven before the world was.

Under the direction and authority of the priesthood in this last dispensation, the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times, the work of the priesthood includes proclaiming the gospel, perfecting the Saints, and performing ordinances for the redemption of the dead. Priesthood bearers are charged to teach the gospel to all nations and peoples, to proclaim the knowledge of salvation. Doing this missionary work is a responsibility of all members of the Church, and a particular obligation for bearers of the priesthood. They are also charged to watch over the Saints everywhere, to labor to increase faith, understanding, and testimony, and to improve the spiritual welfare and physical comfort of all who will receive them. Priesthood bearers are further charged to “redeem the dead” through the sealing power of the priesthood (D&C 128:14–18). Latter-day Saints are taught and encouraged to seek out the names and records of their dead progenitors, to actively engage in genealogical research, to turn their hearts to their ancestors, that every individual may be sealed by sacred temple ordinances in eternal families and ultimately in the family of Adam, which becomes the family of Jesus Christ (D&C 39:4–6; 42:52).

Essentially and eternally, the work of the priesthood is the work of Christ delegated to righteous servants. “This is my work and my glory,” the Lord said to Moses, “to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man” (Moses 1:39). The work of priesthood is to assist in bringing souls to Christ and thereby to exaltation in the kingdom of the Father.

Achieving the fulness of the priesthood of the Son of God is the great goal of all faithful Latter-day Saints, because it is the power of God unto salvation and eternal lives. It is the power by which mortal bodies will be resurrected immortal, to be possessed forever by the spirits who dwelt in them, glorified by God according to their works while in mortality. It is the power by which eternal joy may be attained, but always and only through obedience to the laws and principles of righteousness as exemplified and taught by the Savior.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W., et al. Priesthood. Salt Lake City, 1981.
 McConkie, Bruce R. “The Doctrine of the Priesthood.” Ensign 12 (May 1982):32–34.
 Romney, Marion G. “Priesthood.” Ensign 12 (May 1982):43.
 Smith, Joseph F. GD. Salt Lake City, 1919.
 Taylor, John. The Gospel Kingdom. Salt Lake City, 1964.
 Widtsoe, John A. Priesthood and Church Government. Salt Lake City, 1939.
 Young, Brigham. Discourses of Brigham Young, ed. John A. Widtsoe, pp. 130–51. Salt Lake City, 1954.

RICHARD G. ELLSWORTH

MELVIN J. LUTY

---

PRIESTHOOD IN BIBLICAL TIMES

Throughout the biblical period, God called prophets and other servants to direct his work and to be his authorized representatives by sharing his power or PRIESTHOOD with them. Through that priesthood, God administered his spiritual and temporal kingdom on earth, taught redeeming gospel truths, and provided saving ORDINANCES in all generations (D&C 84:17–21). An understanding of the priesthood in biblical times facilitates an appreciation of the contemporary LDS priesthood, since it represents a RESTORATION of priesthood authority in the latter days.

The priesthood or authority to act for God is governed by KEYS, which open God’s greatest blessings, including the “privilege of receiving the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, . . . [and] the communion and presence of God the Father, and Jesus” (D&C 107:19). These divinely bestowed powers came down in an unbroken line from Adam to Moses (D&C 84:6–17; 107:14–52), but the titles of priesthood officers changed periodically along with the type of social and religious structures that they administered.

PATRIARCHAL PRIESTHOOD AND MELCHIZEDEK. From Adam to Jacob, the main office of God’s priesthood was that of patriarch. Adam, Enoch, Ghost, or recorded in heaven (D&C 132:7). The sealing power, the power to bind on earth and in heaven (Matt. 16:19; 18:18; D&C 132:46), belongs solely to the priesthood of God; and proper BAPTISM, the GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST, the holy ENDOWMENT, eternal marriage, and family sealings come only through the authorized servants of the Lord. Through these powers and authorities of the holy priesthood, the work of salvation proceeds as it was planned in the grand councils of heaven before the world was.

Under the direction and authority of the priesthood in this last dispensation, the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times, the work of the priesthood includes proclaiming the gospel, perfecting the Saints, and performing ordinances for the redemption of the dead. Priesthood bearers are charged to teach the gospel to all nations and peoples, to proclaim the knowledge of salvation. Doing this missionary work is a responsibility of all members of the Church, and a particular obligation for bearers of the priesthood. They are also charged to watch over the Saints everywhere, to labor to increase faith, understanding, and testimony, and to improve the spiritual welfare and physical comfort of all who will receive them. Priesthood bearers are further charged to “redeem the dead” through the sealing power of the priesthood (D&C 128:14–18). Latter-day Saints are taught and encouraged to seek out the names and records of their dead progenitors, to actively engage in genealogical research, to turn their hearts to their ancestors, that every individual may be sealed by sacred temple ordinances in eternal families and ultimately in the family of Adam, which becomes the family of Jesus Christ (D&C 39:4–6; 42:52).

Essentially and eternally, the work of the priesthood is the work of Christ delegated to righteous servants. “This is my work and my glory,” the Lord said to Moses, “to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man” (Moses 1:39). The work of priesthood is to assist in bringing souls to Christ and thereby to exaltation in the kingdom of the Father.

Achieving the fulness of the priesthood of the Son of God is the great goal of all faithful Latter-day Saints, because it is the power of God unto salvation and eternal lives. It is the power by which mortal bodies will be resurrected immortal, to be possessed forever by the spirits who dwelt in them, glorified by God according to their works while in mortality. It is the power by which eternal joy may be attained, but always and only through obedience to the laws and principles of righteousness as exemplified and taught by the Savior.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kimball, Spencer W., et al. Priesthood. Salt Lake City, 1981.
 McConkie, Bruce R. “The Doctrine of the Priesthood.” Ensign 12 (May 1982):32–34.
 Romney, Marion G. “Priesthood.” Ensign 12 (May 1982):43.
 Smith, Joseph F. GD. Salt Lake City, 1919.
 Taylor, John. The Gospel Kingdom. Salt Lake City, 1964.
 Widtsoe, John A. Priesthood and Church Government. Salt Lake City, 1939.
 Young, Brigham. Discourses of Brigham Young, ed. John A. Widtsoe, pp. 130–51. Salt Lake City, 1954.

RICHARD G. ELLSWORTH

MELVIN J. LUTY

---

PRIESTHOOD IN BIBLICAL TIMES

Throughout the biblical period, God called prophets and other servants to direct his work and to be his authorized representatives by sharing his power or PRIESTHOOD with them. Through that priesthood, God administered his spiritual and temporal kingdom on earth, taught redeeming gospel truths, and provided saving ORDINANCES in all generations (D&C 84:17–21). An understanding of the priesthood in biblical times facilitates an appreciation of the contemporary LDS priesthood, since it represents a RESTORATION of priesthood authority in the latter days.

The priesthood or authority to act for God is governed by KEYS, which open God’s greatest blessings, including the “privilege of receiving the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, . . . [and] the communion and presence of God the Father, and Jesus” (D&C 107:19). These divinely bestowed powers came down in an unbroken line from Adam to Moses (D&C 84:6–17; 107:14–52), but the titles of priesthood officers changed periodically along with the type of social and religious structures that they administered.

PATRIARCHAL PRIESTHOOD AND MELCHIZEDEK. From Adam to Jacob, the main office of God’s priesthood was that of patriarch. Adam, Enoch, Noah, and Abraham administered the Lord's work, established covenants between God and the faithful, recorded their teachings and prophecies, and gave special PRIESTHOOD BLESSINGS. A patriarch could bless his offspring by calling upon the powers of heaven. As he gave the birthright blessing to one of his sons, for instance, the keys and powers of the priesthood were extended to the next generation. In the patriarchal order, under the law of primogeniture, these priesthood rights normally were to be given to the eldest son; from Abraham to EPHRAIM the birthright blessing went to younger sons because of their righteousness (Gen. 21, 27–28, 48–49).

MELCHIZEDEK, one of the most important biblical priesthood bearers, remains something of a mystery in the Bible because the precise lineage of his priesthood is not noted. He is simply identified as “priest of the most high God” (Gen. 14:18); a revelation to Joseph Smith adds that Melchizedek received the priesthood “through the lineage of his fathers, even till Noah” (D&C 84:14). Melchizedek not only blessed Abraham and gave him the priesthood after the order of the Son of God, but he was such a righteous high priest that the “greater” priesthood was named the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD after him (D&C 84:19; 107:1–4; Alma 13:1–19). Jesus also was identified as a priest “after the order of Melchisedec” (Heb. 5:6). The Prophet Joseph SMITH observed, “All priesthood is Melchizedek, but there are different portions or degrees of it. That portion which brought Moses to speak with God face to face was taken away; but that which brought the ministry of angels remained. All the prophets had the Melchizedek Priesthood and were ordained by God himself” (TPJS, pp. 180–81).

Although little is known from the Bible about these patriarchs, their righteousness set a pattern referred to in later generations (e.g., Ps. 110:4; 1 Kgs. 18:36). The books of Abraham and Moses in the PEARL OF GREAT PRICE reveal more of the visions, revelations, ordinations, and divine experiences of many of these ancient priesthood holders than the Bible does.

AARON AND THE LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD. With Moses, a new social and religious order with special priesthood offices was established among the Israelites. The priesthood emphasis shifted from patriarchs presiding over extended families to a designated tribe of Levitical priesthood holders, who served Israel for centuries. Under the Lord's direction, Moses ordained his older brother, AARON, to preside over the tribe of Levi, which served all the people (Lev. 8:1–13; Num. 8:13–22; Heb. 5:4). Over time, Aaron became exemplary in his priesthood service and the “lesser” priesthood was named the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD after him (Heb. 7:11; D&C 84:18, 26; 107:13–16). The major priesthood offices were the priests, including a “high” (Hebrew “great”) priest, and the Levites.

Priests were worthy male descendants of Aaron. The high priest was designated from among the first-born descendants of Aaron. His office was responsible for the annual Day of Atonement rituals (Lev. 16) and for all the tithes and offerings of the Israelites (see TITHING). The priests supervised the system of worship and sacrifices at the holy sanctuary and helped regulate the religious affairs and holy days of Israel.

The Levites included all male descendants of Levi. They assisted the priests in collecting and distributing the tithes and offerings, in the elaborate system of animal and food sacrifices, in teaching the law, in singing, and in building and maintaining places of worship, especially the tabernacle and the temple.

Prophets in Old Testament times held the Melchizedek Priesthood, as noted above (TPJS, p. 181); and some of them held special priesthood keys for the gathering of Israel (see ISRAEL: GATHERING OF ISRAEL) and the SEALING powers of eternal ordinances (D&C 132:38–39). In an extension of their mortal ministries, Moses and Elijah delivered these keys to Jesus' apostles on the MOUNT OF TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. 17:1–8) and, along with ELIAS, delivered them also to Joseph Smith in the Kirtland Temple in 1836 (D&C 110). In general, however, the various PRIESTHOOD OFFICES of the Aaronic and Melchizedek priesthoods were not held by Israelite men from the time of Moses to the New Testament period.

Although the Melchizedek Priesthood was limited to those prophets specially called and commissioned, the Aaronic Priesthood continued “with the house of Aaron among the children of Israel” from Aaron to JOHN THE BAPTIST (D&C 84:26–27; TPJS, p. 319). However, after MALACHI (c. 400 B.C.), political corruption occurred involving the office of high priest. Persian, Greek, and Roman rulers sought to control the Jewish priesthood office by making the high priest a political appointee of the state rather than a true and righteous descendant of Aaron. This political manipulation led to rival claimants to priesthood offices and authority, with particular opposition between the Sadducees of Jerusalem and the Essenes of Qumran.

CHRIST'S MINISTERS. John the Baptist was a priesthood bridge between the Old and New Testament periods. Being of priestly descent through both parents, he was a legal administrator of the LAW OF MOSES, yet he received additional blessings and keys to usher in Christ's ministry, being set apart to this power by an angel of God when he was eight days old (D&C 84:28).

As Jesus organized his Church, he established a religious order with new priesthood leaders. While he retained features of the earlier structures such as the Twelve (cf. Num. 1:4, 44; Ezra 8:24–30) and the SEVENTY (cf. Ex. 24:1–11), he gave new titles and ordained new offices, especially the apostles, who served as special witnesses of his ministry and resurrection. Upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, Christ's Church was administered by EVANGELISTS, SEVENTIES, ELDERS, BISHOPS, priests, TEACHERS, and DEACONS (Eph. 4:11–16; 1 Cor. 12:12–28; see also ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH IN NEW TESTAMENT TIMES).

As part of the RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS (Acts 3:21; cf. Moses 6:7), The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints received elements from all the biblical priesthood periods, with the greater part coming from the pattern and offices of Christ's New Testament Church. Under the direction of modern prophets, priesthood holders of both the Melchizedek and Aaronic orders officiate today in a variety of offices and callings, continuing God's pattern of administering to his children's needs.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- De Vaux, Roland. Ancient Israel, Vol. 2. New York, 1965.
- Palmer, Lee A. Aaronic Priesthood Through the Centuries. Salt Lake City, 1964.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS 3:80–90.
- Sperry, Sidney B. Doctrine and Covenants Compendium, pp. 388–93, 567–70. Salt Lake City, 1960.
- Tvedtnes, John A. The Church of the Old Testament, pp. 30–44. Salt Lake City, 1980.
- Widtsoe, John A. Priesthood and Church Government, pp. 1–25. Salt Lake City, 1939.

VICTOR L. LUDLOW

---

PRIESTHOOD BLESSINGS

Priesthood blessings are pronounced in connection with most of the essential ORDINANCES of the gospel: blessing and naming children; CONFIRMATION; ORDINATION TO THE PRIESTHOOD; SETTING APART; and other occasions. In addition, any person may request a blessing at the hands of a worthy Melchizedek Priesthood bearer at any time. The person who does so is usually seeking inspired counsel and asking for official prayer and blessing under the hands of one who is authorized and discerning.

In The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the PRIESTHOOD is not a centralized elite. Ideally, the priesthood is held by every husband and father. The home is viewed as his constant and most important ministry, regardless of the offices he may hold in the Church. One who seeks a priesthood blessing is encouraged to approach father or brother, BISHOP or HOME TEACHERS rather than prominent Church authorities. In principle and in practice, this recognizes the diversity of spiritual gifts, the individual heritage of faith, and the shared sanctity of priesthood service.

Priesthood blessings are usually conferred by LAYING ON OF HANDS, which is seen as the New Testament pattern. Exceptions are found in administering the SACRAMENT and in apostolic blessings given to a congregation (see IIC 2:120; 5:473).

All priesthood blessings are given in the name of Jesus Christ and by authority of the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD (so named to avoid the too frequent repetition of its sacred title [D&C 107:4]). The blessing process may vary according to circumstance and individual need: e.g., the extent of preparation, the use of consecrated OIL, involvement of other persons as participants or witnesses, recording or writing the blessing (often the counsel is to "write it in your heart"), and whether and when further blessings may be appropriate. Blessings given by a father to his wife are known as husband's blessings, to his children as father's blessings; those given by a PATRIARCH, as PATRIARCHAL BLESSINGS; when related to a personal crisis or need, as comfort blessings; those given in response to illness or injury, as administration to the sick.

Priesthood blessings are to be "spoken with care, and by constraint of the Spirit" (D&C 63:64). To refuse to give a blessing when one is called or to hood office by making the high priest a political appointee of the state rather than a true and righteous descendant of Aaron. This political manipulation led to rival claimants to priesthood offices and authority, with particular opposition between the Sadducees of Jerusalem and the Essenes of Qumran.

CHRIST'S MINISTERS. John the Baptist was a priesthood bridge between the Old and New Testament periods. Being of priestly descent through both parents, he was a legal administrator of the LAW OF MOSES, yet he received additional blessings and keys to usher in Christ's ministry, being set apart to this power by an angel of God when he was eight days old (D&C 84:28).

As Jesus organized his Church, he established a religious order with new priesthood leaders. While he retained features of the earlier structures such as the Twelve (cf. Num. 1:4, 44; Ezra 8:24–30) and the SEVENTY (cf. Ex. 24:1–11), he gave new titles and ordained new offices, especially the apostles, who served as special witnesses of his ministry and resurrection. Upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, Christ's Church was administered by EVANGELISTS, SEVENTIES, ELDERS, BISHOPS, priests, TEACHERS, and DEACONS (Eph. 4:11–16; 1 Cor. 12:12–28; see also ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH IN NEW TESTAMENT TIMES).

As part of the RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS (Acts 3:21; cf. Moses 6:7), The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints received elements from all the biblical priesthood periods, with the greater part coming from the pattern and offices of Christ's New Testament Church. Under the direction of modern prophets, priesthood holders of both the Melchizedek and Aaronic orders officiate today in a variety of offices and callings, continuing God's pattern of administering to his children's needs.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- De Vaux, Roland. Ancient Israel, Vol. 2. New York, 1965.
- Palmer, Lee A. Aaronic Priesthood Through the Centuries. Salt Lake City, 1964.
- Smith, Joseph Fielding. DS 3:80–90.
- Sperry, Sidney B. Doctrine and Covenants Compendium, pp. 388–93, 567–70. Salt Lake City, 1960.
- Tvedtnes, John A. The Church of the Old Testament, pp. 30–44. Salt Lake City, 1980.
- Widtsoe, John A. Priesthood and Church Government, pp. 1–25. Salt Lake City, 1939.

VICTOR L. LUDLOW

---

PRIESTHOOD BLESSINGS

Priesthood blessings are pronounced in connection with most of the essential ORDINANCES of the gospel: blessing and naming children; CONFIRMATION; ORDINATION TO THE PRIESTHOOD; SETTING APART; and other occasions. In addition, any person may request a blessing at the hands of a worthy Melchizedek Priesthood bearer at any time. The person who does so is usually seeking inspired counsel and asking for official prayer and blessing under the hands of one who is authorized and discerning.

In The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the PRIESTHOOD is not a centralized elite. Ideally, the priesthood is held by every husband and father. The home is viewed as his constant and most important ministry, regardless of the offices he may hold in the Church. One who seeks a priesthood blessing is encouraged to approach father or brother, BISHOP or HOME TEACHERS rather than prominent Church authorities. In principle and in practice, this recognizes the diversity of spiritual gifts, the individual heritage of faith, and the shared sanctity of priesthood service.

Priesthood blessings are usually conferred by LAYING ON OF HANDS, which is seen as the New Testament pattern. Exceptions are found in administering the SACRAMENT and in apostolic blessings given to a congregation (see IIC 2:120; 5:473).

All priesthood blessings are given in the name of Jesus Christ and by authority of the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD (so named to avoid the too frequent repetition of its sacred title [D&C 107:4]). The blessing process may vary according to circumstance and individual need: e.g., the extent of preparation, the use of consecrated OIL, involvement of other persons as participants or witnesses, recording or writing the blessing (often the counsel is to "write it in your heart"), and whether and when further blessings may be appropriate. Blessings given by a father to his wife are known as husband's blessings, to his children as father's blessings; those given by a PATRIARCH, as PATRIARCHAL BLESSINGS; when related to a personal crisis or need, as comfort blessings; those given in response to illness or injury, as administration to the sick.

Priesthood blessings are to be "spoken with care, and by constraint of the Spirit" (D&C 63:64). To refuse to give a blessing when one is called or to attempt to give a blessing when one is unworthy is to “trifle with [sacred] things” (D&C 8:10).

In giving blessings, priesthood bearers are constantly admonished to seek the Spirit. The Prophet Joseph SMITH taught, “The Holy Ghost is God’s messenger to administer in all those priesthoods” (TPJS, p. 323). The officiator strives for the promptings and impressions of the HOLY GHOST, and these may not be what he anticipated or planned. By fasting and prayer, by experience in the things of God, and by patience, he learns to distinguish authentic inspiration from subjective factors that distort or mislead. He strives during the blessing to use appropriate language to express the ideas that impress his mind by the Spirit. The process is often strenuous: Jesus felt virtue go out of him at the touch of the woman of faith (Mark 5:25–34). Similarly, one who seeks to serve in blessing others “is liable to become weakened” (TPJS, p. 281).

Recipients are charged to unite their faith in God and Christ with the faith of others present, and to bring contrite and teachable hearts. Concentration and communion are required for both receiving and understanding blessings. As blessings are pronounced, the recipients are to take to heart the counsel offered, and adjust their lives accordingly. In cases where the recipients are unconscious, infirm, or out of touch, the main burden of faith is upon the person pronouncing the blessing, and other concerned persons present.

The efficacy of priesthood blessings is not presumed to be automatic or formulaic, or simply a matter of saying the right words. Priesthood authority does not entitle one to act independently of God, but rather bestows the right to seek the mind and will of God and then to transmit it through the priesthood blessing. Neither can a blessing be given with intent to infringe on the recipient’s own agency but “only by persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned” (D&C 121:41). These are called “the principles of righteousness” (D&C 121:36). Unless they are complied with, the blessing “is of no use, but withdraws” (TPJS, p. 148).

Latter-day Saints cherish priesthood blessings as a vital source of grace in facing the crossroads, crises, setbacks, anxieties, and decisions of life. Those who give and receive blessings at the hands of the priesthood in this spirit are lifted up and sustained, and healed in mind, body, and spirit.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

“Performing Priesthood Blessings and Ordinances.” Melchizedek Priesthood Personal Study Guide, 1988, pp. 151–55.

J. ELLIOT CAMERON

---

PRIESTHOOD COUNCILS

